DÆDALUS, dæ-da-lus, an Athenian, son of Eupalamus, was the most ingenious artist of his age. To him we are supposed to be indebted for the invention of the wedge and many other mechanical instruments, as also the sails of ships. Having killed, from jealousy, his nephew Talus, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos gave him a cordial reception. Here he constructed a famous labyrinth for Minos, in which he himself and his son were subsequently confined; when he made for them wings of feathers and wax for their use, and they took their flight from Crete. The heat of the sun, however, melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, who flew too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean which, from him, has been called the Icarian sea. The father alighted at Cumæ, in Italy, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He was ultimately put to death by Cocalus, who had been threatened with war by Minos. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass, at a distance, for wings.

DAGOBERT I., dag-o-bair, king of France, was recognised as king of Austrasia in 622, and on the death of his father, Clotaire II., in 623, became possessed of Neustria, and in 631 of Aquitania, on the death of his brother Caribert. He subdued the Saxons, Gascons, and Bretons; but tarnished the splendour of his exploits by his cruel and dissolute habits. He founded St. Denis, near Paris, in 622, and was there buried, 633; B. 602.—Dagobert II. succeeded to the kingdom of Austrasia in 655; assassinated 679.—Dagobert III. succeeded his father, Childbert III. 711; D. 715.

, Louis James Mandé, da-gair, the inventor of the diorama and daguerreotypes, or sun-pictures, which take from him its name. He was originally an artist, and became a scene-painter to the opera at Paris, assisting M. Prévost in producing his panoramas of the great cities of the world. His ingenuity, however, was continually prompting him to make new efforts in his art; and in 1822, in conjunction with Bouton, he perfected and exhibited the first diorama, which had a great success. For seventeen years he continued in this line, when he discovered the means of delineating objects by the chemical action of light. Something similar had been attempted before, by various chemists; but it remained for Daguerre to work out the discovery. To him belongs the merit of producing sun-pictures perfect upon metallic plates. In 1839 he made an exhibition of these pictures, and was named an officer of the Legion of Honour. At the same time, on condition of publishing his method, an annuity of 6000 francs for life was voted to him by the government, and the process of daguerreotyping became generally known. B. at Cormeille, France, 1789; D. at Petit-Brie-sur-Marne, 1851, where a monument has been erected to his memory.

DAHL, Michael, dahl, a Swedish portrait painter, who came to England, and met with great success. He had the honour to paint the portrait of Queen Anne, and was, during her reign and that of George I., the rival of Sir Godfrey Kneller. B. at Stockholm, 1669; D. in London, 1743.

DAHL, John Christian, a distinguished Norwegian landscape-painter, whose views of Italian and Tyrolean scenery were universally admired. In rendering the wild grandeur exhibited by his native country he was equally successful. B. at Bergen, 1788; D. 1857.

DAHLBERG, Eric, dahl-bairg, a Swedish general, who, after studying the science of fortification, was, in 1843, appointed an engineer. Gustavus Adolphus sent him to superintend the works for the defence of Thorn, and he attended that monarch in the Polish war. By his advice, the king undertook the enterprise of marching his army across the Great Belt, when frozen over, in 1657, whereby he extended his conquests to Copenhagen. In 1680 Dahlberg was ennobled, and in 1689 appointed commandant of Malmö, and superintendent of fortifications. He so greatly improved these, as to be called the Vauban of Sweden. In 1690 he was made governor of Livonia, and died at Stockholm in 1703. B. 1625.—He published "Succia Antiqua et Hodierna," 3 vols. folio, 1700.

DALRYMP, Isaac, dahl-be, a self-taught mathematician, who, in 1772, went to London, and received the appointment of usher to Archbishop Tenison's grammar-school, then near Charing Cross. Here he got acquainted with many celebrated men of science, and subsequently became mathematical master of the naval school at Chelsea. He was afterwards engaged in the trigonometrical survey of England, and in 1799 was appointed professor of mathematics in the senior department of the Royal Military College at High Wycombe. On the removal of that institution to Farnham, Surrey, he accompanied it; but infirmities were now fast increasing upon him, and he was forced to resign his situation. B. in Gloucestershire, 1744; D. at Farnham, 1824. Besides other writings of less collective importance he composed for the Military College DALE, David, dale, an extensive manufacturer and philanthropist, who, having acquired a considerable fortune, devoted it to the encouragement of industry and the improvement of the condition of the labouring classes. With this view he erected the cotton mills at New Lanark. The system he adopted was to give the workpeople an interest in the business by making them participators in the profits. They were generally engaged for a specified number of years, during which they were provided with food, lodging, and clothing; and, at the termination of their engagement, received the share of the surplus profits apportioned to them. Education and the care of their morals also formed prominent features in Mr. Dale's system of treating his workpeople. Mr. Dale likewise attempted, though unsuccessfully, to introduce the cotton manufacture into the county of Sutherland, in the Scottish Highlands. The works at New Lanark were long under the management of the celebrated Robert Owen, who had married Mr. Dale's daughter, and who succeeded to them on the death of his father-in-law. Mr. Owen further developed the system in operation in accordance with his socialist or community theories, but it did not succeed, and the New Lanark works afterwards passed out of his hands.—(See OWEN, Robert.)—Mr. Dale was born at Stewarton, Scotland, in 1733; and died at Glasgow in 1806.

DALL, Rev. Thomas, M.A., canon of St. Paul's, London, was educated at Christ's Hospital and Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, and was ordained in 1822. He kept a school for some time at Greenwich, and also at Beckenham, Kent; and had for his first curacy St. Michael's, Cornhill. He subsequently held some other church preferments; from 1823 to 1830, was professor of English Language and Literature at the London University; and from 1830 to 1839 occupied a similar chair at King's College, London. Sir Robert Peel, in 1835, appointed Mr. Dale rector of St. Bride's, Fleet-street; and, in 1816, promoted him to a canonry in St. Paul's and the rectorship of St. Pancras. He resigned the latter post after an incumbency of 14 years, and was appointed to the living of Thierfield, Herts. While at Cambridge, Mr. Dale published his "Widow of Nain," "The Outlaw of Taurus," and "Irad and Adah: a Tale of the Flood." Between 1819 and 1822 he published three successive volumes of poems, which, after having passed through several editions separately, were in 1836, collected into a single volume. He also gave to the world a translation of Sophocles, "The Sabbath Companion," "The Good Shepherd; a Commentary on the Twenty-third Psalm;" "The Domestic Chaplain and Family Liturgy," besides several volumes of sermons preached at St. Bride's, before the university of Cambridge, and on other occasions; and an edition of Cowper, with notes, critical and biographical. DALHOUSIE, James Andrew Broun Ramsay, tenth earl and first marquis of dal-hoo'-se, a modern English statesman, was educated at Harrow, and afterwards entered Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1833. In 1832 he became Lord Ramsay, by the death of his elder brothers, and in 1834 contested the representation of Edinburgh in the House of Commons, but was unsuccessful. In 1837, however, he was returned for Haddingtonshire. In the succeeding year, he was called, by the death of his father, to the House of Lords, and in 1843 entered upon official life under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel. His first office was that of vice-president of the Board of Trade, of which he became president in the following year. In this capacity his business habits were so eminent, and his reforms so judicious, that, on the accession of Lord John Russell to power, in 1846, he was requested to keep his appointment, which he accordingly did. In 1847, on the recall of Lord Hardinge from India, Lord Dalhousie was appointed governor-general. He had now an opportunity of developing those administrative talents with which he was endowed. On reaching Calcutta, he proclaimed that his policy was to acquire equally direct dominion over the territories of the native princes, as the British already had over those of other parts of India in their possession. Accordingly, on a revolt taking place in Mooltan, he marched a force into the North-western provinces, and, after defeating the Sikhs and Afghans, annexed the Punjab. In two years afterwards, the king of Ava provoked an expedition to be sent against him, when the coast of Burmah was taken by the British, and in 1852 Pegu was incorporated with their dominions. After this, a series of annexations were made, which greatly enlarged the British empire in India. Nagpore, Sattara, Jhansi, Berar, and Oude were successively appropriated, either on account of the tyranny and misrule with which they had been governed, or from the failure of their lawful heirs among the native dynasties. Whilst these events were taking place, the internal resources of the country were being energetically developed and improved. A uniform system of cheap postage was introduced, and a large portion of India intersected by railways; the Ganges Canal was cut, and grand trunk roads constructed through various parts. The energy of Lord Dalhousie's administration was apparent in every direction, when, with a broken constitution, he returned to England in 1860. In 1849 he had been created a marquis for his successes in the Punjab; and previous to his return he had, on the death of the duke of Wellington, been appointed to the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, and the East India Company also settled on him a pension of £5000 a year. n. 1812; d. 1860.

DALLAS, Sir Robert, dal'-as, a distinguished English lawyer, was the eldest son of Robert Dallas, of Kensington, and after being educated at Geneva along with his brother George, was entered at the Temple, called to the bar, and soon made himself conspicuous by his talent. He was engaged in the defence of Warren Hastings, for his efforts on which occasion he obtained the silk gown of a king's counsel. He was elected to the House of Commons for St. Michael's, Cornwall, in 1803, but, being appointed chief-justice of Chester, he vacated his seat, and was subsequently returned for Kirkcaldy. He was appointed one of the puisne judges of the Common Pleas in 1813, and succeeded Vicary Gibbs as president of the same court in 1818. In 1823 he resigned his seat on the bench, and died December 25, 1824.

servant of the East India Company, having sailed for Calcutta when only eighteen years of age. He soon made a name in India, having published at Calcutta, shortly after his arrival a clever poem called "The Indian Guide." Warren Hastings now took him in hand, and got him appointed superintendent of the collections at Ragheshay, an office which he filled most satisfactorily for several years. Being obliged to return to England on account of his health, he was deputed by the residents in Calcutta to present a petition to the House of Commons against Pitt's India Bill. He published a pamphlet in vindication of Warren Hastings in 1789; in 1793 he wrote a work upon the state of affairs and the policy of a war with France, in which he strongly denounced the revolution in that country. This secured him the favour of Pitt, who had this piece and others by Dallas reprinted for general distribution. Sir George afterwards wrote a series of letters to Lord Moira on the state of Ireland, which originally appeared in the "Antijacobin." In 1798 he was made a baronet; in the following year he published a pamphlet against concluding peace with the "present regicidal government of France," and was soon after returned to Parliament for Newport, Isle of Wight. His subsequent publications were "A Letter to Sir W. Pulteney on the Subject of the Trade between India and Europe," "A Defence of the Wars of the Marquis Wellesley in the Deccan and Hindustan," and a tract on the religious conversion of the Hindus. n. 1758; p. 1833.

DALLAS, George Mifflin, an American lawyer and statesman, was the son of James Alexander Dallas, secretary of the treasury and of war under Jefferson and Madison respectively. The family from which Mr. Dallas sprung has produced several men distinguished in literature, law, statesmanship, &c., in America; while the European branch boasts the names of the above-mentioned Sir Robert and Sir George Dallas; and the sister of the subject of this notice intermarried into the Byron family. George Mifflin Dallas was bred to the bar, and, after acting as private secretary to Mr. Gallatin in his mission to St. Petersburg, in 1813, to negotiate peace with England through the mediation of the czar, returned to America in 1815, and began to practise his profession. He held some legal offices in his native state of Pennsylvania, and in 1831 began his political career as one of the representatives in congress of his own state, attaching himself to the democratic party, and taking an active part in the debates of the house. Mr. Van Buren sent him to St. Petersburg as minister, in 1837, where he remained till 1841, when, on the election of General Harrison to the presidential chair, Mr. Dallas returned home and again devoted himself to the practice of his profession. At the next election he was chosen vice-president, Mr. Polk being the president; and in 1846, as president of the senate, he gave his casting vote against the protective tariff bill which was then the great question of the day. He was minister to the court of St. James under Mr. Buchanan's presidency, and in that capacity had charge of arranging the central American question with the British government. He resigned his post on the election of Mr. Lincoln as president. n. at Philadelphia, July 10, 1792. n. 1865.

DALRYMPLE, James, dall'-rim-pel, first Viscount Stair, was a native of Ayrshire, and received his education first at the parish school of Manehline, and afterwards in the university of Glasgow. He served as a captain in Glencairn's regiment during the civil war; was appointed professor of philosophy at Glasgow in 1641, and while in this position studied civil law with a view to the bar. He resigned his chair in 1647, went to Edinburgh, and was admitted an advocate in February, 1648. He was next year chosen secretary to the commissioner sent by the Scots to negotiate for the return of Charles II., and held the same post again in 1650. Cromwell recommended him to Monk for a seat on the Scottish bench, and in 1657 he was accordingly invested with the judicial ermine. Dalrymple was knighted at the Restoration, created a baronet in 1684, appointed president of the court of session in 1671, which office he held till 1681, when displeasing the government on the subject of the Test Act, he was superseded, and obliged to retire to Holland. He published "Institutions of the Law of Scotland," in 1681; and, while resident at Leyden, transmitted to the Edinburgh press "Decisions of the Court of Session from 1661 to 1681;" and published at Leyden in 1686, "Philosophia Nova Experimentalis." He returned to England with the prince of Orange, with whom he had become a favourite in Holland, and was reinstated in the presidency of the Scottish court. He was made a peer by the title of Viscount Stair in 1690; was reappointed lord advocate; and, in 1691, became one of the principal secretaries of state, an office which he continued to fill till the parliamentary inquiry into the massacre of Glencoe drove him from office in 1695. In the same year he published a work entitled "A Vindication of the Divine Perfections;" and died shortly afterwards. n. 1619.

DALRYMPLE, David, Lord Hailes, a Scotch judge, who, after finishing his education at Eton and Utrecht, was called, in 1748, to the Scotch bar, and in 1778 appointed a judge, on which occasion he took the title of Lord Hailes. In this capacity he was eminently distinguished for the diligence with which he fulfilled his duties; but it is on account of his labours in the field of literature that he is chiefly celebrated. He published a number of books in the form of memoirs and letters, relating to the history of Britain in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; "Remarks on the History of Scotland," 12mo; "Annals of Scotland," 4to, 2 vols.; "Remains of Christian Antiquity," 3 vols.; several Memoirs intended for a Biographia Scotica; papers in the "World" and "Mirror," and a great many other works, every one of them bearing the stamp of considerable merit. n. at Edinburgh, 1726; p. 1792.

DALRYMPLE, Alexander, an eminent hydrographer, who, by the force of his talents, raised himself to considerable eminence in the service of the East India Company. He endeavoured to establish friendly commercial relations between the sultan of Sooloo and the Company, but was unsuccessful. He returned to England with a like object in view, but failed there also. In 1775 he again went to Madras, where he had been appointed a member of council, and one of the committee of circuit; but in 1777 was, with several others, recalled to leave his conduct investigated regarding some of his proceedings. In 1779 he was appointed hydrographer to the Company, and in 1785, when a similar office was established by the Admiralty, it was given to Dalrymple. This appointment he held till 1808, when he was called upon to resign it on the ground of superannuation. This, however, he refused to do, and was dismissed. b. at New Hailes, Scotland, 1737; d. from vexation, a month after his dismissal from office, 1808.

DALTON, John, dāl'-ton, a distinguished mathematician, meteorologist, and natural philosopher, who, from humble circumstances, gradually worked his way into public notice and honourable fame. In his thirteenth year he kept a school at Eaglesfield, Cumberland, and in his fifteenth, removed to Kendal to fill the situation of usher in the school of his cousin, George Bewley. In 1793 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the New College at Manchester, which he held until the removal of that institution to York in 1799. He continued to reside in Manchester, and gave lessons in private seminaries, and also occupied himself with lecturing upon his favourite subjects. He also filled the appointments of secretary and vice-president to the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and in 1817 became its president, to which distinction he was elected every succeeding year until his death. Meanwhile he had long been known as a contributor to the "Lady's Diary," "The Transactions of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society," and other serials; but it was not till 1803 that he commenced seriously to work out his grand discovery of the atomic theory. In the following year he explained it to Dr. Thomas Thomson, and subsequently in some of his own lectures, delivered in London and several other of the principal towns of England. In 1808 appeared the first volume of his "New System of Chemical Philosophy," which, in 1810, was followed by the second volume. In both of these volumes he treated of the atomic theory, which proved one of the most important contributions that had yet been made to the science of chemistry. By it, the constituents of any article could be regulated with perfect accuracy, and the knowledge of chemical combinations reduced to an amazing degree of simplicity and certainty. It is upon this discovery that his fame rests, as it at once places him amongst the most original inquirers and thinkers of his day. For it the first gold medal of the Royal Society was awarded to him. In 1832 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the title of D.C.L.; in the following year William IV. gave him a pension of £150 a year, which, in 1836, was raised to £300. In 1834 the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and in 1833, £2000 was subscribed by his friends in Manchester for a statue to him, to be sculptured by Chantrey, and placed in the entrance-hall of the Royal Institution of that city. In 1821 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and was also a member of various other learned societies. b. at Eaglesfield, near Cockermouth, Cumberland, 1766; d. at Manchester, 1844.

DAMASUS I., POPE, dām'-a-sus, was a native of Portugal, and rose to the pontifical chair in 366. He laboured to reform the morals of his time, and extend the discipline of the church. The Arians were opposed by him in several councils. b. 304; d. 384.—DAMASUS II. was elected pope in 1048, and only survived his election twenty-three days.

DAMER, Hon. Anne Seymour, dai'-mer, whose talents as a sculptor have rendered her name famous, was the daughter of field-marshal Conway, and was, in 1787, married to the Hon. John Damer. Little felicity, however, followed her union, Mr. Damer having put an end to his own existence in 1776. Mrs. Damer then devoted herself to the cultivation of her taste for the fine arts—a taste which had distinguished her even in youth. She studied under Cerrachi, the sculptor, and soon became well known for the chaste and classical productions of her chisel. A statue of George III., in the Register Office, Edinburgh; a bust of her mother, the countess of Aylesbury, in Tunbridge Church, Kent; and the bust of Lord Nelson in the council chamber at Guildhall, London, may be named as specimens of her works, of which she produced a great many. b. 1748; d. 1828.

DAMOCLES, dām'-o-klee, a flatterer of Dionysius the tyrant, whom he pronounced the happiest man on earth. This prince, in order to convince him of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed, invited him to a banquet, and caused him to be arrayed and treated as a monarch. During the entertainment, a sword was suspended from the ceiling, over the head of Damocles, by a single horsehair; and thus was typified the happiness of a tyrant.

DAMON and PYTHIAS, dai'-mon, two Pythagorean philosophers of Syracuse, rendered memorable by their friendship. Dionysius the tyrant having condemned Damon to death, permission was granted him to return to his native place, in order to settle his affairs, Pythias remaining in his stead. The hour fixed for the execution arrived, and Pythias was about to suffer the punishment; but Damon returned in time, and a generous contest ensued between them as to who should be the victim. Dionysius was so touched by this faithful friendship, that he pardoned Damon, and asked to be admitted as a third friend. Lived in the 4th century b.c.

DAMPIER, William, dām'-peer, an English navigator, who was early sent to sea, and first sailed in a Bristol privateer. After cruising a considerable time on the American coast, and taking several prizes, principally from the Spaniards, Dampier went aboard another buccaneering ship. Not meeting with success, he sailed for the East Indies, where he left the vessel, and proceeded to the English factory at Acheen. Afterwards he became gunner to the factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he embarked for England, and arrived there the same year, when he published his "Voyage round the World," which was well received by the public. He had now made himself known, and was sent out on a voyage of discovery to the South Seas. In this expedition he explored the north and north-west coasts of Australia, with Shark's Bay. He also explored New Guinea, New Britain, and New Ireland; but, on his return home, was wrecked on Ascension Island. In 1701, however, he arrived in England, and published an account of his voyage. He continued to follow the sea till 1711, after which his life is lost in obscurity. b. in Somersetshire, 1652. There is a portrait of Dampier in the Trinity House. His "Voyages" bear the stamp of truth, and are written in a vivid style of narrative.

DANA, Richard Henry, dai'-na, an American writer, who was educated at Harvard College, Massachusetts, with a view to his following the legal profession. Delicacy of health, however, forced him to quit his legal studies, when he applied himself to the more congenial pursuits of literature and politics. In 1817 he became a contributor to the "North American Review," and, from the attractive character of his articles, was introduced to a share in its management. This continued till 1820, when his connexion with that periodical ceased. He now started "The Idle Man," which lived only through one volume, and in which his "Tom Thornton" "m.

published a collection of his poems and prose writings, and another edition in 1850. Mr. Dana, however, principally confined himself to miscellaneous writing, and to occasional lecturing on poetry. b. at Cambridge, near Boston, 1787.

DANBY, Francis, A.R.A., dān'-be, a modern artist, received his earliest lessons in design at the School of Arts in Dublin, and after acquiring some distinction in that city, he, in 1820, removed to England, and took up his residence at Bristol, whence he sent his pictures annually to the exhibition of the Royal Academy, but with little success till 1824, when his "Sunset at Sea after a Storm" attracted considerable notice. This picture was purchased by Sir Thomas Lawrence. The following year he sent his "Delivery of Israel out of Egypt," which was highly thought of, and he became an associate of the Academy. He now worked hard, and exhibited several pictures, which increased his reputation. In 1829, on account of some domestic affairs, he left England, and was absent for ten or twelve years, when he returned, and began to exhibit again. He had now attained the summit of his art, and continued to produce a great many first-class paintings. Among these may be named his "Morning at Rhodes," "The Enchanted Island," "The Deluge," "A Holy Family," "Caius Marius amid the Ruins of Carthage," "The Departure of Ulysses from Ithaca," and "A Wild Seashore at Sunset." b. at Wexford, in Ireland, 1793. d. 1861.

DANCE, George, jun., dance, an eminent architect, whose first work was the prison of Newgate, begun by him in 1770. He also designed St. Luke's Hospital and the front of Guildhall, which, as an artistic performance, is remarkable only for its absurdity. He was also the architect of the British Institution, formerly the Shakspeare Gallery, Pall Mall, and the theatre at Bath. He held the appointment of city surveyor till 1816, when he resigned in favour of Mr. W. Montague, a pupil of his own. b. in London, 1740; d. in 1825; and was buried near Wren and Rennie in St. Paul's Cathedral.

DANCEZ, Daniel, dān'-ser, an extraordinary English miser, who, in 1736, succeeded to a considerable estate. Notwithstanding this, he led the life of a hermit for more than half a century. His only dealing with mankind arose from the sale of his hay; and he was seldom seen, except when gathering logs of wood from the common, or old iron or sheep's dung from under the hedges. He was frequently robbed, and therefore shut up the door of his house, and got in and out by an upper window, making use of a ladder, which he drew up after him. His sister, who lived with him many years, left him, at her death, a considerable increase to his wealth; and, on this occasion, he bought a second-hand pair of black stockings to put himself in decent mourning. This was an article of luxury, for, at other times, Daniel wore handbands on his legs. b. 1714, near Harrow, in Middlesex; d. 1795; and left his estates to Lady Tempest, who had been very charitable to both him and his sister, under the notion that they were poor.

DANCOURT, Florence Carton, dang'-kooor, a French dramatist of the time of Louis XIV., by whom he was patronized. He was originally intended for the church, but preferred the bar, which he in turn abandoned for the profession of actor and author. He was a great favourite with Louis, in whose service he passed thirty-eight years, and then retired to his estate in Berri, where he passed the remainder of his life in retirement. His works, principally farces, the scenes of which are laid in low life, occupy six volumes. b. at Fontainebleau, 1661; d. 1726.

DANDOLO, Enrico, dān'-do-lo, doge of Venice, to which office he was elected in 1192, being then 84 years old. He raised the Venetian republic to a considerable height by the vigour and wisdom of his government. In 1201 he engaged in the crusade, and conquered Zara, which had revolted against the Venetians. In 1203, though nearly 90 years of age, he greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Constantinople, on the taking of which he was created despot of Romania. d. in 1205.

DANDOLO, Andrea, doge of Venice, extended the commerce of the republic by a union with Egypt, which produced a war between the Venetians and the Genoese, which lasted several years. He was a man of letters, wrote a "History of Venice," and corresponded with Petrarch. b. about 1307; d. in 1354.

DANICAN, Andrew. (See PHILIDOR.)

DANIEL, Samuel, dān'-yel, an English poet and historian, who became groom of the privy chamber to the queen of James I. At the close of his life he retired to a farm in his native county, where he died in 1619. b. in Somersetshire, 1583. His poems and dramatic pieces were collected, and printed in 2 vols. 12mo, 1718. The most important are an heroic poem in six books, on the Wars of York and Lancaster; "Musophilus," a very elegant composition; a tragedy of "Cleopatra;" and the "Complaint of Rosamond." Besides these, there are several masques, sonnets, odes, and epistles. He also wrote the "History of England to the End of the Reign of Edward III.," which, according to some authors, is the best of all his works.

DANIEL, Gabriel, dā'-ne-el, a French historian, who entered among the Jesuits at the age of eighteen, and became historiographer of France under Louis XIV., who gave him a pension of 2000 francs. One of his first productions was a "Voyage to the World of Desartees," which has been translated into several languages. His greatest performance, however, is "The History of France," published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713, but afterwards enlarged to 7 vols. 4to, 1723. This work is said to have little merit as a whole. It is rather a history of the kings than of the people, is feeble in style, and full of inaccuracies. He also wrote several miscellaneous and theological treatises. b. at Rouen, 1643; d. at Paris, 1723.

ing between Cape Comorin and Serinagur, in the Himalaya mountains. They were ten years engaged in this task, and many of their views were subsequently published in a work called "Oriental Scenery," which appeared, completed, in 6 vols. folio in 1808. As an engraver, Mr. Daniell produced several other works of great merit, and between 1814 and 1825 was occupied in getting up a work entitled a "Voyage round Great Britain," for which he spent the summer of every year in making notes and collecting drawings. Besides these, he painted in oil many large pictures of scenes in India, and, in conjunction with Mr. Paris, produced, in 1832, a panorama of Madras, and, more recently, "The City of Lucknow." B. 1760; p. 1837.

DANIELL, John Frederick, a distinguished chemist and meteorologist, who commenced life as a sugar-refiner, but, becoming acquainted with Professor Brande, they, together, started the "Quarterly Journal of Science and Art," and superintended the first twenty volumes of that serial. In 1820 Daniell published an account of his new hydrometer, an instrument which has been of immense service to meteorology. In 1823 his "Meteorological Essays" appeared, and raised him still higher in the rank of men of science. His "Essay on Artificial Climates" appeared in 1824, and in 1831, on the establishment of King's College, he was made professor of chemistry. About this time a description of his new pyrometer was given to the world, and for the invention of this instrument, the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal. In 1837 he received the Copley medal for discovering a mode by which a continuous current of voltaic electricity may be maintained. In 1842 he received one of the Royal medals for a paper on the theory of salts. In 1843 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L., and in the same year a second edition of an "Introduction to Chemical Philosophy" appeared. With his professorship, he held other important appointments, and was for thirty years a member of the Royal Society. B. in London, 1780; d. 1845. Besides the above, he wrote a great many treatises upon subjects connected with his favourite studies.

DANNECKER, John Henry, dan'-ai-ker, a distinguished German sculptor, was born at Stuttgart of humble parentage, but early evincing a taste for the fine arts, and especially for sculpture, he attracted the notice of Charles Duke of Wurtemberg, who took him under his protection, and procured his admission to the Military Artistic Academy of Stuttgart, where he made such progress, that when only 16 years of age, he obtained a prize for his model of Milo. This was in 1774. He subsequently visited Paris and Rome, in the latter of which cities he met Canova, and derived much benefit from his conversation and instruction. Dannecker returned to Germany in 1790, and shortly afterwards completed the "Ariadne," one of his finest works. His noblest effort, however, is his statue of Christ, which occupied him eight years, was finished in 1824, and is now in the possession of the Emperor of Russia. Dannecker was especially eminent for the beauty of the features, the elegant pose, and the fine proportions of his statues. B. 1753; p. 1841.

DANTAN, Jean Pierre, dan'-tà, a French sculptor, whose father followed the same profession, and in whose studio he first imbibed the principles of his art. He subsequently studied under Bosio, and, when he first essayed on his own account, produced several bust and portrait studies, which excited considerable admiration, and at once brought him prominently into notice. His genius, however, led him into the study of caricature, when, about 1532, he captivated the humorous inclinations of the Parisians by a series of grotesque statuettes, which he called "Charges," of the principal celebrities of the capital. These were nothing more than exaggerated portraits of the leading features of the face, rendered with great ingenuity, yet without being ridiculous. They were new and striking, and "took" with the public amazingly. One of the peculiarities of these "Charges" was, that the heads were disproportionately large, whilst the bodies upon which they were placed were as disproportionately diminutive. They were executed with a view to correctness of attitude and expression, in so far as regarded the individuals they were intended to represent, although all about them was either exaggerated or diminished to an amusing degree of absurdity. The consequence to these "celebrities" in the hands of Danton was great popularity; and as many of them, such as Paganini, Lablache, Thalberg, were men continually before the public, it may be presumed that the genius of the sculptor helped to extend rather than circumscribe their fame. B. at Paris, 1800.

DANTE, or DURANTE, Alighieri, dau'-tai, the most distinguished of Italian poets, in early life served his country both as a soldier and a politician. He became one of the priori or chief magistrates of his native city of Florence about 1300, when the contentions of the two factions of the Bianchi and the Neri were at their height. He joined the former, which, being the weakest, was overcome in the struggle, and Dante falling with his party, was banished, and his property confiscated. For many years he was doomed to bear the sorrows of an exile. At length he was taken under the protection of Guido da Polenta, lord of Ravenna, under whose roof he passed the remainder of his days. B. at Florence, 1265; d. at Ravenna, 1321.—It was during his exile that Dante wrote his poem, of world-wide fame, "La Divina Commedia." It comprises three poems, or distinct acts—Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. The poet, describing the fate of souls after "shuffling off this mortal coil," places in hell and purgatory all those who are remarkable either for their crimes or vices (especially those who were the authors of his misfortunes), and in paradise those who have done good deeds on earth. He is supposed, in company with Virgil, to descend to the infernal regions, and there describe the various punishments of sinners, whilst Beatrice, his first-loved earthly companion, leads him through the delights of paradise. This extraordinary composition is one of the most sublime productions which have ever emanated from the genius of man, although many passages are full of extravagances, and others, from their peculiar allusions, are very obscure. "La Commedia" was the first poem ever written in the Italian language; before it, the Latin tongue was always employed. The best edition is that of Venice, 1757, 5 vols. 4to. This poem has found in all countries a host of editors, commentators, and translators. Dante also wrote some works in Latin, particularly one on Monarchy, and another, "De Vulgari Eloquentia." It is, however, on his "Divina Commedia" that his fame securely rests. A monument was erected to his memory in the church of Santo Croce, in Florence, and opened to public view on the 21th of March, 1830. This tardy justice to the memory of a great poet, by his countrymen, may have been stimulated by the reproving lines of Byron, in the 4th canto of "Childe Harold," beginning—

"Ungrateful Florence! Dante sleeps afar!"

DANTE, Jean Baptiste, of the same family as the poet, was remarkable for his mechanical genius, the most noted production of which was a pair of wings, which were so nicely constructed, that he could support himself in the air, and fly across the Thrasimeneus lake, near Perugia, of which city he was a native. This machine nearly immortalized him in a not very agreeable manner, however, for in an exhibition of its powers before the people, one of the wings broke, Dante fell upon the top of the church of Notre Dame, and severely shattered his thigh. This put an end to his aerial excursions, and he subsequently devoted himself to mathematics, of which he was professor at Venice. Died towards the end of the 15th century, before he had attained his 40th year.

DANTON, George Jacques, dan'-taeng, a leading demagogue in the French revolution, was a lawyer, and attained notoriety in that storm which brought prominently into notice a number of persons who would otherwise have passed their days in obscurity. He displayed extraordinary talents in the National Convention, and was a powerful speaker. He was the leader of the Cordeliers club, was accused of having instigated the massacre of the 2nd of September, and was a man of debauched character in private life. He was mainly instrumental in organizing the opposition to the Prussian invasion after the sanguinary scenes of September, his declaration, in the midst of general terror and confusion, that the "country was in danger, and could only be saved by boldness, incessant boldness, nothing but boldness," having roused the populace to make those efforts which resulted in the defeat of the Duke of Brunswick at Jena, and the commencement of that career of conquest and aggression which closed only on the field of Waterloo. Robespierre supplanted him, and he died under the guillotine in 1794. b. at Arcis-sur-Aube, 1759.

D'ARBLAY, Madame Frances, dar'-blai, was the daughter of Charles Burney, the author of the "History of Music," and, in 1783, married a French emigrant artillery officer, with whom she afterwards went to France, and who, on the restoration of the Bourbons, attained the rank of general. After the termination of the war, they returned to England, and settled at Bath, where her husband died in 1818. She continued to reside at Bath up to the time of her death. b. at Lynn Regis, 1752; d. at Bath, 1840.—Madame D'Arblay's maiden name was Frances Burney, and she gained considerable celebrity by her literary productions. These were mostly in the paths of fiction, in which she produced four novels, "Evelina," "Cecilia," "Camilla," and the "Wanderer." For this last she received £1500, although it is but an indifferent performance. She wrote several other works, among which were Memoirs of her father, which, in 1832, she published in 3 vols.

DARCET, John, dar'-sai, a French chemist and physician, who became professor of chemistry in the National Institute of Paris. He published several papers on the management of potteries, and the nature of earthen fit to be used in those manufactories. He also gave analyses of several minerals, and published the "State of the Pyrenees, and of the Causes of their Wasting." b. at Donazit, Landes, 1725; d. at Paris, 1801.

DARCY, Patrick. (See ARCY, Patrick d'.)

DARIUS THE MEDE, dä'-ri-us, the prince mentioned in the Scriptures, is, according to some, the same as Cyaxares, son of Astyages, and maternal uncle to Cyrus. d. at Babylon, about 548 B.C.

DARIUS I., king of Persia, was the son of Hystaspes. He entered into a conspiracy with six others against the usurper Smerdis, whom they slew, and then made an agreement that he should have the crown whose horse should neigh first in the morning. By a plan concerted, by the groom of Darius, a certain spot was fixed upon, and when the candidates came to the place, the horse of Darius suddenly neighed, in consequence of which he was saluted king. He subsequently took Babylon, after a siege of ten months, rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and restored the captive Jews to their own country. At Marathon his forces were defeated by the Greeks, on which he resolved to carry on the war in person, but died in the midst of his preparations, 485 B.C.; b. about 550 B.C.

DARIUS II. was surnamed Ochus or Nothus (bastard), because he was an illegitimate son of Artaxerxes. After the murder of Xerxes, he ascended the Persian throne, and espoused Parysatis, his sister, a cruel princess, by whom he had Artaxerxes Mnemon, afterwards king, and Cyrus the Younger. d. 404 B.C.

DARIUS III., surnamed Codomannus, was the last king of Persia. The peace of his kingdom was early disturbed by Alexander, who invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. The king of Persia met his adversary in person, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable, however, more for the splendour of its equipment than its military courage. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. Another was soon after fought near Issus, where Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead on the field, and took, among the prisoners of war, the mother, wife, and children of Darius. The darkness of the night favoured the retreat of Darius, who saved himself by flying in disguise. These losses weakened, but did not discourage, the Persian monarch, who assembled another more powerful army, with which he encountered his enemy at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander, and the superior valour of the Macedonians, ultimately prevailed over the effeminate Persians, and Darius fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now almost at an end. Bessus, the governor of Bactria, in hopes of succeeding him on the throne, attempted his life; and Darius was found by the Macedonians, in his chariot, expiring, covered with wounds, 330 B.C. In him the empire of Persia was extinguished, 229 years after it had been first founded by Cyrus the Great. (See ALEXANDER THE GREAT.)

of Lennox, the ill-fated husband of Mary queen of Scots, was married to her in 1565, and two years afterwards was blown up by gunpowder in a house where he was lying unwell, in the neighbourhood of Holyrood palace, at Edinburgh. (See MARY STUART.)

DARQUIER, Augustin, dar'-ke-ai, a French astronomer, and member of the National Institute, who early discovered a strong inclination for the study of astronomy, which he cultivated with ardour; purchasing instruments, and establishing an observatory in his own house. He also educated pupils, paid the expenses of calculations, and sought for no pecuniary aid from government. His last observations were printed in Lalande's "Histoire Céleste," and are brought down to March, 1793. b. at Toulouse, 1718; d. 1802.

DARU, Pierre Antoine Noel Bruno, Count, dar'-oo, a distinguished poet, historian, and statesman of France, who entered the military service of his country, notwithstanding an ardent attachment which he had to literary pursuits. He rose through a succession of employments, writing poetry, and assisting in the military organization of the army. He attracted the notice of the first consul, and, in 1802, became a member of the Tribunal. In 1805 he was made a counsellor of state, and general-intendant of the Imperial household. This last office he hesitated to accept. "I have spent my life among books," said he, "and have not had time to study the arts of the courtier." "Of courtiers I have plenty," said Napoleon I.; "they will never fail; but I want a minister, at once enlightened, vigilant, and firm." He subsequently became the confidential friend of the emperor, and his prime minister. In 1812 he opposed the expedition to Russia, as he did several other of the emperor's schemes. On the abdication of Napoleon, he retired from public life, and, although exiled by the first government of the restored Bourbons, was recalled in 1819, and made a peer of France. He afterwards wrote a "Life of Tully," and a "History of Venice." b. at Montpellier, 1767; d. 1829.

DARWIN, Erasmus, dar'-win, an English physician and poet, who, in 1753, took his bachelor's degree in medicine at Cambridge, and on that occasion produced a thesis in which he maintained that the movements of the heart and arteries are immediately produced by the stimulus of the blood. From Cambridge he removed to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree, after which he practised at Lichfield. In 1757 he married Miss Howard, of that city, who died in 1770; after which he married the widow of Colonel Pole, who brought him a good fortune. He then removed to Derby, where he passed the remainder of his life. Dr. Darwin's literary fame rests upon his "Botanic Garden," with philosophical notes, in two parts:—1. "The Economy of Vegetation." 2. "The Loves of the Plants," 2 vols. 8vo. 3. "Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life," 8vo. 4. "Phytologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening," 1 vol. 4to. In these works the poet, botanist, and philosopher appear to advantage, although they are now little read. Besides these, he was the author of papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and a tract on "Female Education," 4to. He had also a share in the formation of the "System of Vegetables" of Linnæus, published in the name of the Botanical Society at Lichfield. b. near Newark, Nottinghamshire, 1731; d. at Derby, 1802.

DARWIN, Charles, F.R.S., an eminent modern naturalist, who distinguished himself by his discoveries in the paths of zoology and geology. He is also widely known by his work entitled "The Voyage of Naturalists." This is a record of the observations which he made in several of the countries visited by his Majesty's ship Beagle, between the years 1832 and 1836, to which he had been attached as naturalist. He also wrote several other works, which place him high among geologists. His "Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection," has gone through several editions, and been the occasion of much controversy among the learned. b. at Shrewsbury, Feb. 12, 1809.

DATAMES, dat'-a-mees, a Persian general under Artaxerxes II., who gained many victories over the enemies of that prince. Being disgraced, however, by the king, to whom curious courtiers had misrepresented him, he raised Cappadocia in revolt, and defeated Artabazus, whom the king sent against him. Assassinated by Mithridates, 361 B.C.—Cornelius Nepos has written his life.

DATIS, dat'-tis, a general of Darius I., had the command, in conjunction with Artabanus, of the Persian army which was defeated by Miltiades at Marathon, 491 B.C.—He was subsequently put to death by the Spartans.

DAUBENTON, Louis-Jean-Marie, do-ben'-taung, a French anatomist and naturalist, who became assistant to Buffon in the royal garden, and keeper of the king's museum. In 1744 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and contributed several valuable papers to their memoirs. He had also a considerable share in the production of Buffon's "Natural History," generally furnishing the anatomical descriptions. His "Instructions to Shepherds," 1784, 8vo, is an excellent work. He was likewise the author of "A Methodical View of Minerals," and contributed several articles to the "Encyclopædia." Daubenton was the principal means of introducing and successfully propagating the breed of Spanish sheep in France. He was married to the authoress of "Zélie dans le Désert," with whom he lived in great happiness. b. at Montbard, Burgundy, 1716; d. at Paris, 1800.

DAUBENT, Charles Giles Bridle, M.D., F.R.S., dar'-be-ne, distinguished himself by his labours in the fields of geology, chemistry, and physiological botany. On these subjects he published a great many papers, whilst performing his duties as professor of botany and chemistry in the University of Oxford. In 1856 he was elected president of the British Association. b. 1795; d. 1867.

D'AUBIGNES, Jean Henri Merle, do-been'-yai, a Swiss theologian, who, for some time, was the pastor of a French church in Hamburg, whence he removed to Brussels, where he acquired great popularity as a preacher. It is, however, on account of his great work, entitled "A History of the Reformation of the 16th Century," that he is here noticed, a performance which has acquired an immense popularity. He also wrote several other works; among which we may name "The Protector (Cromwell); a Vindication;" and "Germany, England, and Scotland." His sympathies lean greatly towards the evangelical Protestantism of the last-named country, to which he paid

D'AUBIGNE', Theodore Agrippa. (See AR-BIGNE', D.)

DAUN, Leopold Joseph Maria, Count, doun, celebrated Austrian general, who served the empress Maria Theresa with the greatest zeal and glory. He commenced his military career against the Turks; but it was as a commander in the armies which were engaged in the Seven Years' War against the king of Prussia, that he attained the acme of his glory. After a series of good fortune, however, he met with a defeat at Torgau, in 1760. b. 1703; d. at Vienna, 1796.

DAUNOR, Pierre Claude François, dau-noo, a distinguished politician and man of letters, after being a student of divinity at Montmorency, was professor at Troyes, Soissons, and Boulogne. His first appearance as an author was in 1757, when he published an essay on the influence of Boileau on French literature, which was well received. In 1792 he became a member of the National Convention, in which he voted for the detention of Louis XVI., but opposed his execution. He was subsequently imprisoned by the Jacobins, and escaped the guillotine on the occurrence of the revolution of 9th Thermidor. On resuming his seat in the Convention, he was appointed one of a commission to draw up a new constitution, was for some time reporter, and afterwards secretary of the Convention, in which last office he continued till the close of its sittings, when he was appointed a member of the Council of Five Hundred. He pronounced, by order of the republic, the eulogium on General Hoche in the Champs de Mars; was sent to organize the Roman republic in 1799; and elected president of the Council of Five Hundred on his return. He opposed the proceedings of Napoleon on the 18th Brumaire, and refused several offices tendered to him. He, however, as a member of the Tribunal, pronounced an harangue on the battle of Marengo, and moved the honours decreed to Desaix. He was archivist to the legislative body and the empire from 1804 till the restoration, when he lost his places, and took to journalism, having conducted the "Journal des Savants" till 1838, which position he resigned on being named perpetual secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres. He was restored to his offices at the revolution of 1830, and was subsequently made a peer of France. He was a voluminous writer, having contributed to the "Biographie Universelle," the "Histoire Littéraire," and the "Journal des Savants," upwards of 330 different papers, besides other writings. b. 1761; d. 1840.

DAVENANT, Sir William, dáv'-nant, an English poet, who, after being some time at Lincoln College, became page to the duchess of Richmond, and then to Lord Brooke. In 1637 he succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate; and, having fought for the king during the civil war, received, in 1643, the honour of knighthood. On the decline of the royal cause, he went to France, and formed a plan of carrying out to Virginia, in America, some artificers; but his ship was taken by English cruisers, and he himself would have suffered death, had not Milton interceded on his behalf. This generous act he was enabled, at a future day, similarly to repay to Milton. At the Restoration he obtained a patent for erecting a theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, and devoted himself to dramatic composition and poetry. b. at Oxford, 1605; d. in London in 1668, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. His works were published together in 1678.—His son, Charles Davenant, was well versed in politics, and acquired some reputation by his poetic works, as also others connected with political and social economy. His works were published in five volumes 8vo, 1771. b. 1656; d. 1714.

DAVID, St., dá'-vid, a British saint, who, in the 5th century, was bishop of Caerleon, and the metropolitan of the Welsh church. He subsequently removed his see to Myrnyw, which came to be called Ty Dewi, or the house of St. David. There are many churches dedicated to him in Wales; but the notion of his being the patron saint of that country, and his originating its symbol in the leek, are treated as modern inventions. Lived in the 5th century.—The wearing of the leek, in Wales, on St. David's day, probably originated from the custom of "Cym-hortha," or the friendly aid, practised among farmers. In some districts of South Wales, all the neighbours of a small farmer were wont to appoint a day when they attended to plough his land, and the like; and, at such time, it was the custom for each to bring his portion of leeks with him for making the broth or soup.

DAVID I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Alexander the Pious, in 1124. He was reared in England, and married Maud, grand-niece of William the Conqueror. When called to the Scottish throne, he held the earldom of Northumberland and Huntingdon, and, on the death of Henry I., king of England, maintained the claim of his daughter Maud against Stephen, and seized Carlisle. He was, however, defeated at the battle of Northallerton, in 1138. The following year a negotiation was entered into, by which Carlisle was suffered to remain in the possession of David. b. at Carlisle, 1153.

DAVID II., king of Scotland, was the son of Robert Bruce, at whose death he was but five years old. On the invasion of his country by Baliol, he was sent to France; but his party revalling, after a bloody contest, he returned in 1342. He made several inroads on England, but was taken prisoner and conveyed to the tower, where he was confined till 1357, when, in paying a heavy ransom, he was set free. b. in 1311.

DAVID OF HIRAZUG, surnamed the Black, a Welsh divine, bard, and grammarian. The literary compositions of the Welsh being affected by their conquest by Edward I., this divine was chosen to modify the grammar and system of prosody of Edeyrn, agreeably to the regulations which took place on that occasion. He also translated several copies of a Missal, or the Office of the Virgin, into Welsh. Flourished in the 14th century.

DAVID AP GWILYM, a celebrated Welsh bard, who composed a variety of beautiful poems, under the patronage of Ivor the Generous. The subject of the greater part of these is love. One hundred and forty-seven of them he dedicated to the fair Morvud, his mistress; but she rejected his suit, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer in the English army at the battle of Mynydd-y-Mynydd. Flourished in the 14th century. His works were printed in London, in 1789.

Trebizond, usurped the throne on the death of his brother John. In 1461 he relinquished his kingdom to Mahomet II., on condition that the latter should espouse his daughter Anne, and that his own life should be saved. The sultan observed the first of these conditions, but caused David to be put to death, with seven of his sons, 1462.

DAVID, Jacques Louis, da'-veed, a celebrated French artist, who, after studying in Paris, went to Rome, where his talents for historical painting rapidly developed themselves. In 1789 he produced his picture representing Lucius Junius Brutus passing sentence of death upon his son Titus, which, to some extent, may be considered to have indicated the tendency of his mind towards democratic political principles. He became a devoted admirer of the monsters Robespierre and Marat, and eagerly accepted office in the bloodiest periods of the great Revolution. He became a member of the National Convention, an adherent of the Jacobins, and imagined he discovered in Robespierre a resemblance to Phocion, and in Collot d'Herbois a reproduction of Marius. He painted pictures of republican heroism, voted for the death of Louis XVI., and escaped guillotining himself only on account of his artistic celebrity. In 1800 Napoleon appointed him painter to the government; and throughout the imperial rule, his influence controlled, to a large extent, the fine arts in France. On the fall of the emperor, he was driven into exile. b. at Paris, 1748; d. at Brussels, 1825. The best paintings of David, however excellent in other respects, are deficient in vitality. His figures have the form, but not the breath of life in them; consequently, they can be considered as little more than beautiful sculptures represented on canvas. His best works are the "Oath of the Horatii," the "Rape of the Sabines," the "Death of Socrates," and "Napoleon presenting the Imperial Eagles to his Troops." His portrait of Napoleon I. is generally well known.

DAVID, Félicien, a modern French composer, who, after attaining to considerable excellence on the violin, became musical director at the church of Saint-Sauveur, Aix. Here he continued to devote himself to his professional duties; but becoming imbued with the doctrines of Saint-Simon, he, with some others, paid a visit to Egypt, the Holy Land, and the Desert. He was gone three years, and when he returned, published some "Oriental Melodies," which were not well received. Still devoting himself to study, he adopted loftier themes for the exercise of his genius, and in 1844 produced his ode entitled "The Desert," which met with a brilliant success. After this, came his "Moses on the Mount," "Christopher Columbus," for which Louis Philippe conferred on him the cross of the Legion of Honour; and several other works of great merit. b. at Cadenet, in Vaucluse, 1810.

DAVIES, Sir John, dai'-vis, an English poet, lawyer, and political writer, who, on the accession of James I., had the honour of knighthood conferred on him, and was made attorney-general for Ireland. In 1626 he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, but died in the same year. Sir John wrote a valuable book on the state of Ireland. His poetical works, of which that entitled "Nosce Teipsum" is the principal, were collected and published in 1773,

DAVIES, Thomas, an intelligent and enterprising publisher, who was educated at Edinburgh, and becoming an actor, received an engagement at the Haymarket Theatre, London. He subsequently became a bookseller in Russell-street, Covent-garden, where he was patronized by Dr. Johnson, and, through him, by other celebrities of his time. In 1780 he published the "Life of Garrick," which had a good sale. He also wrote "Dramatic Miscellanies," the "Life of Henderson the Player," and several fugitive pieces. Dr. Johnson declared that Davies was "learned enough for a clergyman." The Doctor was first introduced to Boswell in his book shop; and both he and his wife, distinguished by her beauty, were highly esteemed by the great lexicographer, who lived on as easy an intimacy with them, as with any family he visited. It was the unmerciful ridicule of Churchill in his "Rosciad" which drove Davies from the stage:—

"With him came mighty Davies;—on my life,
That Davies has a very pretty wife!—
Statesman all over—in plots famous grown,
He months a sentence as curs mouth a bone!"

DAVILA, Henrico Caterino, da'-ce-la, an Italian historian, whose family was of Spanish extraction, and had furnished several constables to the island of Cyprus. The Turks taking this island, at an early age he was brought from Padua to France, where his father enjoyed the favour of Henry III. and Catharine de Medici. In compliment to these royal friends, he received his baptismal names; and, at first a page, he afterwards took service under Henry IV., and was present, during the civil war in 1597, at Honfleur and Amiens. He afterwards returned to Padua, and then fixed his residence at Venice, where he again took up arms and rendered great services to the republic. He now set about writing, in Italian, a "History of the Civil Wars in France, from the Death of Henry II. to the Peace of Vervins," which was published at Venice, 1630. His history is universally esteemed for the exactness of its facts and the excellence of its style, although the author has been reproached with showing some partiality for Catharine de Medici. It has been translated into French several times, and also into English. b. near Padua, 1576; assassinated near Verona, 1631.

DAVIS, John, dai'-vis, an English navigator, who, in 1585, had the command of an expedition to discover a N.W. passage to America. In this voyage he discovered the strait called by his name. The year following he sailed on the same design, and having explored the coasts of Greenland and Iceland, proceeded as far as lat. 62° N. In 1591 he went as second in command with Cavendish, in his voyage to the South Seas. After this, he made five voyages to the East Indies, but was killed in the last of these in a fight with some Japanese pirates, on the coast of Malacca. He wrote an account of some of his voyages, and invented a quadrant, which was used for taking the sun's altitude at sea, till superseded by Hadley's sextant. b. near Dartmouth, Devonshire; slain, 1605.

DAVIS, Jefferson, the president of the Confederate States of America, the son of Samuel Davis, a planter, who soon after his son's birth removed from Kentucky, where he had previously resided, to the state of Mississippi. Young Davis received an academical education, and was sent at the usual age to Transylvania College, Kentucky, which he left in 1821 to enter the United States Military Academy at West Point, where he graduated in 1823, and was appointed brevet second Lieutenant. He remained in the army seven years, and served in wars with several Indian tribes, acquitting himself in a satisfactory manner. He resigned his commission, June 30, 1835, returned to Mississippi, and became a cotton planter, living in retirement till 1843, when he began to take an active part in politics on the democratic side, and in 1844 was chosen one of the presidential electors of Mississippi to vote for Polk and Dallas. In November, 1845, he was elected a representative in Congress, and took his seat in December of that year. He bore a conspicuous part in the discussions of the session on the tariff, on the Oregon question, on military affairs, and particularly on the preparations for war against Mexico, and on the organization of volunteer militia when called into the service of the United States. On the breaking out of the war with Mexico in 1846, Mr. Davis was elected colonel of the 1st Regiment of Mississippi volunteers, and led it to reinforce the army of General Taylor on the Rio Grande. He was actively engaged in the attack and storming of Monterey, in September, 1846; was one of the commissioners for arranging the terms of the capitulation of that city; and highly distinguished himself in the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847, being complimented for his coolness and gallantry by the commander-in-chief in his despatches. At the expiration of the term of his enlistment, in July, 1847, the Mississippi regiment was ordered home; and Colonel Davis was offered a commission from President Polk as brigadier-general of volunteers, which he declined accepting, on the ground that the constitution reserves to the states respectively the appointment of the officers of militia, and that consequently the appointment by the Federal Executive is a violation of the rights of the states. In August, 1847, he again took his seat in the senate as one of the representatives of Mississippi, and was chosen chairman of the committee on military affairs, and took a prominent part in the debates on the slavery question in defence of the institutions and policy of the slave states, and was a zealous advocate of the doctrine of state rights. In 1851 he was a candidate for the governorship of his state, but was defeated, and remained in retirement until the presidential contest of 1852, when he took an active part in securing the election of General Pierce, who, on forming his cabinet in 1853, appointed Colonel Davis secretary of war, which post he held till the accession of President Buchanan in 1857. His administration was conspicuous for energy and ability, and for the numerous reforms which he introduced into the department of war, and into the discipline and organization of the army. Colonel Davis was once more elected to Congress, and would have continued a member of that body till March 4, 1863, had nothing occurred to interfere with the ordinary course of events; but the election of Mr. Lincoln to the presidential chair in 1860, and the secession of the Southern States which followed, induced him to withdraw from Congress. On the consolidation of the seceded states in a definite government, Mr. Davis was chosen president. At the fall of the Confederacy in 1865, he was taken prisoner, and was kept in close confinement until 1867, when he was released, on bail, to appear for trial when called on. He was finally pardoned in 1869. b. in Kentucky, 1808.

DAVISON, William, dai'-son, a Scotchman, or of Scotch extraction, who rose through various grades to be secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth. He was employed in missions to Scotland and to Holland, and was the negotiator of the treaty between Elizabeth and the United Provinces when the latter determined to throw off their allegiance to Spain. After his return he was raised to the privy council, and named secretary of state along with Walsingham. He was ultimately sacrificed to clear his mistress of complicity in the death of Mary Queen of Scots, whose execution at Fotheringhay he was accused of having unduly hastened, contrary to Elizabeth's wish. For this he was condemned to 10,000 marks fine, and imprisonment during pleasure, and the conviction used to justify the virgin queen to the son of her victim. The fact seems to be, however, as Camden states, that Davison only acted in the matter in accordance with Elizabeth's orders, and that he was sacrificed in order to remove the odium of the transaction from the name of his mistress. Walsingham either was, or affected to be, sick, and the duty of presenting the warrant for Mary's execution to the queen for signature devolved upon Davison, and hence the trouble which came upon him. His subsequent history is involved in obscurity.

DAVOUT, or DAVOUT, Louis Nicholas, da'-voost, a celebrated French marshal, began his life with Bonaparte as a student at Brienne. In 1785 he entered the army, and, taking the side of the revolutionists, fought under Dumouriez at Jemappes, on November 6, 1792. In 1793 he was made a general; but being of a noble family, he was forced to resign his command, on account of the decree which forbade such to enter upon active service. The downfall of Robespierre, however, enabled him to recover his rank in the army, with which he fought on the Rhine, under Pichegru. In the Italian campaigns he procured the friendship of Napoleon I., and afterwards accompanied him to Egypt. On his return, he was made a general of division, and commanded the cavalry of the army of Italy. He contributed to the victory of Marengo, and became a marshal under the imperial dynasty. He commanded the right wing at Austerlitz, and, on October 14, 1806, defeated the duke of Brunswick at Auerstadt. For this he was created duke of Auerstadt. For his services at Eckmühl he was created prince of Eckmühl, and at Wagram once more commanded the right wing. He was with the Russian expedition, and was wounded in the battle of Borodino. After the retreat from Moscow, he held Hamburg, where he had his head-quarters, against all the forces of the allies, and only, after the peace of 1814, surrendered to General Gérard, who was the bearer of the commands of Louis XVIII. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he became minister of war. After Waterloo, he lived in retirement till 1819, when he re-entered the Chamber of Peers. b. at Annoux, in the Yonne, 1770; d. 1823.

design, and became superintendent of the Pneumatic Institution at Bristol. While fulfilling his duties in this capacity, he published his "Chemical and Philosophical Researches," which obtained for him the professorship of chemistry in the Royal Institution of London. In the April of 1801 he gave his first lecture, and, from that time, his popularity extended to all parts of the country. In the following year he was made professor to the Board of Agriculture, and, in 1818, had a baronetcy conferred on him. In 1820 he was elected president of the Royal Society, to whose "Transactions" he continued to contribute papers, on subjects of the greatest interest, for several years. B. at Penzance, Cornwall, in 1778; D. at Geneva, Switzerland, 1820. The exertions of Davy in the fields of science have given his name an imperishable fame. He discovered the metallic bases of the earths and alkalis, the principles of electro-chemistry, and invented the miners' safety-lamp. In reference to his discovery of the composition of the fixed alkalis, Dr. Paris says, "Since the account given by Newton of his first discoveries in optics, it may be questioned whether so happy and successful an instance of philosophical induction has been afforded as that of Davy." The same writer says of him, that "he was endued with the spirit, and was a master of the practice of the inductive logic; and that he has left us some of the noblest examples of the efficacy of that great instrument of human reason in the discovery of truth." Besides his philosophical works, he wrote "Salmonia; or, Days of Fly-fishing;" and "Consolations in Travel."—His brother and biographer, John Davy, M.D., F.R.S., was also an eminent chemist, physiologist, and geologist. He entered the army as a surgeon, and became inspector-general of army hospitals, on half pay. He wrote largely on general subjects, as well as on those connected with the natural sciences.

DAVY, John, a singularly precocious musical genius, who, when only four or five years of age, could play an easy tune after hearing it once, and who, when six years old, constructed an instrument with eight horse-shoes and an iron rod, with which he imitated the Creditor chimes very successfully. He was subsequently placed under the charge of the organist of Exeter cathedral, and having learned all he could from him, went to London, where he was engaged in composing music for operas and other works at Covent Garden Theatre. Some song-music of his was much admired at the time, and is still sung—for instance, his "Just like Love is yonder Rose," which he composed to Strangford's translation of that piece from Camoens. B. at Upton Helion, near Exeter; D. 1824.

DAWES, Richard, daws, a learned critic, who, in 1730, published proposals for a Greek translation of "Paradise Lost," which was never completed. In 1733 he was appointed master of the grammar-school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and, in 1745, published his "Miscellanea Critica; or, a Collection of Remarks on various Ancient Authors," a work of high value. In 1749 Dawes resigned the mastership of his school, and died at Haworth, near Newcastle, 1766; B. at Market-Bosworth, 1709.

DAY, Thomas, dai, an English writer, the author of "Sandford and Merton," whose father was a collector of the customs, and died while he was an infant, leaving Thomas £1200 a year. His manners were eccentric, and his opinions romantic. He and a friend of his, called Bicknell, took two orphan children from the workhouse at Shrewsbury, to educate them in the ancient Roman manner, and afterwards to marry them. The project, however, failed, and Mr. Day married, in 1773, a Miss Milnes, of Yorkshire. He wrote several works; but the one by which his name will be perpetuated is "The History of Sandford and Merton," a romantic tale for young persons, pleasing, but fanciful, and of much the same stamp as Rousseau's "Emilius." B. in London, 1748; D. 780.

DE CANDOLLE, Augustin Pyramus, kan'-dol, French botanist, who, in 1807, was made professor of botany in the University of Montpellier. A chair was subsequently specially established for him in Geneva, when he designed to produce a work which should comprehend a description of all known plants. Such an undertaking was of too great magnitude for one man; consequently, he was obliged to abandon his design. He, however, wrote largely on his favourite science, besides contributing papers to the Transactions of almost every scientific society in Europe. B. at Geneva, 1778; D. 1841.

DECATUR, Stephen, de-ka'-tur, an officer of the United States navy, who distinguished himself in several encounters with the ships of the British. When in command of the Chesapeake he captured the Macedonian of inferior power, on the 25th of October, 1812. On this occasion, he declined to accept Capt. Carden's sword, saying that he could not think of taking the sword of so brave an officer. He was subsequently, while in command of the Macedonian and the United States, blockaded in the port of New London; and, in 1815, when in command of the President, attempted to get to sea, but after fighting the Endymion, was captured by three other English vessels. He served at a later period against the Algerine pirates in the Mediterranean, where he captured a large frigate, and compelled the Algerine regency to conclude a treaty advantageous to his country. After his return to America, Decatur was appointed one of the commissioners of the navy board; but in 1820, was killed in a duel with Commodore Barron, in consequence of the censures he had passed upon that officer for surrendering the Chesapeake to the Shannon. B. in Maryland, 1779.

DECURUS MVS, de'-she-us mus, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the infernal gods for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, throwing himself into the midst of the ranks of the enemy, and dying, covered with wounds, 339 B.C.—His son and grandson also imitated his devotedness in the same manner; the first in a battle with the Gauls and Samnites, 293 B.C.; the second, in the war against Pyrrhus, 280 B.C.

DECURUS, a Roman emperor, who distinguished himself by an expedition against the Persians, and by persecuting the Christians. In his march against the Goths, he entered a morass, where he and his army, attacked by the enemy, perished, 251 A.D.

DECKER, Thomas, dek'-ker, an English dramatist, contemporary with Ben Jonson, who satirized him in his "Poetaster," under the name of Crispinus. Decker retorting in his "Satyromastix; or, Untrussing of a Humorous Poet." He wrote several plays, some of which possess merit. b. about 1641.—The best-known drama of Decker is "Fortunatus, or the Wishing-cap;" and his best-known tract is "The Gull's Horn-book." From this, Sir Walter Scott, in his "Fortunes of Nigel," draws largely for his description of London life. It was first printed in 1609, and gives a very minute and curious picture of the manners and customs of the middle classes of society in the seventeenth century.

DEE, John, dee, an English mathematician and philosopher, who, on the founding of Trinity College, Cambridge, was chosen one of its fellows. Becoming, however, suspected of practising magic, he went to Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in civil law. He there read lectures in the mathematics, and also at Paris, where he was offered a mathematical professorship in the university. In 1551 he returned to England, and obtained the rectory of Upton-upon-Severn; but his devotion to mathematical studies again brought him into trouble, for causing him to be accused of practising magical incantations. He was also accused of preaching against the life of Queen Mary, for which he suffered imprisonment. On the death of Mary, he rose into favour with Queen Elizabeth, who visited him at Mortlake, where he resided, and collected a library. As the people would have him a magician, he seems, at length, to have believed that he was one, and in 1581, with Edward Kelly, began magical operations, which lasted two years. In these they were joined by a Polish nobleman, called Laski, who persuaded Dee to go to Poland, where they remained some time, holding communication with spirits. He subsequently returned, by order of the queen, and, in 1595, was made warden of Manchester College. b. in London, 1527; d. at Mortlake, 1609.—He published several mathematical works in Latin and English, and wrote many more which were never printed; but in 1659 Dr. Casaubon published "A true and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits," &c. The genius of Dee was comprehensive, and seems to have been misunderstood in the age in which he lived.

DR Foe, Daniel, de-fo', the author of "Robinson Crusoe," was the son of James Foe, a butcher, of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He himself prefixed the De to his name, but for what reason we have no intimation. In 1693 our author kept a hosiery shop in Cornhill; but becoming a bankrupt, had recourse to his pen for a subsistence. He subsequently received the appointment of accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, which office he held till that impost was taken off. In 1701 he produced his "True-born Englishman," and in the following year appeared his "Shortest Way with the Dissenters," a pamphlet which drew upon him the vengeance of the government. Beholding the danger with which he was threatened, he absconded, when, on the 10th January, 1703, the following interesting descriptive advertisement appeared in the "London Gazette":—"Whereas, Daniel De Foe, alias De Fooe, is charged with writing a scandalous and seditious pamphlet, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' He is a middle-sized spare man, about 40 years old, of a brown complexion, and dark brown-coloured hair, but wears a wig; a hooked nose, a sharp chin, grey eyes, and a large mole near his mouth; was born in London, and for many years was a hose-factor in Freeman's Yard, in Cornhill, and now is owner of the brick and pantile works near Tilbury Fort, in Essex. Whoever will discover the said Daniel De Foe to one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, or any of her majesty's justices of the peace, so that he may be apprehended, shall have the reward of £50, which her majesty has ordered immediately to be paid upon such discovery." The luckless author was discovered, brought to trial, and sentenced to be pilloried, fined, and imprisoned. In the "Gazette" of the 31st July of the same year, it is recorded, that "on the 29th instant Daniel Foe, alias De Foe, stood in the pillory before the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, as he did yesterday near the Conduit in Cheapside, and this day at Temple Bar, in pursuance of his sentence, given against him at the last sessions at the Old Bailey, for writing and publishing a seditious libel, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' By which sentence he is also fined 200 marks, to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years, and to remain in prison till all be performed." However cruel had been the design of the government in passing sentence on De Foe, the punishment itself was a complete failure. Such a pillory exhibition had seldom been seen in England; for exulting thousands accompanied him each day from Newgate to the pillory, to protect him from hurt or insult, and greeted him, also, with shouts of triumph on his return to Newgate. The very pillory itself was said to have been decorated with garlands; for it was the height of summer, when there was an abundance of flowers; and not only this, but refreshments were provided for him. On regaining his liberty, he retired to Bury St. Edmunds, where he continued to exercise his pen, and was instrumental in promoting the union of England and Scotland. While in Edinburgh on this business, he was mobbed by the populace, the feeling being at the time very strong against the union and all who were supposed to be engaged in promoting it. In 1713 he was again committed to prison for some political pamphlets, but Lord Oxford procured his pardon. In 1715 he published the "Family Instructor," a religious performance of merit; and in 1719 appeared his greatest work, the romance of "Robinson Crusoe," supposed to have been founded on the story of Alexander Selkirk's being left on the island of Juan Fernandez. De Foe wrote a number of other fictions of considerable merit. b. in London, 1661; d. 1731.—In concluding this brief sketch of one of the greatest and most original of England's fiction-writers, we cannot resist the temptation to insert the following record of what were his sentiments regarding the opinions of mankind, and what had been his own experience of life. The above advertisement describes the outward man. The inward shall be described by himself. "I am a Stoic," says he, "in whatever may be the event of things. I'll do and say what I think is a debt of justice and truth, without the least regard to clamour and reproach; and as I am utterly unconcerned at human opinion, the people that throw away their breath so freely in censuring me, may consider of some better improvement to make of their passions, than to waste them on a man that is both above and below the reach of them. I know too much of the world to expect good in it, and have learned to value it too little to be concerned at the evil. I have gone through a life of wondrous, and am the subject of a vast variety of providences. I have been fed more by miracle than Elijah when the ravens were his purveyors. I have, some time ago, summed up the scenes of my life in this distich:—

No man has tasted different fortunes more;

And thirteen times, I have been rich and poor. In the school of affliction I have learned more philosophy than at the academy, and more divinity than from the pulpit. In prison, I have learned that liberty does not consist in open doors and the egress and ingress of locomotion. I have seen the rough side of the world as well as the smooth, and have, in less than half a year, tasted the difference between the closet of a king and the dungeon of Newgate. I have suffered deeply for cleaving to principles." Such is the experience of the author of "Robinson Crusoe," one of the most delightful romances that ever emanated from a human brain. "Was there ever anything written by mere man," asks Dr. Johnson, "that the reader wished longer, except 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'Don Quixote,' and the 'Pilgrim's Progress'?"

DEIOTARUS, dei-o-ta'-rus, a tetrarch of Galatia, who was created, by the Romans, king of that country, with the addition of Lesser Armenia. He joined the party of Pompey, but, on the defeat of that general, submitted himself to Cæsar, who dethroned him, but soon afterwards restored his estates. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DE LA BÈCHE, Sir Henry Thomas, baish, an eminent geologist, who first imbibed a taste for that science whilst residing at Charnmouth and Lyme Regis, previous to his being sent to the military school at Great Marlow, since removed to Sandhurst. In 1814 he entered the army, and in 1817 became a fellow of the Geological Society. Of this society he subsequently became secretary, foreign secretary, and finally president in 1847. Throughout the whole of his life he ardently devoted himself to his favourite science, reporting on the geology of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Wales, and other parts; and was, by his map of Cornwall, the cause of suggesting to the government the geological survey. He founded the Museum of Practical Geology, and succeeded in establishing the School of Mines. His mind was of an eminently practical character. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1848 was knighted. In 1853 he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris; but by this time his career was drawing to a close. B. near London, 1796; D. 1855.—Sir Henry wrote largely on geology, and published several excellent manuals for the young student. His "How to Observe," first published in 1833, has been pronounced a truly Baconian volume—a sort of "Novum Organum" of geology.

DELA-CROIX, Ferdinand Victor Eugène, del'-a-kro-aw, a distinguished French painter. His father passed through the sternest scenes of the great revolution, and, in 1806, died prefect of the Mouths of the Rhone and the Gironde. Young Delacroix was well educated, and entered the Academy of Arts in his 18th year. His first exhibited picture represented "Dante and Virgil sailing round the Infernal City," and excited a great deal of controversy; which may be taken as a sign of its being differently executed from the style of French art than in voisine, as well as of its indicating proofs of genius. It was succeeded by the "Massacre of Seid," which placed him at the head of a school designated the "Romantic." Both of these pictures now belong to the national collection, and hang on the walls of the Luxembourg. His position was now in a measure fixed, and he continued to work with unremitting assiduity. Among his earlier performances, we may notice his "Christ in the Garden," "Milton dictating 'Paradise Lost' to his Daughters," and "Philotheus appearing to Faust." The revolution of 1830 supplied him with other themes; but having become an attaché of the government mission to Morocco, the scenes of the East suggested new subjects. On his return, he exhibited, in 1834, "Women of Algiers," a work which Parisian judges declared placed him on a parity with Rubens as a colorist. M. Thiers, who had from the first been his admirer, being now Minister of the Interior, gave him the walls of the Salon du Roi, at the Palais Bourbon, to paint; which he accomplished by symbolically illustrating the arts, winning for himself still greater fame. He was now called upon to adorn other public buildings, at which he laboured, whilst at intervals he produced other important gallery and cabinet paintings. Among these may be named "Hamlet with the Skull of Yorick," "Medea," "Cleopatra," "Christ at the Tomb," and the "Resurrection of Lazarus." His works, as a whole, are numerous, and marked by great energy of style and originality of invention. His admirers place him on the same pedestal with Paul Veronese. B. at Charenton-Saint-Maurice, near Paris, 1793; D. 1863.

DELA-MBRE, Jean Baptiste Joseph, del-ambr', a distinguished modern French astronomer, who was first taught by the poet Delisle, at Amiens, and who afterwards entered the astronomical class under Lalande, in the College of France, at Paris. This teacher, as did Delisle, became the friend of Delambre; and many of the calculations of the master were performed by the pupil. Up to this period, Delambre had supported himself by translating foreign works for publishers, and by giving instructions as a professor of languages; when he became tutor to the two sons of a person of the name of Dassy. This gentleman fitted up a small observatory for his use, and Delambre soon became an adept in the use of the instruments, and resolved to devote himself to the study of astronomy and its history. Persevering by nature, and devoted to whatever he engaged in, he surmounted every obstacle that came in his way, and, in 1781, formed the table of the motion of Herschel's newly-discovered planet, which procured him the prize awarded by the Academy of Sciences. He now entered upon the construction of his solar tables and those of other planets; in 1792 completed his calculations, and received another prize, which the Academy had offered in the preceding year. He was now deputed, with Méchain, to measure the arc from Dunkirk to Barcelona, which, from the death of his assistant, he had to complete himself. The result of the measurements taken in the performance of this duty, furnished the data for his work entitled "Base du Système Métrique Décimal," for which the Institute of France decreed him a prize. He had now attained what may reasonably be supposed to be the summit of a philosopher's ambition, and was chosen an associate of almost every learned body in Europe. In his own country honours were showered upon him, and in 1817 he was made a chevalier of the order of St. Michael. His scientific works are very numerous. n. at Amiens, 1749; n. at Paris, 1822. 2

DELANY, Patrick, de-lai'-ne, an eminent Irish divine, who by his learning and ability raised himself from a humble origin to be chancellor of Christ Church, tutor of Trinity College, Dublin, and ultimately to the deanery of Down, where he was educated. He married for his second wife the daughter of Barnard Granville, Lord Lansdowne, a woman of superior intellect and acquirements. Dr. Delany's principal works are—"Revelation Examined with Candour," 3 vols.; "Reflections upon Polygamy;" "An Historical Account of the Life of David, King of Israel," 3 vols.; "Sermons on the Social Duties and Vices," 2 vols.; besides "Essays on the Origin of Tithes," "Critiques on Lord Orrery's Life of Swift," with whom Delany was long on terms of intimacy. n. about 1686; n. 1788.

DELANY, Mary Granville, second wife of the preceding, when seventeen years of age married Alexander Pendarves, Esq., but in 1724 was left a widow, and after remaining in that condition for nineteen years, married Dr. Delany. She lived for several years with the Duchess of Portland, at Dulstrode; and on the latter's death was assigned a house in Windsor, with a pension of £200 a year, by George III., which she enjoyed till her death. Her correspondence with many of the wits and learned men of the day, which is distinguished for elegance and spirit, has made her well known to the reading public; but she was especially distinguished for her skill in drawing and painting. When 70 years of age she invented a beautiful and ingenious Flora, constructed of coloured paper, skilfully cut out with scissors, and arranged on a black ground, which was so tastefully executed as almost to equal nature. In this amusement Mrs. Delany spent her time till her 83rd year, when failing sight compelled her to relinquish the pursuit. n. 1700; n. 1788.

DELA ROCHE, Paul, del-a-rosh', an eminent French painter, who early became devoted to his art. At first he applied himself to landscape, but by degrees entered upon historical subjects, and became the head of the "Eclectic" school. His style and pictures are so generally familiar, that it is hardly necessary to do more than enumerate the names of some of them, to recall them to mind, and prove his claim to the eminence he attained. "Joan of Arc in Prison with Cardinal Beaufort," the "Death of Queen Elizabeth," "The Children of Edward IV. in the Tower," "Cromwell contemplating the Dead Body of Charles I.," "Execution of Lady Jane Grey," "Charles I. insulted by the Parliamentary Soldiers in the Guard-room," "Stratford receiving the Blessing of Laud, on his Way to the Scaffold," "The Death of the Duke of Guise," "Napoleon Crossing the Alps," "Napoleon at Fontainebleau," and many more. Most of these, if not all, have been engraved; and may be said to be almost universally known. In 1834 Delaroche was created an officer of the Legion of Honour. n. at Paris, 1797; n. 1856.

DELA VIGNE, Jean François Casimir, de-la-veen', a modern French poet, whose best effusions are his "Mosséniennes," which refer to the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. He also wrote several dramas, which enjoyed an ephemeral success. n. at Havre, 1793; n. at Lyons, 1813.

DELILLE, Jacques, de-leel', a modern French poet of considerable eminence. He translated the "Georgics" of Virgil, which obtained for him admission to the French Academy. He became professor of Latin Poetry at the College of France, and of the Belles-lettres in the Paris University. Having twice withdrawn from the unsettled social condition of his country, he came to London, where he translated Milton's "Paradise Lost." On his return he produced his poem entitled "Conversation;" but shortly afterwards became blind, and died. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced the "Three Kingdoms of Nature," "Misfortune and Pity," and "Imagination." The chief characteristics of his effusions are sweetness of versification, true pathos, and purity of moral sentiment. n. at Aigues-Perse, Auvergne, in 1733; n. 1813.

DELISLE, Joseph Nicholas, de-leel', an eminent French mathematician and astronomer, who had for his pupil the celebrated Lalande. Being invited to Russia, he there held the appointment of astronomer-royal for upwards of twenty years. On returning to Paris, he was appointed professor in the Royal College. In 1724 he paid a visit to England, and there became acquainted with both Newton and Halley. n. 1683; n. 1768.

DELISLE, Guillaume, a French geographer of distinction, who, after studying under the direction of his father, also a geographer, conceived the notion of remodeling the existing system of geography, and accordingly, in 1700, published maps of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, and also constructed globes of both the terrestrial and celestial spheres. He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1702, and was subsequently appointed teacher of geography to Louis XV., who named him, in 1718, his first geographer, and allowed him a pension of 1200 livres a year. Peter the Great invited him to St. Petersburg, where his brother Joseph was already settled; but this invitation he declined, and died of apoplexy in 1726. n. at Paris in 1673.

DELOLME, Jean Louis, de-lolm', a political writer, who first practised as a lawyer in his native Switzerland, and afterwards travelled to gain a knowledge of the constitutions of various countries. He fixed his abode in England, where he remained until near the close of his life, composing political essays, and writing in the journals. In spite of considerable talents, he led a miserable existence, having an unfortunate passion for gaming. Delome is best known by his "History of the Constitution of England" written in French, but translated into English, and often reprinted. "It is the best work to consult on the government of England," says a foreign writer, "and proves its superiority over all other existing governments." n. at Geneva, about 1740; n. 1806.

DELOLME, Philibert, de-lorm', a celebrated French architect, who first studied in Italy, and was attracted to Paris by the Cardinal du Bellay, who introduced him to the court of Henry II. Delorme was commissioned to execute the plans of the châteaux of Anet and Meudon, and subsequently, for Catharine de Medici, those of the Valois court at St. Denis, and of the palace of the Tuilleries, of which he was created governor. He left some writings on architectural art; amongst which is a treatise entitled "New Inventions, in order to build better and at small cost." b. at Lyons, 1518; d. 1577.

DELLAMARIA, Domenico, dell-la-ma-re-a, a musical composer of some distinction, who was born in Marseilles, but of Italian parents. He had composed a grand opera when only eighteen years of age, which was well received on its representation in his native city. He afterwards studied in Italy, where he wrote six comic operas, all of which were received with applause. In 1796 he returned to France, and within two years produced four operas and several other works, all exhibiting talent of a superior order. His best operas are—"Il Maestro di Capella" (comic), "Le Prisonnier," "L'Oncle Valet," "Le Vieux Château," and "L'Opera Comique." b. 1764; d. suddenly at Paris, 1800.

DELUC, John Andrew, de-look', a modern philosopher, who principally devoted himself to the study of physics and geology, extending his observations to all parts of Europe, and endeavouring to make his discoveries tally with the text of the book of Genesis. He passed a portion of his life in England, and was there appointed queen's reader. His principal works are, "Theory of Barometers and Thermometers," "New Notions on Meteorology," "Letters to the Queen of England on the Mountains and History of the Earth," and "Geological Journeys." In 1802 he published "An Account of the Philosophy of Bacon," with a view of opposing Lasalle, a French infidel translator of the English philosopher; but the work was not much esteemed. To Deluc we owe many important improvements in the barometer, thermometer, and hydrometer. b. at Geneva, 1727; d. at Windsor, 1817.

DEMADES, dem'-a-dees, an Athenian, who, from being a mariner, became a distinguished orator, and rose to high station in the republic. He was made prisoner by Philip of Macedon at the battle of Charonea, 338 b.c., and succeeded, by his frankness, in gaining the esteem of his captor, and was set at liberty. He remained some time attached to Macedon, and used his influence in favour of the Macedonian party at Athens. When on an embassy to Antipater in 318 b.c., he fell into the hands of Cassander, the son of Antipater, who put him to death for having used disrespectful expressions towards his father in a letter he had written to Perdicas.

DEMETRIUS, de-me'-tre-us. Many of this name are mentioned in ancient history, the most celebrated of whom are the following:—

DEMETRIUS, king of Macedon, surnamed Poliorcetes, on account of the many places which he destroyed, was the son of Antigonus, one of Alexander the Great's generals and successors. At the age of twenty-two, he was sent with an army against Ptolemy, by whom he was defeated near Gaza; he soon, however, repaired his losses, and, with a fleet of 250 ships, sailed to Athens, which he conquered from Demetrius Phalereus. He afterwards defeated Cassander at Thermopylae, but was subsequently himself overthrown at the battle of Ipsus, fought 301 b.c., when he fled to Ephesus, the Athenians refusing to receive him. Notwithstanding this ingratitude, he raised another army, and when they groaned under the power of a foreign enemy, came to their help. He then slew Alexander, the son of Cassander, and seated himself on the throne of Macedon. At the end of seven years he was obliged to quit his kingdom and retire into Asia, where, being reduced to great distress, he went to the court of Seleucus, his son-in-law; but a difference breaking out between them, war ensued, in which he was defeated. Seleucus then confined him in a castle, but allowed him to take the diversion of hunting. d. of excessive drinking, 283 b.c.—His posterity reigned till the time of Perseus, who was vanquished by the Romans.

DEMETRIUS I., king of Syria, surnamed Soter, was the son of Seleucus Philopator. He was for some time deprived by usurpers of his rightful inheritance; but the Syrians, recognising him as their lawful sovereign, placed him on the throne. He then declared war against the Jews, in which conflict Judas Maccabeus lost his life, bravely fighting for the liberties of his country. A confederacy of the neighbouring kings was subsequently formed against Demetrius, and he was slain, 150 b.c.

DEMETRIUS II., surnamed Nicator, the son of the preceding, was placed on the throne by Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, after expelling the usurper Alexander Balas, 148 b.c. He married Cleopatra, the wife of the same Alexander, and daughter of Ptolemy, but gave himself up to dissipation; when, after various vicissitudes, his reign became so intolerable, that his subjects solicited the king of Egypt to grant them another sovereign. Demetrius fled, and was killed by the governor of Tyre, 128 b.c.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a celebrated orator and statesman of Athens, attached to the Macedonian party, and elected archon, by their influence, 317 b.c. He governed wisely; and the Athenians, charmed by his eloquence, erected 380 bronze statues in his honour. He afterwards fell into disgrace, and Demetrius Poliorcetes took possession of the city, and proclaimed the liberty of the Athenians to throw off the yoke of the Macedonians. His life being threatened, he fled to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, whose son banished him from his dominions. d. by the bite of an asp, 283 b.c.—He wrote several books, and it is said that the library of Alexandria was commenced by his advice, and that he contributed to it 200,000 volumes. There is a treatise on rhetoric ascribed to him; but it is of more modern date. (See DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES.)

DEMETRIUS, the son of Ivan IV., czar of Russia, was still in his cradle at the death of his father. He was the brother and sole heir of Fedor. The ambitious Boris Godonov caused him to be assassinated in 1591, thus hoping to pave his own way to the throne. b. about 1551.—The disappearance of Demetrius furnished an opportunity for a crowd of impostors to assert their right to the crown. One of these, a monk, and whose real name was Gregory Otrepieff, caused himself to be recognised as czar in 1605, and, after a reign of a few months, was assassinated in Moscow, 1606. The false Demetriuses ceased not to make their appearance until the rise of the house of Romanoff in 1613.

DEMIDOV, or DEMIDOFF, dem'-i-dof, a wealthy and influential Russian family, whose head was a skilful blacksmith of Tula. This Demidoff was intrusted by Peter the Great with the business of casting the cannon for that prince's numerous warlike expeditions. He actively seconded all the exertions of the czar, and in 1725 discovered the mines of Kolyvan, the working of which speedily enriched him.—He left a son, Nitika, and several grandsons, who distinguished themselves in the same career as their progenitor, and amassed colossal fortunes. The best-known of these are Procop Demidoff, who worked with great profit the iron, copper, and gold mines of the Ural Mountains. b. at Moscow about 1730.—Nicolas Nikitich, a zealous philanthropist, who introduced into his country several branches of industry, founded establishments of public utility, and carried to a great state of perfection the working of mines. He had an annual income of a quarter of a million sterling. His last years he passed in France and Italy, enjoying the society of learned men, and heaping benefits on all around him. b. near St. Petersburg, 1773; d. at Florence, 1828.—He left two sons, Paul and Anatol, who, as well as inheriting his fortune, had also the same high taste and benevolence. Of these Count Anatol allied himself to the Bonaparte family, by marrying, in 1810, one of Napoleon's nieces, the princess Mathilde, daughter of Jerome, and sister of Prince Napoleon. In 1845, however, a separation took place between them.

DEMOCEDES, dem'-o-sed'-dees, a physician of Crotona, who went to Athens, and resided at the court of Polyocrates, the tyrant of Samos. On the death of that prince, he and his family became captives to the Persians, and were carried to Susa, where he worked with other slaves. Happening to cure Darius from the effects of a wound received whilst hunting, he was liberally rewarded, admitted to the royal table, and requested by the monarch to remain at his court. He returned, however, to his own country, and married the daughter of Milo the wrestler. Lived in the 6th century b.c.

DEMOCRITUS, dem'-o-kr'i-tus, a famous Greek philosopher, whose father was a man of wealth; but Democritus, preferring philosophy to riches, spent his patrimony in travelling to acquire knowledge. There was a law in his country, that whoever reduced himself to poverty should be deprived of sepulture. Democritus had incurred this fate; but his talents were such, that the magistrates decreed he should be buried at the public expense. He was constantly laughing at the follies of mankind, and therein had the advantage of Heraclitus, who was always weeping over them. None of his writings have come down to us. He was the author of the atomical philosophy, and the precursor of Epicurus. b. at Abdera, in Thrace, about 460; d. 357 b.c.

DEMOIVRE, Abraham, dem'-ouvr, a clever mathematician, was a native of Vitry, Champagne, France, but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he was compelled to leave his country, and came to England, where he devoted himself to the study of the positive sciences, his favourite work being the "Principia" of Newton, gaining a livelihood in the meanwhile by lecturing on mathematics in London. He became a member of the British Royal Society and of the Academies of Paris and Berlin. The rival claims of Leibnitz and Newton to the merit of inventing the method of fluxions, was referred to Demoivre for decision —a proof of the high estimation in which his talents and learning were held. His principal works are—"Miscellanea Analytica," "A Treatise on Annuities;" "The Doctrine of Chances," the latter being his greatest effort, and which, dedicated to Newton, was first published in 4to, in 1718, and three times reprinted. b. 1667; d. in London, 1754.

DE MORGAN, Augustus, demor'-gan, was professor of mathematics in University College, London, from its foundation, in 1828, till 1831, when he resigned. In 1836, however, he returned to the same post. He wrote a great many works on arithmetic, trigonometry, mathematics, and the kindred sciences. b. in the island of Madura, East Indies, 1806.

DEMOSTHENES, de-mos'-the-nees, the greatest of Grecian orators, was the son of an Athenian, a wealthy armourer. Losing his father when a child, his guardians embezzled a considerable portion of his estate, and, at the age of seventeen, he pleaded his cause against them, in which he was successful. His first attempts at oratory, however, in the public assembly, were not so happy; for his lungs were weak, his pronunciation inarticulate, and his gestures awkward. He now retired for some years from public life, and by great perseverance overcame his defects. He would declaim as he walked up the side of steep hills, and by the seashore when the waves were roaring, and accustom himself to speak with pebbles in his mouth. To acquire a good gesture, he would practise before a mirror; and to correct a habit he had of shrugging up one of his shoulders, he placed a sharp-pointed sword just over it, in the place where he stood. The principles of his art he had acquired under Isæus, and he had also attended the lectures of Plato. Not being ready in speaking extemporaneously, he studied orations with great care in a cave, on which account his detractors declared that they smelt of the lamp. He read and re-read, too, all the great writers of antiquity, especially the history of Thucydides, which he transcribed, it is said, some eight or ten times. Having thus gained confidence that he had overcome his faults of manner and style, he returned to public affairs at the age of twenty-seven, and after passing some years at the bar, entered the government, and filled the highest offices of state. The encroachments of Philip of Macedon at this period alarmed all the Grecian states, particularly Athens. Demosthenes was foremost in rousing his countrymen to a sense of their danger. He depicted the ambitious designs of Philip in glowing colours in his celebrated orations called Philippics. When Philip was about to invade Attica, Demosthenes was sent as ambassador to prevail on the Boeotians to assist them; in which mission he succeeded. He was also at the battle of Cheronea, where the orator, however, played the coward, and fled, and for his conduct there, several accusations were preferred against him; but he was acquitted. Philip dying, Demosthenes thought this a favourable opportunity to crush the Macedonian power, and by his exertions a new confederacy was formed among the Grecian states, and the Persians were solicited to commence hostilities against Philip's son, Alexander. The vigorous activity of this prince, however, and the dreadful chastisement he inflicted on Thebes, soon had the effect of breaking up the confederacy. The Athenians found it expedient to divert the victor's wrath by sending to him an embassy, of which Demosthenes formed one; but his apprehensions induced him to turn back on the road. He was one of the orators whom Alexander required to be delivered up; but Demades pacified the king without this sacrifice. The influence of Demosthenes being now on the decline, Eschines took advantage of it, to bring an accusation against him on the subject of his conduct at Chæroneæ, and his having had a crown of gold awarded him; but the orator so well defended himself in his celebrated oration "De Coronâ," that he was honourably acquitted, and his adversary sent into exile. Shortly after, however, Demosthenes was convicted of receiving a golden cup and twenty talents from Harpalus, one of Alexander's generals, who had revolted from Alexander, and instigated the Athenians to rise against his authority. To avoid punishment, Demosthenes fled to Ægina, where he remained till the death of Alexander, when he was recalled by his countrymen, and brought home in triumph. But this change of fortune was of short duration. Declaring war against Antipater, Alexander's successor, and that general defeating the Athenians, he required the citizens to deliver up Demosthenes, who fled to the temple of Neptune, at Calauria, where he poisoned himself, 322 B.C. B. at Athens, 384 B.C. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and maintained his eldest child at the public expense. Majesty and energy are the characteristics of the eloquence of Demosthenes. To convince the understanding, rather than to exert a power over the passions of his hearers, was the object of this speaker's oratory; and, as Cicero said, this is the ideal model of true eloquence. Of the orations of Demosthenes which are extant, the text of Bekker is now regarded as the standard, and many of his orations have been translated into the English and other languages. Of the former, the work of Leland is the best.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, demp'-ster, a Scotch writer, who studied at Cambridge, whence he removed to Paris, and afterwards became professor of philology at Pisa. He wrote several books, the most curious of which are a "Martyrology of Scotland," a "List of Scottish Writers," and a "History of the Etruscans;" but, either from carelessness, indolence, or ignorance, none of them are to be relied upon. B. at Muirkirk, Aberdeenshire, 1579; D. near Bologna, 1625.

DEMPSTER, George, a native of Dundee, Scotland, who was bred to the Scottish bar, but only practised for a short time, and then devoted himself to politics, having been elected for his native town in 1762. He became a member of the Rockingham party, and supported Pitt till the regency question came under consideration, when he joined Fox. He retired from Parliament in 1790, and directed his attention to the improvement of the Scottish highlands, by developing the resources of those districts in agriculture and the fisheries. He published several essays on agricultural and other subjects, together with a volume of speeches in Parliament. B. 1736; D. 1818.

DENHAM, Sir John, den'-ham, an English poet, whose father was baron of the Court of Exchequer. In 1631 he was sent to Trinity College, Oxford, whence he went to Lincoln's Inn, with the view of following the law; but in this he made little or no progress. In 1641 his tragedy of "The Sophi" appeared; and soon after he was made governor of Fareham Castle for Charles I. In 1643 he wrote the "Cooper's Hill," the best of all his works. It is in this poem that the celebrated couplet, so very much admired, appears:—

"Though dark, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull;

Strong, without rage; without o'erflowing, full."

It relates to the Thames. After the decapitation of Charles I., he attended Charles II. in his exile, and was appointed by him ambassador to Poland. At the Restoration he was appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings, and created knight of the Bath. B. at Dublin, 1615; D. in London, 1669; and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Denham's "Cooper's Hill" is a on him the compliment of the "majestic Denham."

DENINA, Carlo Giovanni Maria, den'-ne-nà, an Italian professor and writer of history, who held chairs at Pignerol and Turin, but was deprived of the latter appointment, and banished to Vercelli. He was shortly afterwards pardoned, however, recalled to Turin, and appointed librarian to the king. He visited Berlin in 1752, on the invitation of the Prussian king, and in 1794 was introduced at Mayence to Napoleon, who made him his librarian, and he then settled in Paris, where he died in 1813. B. at Revello, Piedmont, 1731.—His writings are very numerous, but the following may be considered the most important:—"Revolutions of Literature" (1760), which drew upon the author the resentment of Voltaire, and which has been translated into English; "Revolutions of Italy," 5 vols. (1769); "Discorso sull' Impiego delle Persone," (1777), which was the occasion of his losing the rhetoric chair at Turin; "Observations on the DENISON, the Rt. Hon. John Evelyn, den'-e-son, entered parliament as member for Newcastle-under-Lyme in 1823, and served as one of the Lords of the Admiralty under Mr. Canning. He succeeded Mr. Shaw Lefevre (now Viscount Eversley) as Speaker of the House of Commons in 1857, and was unanimously re-elected to that office in 1859, 1865, and 1868. B. 1800.

DENMAN, Thomas, Lord, den'-man, received the rudiments of his education at Diss, under the celebrated Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld. He subsequently entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and, in 1806, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn. In 1818 he was returned member of Parliament for Wareham, Dorset, and in 1820, for Nottingham. In the House of Commons he leagued with Brougham and Burdett, and in 1820, became solicitor-general to queen Caroline. His conduct in behalf of that unfortunate lady was so highly approved by the London citizens, that they presented him with the freedom of their city. In 1830 he was appointed attorney-general, and in 1832, chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1834 he was raised to the peerage, and, till 1850, presided over the court of Queen's Bench, when he retired on account of failing health. B. in London, 1779; D. at Stoke Albany, Northamptonshire, 1854.

DENNER, Balihazar, den'-ner, a celebrated

German portrait painter, distinguished for the excessively elaborate finish of his works; their extraordinary finish, however, being their chief merit. Little is known of Denner's early life. He was a native of Altona, and after living for some time with a painter at Dantzic, and distinguishing himself at the courts of some of the minor princes of Germany, he came to England on the invitation of George I. Here he spent a 1723. He subsequently travelled over the north of Europe for some years, and died rich, either at Rostock in 1740, or at Hamburg in 1747. n. 1635.—Though Denner bestowed more labour upon his pictures than probably any other artist ever did, he still contrived to paint a considerable number, which are scattered over the galleries of Germany, some being at Vienna, some at Munich, and others elsewhere. All his pieces are not finished in the same high degree, but some are so to such an extent as, it is said, to require the aid of the microscope to discover all the minute details of the execution. Denner painted nearly all the German princes of his day, besides two kings and one emperor, namely, Frederick IV. of Denmark, Augustus II. of Poland, and Peter III. of Russia.

DENNIS, William Henry, den-ne, a brave and skilful British officer, who won a prominent place among those who have made their country's arms famous in the East. He entered the army in 1800; became lieutenant in 1804, captain in 1810, and lieutenant-colonel in 1832. After taking part in the Indian campaign under Lord Lake, in 1805-6, and being present at the capture of the Isle of France, in 1810, he won marked distinction by his services in the Burmese war of 1826-27. In the Afghan war, in 1839, he led the assault on Ghuznee, and was the first man who made his way within the wall's. In September, 1840, Colonel Dennis was sent to watch the Wullee of Khooloom, who was then in the field at the head of 10,000 men, in aid of Dost Mohammed, and succeeded, on the 15th of September, after some difficult and able manoeuvres in the Hindu Koosh defiles, in forcing the enemy to accept battle at Bamecan, where, with only 1000 men, he dispersed the enemy's 10,000. The result of this action was the termination of the campaign and the surrender of Dost Mohammed. When the Khyber Pass was forced by the British troops, April 5, 1842, Colonel Dennis was at first in command of the rear-guard, and on Sir Robert Sale being disabled by his wound, the charge of the whole force devolved on Dennis, which he continued to hold during the greater portion of the siege of Jellalabad, where he was killed on the 6th of June, 1842, almost at the conclusion of the siege. He generally rode a white charger, and the colonel and his horse were ever conspicuous objects in the midst of danger, and indeed this circumstance is said to have caused his death by making him an easily-distinguished mark for the enemy's riflemen, who, after many attempts, at last succeeded in hitting him. The queen had named him one of her aides-de-camp, but before the intelligence of the appointment reached Jellalabad, Colonel Dennis was no more.

DENNIS, John, den-nis, an English author and critic, who, in 1692, wrote a Pindaric ode on King William, after which he published several other poems, two of which, on the battles of Blenheim and Ramilies, procured him the favour of the duke of Marlborough, who gave him £100 and placed him in the Custom-house. In 1704 appeared his tragedy of "Liberty Asserted," which, as an invective against the French nation, became popular. This was followed by his "Orpheus and Eurydice," "The Comical Gallant," an alteration of "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" "The Invader of his Country," which was also an alteration of "Coriolanus." When the treaty of Utrecht was negotiating, he imagined himself of so much consequence, that he went to the duke of Marlborough, and begged that he would use his interest that he might not be delivered up to the French king. The duke gravely told him that "he had made no provision for himself, though he could not help thinking that he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis." In 1712 he made a merciless attack on the "Cato" of Addison, and his reflections on Pope's "Essay on Criticism" secured him a place in the "Dunciad." His attack on "Cato" drew forth a whimsical pamphlet, called "The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable frenzy of Mr. John Dennis." a. in London, 1687; n. 1734.

DENON, Dominique Vivant, Baron de, den-aeng', was appointed to the office of a gentleman about the person of Louis XV., and afterwards, as secretary to an embassy, resided several years in Italy. Here he studied the arts, and subsequently, after passing through the horrors of the French revolution, attracted the notice of Bonaparte. With him he went to Egypt, and on returning to Paris, received the appointment of general director of the museums, with the superintendence of the medallic mint, and such works of art as were executed in honour of the victories of France. On the abdication of the emperor, he was still allowed to retain his office, but in 1815, having rejoined Napoleon on his escape from Elba, was deprived of it. He now retired from public life, and occupied his leisure with preparing a general history of art. In this performance he was assisted by eminent artists; but he did not live to complete it. n. at Châlons-sur-Saône, 1747; n. at Paris, 1825.—He wrote "Travels in Egypt," which is considered a great work, a comedy, and several other productions of considerable merit.

DENTATUS, Lucius Siciinius, den-tai-tus, a Roman tribune, who had been engaged in 120 conflicts, and was 45 times wounded. He was murdered by the soldiers of Appius Claudius, but not until he had slain 15 of them and wounded 30 more.

D'EON DE BEAUMONT, Chas. Genevieve Louise Auguste André Timothée, Chevalier, dawng, was a native of Tonnerre, and played the parts of equerry to Louis XV., doctor of law, parliamentary advocate, officer in the army, ambassador, royal censor, &c., during a long life; but the most singular affair in connexion with him is, that his sex was long a complete mystery. He came to England in attendance on the duke de Nivernois in 1761, and was appointed plenipotentiary on the departure of the duke after the conclusion of peace in that year. An affront subsequently put upon him by the appointment of the count de Guerchy to the post of ambassador, and the order to himself to act as secretary, induced D'Eon to publish some severe comments on de Guerchy, and to disclose certain state secrets. For this he was prosecuted in

... he strenuously supported Reforming changes, and was chief secretary for Ireland, and subsequently, colonial minister under Lord Grey's administration, from 1830 to 1834. In the discussion on the Reform Bill of that period, he resolutely defended its provisions with great warmth and talent, and also carried the Bill for national education in Ireland. He was likewise a principal instrument in the success of the measure for the emancipation, in 1833, of the West-India slaves. Now came, however, the crisis upon which he separated, for the remainder of his political life, from the Liberal party. Alarmed at the intended project to reduce still further the Irish Church establishment, he, with other members of the cabinet, resigned his office. He was once more, under Sir Robert Peel, colonial minister; and, in 1844, he was called to the House of Lords, in his father's lifetime, as Baron Stanley. About 1845, when Sir Robert declared for free trade, Lord Stanley headed the protectionist opposition, and from that time became the leader of the Conservative party. In 1851, his father dying, he succeeded to the earldom of Derby. The year following, he was enabled to form an administration to succeed Lord John Russell's, but he had only a few months' tenure of power. In 1858, on the fall of the Palmerston administration, he again had the formation of a ministry intrusted to him, which lasted until 1859. In 1866 he again became premier, but resigned, in favour of Mr. Disraeli, early in 1868, in consequence of ill health, and retired from active political life. The eloquence of Lord Derby was remarkable for the purity and fire of its style, and earned him the title of the "Rupert of debate." B. at Knowsley Park, Lancashire, 1799.

DERCYLLIDAS, der-sil'-li-däs, a Lacedæmonian general, who, about 404 B.C., entered Asia Minor, defeated the Persians, and took several of their cities; thus preserving the Greek colonies, which had been threatened by their neighbours. He also built a wall between Thrace and the Chersonesus, to prevent the incursions of the people of the former country.

DERHAM, William, deer'-ham, an English scholar and divine, who devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, became a member of the Royal Society, and contributed largely to the "Philosophical Transactions." In 1713 he published his "Physico-Theology," being the substance of his Boyle's Lectures, with curious notes; and in 1714 appeared his "Astro-Theology," which was also delivered at the same lecture. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and in 1730, the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. The last thing he printed of his own was "Christo-Theology, or a Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion," 1730. In his younger days he published a treatise entitled "The Artificial Clockmaker," in 12mo, which has been several times reprinted. He was rector of Upminster, where he died, 1735. B. near Worcester, 1657.

Dering

DERING, Sir Edward, deer'-ing, an English gentleman, who distinguished himself, in the reign of Charles I., by his zeal for the reform of abuses. He brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters. Notwithstanding these revolutionary tendencies, he afterwards espoused the king's cause, which he supported with a regiment of horse equipped at his own expense. He was a great sufferer in the civil war, and died before the Restoration. His speeches in parliament are in 1 volume 4to.

DERMODY, Thomas, der'-mo-de, an Irish poet, was the son of a schoolmaster, who is said to have employed his son as Greek and Latin assistant when only nine years of age. He ran away to Dublin when ten years old, and after leading a somewhat questionable life for several years, enlisted, and went abroad under the command of the earl of Moira, who, for his good conduct, made him a second lieutenant in the warren corps. By intemperance, however, he forfeited his position, and the earl's favour, and ultimately died in utter poverty. He published a small volume of poems in 1793, which had been written in his thirteenth year; another volume of poems appeared in 1800, and a third in 1801; he subsequently issued a poem called the "Battle of the Bards," and likewise wrote a pamphlet on the French Revolution, annexed to which was a poem entitled the "Reform." b. at Ennis, 1775; b. at Sydenham, 1802.

DESAGULIERS, Jean Theophile, dai'-sa-goo'-le-ai, a French philosopher, who came to London with his father, who was a minister, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Entering into holy orders, he, in 1702, succeeded Dr. Kiel as lecturer in experimental philosophy at Oxford, and published a "Course of Experimental Philosophy," a "Dissertation on Electricity," "Fires Improved; being a New Method of Building Chimneys, so as to prevent their smoking." He also translated into English "Gravesande's Mathematical Elements of Natural Philosophy." He was an active member of the Royal Society, and contributed several papers to its "Transactions." b. at Rochelle, 1683; d. 1749.

DESAIX, Louis Charles Anthony, des-ai', a French general, who early entered the military service of his country, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. In the early part of the Revolution he became aide-de-camp to Prince de Broglie, and was severely wounded at the battle of Lauterberg, but kept the field, and rallied the battalions after they had been thrown into disorder. Named successively general of brigade and of division, he contributed greatly, by his talents, to the success of the famous retreat of Moreau from Germany, the left wing of the army being commanded by him on that occasion. He afterwards defended the bridge and fort of Kehl, for two months, against the Austrian army, with great bravery, and was wounded; but subsequently joined Bonaparte at Milan, when it was announced that "the brave General Desaix had come to visit the army of Italy." He served with Bonaparte in Egypt, where he distinguished himself greatly, and was appointed governor of the upper part of the country. It was here he achieved his greatest glory. He completely subdued Upper Egypt, and received, as a testimony of admiration from Bonaparte, a sword, with this inscription on its blade, "Conquête de la Haute Egypte!" He was obliged, however, in 1800, to sign the unfavourable treaty of El Arish with the Turks and English, and, on his way to France, was captured and detained by Lord Keith as prisoner of war. He afterwards obtained his parole, and went to France. He once more fought under the banner of Bonaparte in Italy, but was killed at the battle of Marengo, to which victory he principally contributed, June 14, 1800. b. at St. Hilaire-d'Ayat, in Avignon, 1763.—A statue was erected to this general, in the Place-Dauphine, in Paris.

Descartes

DESAULT, Pierre Joseph, des'-olte, a French surgeon, who, in his twentieth year, went to Paris, and soon became popular as a lecturer on anatomy and surgery. In 1776 he was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons, and in 1783 was appointed surgeon-major to the Hospital of Charity, after which he became head surgeon of the Hôtel-Dieu. In 1791 he commenced his "Journal de Chirurgie," a work of high reputation. During the violence of the Revolution he was confined some time in the Luxembourg prison; but his usefulness saved his life. He died while attending the dauphin, June 1, 1795, which induced a suspicion that he was despatched because he would not poison that unfortunate prince. b. near Macon, 1744. He left a work entitled "Traité des Maladies Chirurgicales," &c., 2 vols. 8vo.

DESBARREAU, Jacques Vallée, Count, dai-ro, a French nobleman, who became councillor in the Parliament of Paris, but which position he resigned, in order to devote himself more fully to the enjoyment of good cheer and the pursuit of pleasure. He changed his abode and climate according to the seasons, and was intimately associated with all the fine wits of the day; Balzac, Chapelier, Descartes, and others. He composed several songs and fugitive pieces; but the only production of his which is preserved is the beautiful sonnet, "Grand Dieu, tes jugements sont remplis d'équité," &c. Voltaire, however, denies the authorship to Desbarreaux, and gives it to the Abbé Lavau. b. at Paris, in 1602; d. 1647.

DESBILLONS, François Joseph Terrasse, dai-bel'-yawng, a French Jesuit, who wrote 2 vols. of fables resembling those of La Fontaine, and some Latin poems. He also published an edition of Phædrus, with notes. b. at Châteauneuf, in 1711; d. at Mannheim, 1788.

DESCARTES, René, dai-kart', a celebrated French philosopher, who received his education at the Jesuits' college at La Flèche. Here he acquired a considerable knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages; but on leaving that seminary, removed to Paris, applying himself to the study of mathematics. In 1616 he entered the army of the prince of Orange, and afterwards served under the duke of Javarin, fighting with great bravery at the battle of Prague, in 1620. While in the garrison at Breda, he solved a difficult mathematical problem, which had been posted in the public streets; and this introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned Beekmann, principal of the college of Dort. He also wrote, at this time, in Latin, a treatise on music, and projected some other works. After this, he quitted the military life, and travelled into Holland, Switzerland, France, and Italy, where, although it has been said that he saw Galileo, at Florence, it does not appear that he visited him. In 1629 he settled at Amsterdam, and applied himself assiduously to the mathematical sciences, particularly dioptries, in which he made some important discoveries. About this time he visited England, where he made observations on the declination of the magnetic needle. His philosophy now became the subject of much discussion, meeting with an extensive reception, though with considerable opposition. Gilbert Voet, rector of the University of Utrecht, wrote against it, and Descartes replied with a virulence unbecoming a philosopher. To escape religious persecution, he accepted an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to go to Stockholm, where he obtained a pension and an estate. By this queen he was treated with great distinction, although she pursued her studies under his direction at five o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding that his health was far from being rigorous. b. at La Haye, in Touraine, 1596; d. at Stockholm, 1650, when his remains were conveyed to Paris, and interred with great pomp in the church of St. Geneviève. Descartes was a man of great parts, and of a vigorous imagination. He was the first to reduce the science of optics to the command of mathematics. His principal works are, 1. "Principia Philosophiæ;" 2. "Di-sertatio de Methodo recte regendæ Rationis," &c.; 3. "Dioptrice;" 4. "Meditationes;" 5. "Geometry;" 6. "Letters."

DESFONTAINES, Pierre François Guyot, dai-fon-tain, a French critic, who studied under the Jesuits, and in 1721 went to Paris, where he contributed to several periodical papers, especially to the "Journal des Savants," which he greatly aided by the cleverness of his articles. Offending Voltaire by the freedom of his criticisms and censures, a bitter literary warfare was the consequence. Besides other works, he published a prose translation of Virgil. b. 1633; d. 1745.—There was also a French botanist of this name, who published several works on flowers and plants. b. 1751; d. 1833.

DESHOULIÈRES, Antoinette, dai-shool-e-air, a distinguished French poetess of the reign of Louis XIV., who was intimate with all the literary celebrities of that sparkling age, and appears to have borne herself throughout many difficult circumstances, with a propriety much to be commended. Her contemporaries called her the "Tenth Muse" and the "French Calliope." She attempted poetry in all its various forms, from the song to tragedy; but the idyl and eulogues were those in which she most excelled. One of the most admired of her compositions is "Les Moutons," a charming allegory, in which she deploras, in beautiful verses, the sad lot of children who have lost their father. She married, in 1651, the Seigneur Deshoulières, but who died leaving her without fortune. b. 1633; d. 1694.

DESIDERIUS, or DIDIER, des-i-deer-e-us, the last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus in 756. His daughters were married to the two sons of Pepin, king of France, Carloman and Charlemagne. Desiderius invading the papal territories, the pope called in Charlemagne to his aid, who marched into Lombardy, took his father-in-law prisoner, and sent him with his family to France, where they died. Dethroned in the year 777.

DESMAIS, Joseph François Edouard, de-ma-hé, a French dramatic poet, was the friend of Voltaire, and the associate of the leading wits of the time in Paris. He was a man of singularly amiable manners and disposition, and used to remark that "If literary men were only agreed, they would, though few in number, rule the world;" and that, "If my friend laughs, he ought to tell me the cause of his joy; but if he weeps, it is my duty to find out the sources of his grief." Desmairis was the author of a play called the "Impertinent," which was received with great applause; and of two volumes of miscellaneous works in verse. b. at Sully-sur-Loire, 1722; d. 1761.

DESMARZEAU, Pierre, dai-mai-zo, a French biographical writer, who came to England, and became fellow of the Royal Society. He translated into English "Bayle's Dictionary," and wrote the lives of Chillingworth and John Hales. He had also a concern in the great Historical Dictionary, 10 vols. folio. b. at Auvergne, 1666; d. in London, 1745.

DESMARETS, François Serephin Bernier, dai-mar-ai, a French poet and critic, who translated the odes of Anacreon into Italian, and was the author of poems in Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish, besides an excellent French grammar. He was perpetual secretary to the French Academy, and was at one time secretary to the French embassy at Rome. b. in Paris, 1632; d. 1713.

DESMOLERS, Pierre Nicholas, dai-mo-lai, a French ecclesiastic, who continued Salengre's "Memoirs of Literature," 11 vols. 12mo, and edited several of Lami's treatises. b. at Paris, in 1677; d. 1760.

DESMOLINS, Camille, dai-moo-li, a fellow-student of Robespierre, who, in 1793, was the favourite orator with the people of Paris, and made his idea of liberty the idol of his worship. He had the greatest contempt for everything that wore the appearance of religion; and although his talents were considerable, they seem only to have hastened his downfall. In the heat of the great revolution, his colleagues conspired against him, and brought him to the scaffold. b. at Guise, 1763; guillotined, 1794.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, des-pard, an Irishman, who early entered upon a military life, and became an able engineer. At the close of the American war he served in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by an expedition on the Spanish main, in which he had for a coadjutor Captain, afterwards Lord, Nelson. For his services there, he was made lieutenant-colonel. In 1784 he was appointed English superintendent at Honduras; but his conduct causing him to be suspended, he demanded an investigation. This, however, was refused him, when he became violent against the government, and was sent to Coldbath Fields prison, whence he was removed to the House of Industry at Shrewsbury, and next to Tothill Fields Bridewell. On his liberation, he endeavoured to seduce the soldiery, and having collected some followers, held meetings at alehouses, to which no persons were admitted without taking a treasonable oath. At these assemblies, it is said that various plans were devised for the murder of the king; and, at last, it was determined to make the attack when his majesty went to the Parliament House. The plot being discovered, he and several other persons were arrested, and, being found guilty, suffered on the scaffold, in 1803.

DESSALINES, Jacques, dai-sa-leen, a negro, who, from being a slave, was made the first king of St. Domingo. He was carried in early life from the Gold Coast of Africa, of which he was a native, to St. Domingo, and joined the negro chief Toussaint L'Ouverture on the outbreak of the negro insurrection in the island after the French revolution, became Toussaint's first lieutenant, and, after his capture, headed the rebellion against General Rochambeau, whom he mainly contributed to defeat in the battle of St. Marc. He was proclaimed emperor of Hayti on the 5th of October, 1801; but his cruelty and avarice making him obnoxious, Christophe and Pethion raised an insurrection, and Dessalines was killed by a musket shot on the 17th of October, 1806, and was succeeded by Christophe, under the title of Henry I. Though of low stature, Dessalines was firmly built, and his eyes were possessed of uncommon brilliancy. He was utterly uneducated. b. about 1760.

DESTOUCHES, Philip Néricault, dai-toosh', a French dramatic writer, who was attached to a political mission to England, and resided in London for a number of years. On his return to his own country, he refused the office of ambassador to Russia, and retired into the country, where he devoted himself to agriculture and the belles-lettres. b. at Tours, 1680; d. 1754.—His principal pieces are "Le Philosophe marié," and "Le Glorieux," the last of which is esteemed one of the best comedies in the French language. His works were printed at the Louvre, in 4 vols. 4to, 1757, and since in 10 vols. 12mo.

DEVIS, Arthur William, de'-vis, an English painter, who received, when very young, a silver medal from the hands of Sir Joshua Reynolds, then president of the Royal Academy, for proficiency in the arts. He was employed by the East India Company, when only twenty years of age, as draughtsman on a voyage of discovery; but the ship despatched on the expedition was wrecked on the Fellew Islands, and Devis, after much privation, succeeded in reaching Bengal, where Sir William Jones and other distinguished individuals received him kindly, and warmly patronized him. He returned to England in 1793, and successfully practised his art for many years. His most important pictures are—"King John Signing Magna Charta," "Lord Cornwallis receiving the Sons of Tippoo Sahib as Hostages," and the "Battle of Trafalgar." Before executing the last-named work, Devis went on board the Victory, and made a sketch of the cockpit where Nelson died, and likewise took portraits of the officers and others who surrounded the hero in his last moments. b. Aug. 10, 1762; d. Feb. 11, 1822.

D'EWEES, Sir Symonds, duse, an English antiquary, who employed a considerable part of his time in collecting materials for a history of Great Britain, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by Charles I. In 1641 he was made a baronet, and, on the breaking out of the Civil War, accepted the Solemn League and Covenant. He compiled the "Journals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth," published in 1682, folio, and wrote his own life, which is in Peck's "Desiderata Curiosa." The "Journals of Parliament" are an authority for the parliamentary transactions of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. b. at Caxden, Dorsetshire, 1602; d. 1650.

DE WITT, John, de wit, a distinguished Dutch statesman, who laboured to retrench the power of the house of Orange by endeavouring to prevent the union of the offices of stadtholder, captain-general, and high-admiral in one and the same person. In 1654 he negotiated the peace with Cromwell, in which it was arranged that no member of the house of Orange should be made high-admiral or stadtholder. b. at Dort, 1625; murdered, with his brother, at the Hague, 1672. He had gone in his carriage to receive his brother as he came out of prison, having been unjustly confined, when he was set upon by the populace and killed.

D'HILLIERS, BARAGUAY. (See BARAGUAY.)

DIAGORAS, di-ag'-o-ris, a Greek philosopher of Melos, and a disciple of Democritus, who, having been the victim of a perjury which remained unpunished, passed from superstition to atheism, and was generally called the Atheist. He was driven from Athens on the charge of having turned into ridicule the Eleusinian mysteries, and perished by shipwreck, about 412 B.C.

DIAZ, Bartolomeo, de'-az, a Portuguese navigator, who discovered the Cape of Good Hope, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Tempests; but on his reporting this, in 1486, to John II., king of Portugal, he commanded it to be called Cabo de Buena Esperanza, or the Cape of Good Hope. Said to have been lost in a storm in 1500.

DIBDIN, Charles, dib'-din, an English actor, dramatist, and distinguished sea-song writer, was educated at Winchester, and originally intended for the church; but going to London, at the early age of sixteen he produced an opera, called "The Shepherd's Artifice," which was brought out at Covent Garden. In 1778 he was appointed musical manager at Covent Garden. Subsequently he built the "Circus," afterwards called the "Surrey;" and in 1788 published his "Musical Tour." In the following year he gave his entertainment called "The Whim of the Moment," of which he was sole author, composer, and performer. In this piece he sung his ballad of "Poor Jack," which completely won the ear of the public; and, from that time, his reputation as a balladist was established. He wrote no fewer than 900 songs, according to some, and 1200 according to others. Whichever number is correct, does not much signify; as a soil so prolific must have produced many weeds. Many of his lyrics, however, have great merit. They have soothed the seaman during long voyages, sustained him in the storm, and inspired him in battle; and they have been quoted to restore the mutinous to order and discipline. In 1805 he retired from public life, and received a government pension of £200 per annum. b. at Southampton, 1745; d. 1814. "Poor Tom Bowling" was written upon a brother of his, who had been the captain of an East Indiaman, and was twenty-nine years older than the author.—Thomas, a son of Charles, was long connected with the London stage, as an actor and dramatist. He wrote and adapted a vast number of pieces; but none of them are distinguished by much original merit. He also wrote a work of amusing "Reminiscences." b. 1771; d. in Pentonville, 1841.

DIBDIN, Rev. Thomas Froggall, was the son of the brother of Charles Dibdin's celebrated "Poor Tom Bowling, the darling of our crew."

He lost his parents when only in his fourth year, and was designed for the law, but ultimately became a clergyman, and an eminent bibliographer. In 1809 appeared his "Biblio-mania," and an enlarged edition in 1811. The work was well received, and brought him £200 of profit, and considerable remittance. After it, came his edition of Ames's "Typographical Antiquities," the "Bibliotheca Spenceriana," the "Bibliographical Decameron," and several "Antiquarian Tours." He was the founder of the Roxburghe Club, a literary association, instituted for the purpose of reprinting books. He also wrote "Reminiscences of a Literary Life," and several theological works. b. at Calcutta, 1776; d. 1847.

DICÆARCHUS, di-se-ar'-kus, a peripatetic philosopher of Messina, in Sicily, whose treatise on the "Geography of Greece" was published by H. Stephens, in 1839, and by Hudson in his "Collection of Writers on Geography," in 1709. His principal philosophical work was one "On the Soul," which he divided into three dialogues, and which argued against its existence. Lived in the 3rd century b.c.

DICK, Sir Alexander, dik, a Scottish physician, who studied at Edinburgh, and at Leyden under Boerhaave; and having taken his degree of M.D., returned to his own country. He afterwards made the tour of Europe, and when he came back settled in Pembrokeshire, where he practised with success. On the death of his brother, he succeeded to the family estate of Prestonfield, where he resided the remainder of his days. In 1756 he was chosen president of the College of Physicians at Edinburgh, to which he was a benefactor. b. at Prestonfield, in 1703; d. 1788.—He was the first who paid attention to the culture of the true rhubarb in Britain; for which he received, in 1774, the gold medal from the London Society for Promoting Arts and Commerce.

DICK, Sir Robert Henry, major-general, entered the army as ensign in the 75th foot in 1800; obtained a company in the 78th, in 1804; was in the expedition to Sicily, and was wounded in the battle of Maida; was present in the battle of Alexandria, under Abercromby, and again wounded at Rosetta. He was attached to the 42nd Highlanders in 1808, and went to the Peninsula with the 2nd battalion, where he was present, in command of his battalion, at Busaco, Ciudad-Rodrigo, the storming of Fort St. Michael, and the siege of Burgos. He again joined Wellington in the campaign of 1815, and was a third time wounded at Quatre-Bras, while in command of the 42nd. At the conclusion of the war he retired to Tullimet, his paternal estate in Perthshire; but, having lost his wife, he once more sought active service, obtained a command in India, and was killed in the battle of Sobraon, on the 10th of February, 1846, while in the act, as Lord Gough in his despatches expressed it, of "personally animating, by his dauntless example, the soldiers of her Majesty's 80th regiment in their career of noble daring."

DICK, Thomas, LL.D., the "Christian philosopher," was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and afterwards entered the ministry of the Secession Church. Much of his time was passed in teaching and lecturing on scientific subjects. He also contributed to many periodicals, whilst producing the following more permanent works:—"The Christian Philosopher," "The Philosophy of Religion," "Philosophy of a Future State," "On the Mental Illumination and Moral Improvement of Mankind," "Christian Benevolence contrasted with Covetousness,"

Diderot

"Celestial Scenes," "The Solar System," "The Atmosphere and Atmospheric Phenomena," and "The Telescope and Microscope." Some of these works have been translated into other languages, and the "Solar System" into the Chinese. All his works have received the highest commendation, and merit a place in every Christian library. Towards the close of his life a small pension was granted to him by the government. b. near Dundee, Scotland, 1772; d. 1857.

DICKENS, Charles, dik'-ens, one of the most successful of modern novelists, was intended for the profession of the law, but became a reporter for the newspapers. His first engagement was in the office of "The True Sun," and his next in that of the "Morning Chronicle," in the evening edition of which paper first appeared his "Sketches of Life and Character." These were subsequently collected, and given to the world under the title of "Sketches by Boz." Their success induced an enterprising publisher to engage Mr. Dickens and Mr. Seymour, the comic draughtsman, "the one to write, and the other to illustrate, a book which should exhibit the adventures of a party of cockney sportsmen." The result was the "Pickwick Papers," a performance which at once placed Mr. Dickens in the foremost rank as a popular writer of fiction. After it, came his "Nicholas Nickleby," "Oliver Twist," the "Old Curiosity-Shop," "Barnaby Rudge," and many more, teeming with original wit, humour, and sentiment, besides abounding with vivid descriptions of human life and character. In 1841 he paid a visit to America, where his fame had preceded him, and where he received a hearty welcome. On his return, he published a work recording the impressions made by his visit. In 1845 he was appointed principal editor of the "Daily News," a paper of liberal politics; but he did not long hold this position. For its columns he contributed "Pictures of Italy." On his retirement from that paper he resumed the pen of fiction, and produced "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," several "Christmas tales," the "Child's History of England," "Little Dorrit," and edited the "Memoirs of Grinnaldi." He, besides, till 1859, conducted the periodical called "Household Words," and was a constant contributor to its pages. In that year he relinquished his connexion with that serial, to establish another on a similar plan, and entitled "All the Year Round," of which the first series was completed and the second commenced in December, 1863. In 1867-8, he visited the United States for the purpose of giving readings in the principal towns, and, on his return from America, commenced a series of farewell readings in the principal towns of the United Kingdom. b. at Landport, Portsmouth, 1812.

DICKENS, Mrs., dik'-ens, whose maiden name was Poole, a celebrated singer, sustained the same range of characters as Mrs. Billington, to whom, however, she was inferior as a vocalist. She began her career at Covent Garden, in 1793, after having been the pupil of Rauzzini, the teacher of Braham, and from that time till 1818 was constantly engaged at the operas and oratorios in the metropolis. Ill-health compelled her to retire in the year last-mentioned; and she died in 1833.

DIDEROT, Denis, de'-do-ro, a French writer, was the son of a master cutler, and was intended for the profession of the law; but, from sheer indolence and the love of reading, he relinquished this intention, and gave himself up to literature and philosophy. His first work, entitled "Philosophical Musings," was published in 1746 and was afterwards reprinted under another title. In 1747 he was concerned in a Medical share in this work was large, and the whole of the articles on arts and trade were furnished by him. His own opinion of it, however, is not very flattering. "In its execution," said he, "I had neither time nor the power to be particular in the choice of my contributors, who were mostly very inferior men, badly paid, and, consequently, careless in their work." While engaged in the "Encyclopédie," he wrote some other books; such as a licentious novel, called "Eijoux Indiscrets," and two comedies, the "Fils Naturel" and the "Père de Famille." In 1749 appeared his "Letters on the Blind," the free sentiments in which occasioned his being imprisoned six months at Vincennes. On recovering his liberty, he wrote "Letters on the Deaf and Dumb." His other works are, "Principles of Moral Philosophy," "Reflections on the Interpretation of Nature," "The Code of Nature," "The Sixth Sense," "Of Public Education," "Panegyric on Richardson," "Life of Seneca." Diderot was an ingenious, rather than a useful writer. His works are fanciful, and full of prejudices against religion; but he made himself rich by them, if that is of consequence when a man comes to his death-bed. The last remark he was heard to make by his daughter, shortly before his death, was, that "the first step towards philosophy is incredulity." n. at Langres, in Champagne, 1713: n. in Paris, 1784.

DIDYUS JULIANUS, M. Salvius Severus, did'-o-ju-jū'-u'-us, a Roman emperor, who was consul in 179 A.D. He purchased the imperial diadem from the soldiers at an enormous rate, in 193; but did not pay the sum agreed upon, and made himself odious by his luxurious and extravagant habits. Shortly afterwards, however, Severus was declared emperor by the praetorian bands, and Didius was slain, having reigned only sixty-six days. n. at Milan, about 133.

DIDO, or ELISSA, dī'-do, queen and founder of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. She married Sicheus, priest of Hercules, who, for the sake of his riches, was murdered by Pygmalion, the successor of Belus. Dido, disconsolate at the loss of her husband, sailed with a number of Tyrians, and settled on the coast of Africa, where she purchased a tract of land, on which she built a citadel, called Byrsa. This place soon increased, and her dominions extended. Iarbas, king of Mauritania, wooed her; but she rejected his suit; when he threatened to invade her territories. She requested three months to reconsider her refusal, and, in the interval, caused a funeral pile to be erected subjects, about 953 B.C. Virgil and Ovid have represented this action as the effect of grief, occasioned by the departure of Aeneas, of whom she was enamoured.

DIDOT, François Ambrose, dē'-dō, a celebrated printer, who invented stereotyping, ascribed also to a Scotchman named Ged, and executed several works with beauty. He also improved the construction of paper-mills, and invented many useful machines relative to the typographic art. At the age of 73 he read over five times, and carefully corrected, every sheet of the stereotyped edition of Montaigne, printed by his sons. He had likewise projected, and partly executed, an index to that writer. n. 1730; n. at Paris, 1804.—His brother, Pierre François, and his sons (particularly François) and a nephew, also did much to improve the arts of printing and type-casting in France.

DIDRON, Adolphe Napoléon, dē'-dron, one of the greatest modern French students of mediæval Christian art, who made himself familiar with all the remarkable mediæval monuments in France and Greece. In 1818 he lectured on Christian iconography in Paris, and afterwards became editor of the "Annales Archéologiques." His principal work, however, is his "Iconographie Chrétienne," a portion of which has been translated into English by Mrs. Millington. n. at Hanteville, 1806.

DIEBISCH, Sabalkanski Hans Karl Frederich Anton, dē'-bitsh, a Prussian, who entered the military service of Russia, and in 1805 was wounded at Austerlitz. After the battle of Friedland, he rose to the rank of captain, and subsequently became major-general. He fought at the battle of Lutzen, and was at that of Dresden. In 1814 he opposed the hesitation of the allies to march on Paris, for which the emperor Alexander bestowed on him the order of St. Alexander Nevski. In 1820, he became chief of the imperial staff of Alexander, whom he attended on his death-bed at Taganrog. In the war with Turkey in 1829, he took Varna, and greatly extended his reputation by making the passage of the Balkan. He advanced to Adrianople, when the treaty of that name was signed, and which saved his army. In 1831 he was sent to quell the insurrection in Poland, and fought the battle of Ostrolenka. Thence he transferred his head-quarters to near Pultusk, where he died of cholera, in 1831. n. at Gross-leippe, in Silesia, 1785.

DIEFFENBACH, Johann Frederich, dē'-fen-bak, esteemed one of the most skilful operating surgeons that ever lived, originally studied for the church, participated in the war of liberation in Germany, and did not commence the study of surgery and medicine till after the fall of Bonaparte in 1815. He attended the classes at Vienna and Wurtzburg, and then settled at Berlin, where he was appointed to the chair of surgery. He published several useful works, but his fame mainly rests on the skill with which he performed the most difficult operations, among others, those of making artificial noses, cheeks, eyelids, &c. He also invented a valuable method of curing squinting, which is now generally practised by the faculty. n. 1785; n. 1843.

DIEMEN, Anthony van, dē'-men, governor of the Dutch East India possessions, first went to India as an accountant, in the employ of his government. In 1625 he became a member of the supreme council, and in 1631 returned to Holland as commander of the Indian fleet; but the year following, went out again as director-general. Subsequently becoming governor-general, he greatly extended the Dutch interest in the East. In 1642 he sent Abel Tasman on a voyage to the south; the consequence of which was the discovery of that large island which was called after him Van Diemen's Land; but which name was changed, at the desire of the colonists, to Tasmania. n. at Kuilenberg; p. 1645.

DRENECES, di-en'-e-see, a Spartan, who, hearing, before the battle of Thermopylae, that the Persians were so numerous that their arrows would darken the light of the sun, observed, that it would be a great convenience, for the Spartans would then fight in the shade.

DRENDENCK, Abraham van, de'-pri-bek, an eminent Dutch painter, of the Flemish school, was a fellow-pupil of Vandyke in the studio of Rubens, at Antwerp. He was one of the best scholars of his great master, and acquired a high reputation. In 1611 he was elected director of the Antwerp Academy, an office which he held as long as he lived. He designed chiefly for the booksellers, and his works on canvas are very scarce. In the churches of Antwerp there are several painted windows by him. n. at Bois-le-Duc, about 1606; p. 1675.

DRES, Albert, dees, a German landscape-painter and engraver, who acquired considerable reputation in his art. After gaining a slight knowledge of this in Hanover, he proceeded to Dusseldorf, and thence to Rome, where he took up his abode in the neighbourhood of Tivoli and Albano. Here he devoted himself to the study of the ever-varying aspects of nature; and, in Rome, published, in conjunction with several German artists, a set of landscape-etchings. He now married a Roman lady, and, in 1706, returned to Germany, taking up his residence in Vienna. Here he rose into fame; but from having accidentally taken some sugar of lead, by mistake, for a medicine, he was afflicted with a nervous debility, which forced him to resign the use of his pencil. He now applied himself to poetry, in the study of which he had always been more or less occupied, and to musical composition. We are not aware that his excellence was great in either of these pursuits. n. in Hanover, 1755; p. at Vienna, 1822.

DRETRICH, Johann Wilhelm Ernst, de'-treesh, an eminent German artist, whose father was court-painter at Weimar, and from whom he received his first instructions in art. In his 12th year he was sent to study at Dresden, and there, in his 18th, was presented to Augustus II., king of Poland, whose court-painter he became. He obtained other patrons, and now rose rapidly. In 1741 he was appointed court-painter to Augustus III. In 1763 he became one of the professors in the Academy of Arts at Dresden, and director of the school of painting in the porcelain manufactory at Meissen. Dietrich was a persevering artist, but with little original power. His excellence lay chiefly in landscape painting. n. at Weimar, 1712; p. at Dresden, 1774.

DREZ, Juan Martin, de'-aitch, known as the "Empecinado," the celebrated guerilla chief who made himself famous, and gained great renown, during the Peninsular War, was the son of a peasant of Valladolid, and entered the army of his country as a dragoon. With a band of about fifty followers, he, in 1808, commenced a career of guerilla warfare which greatly harassed the French, and was of material value in aiding in their expulsion from Spain. The Duke of Wellington, to whom he was of great use, fully appreciated his services, and he was at length made a brigadier general of cavalry. He attended the Duke in his triumphant entry into Madrid, and was ordered by him to join the army at Tortosa, in command of 500 men. Dizze gave advice to the government of Ferdinand VII., by addressing to the king in 1815 a singular letter, and by the independence of his conduct; and, as is not unusual with kings, all his services were forgotten, and he was charged with conspiracy, tried, condemned, and executed in 1825. n. 1775.

DIGBY, Sir EYWARD, dig'-le, an English gentleman, who was visited by James I. at Belvoir Castle, and knighted by that sovereign, when on his way from Scotland to ascend the throne of England. He became a partisan in the gunpowder plot, for which he was executed in 1606. n. 1581.—He pleaded guilty at his trial, and endeavoured to extenuate his crime by alleging conscience as his motive.

DIGBY, Sir KENELM, son of the above, was brought up in the Protestant religion, and educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, where he studied philosophy; after which he made the tour of Europe, and was absent two years in France, Spain, and Italy. On his return, he received the honour of knighthood at Hinchinbrook, near Huntingdon, the house of Lord Montague. In the reign of Charles I. he was appointed to several posts, and on occasion of some difference between England and the Venetians, was dispatched with a fleet into the Mediterranean, and gained considerable reputation by his conduct. About 1638 he quitted the Church of England for that of Rome, and vindicated this change in a composition, entitled "A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion." At the commencement of the civil war, he was imprisoned by the Parliament in Winchester House, during which time he wrote a refutation of Brown's "Religio Medici." In 1643 he regained his liberty, went to France, and, soon after, travelled into Holland to visit Descartes, with whom he established an intimate friendship. When Cromwell assumed the government, he ventured to visit his native country, and was frequent in his attendance at the court of the Protector. He also became a member of the Royal Society, and was one of the council. n. 1603; p. in London, 1665, and was buried in Christ Church, Newgate-street. With his son the males of that branch of the Digby family became extinct. Sir Kenelm wrote "A Treatise on the nature of Bodies;" "On the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul;" "Institutionum Peripateticarum Libri quinque, cum Appendice Theologica de Origine Mundi;" and several other works. Sir Kenelm's wife was Venetia Anastasia Stanley, distinguished for her beauty, which he tasked his ingenuity to preserve, by the invention of cosmetics for her use. There is a portrait of her, by Vandyke, in Windsor Castle.

DIGBY, John, an English nobleman, who was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to James I., and by whom he was sent ambassador to Spain. In 1618 he was made Lord Digby, and in 1621 sent ambassador to the emperor of Germany. In 1622 he was again sent to Spain to negotiate a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, and, the same year, was created earl of Bristol. On his return, he and Buckingham preferred charges against each other in parliament, which, however, did not lead to a trial. When the civil war broke out, he went abroad, and died at Paris, 1653. n. at Colehill, Warwickshire, 1590. He wrote some poems.

THE DICTIONARY

Digby

DIGBY, George, Earl of Bristol, an English nobleman, the son of the above, received his education at Oxford. He became a member of the Long Parliament, wherein he, at first, opposed the court, but afterwards joined the royal party, and was expelled. He exerted himself in the service of Charles I., and when that monarch was put to death, his lordship was exempted from pardon, when he went abroad. At the Restoration he was made knight of the Garter. In 1663 he impeached Lord Clarendon in the House. b. at Madrid, Spain, 1612; d. at Chelsea, 1676.—He wrote a play called "Elvira, or the Worst not always True," which was printed in 1667.

DIGGERS, Thomas, digs, was educated at Oxford, after which he became muster-master-general of the forces sent by Queen Elizabeth to assist the oppressed Netherlanders. He wrote,—1. "Alas, sive Scake Mathematicæ," containing demonstrations for finding the parallaxes of any comet, or other celestial body, 4to. 2. An arithmetical treatise, named "Stratagemæ," requisite for the perfection of soldiers, 4to. 3. "Perfect Descriptions of the Celestial Orbs," 4to. 4. "Humble Motives for As-sociations to maintain the Religion established," 8vo. 5. "England's Defence," a treatise concerning invasion, folio. b. in Kent; d. 1595.

DIGGES, Sir Dudley, the eldest son of the above, was educated at University College, Oxford. He was knighted by James I., who sent him ambassador to Russia; but in the parliament of 1621 he resisted the court measures, and so continued to do in the next reign, for which he was sent to the Tower. In 1636 he was brought over by the grant of the mastership of the Rolls. He wrote,—1. "A Defence of Trade," 1615, 4to. 2. "A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject," 4to. 3. "Speeches," in Rushworth's Collections. 4. A collection of letters, which appeared after his death, under the title of the "Complete Ambassador." b. 1593; d. 1639.

DIKE, Charles Wentworth, dike, a publicist, closely connected with the literature of his day. Receiving, at an early age, an appointment in the Navy Pay-office, he found leisure to contribute papers to various magazines and reviews, and to edit a collection of old English plays, in 6 vols. This work appeared in 1814. He subsequently became connected with the "Athenæum," a literary journal, and by skilful management raised it to an influential position in periodical literature. b. 1789; d. 1864.

DIKE, Sir Charles Wentworth, son of the above, was one of the most active promoters of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851, and to his unwearied industry in working out its details, its success was greatly attributable. He was also one of the Royal Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862, and took the most active part in its organisation and superintendence. He was made a baronet in 1862, and entered parliament in 1865. b. 1810.

DILLENIUS, Johann James, dil-le'-no-us, an eminent German botanist, who, in 1721, accompanied Dr. Sherrard to England, where he spent the remainder of his days. Soon after his arrival he undertook a new edition of Ray's "Synopsis Stirpium Britannicarum," and was appointed the first botanical professor at Oxford, on Dr. Sherrard's foundation. In 1736 the university admitted him to the degree of M.D. He published a work, entitled "Florus Elthamensis," and a "History of Mosses." b. at Darmstadt, 1687; d. 1747.

Diodorus Siculus

DIMSDALE, Thomas, dims'-dail, a celebrated physician, who accompanied the duke of Cumberland in his expedition against the army of Prince Charles Stuart, as assistant-surgeon, and continued in that capacity till the surrender of Carlisle, when he returned to Hertford. In 1761 he commenced practice, and became celebrated by his successful mode of inoculating for the small-pox. In 1763, accompanied by his son, he went to Russia, and inoculated the empress and grand-duke, for which he was created a baron of the empire, physician to her majesty, and counsellor of state. A gratuity of £12,000 was given him for his journey, and a pension of £500 a year. In 1781 he again visited Russia, to inoculate the two sons of the grand-duke. The year preceding, he was elected member of parliament for Hertford, and again in 1784, on which he quitted practice. About this time he had the misfortune to lose the sight of both eyes by cataract, from which he was relieved by Baron Wenzell. In 1790 he retired from parliament. He wrote "Tracts on Inoculation," 8vo, 1781, in which is an account of his first journey to Russia. b. in Essex, 1712; d. 1800.

DINARCHUS, di-nar'-kus, a native of Corinth, who established himself at Athens, and there received large sums of money for the composition of orations, which he prepared by order for those who wanted them. Accused of taking bribes from the enemies of Athens, he went into involuntary exile about 307 B.C., but was recalled after an absence of fifteen years. Three of his orations only have come down to us, and are in Stephens's Collection, 1676.

DIOCALES, di-nok'-ra-tes, an architect of Macedonia, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, burnt down, 356 B.C., by Eratosthenes; extended and beautified Alexandria, at the command of Alexander the Great; and was called into Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus. To him, as well as to others, has been ascribed the gigantic project of cutting Mount Athos in the form of a statue, holding a city in one hand, and in the other a basin, into which all the waters of the mountain could empty themselves. Lived in the 4th century.

DIOCLETIAN, Caius Valerius, di-o-kle'-she-an, a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family, and raised from a common soldier to the rank of general. On the death of Numerian, in 284, he was chosen emperor. He took Maximian to be his colleague, and created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he styled Cæsars. He was a great commander, and a patron of learning; but, in 303, stained his reign by a persecution of the Christians. He renounced the crown in 304, and retired to Salona, where he died, 313. b. at Dioclea, in Dalmatia, about 245.—This was one of the most distinguished of the Roman emperors.

DIONAZI, Giovanni, de'-o-da'-te, a distinguished divine, descended from a noble family of Lucca, was educated as a Catholic, but embraced Protestantism, became professor of Hebrew at Geneva, was the friend of Milton, and at one time visited England. He made a translation of the Bible into Italian, for which his name has become famous. b. 1576; d. 1649.

DIOPORUS SICULUS (of Sicily) di'-o-dor'-us sik'-u-lus, an historian, who produced an "Historic Library," or "Universal History," in 40 books, which contained the history of the world from the creation to 60 B.C. Unfortunately, of this work only 15 books and a few fragments remain. Though his chronology is erroneous, and there are many great defects in his writings, they are, nevertheless, extremely valuable, containing, as they do, facts to be met with in no other collection. He flourished about 44 B.C. B. in Sicily. The best edition of his work is that of Wesseling, in 2 vols. folio, Amsterdam, 1745.

DIOTREXES, di-ot'-e-nees, a Cynic philosopher, who being forced to leave his native country for coining false money, went to Athens, and applied himself to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynics. He carried the austerities of his sect to a great extreme, wearing a coarse ragged cloak, living on the meanest food, and lodging under porticos and other public places. It is said that he also took up his residence in a tub, and that this became his favourite abode. At Corinth he used to harangue in the Craneum; where he was visited Cynic." The monarch then asked him if he could render him any service. "Yes," said he; "stand out between me and the sun." The independence of mind shown by the philosopher struck the king, and he said, "If I was not Alexander, I would be Diogenes." He is supposed to have died at Corinth, and a public funeral was decreed him by the Athenians. The people of Sinope erected statues to his memory. B. at Sinope, a city of Pontus, 414 B.C.

DIOTREXES, surnamed the Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Chrysippus, and the successor of Zeno as teacher of philosophy. He accompanied Carnades and Critolaus on an embassy from Athens to Rome. Lived about 200 B.C. His works are lost.

DIOTREXES LAERTIUS, la-er'-she-us, a Greek historian, who wrote the "Lives of the Philosophers," in ten books. The best edition of Laertius is that of Amsterdam, 1692, 2 vols. 4to. The most convenient edition is that of H. G. Hubner, Leipzig, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo. B. at Laertes, in Cilicia. Lived during the reign of Severus or Caracalla.

DIOTREXES, a Cretan philosopher, who succeeded his master, Anaximenes, in his school of philosophy at Miletus, about 430 B.C.

DION, di-on, a celebrated patriot of Syracuse, who was the disciple and friend of Plato, when that philosopher was at the court of Dionysius, whose daughter, Arete, he married. Being afterwards ill-treated and banished his country by Dionysius, he resolved upon revenge, and with a small force landed in Sicily during the absence of Dionysius, and entered Syracuse in triumph. The tyrant, informed of this, hastened to Sicily, and made a violent assault on the citadel, in defending which Dion was wounded. Being supplanted by Heracles, the commander of the Syracusan fleet, who had defeated that of Dionysius, Dion retreated to Leontium, whence he was recalled when the city was besieged by another force sent against it by Heracles. He relieved the place, pardoned his enemies, and retired to a private station. In a subsequent conspiracy, he fell by assassination, 364 B.C.

DION CASSIUS, kas'-se-us, a Bithynian historian, whose father was proconsul of Cilicia, whence Dion went to Rome; and here his pleadings recommended him to notice, leading him, at length, to the office of consul. He wrote in Greek the "History of Rome," from the building of the city to the reign of Alexander Severus, the greatest part of which, however, is lost. That which remains was printed by Robert Stephens, at Paris, in 1551, and afterwards by Romar, with a Latin translation. He died, in his native country, it is said, about the age of 70. B. at Nicæa, in Bithynia, about 155.

DIONYSIUS I., di-o-nish'-e-us, king or tyrant of Syracuse, who, from being a plain citizen, became commander of the forces, overthrew the government, and assumed the title of king, 405 B.C. While he was engaged in an expedition against Carthage, a body of his forces deserted, and returning, took possession of the citadel, plundered his riches, and offered violence to his wife. Dionysius hastened back, and having defeated his enemies, took upon them a severe revenge. He now concluded a peace with the Carthaginians, and employed himself in defending the city. Having defeated another insurrection, he disarmed all his subjects. He conquered several cities, and, after a long war with the Carthaginians, succeeded in driving them from Sicily. Dionysius affected a taste for polite literature, and committed dreadful cruelties. Being of a suspicious disposition, he caused a subterraneous prison to be so constructed as to carry, by tubes to his private apartment, every sound or speech uttered by his prisoners. He invited Plato to his court; but being displeased with his moral discourses, he sent him away in disgrace, and ordered the master of the ship to sell him for a slave. B. at Syracuse, 430; D. 367 B.C. (See DAMOCLES.)

DIONYSIUS II., the younger, the son and successor of the above, whom he exceeded in cruelty, but whose equal he was not in policy. He also sent for Plato to his court, profiting little, however, by the conversation of that philosopher. He banished his brother-in-law, Dion, and obliged his wife to marry again, which so enraged Dion, that he gathered an army, and drove the tyrant from Syracuse, B.C. 356. Dionysius returned about ten years afterwards, and was expelled by Timoleon; on which he fled to Corinth, where he supported himself as a schoolmaster. D. 313 B.C.

DIONYSIUS, an historian and critic of Heli-carnassus, in Caria, was invited to Rome about 30 B.C., and there wrote his "Roman Antiquities," only eleven books of which are extant. He is esteemed for his impartiality, and particularly for his chronological accuracy. Besides this work, we have one written by him, entitled a "Companion" of some ancient historians, and another on the "Structure of Language." The best edition of his works is that of H. H. H. H., Leipzig, 1774, 6 vols. 8vo. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DIONYSIUS, called the Tyrant of Heraclea, in Pontus, married the niece of Darius, and greatly enlarged his territories. He was, it is said, of a most corpulent and somnolent habit, so that it was impossible to awake him without piercing his flesh with pins. B. 359; D. 304 B.C.

DIONYSIUS (the Areopagite), a native of Athens, and a member of the Areopagus, where he sat when St. Paul was brought before it and made his famous speech respecting the "unknown God," which was the means of the conversion of Dionysius. According to some accounts, he was consecrated bishop of Athens, and suffered martyrdom. There were printed at Antwerp, in 1634, 2 vols. purporting to be his works; but their authenticity is questionable.

DIONYSIUS, surnamed the Little, a Romish monk, who drew up a body of canons, called "Collectio, sive Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum," translated from the Greek; he also compiled a body of decretals. To him is attributed the invention of the Victorian period, or chronological mode of computing the time of Easter. Lived in the 5th century.

DIOPHANTUS, di-o-fan-tus, a mathematician of Alexandria, to whom is attributed the invention of algebra. When he lived is not settled; some placing him before the Christian era, and others afterwards. A Latin translation of his works was published by Holtzman, at Basle, in 1575, in 1 vol. folio.

DROSOCORDUS, Pedanius, di-os-kor-i-dees, a physician and botanist, of Greece, who wrote five books on the Materia Medica, containing the medical virtues of plants. These are the most abundant source from which we can draw a knowledge of the botanical attainments of the ancients; the best edition of these is that of Sarraenus, folio, Frankfurt, 1593. n. at Anazarba, Cilicia. Lived in the 1st century.

DIPPFL, John Conrad, dip'-pel, a German physician, who, at first, studied theology at Giessen, and afterwards read medical lectures at Strasburg. He asserted that he had discovered the philosopher's stone, and other wonderful secrets. After rambling from place to place, he settled at Hamburg; but was given up to the Danish government for some freedoms he had taken in regard to the government of that country, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the island of Bornholm. After seven years' confinement, he was set at liberty, and, about the same time, was invited to Sweden, to attend the king, who was dangerously ill. The influence of the clergy, however, procured his expulsion in 1727. He then went to Germany, and in 1733 gave out that he would not die. In 1808; but the year following, he was found dead in his bed. n. at Darmstadt, 1672.—He wrote a number of enthusiastic books, under the name of "Christianus Democritus." In the midst of his extravagances, however, Dippel did some good. He made several useful discoveries; amongst others, those of the animal oil which goes by his name, and of Prussian blue.

DISRAELI, Isaac, dis-rai'-le, was the descendant of a family of Spanish Jews, who, in the 15th century, fled from the religious persecutions in the Peninsula, and settled in Venice, where they assumed the name of Disraeli, "which was never borne before or since by any other family." The father of Isaac came to England in the middle of the 18th century, and made a fortune by commerce; and he, himself, was the only child by a mother of the same race as his father. He was intended for the pursuits of commerce, but having a strong aversion to that line of life, he was suffered to apply himself to literature, and, after some performances in the region of poetry and romance, published, in 1790, a small volume entitled "Curiosities of Literature." The success of this volume stimulated him to pursue his researches in the same path, and, by 1830, the one volume had become six, full of interesting matter. In 1795 appeared his "Essay on the Literary Character," which was succeeded, at various periods, by "Calamities of Authors," "Quarrels of Authors," an "Inquiry into the Political Character of James I.," "Literary Miscellanies," "Life and Reign of Charles I.," and a few other works. In 1841 he published his "Amenities of Literature," and, afterwards, amused the remainder of his days with revising what he had before written. n. at Enfield, 1766; p. at Bradenham, Buckinghamshire, 1848.

DISRAELI, the Right Honourable Benjamin, the son of the preceding, at an early age discovered such precocity of talent as seemed to prognosticate future success in the paths of literature; but, as he was intended for the legal profession, he was placed in an attorney's office, where he continued for some time. In 1826 he became a contributor to a paper started in the Tory interest, and called "The Representative." This paper lived only five months; but it seems to have had some effect upon the mind of Mr. Disraeli, in so far as to give it a political bias. In 1828 appeared his novel of "Vivian Grey," which was, at various times, succeeded by "Constans Fleming," "The Young Duke," "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy," "The Rise of Iskander," "Henrietta Temple," "Venetia," "Coningsby," "Sybil," and "Tancred." Besides these, he produced, in 1834, a quarto poem, entitled "The Revolutionary Epic;" and, in 1839, "Alarcos, a Tragedy." He also wrote some pamphlets, and a biography of Lord George Bentinck. Whilst thus actively engaged in the world of letters, he was continually before the public eye as a politician. In this character, however, he did not at first figure so satisfactorily as in that of a writer of fiction. After travelling on the continent between the years 1829 and 1831, he returned, and stood for the representation of the borough of Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire, in the interest of the radical reforming party. He was unsuccessful, but nothing daunted; and, in 1833, he came forward in the same interest as a candidate for Marylebone. Here he was again unsuccessful, notwithstanding that he declared himself the friend of triennial parliaments and of vote by ballot. Having failed as a Radical, he, in 1835, came forward as a Conservative candidate for the borough of Taunton. He was still unsuccessful; but, in 1837, as a Conservative, he was returned member for Maidstone. His first speech in the House was, like his first endeavours to obtain a seat there, a complete failure. The oration was laughed at throughout, and he was compelled to sit down before it was finished. This, however, he did not do until he had said, "I have begun, several times, many things, and have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." These words proved prophetic. The time did come when he was listened to, and that, too, with the most anxious eagerness. By 1841 he was recognized as the leader of "the Young England party." Between that year and 1846 his attacks upon Sir Robert Peel were as frequent, as they were often brilliant and severe. He was then member for Shrewsbury, and, in 1847, was elected member for Buckinghamshire. In 1848 his friend Lord George Bentinck died, when he became leader of the old Tory or Protectionist party in the House of Commons. In 1852 he became chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Derby, and again in 1853 and in 1866. On the retirement of Lord Derby from the premiership in January, 1868, Mr. Disraeli succeeded him, and held office until after the general election in that year, when, in consequence of the majority against him in the House of Commons, he resigned. b. 1805.

DITTON, Humphrey, dit-on, a learned mathematician and master of Christ's Hospital, who wrote various articles in the "Philosophical Transactions," but is best known for his work, "The Institution of Fluxions," etc. b. at Salisbury, 1675; d. 1715.

DIVINI, Eustachius, de-te-ne, an Italian, who distinguished himself by his skill in grinding telescope glasses. In this, however, he was soon outstripped by Huygens, who introduced such improvements as enabled him to discover Saturn's ring. Divini contested the truth of this, Huygens replying and Divini rejoining. b. about 1664.

DIXON, W. Hepworth, dis-on, a modern English writer, who first brought himself into notice by contributing some papers to the "Daily News," "On the Literature of the Lower Orders." He wrote another series on "London Prisons," and then produced several biographical works of considerable merit. Among these we may notice that of "William Penn," in which he undertakes the defence of his subject against several charges made by Lord Macaulay in his "History of England." To the arguments and statements of Mr. Dixon, Macaulay never replied. He also wrote lives of Blake and of DONSON, William, dob-son, an English painter, who imitated the manner of Vandyck, by whom he was introduced to Charles I. He painted both historical subjects and portraits with great excellence. b. 1610; d. 1646.

DOUGLAS, Sydney, do-bel, an English poet, the author of the "Roman," "Balder," "England in Time of War," and, in conjunction with Alexander Smith, of "Sonnets of the War." b. at Peckham Rye, London, 1824.

DODD, William, dod, an unfortunate English divine, who, in 1753, entered into orders, and became a popular preacher in the metropolis. In 1766 he took the degree of LL.D., at which time he was chaplain to the king; in 1771, he published "Sermons to Young Men," and the year following, obtained the living of Hockloft, in Buckinghamshire. The rectory of St. George, Hanover Square, becoming vacant in 1774, he sent an anonymous letter to the chancellor's lady, offering £3000 for the presentation. Being discovered as the writer of this letter, King George III. caused him to be struck out of the list of chaplains. On this he went abroad, and meeting his pupil, the earl of Chesterfield, at Geneva, that nobleman presented him with the living of Winge, in Buckinghamshire. This generosity he ill requited; for, being of an extravagant disposition, and more expensive in his habits than his income would allow, he forged Lord Chesterfield's name to a bond for £4200, in the hope of being able to take it up before it was due; but the fraud was discovered, and he was tried and condemned to the gibbet. b. at Bourne, Lincolnshire, 1720; hence, at Teynham, 1777. Dodd published a translation of the Hymns of Callimachus; four volumes of "Sermons on the Miracles and Parables;" "A Collection of Poems;" "Reflections on Death," 12mo; "Comfort for the Afflicted," 8vo; and after his death appeared his "Thoughts in Prison," with his life prefixed. He also selected the "Dramas of Shakespeare," which he introduced with criticisms throughout the body of the volume.

DODD, Ralph, a civil engineer, and the originator of several public works of importance, such as Vauxhall Bridge, the South Lambeth Waterworks, and a project for a tunnel at

His son, George Dodd, was also an engineer, and planned, and for a time superintended, the erection of Waterloo Bridge. b. 1827.

DODDERIDGE, or DODDINGTON, Sir John, dod-ridj, an English judge, and author of various works on legal science, among which are—"The Lawyer's Light," "The English Lawyer," "The Law of Nobility and Peerage," "The Complete Parson," &c. b. 1655; d. 1683.

DODDING, Philip, an eminent dissenting divine, who, after several preferments, settled at Northampton, as minister and tutor, and acquired a great and merited reputation by his learning, candour, and piety. Many eminent persons were educated under him, and he held friendly relationships and correspondence with the greatest dignitaries of the established church. Being of a consumptive habit, he went to Bristol, to endeavour to improve his health; but finding little or no benefit from the change, he went to Lisbon, where he died, 1751. b. in London, 1702.—He published a number of excellent works, the principal of which are, his "Family Expositor on the New Testament," 6 vols. 4to; the "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," of which numerous editions have been printed; the "Life of Colonel Gardiner;" and "Sermons on the Evidences of Christianity." His single sermons and tracts were collected in 3 vols. 12mo, after his death; also his "hymns," "Lectures on Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity;" and a volume of his letters, was issued by Mr. Stedman, of Shrewsbury, after the author's death.

DODDINGTON, George Dabb, Lord Melcomb-Regis, dod-ing-ton, a British statesman, remarkable alike for his talent and for the subtle subversiveness of his character, came into Parliament in 1715 for Winchelsea; was shortly afterwards sent envoy to Spain; was a lord of the treasury in Sir Robert Walpole's government; and obtained as the reward of his political subversiveness and intrigue, the title of Lord Melcomb-Regis. He associated much with the wits and learned men of the time, some of whom—such as Churchill and Pope—ridiculed and satirized him, while Hogarth introduced him and his wig into his picture called the "Orders of Periwigs." His "Diary," published in 1784, is curious as exhibiting the traits which distinguished the statesmanship of the time. b. in Dorsetshire in 1691; d. 1762.

DODSLEY, Robert, dods-le, an author and bookseller, but who first figured in life as footman to a lady. While in this station, he published a volume of poems by subscription, entitled the "Muse in Livery." His next piece was a dramatic trifle called "The Toyshop," which had the approbation of Pope, and was brought upon the stage with so much success, that the author was enabled to commence bookseller in Pall Mall, where he carried on an extensive business many years, and then left it to his brother. He also wrote the "King and Miller of Mansfield," which was followed by a sequel to it, named "Sir John Cockle at Court." His greatest dramatic effort, however, was the tragedy of "Cleone," which was successfully brought out at Covent Garden theatre. He also produced a little book, entitled "The Economy of Human Life," which, owing to a notion that prevailed that it was the production of the earl of Chesterfield, had a large sale. In 1760 he published select fables of Æsop and other fabulists, to which he prefixed an essay on fable. He also edited a valuable collection of poems by different authors, 6 vols.; and a collection of old plays, 12 vols. Mr. Dodsley was likewise the projector of the "Preceptor," a useful book for youth, 2 vols. 8vo; and of "The Annual Register," a work of high and deserved reputation. His own miscellaneous pieces were collected and published in 2 vols. 8vo. b. at Mansfield, 1703; p. at Durham, 1764.

DODSWORTH, Roger, dod's-worth, an English topographer, who collected the antiquities of Yorkshire, in 162 large volumes, which are in the Bodleian library at Oxford. b. in Yorkshire, 1553; p. 1654.

DODWELL, Henry, dod'-wel, a learned writer, who, after various vicissitudes, was, in 1689, appointed Camden professor of history at Oxford, but was deprived of that place in 1691, for refusing the oaths to King William, on which he retired to Cookham, and afterwards to Shottesbrooke, in Berkshire. In 1701 he published an account of the ancient Greek and Roman cycles, a quarto volume, of which Dr. Halley had a high opinion. To follow him through his numerous publications would exceed our limits; but his most famous book was on the "Natural Mortality of the Soul," in which he endeavoured to prove, from Scripture and the fathers, that "it is immortalised actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or reward, by its union with the divine baptismal spirit." This book made a great noise, and was answered by several writers, particularly Dr. Samuel Clarke. He wrote and edited several other works, and died at Shottesbrooke in 1711. b. at Dublin, 1641.—Henry, a son of the above, was bred to the law, and was an active promoter of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. He wrote a pamphlet, but did not affix his name to it, entitled, "Christianity not founded on Argument," in which, under the pretence of friendship, he endeavoured to undermine the Christian religion. It was answered by Dr. Leland, Dr. Doddridge, and the author's brother William, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became D.D., rector of Shottesbrooke, prebendary of Salisbury, and archdeacon of Berkshire.

DOGGET, Thomas, dog'-get, the legator of "Dogget's coat and badge," was an English actor and dramatic poet, who excelled in the representation of comic characters, playing at Drury Lane theatre, and becoming joint manager of that house. p. in 1721.—He left a legacy to provide a coat and badge to be rowed for, from London Bridge to Chelsea, by six watermen, yearly, on the 1st of August, the day of the accession of George I.

DOLABELLA, P. Cornelius, dol'-a-bel'-la, the son-in-law of Cicero, who attached himself to Julius Caesar, by whom he was made consul. On the death of Caesar he obtained the government of Syria; but having slain Trebonius, the governor of Asia Minor, and one of Caesar's assassins, he was declared an enemy of the republic. Cassius besieged him in Laodicea, where he killed himself, in the 27th year of his age. p. 43 B.C.

DOZCI, Carlo, dol'-chai, an artist of Florence, who attained great eminence as a painter of religious subjects. His heads are said to be inimitable. b. 1616; p. 1686.

DOLLOD, John, dol'-lond, an eminent English optician, who, though put to the trade of silk-weaving, devoted himself to the study of astronomy, which led him to consider the means by which the power of the telescope might be improved. Commencing business as an optician with his eldest son Peter, he invented the achromatic object-glass, and succeeded in applying the micrometer to reflecting telescopes, and made many other improvements. b. in Spitalfields, 1706; p. 1761.—His son Peter also made great improvements in optical instruments, and, in conjunction with his father, acquired a well-merited reputation. b. 1730; p. 1820.

DOLOMITI, Diodati, do'-lo-me-u(r), an able French mineralogist, who served with Bonaparte in Egypt, but on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina. Sir Joseph Banks, president of the Royal Society, interested himself successfully for his release, which he obtained in 1801. b. at Grenoble, 1750; p. in 1801.—His principal works are, "Voyage to the Isles of Lipari in 1781," "Memoir on the Earthquake of Calabria in 1783;" and several papers contributed to the "Mineralogical Dictionary." He was commander of the Order of Malta, a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and also of the National Institute.

DOMAT, Jean, dom-ar', a distinguished French jurist, who presided for nearly 30 years over one of the courts of law at Clermont. He wrote an important work on the civil law of France, entitled, "Les Loix Civiles dans leur Ordre Naturel, suivies du Droit Public," which was the origin of the system of Montesquieu's "Spirit of the Laws." It was translated into English, in 1773, by William Strahan. Domat's "Legum Delectus" was published after the author's death. b. 1625; p. 1693.

DOMBROWSKI, Henry John, dom-broo'-ske, a Polish general, who, in 1791, was engaged in the cause of the independence of his country against Russia and Prussia. Obligated to take refuge in France in 1796, he there formed a Polish legion, and had the command of it in the Italian campaign. In 1806, after the battle of Jena, he hastened to Poland, and there assembled a force of 30,000 men, which he united with Napoleon's army. In 1812, having made the greatest exertion to cover the retreat of the French from Moscow, he led the remains of his army beyond the Rhine. He was appointed, in 1815, commander of the cavalry, and senator of the new kingdom of Poland, but did not long enjoy these dignities. b. near Cracow, 1755; p. 1818.

DOMENICHINO, do'-main-e-ke'-no, an Italian painter, who studied in the school of the Caracci, where his fellow pupils, from his slowness, called him the "Ox." On this, one of his masters told them, that "this ox would in time make his ground so fruitful, that painting would be fed by what it produced." The prediction was verified. He was also deeply skilled in architecture, and filled the appointment of architect to Gregory XV. b. at Bologna, 1591; d. 1641.

DOMINIC, St., dom'-e-neek, a Spanish priest, who founded the order of the preaching friars called Dominicans, and, according to some authorities, the Inquisition. This, however, is an error, as the formal establishment of the "Holy Office" did not take place until 1533, when Gregory IX. named Pietro da Verona, a Dominican monk, the first inquisitor-general. b. at Calahorra, Spain, 1170; d. at Bologna, 1221. He was canonized by Pope Gregory IX.

DOMITIAN, Titus Flavius, do-mish'-e-an, the younger son of the emperor Vespasian. He obtained the imperial dignity on the death of his brother Titus, A.D. 81. The commencement of his reign seemed auspicious for the happiness of the Romans; but he soon discovered the wickedness of his disposition, and gave way to the most detestable crimes. He assumed the title of deity, and, at the same time, amused himself in catching flies, and sticking them on a bodkin. His cruelties rendered him so odious, that he was afraid of his own shadow, and took a number of precautions to secure himself from assassination, by which fate, however, he was overtaken, A.D. 96, in the 45th year of his age. He was the last of the twelve Cæsars.

DOMITIANUS, Domitius, do-mish'-e-a'-nus, general of Diocletian's army in Egypt, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Alexandria in 286, and fell by violence two years afterwards.

DON, David, an eminent botanist, who, in 1836, was appointed to the chair of Botany in King's College, London, which he held till his death. He wrote several excellent works upon the science of which he was a professor, and was, for some time, librarian to the Linnean Society. b. at Forfar, Scotland, 1800; d. 1840.

DONALDSON, Thomas Leverton, don'-ald-son, professor of architecture in University College, London, gradually rose to the high position he attained, and published several works illustrative of the subject of his profession. After pursuing his studies abroad, visiting Naples, and spending a year at Rome, he returned, and commenced publishing several works, which brought him prominently into notice. When the Institution of British Architects was inaugurated, in 1835, he was chosen one of its secretaries, and subsequently became chairman of the commissioners of sewers for Westminster. In 1843 he was appointed professor of architecture at University College. He acted on the committee for the Great Exhibition of 1851, and, in 1855, received, for his own drawings, from the committee of the "Exposition Universelle," a gold medal. He gave up his professorship in 1864. b. 1795.

DONATELLO, or DONATO, don-a-tail'-o, a Florentine sculptor, was the first who abandoned the dry Gothic style, and attempted to restore to his art the grace and beauty of the antique. His works are to be found in many of the Italian churches. Michael Angelo, it is said, held Donatelli's performances in high admiration. b. 1333; d. 1466.

nomer, of the museum at Florence, who was the first to discover, on the 2nd of June, 1858, the magnificent comet of that year, and which was known by his name. At that date it was 228,000,000 miles distant from the earth, being visible only by the most powerful telescopes. From that time it gradually approached our world until the 10th of October, when it was at its nearest, viz., 51,000,000 miles. Donati's comet was unexpected, and was new to astronomers, who, however, at its arrival, had been anxiously looking out for the return of that of 1536.

DONELL, Sir Ross, don'-el-e, a British admiral who entered the navy when young, and served in Lord Howe's victory on the 1st of June, 1794, where he so distinguished himself as to obtain promotion to flag rank, and was in command for some time in the Mediterranean. In 1804, Nelson entrusted him with the command of the squadron of frigates engaged in blockading Toulon; and in the expedition against the Cape of Good Hope, shortly afterwards, he evinced the most determined bravery. His next sphere of action was South America, where he was at the capture of Buenos Ayres; and during the investment of Monte Video he commanded the brigade of seamen and marines acting on land along with the army, and took part in the storming of the town on the 3rd of February, 1807, for his services on which occasion he received the thanks of Parliament. He next served on the Cadiz station, and, in 1810, joined Lord Collingwood off Toulon. He attained the rank of rear-admiral in 1814; vice-admiral in 1825; and admiral in 1838. d. at an advanced age in 1841.

DONIZETTI, Gaetano, don-e-zet'-te, a distinguished Italian musical composer, who received his first instructions in his art in the Musical Institute of Bergamo. In 1815 he removed to Bologna, and, entering the army, produced, in Venice, in 1818, his first opera, entitled "Enrico di Borgogna." In 1822 he left the army, but still continuing to cultivate his musical abilities, he put forth, in 1830, his "Anna Bolena" at Milan. Up to this period he had produced no fewer than thirty-one operas; and during the next fourteen years he added to these thirty-three more. Many have sunk into oblivion, but others, being of the highest class, retain their popularity with the musical public. Among these we may mention "Anna Bolena," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "La Fille du Régiment," "Don Pasquale," &c. In 1833 he was appointed professor of counterpoint in the Royal College of Music at Naples, and afterwards became chapel-master and composer to the imperial court at Vienna. Having unfortunately contracted habits of intemperance, he was for some time confined in a lunatic asylum. In 1847 he was taken to Bergamo, where he died in the following year. b. at Bergamo, 1793.

DONOVAN, Edward, don'-o-van, a writer on various departments of natural history, one of whose earliest works was "A Natural History of British Insects," begun in 1792 and finished in 1816. This work, although of great value at the time of its appearance, has since been superseded by others. Between 1794 and 1797 he published four volumes of a work entitled "The Natural History of British Birds," and in 1798, he commenced a series of illustrated volumes of the insects of Asia, containing epitomes of the natural history of the insects of China, India, and Asia generally, which had a very large sale. He subsequently published other works, and conducted a periodical called the "Naturalist's Repository," of which three vols. appeared. Science is not indebted to Donovan for any new discovery or important generalization: but his illustrated works have done much to engender a taste for the study of natural history. p. 1837.

DONNE, John, don, an English divine and poet, who, though reared a Roman Catholic, embraced, at the age of nineteen, the Protestant religion. Soon afterwards he went abroad, and on his return became secretary to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, when he privately married a daughter of Sir George More, lieutenant of the Tower. The latter was so irritated at the match, that he not only prevailed upon the chancellor to dismiss him from his service, but got him imprisoned in that ancient fortress. His confinement, however, was short, and a reconciliation was effected. At the desire of King James, he entered into orders, and became his chaplain. He was made D.D. by the university of Cambridge, and rose to such fame by his preaching, that he had the offer of no fewer than fourteen different livings during the first year of his ministry. In 1617 he was chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn; in 1621 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and soon after, Vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West. p. in London, 1573; p. 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. — Dr. Donne was a man of great wit, learning, and gravity. His satires are highly praised by Dryden, who calls him "the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet, of our nation." They were rendered into modern English by Pope. Three volumes of his sermons were published after his death, and some miscellaneous essays.

DONNE, Benjamin, an English mathematician, who made a survey of Devonshire in 1761, for which he received a premium of £100 from the Society for Promoting Arts and Commerce. About the same time he published "Mathematical Essays," in 8vo, which had a favourable reception, and procured him the office of keeper of the library at Bristol, where he kept an academy many years. In 1771 he printed an "Epitome of Natural and Experimental Philosophy," and in 1774 a work entitled "The British Mariner's Assistant." In 1796 he was appointed master of mechanics to the king. p. at Bideford, 1729; p. 1793. — Besides the books above mentioned, he wrote treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry.

DOO, George Thomas, do, an English artist, who was appointed historical engraver to the queen, and is best known by his "Knox preaching before the Lords of the Covenant," after Wilkie; Elty's "Combat," and Eastlake's "Italians coming in Sight of Rome." From the little encouragement, however, extended to his art, he nearly entirely abandoned it, and became a painter of portraits in oil. p. in London, 1800.

DORAN, John, Ph.D., dor'-an, a modern English writer, who, at the age of fifteen, manifested a predilection for literature, and produced a melodrama entitled "The Wandering Jew," which was, in 1822, first played at the Surrey Theatre, London. After passing some years in France, he became, successively, private tutor in four of the noblest families in Britain; and, in 1835, published his "History of the Borough and Castle of Reading." This work obtained for him the honorary degree of Ph.D. from which was written in conjunction with Mrs. Romer, and published in 1833. The share of that lady in it, however, was very small. "Table Traits, and Something on Them," "Habits and Men," "Knights and their Days," "Queens of England of the House of Hanover," "Monarchs retired from Business," and "The History of Court Fools." These works passed through several editions, and Dr. Doran also acted in the capacity of editor to a weekly paper, and contributed largely, both in prose and verse, to various periodicals. p. in London, 1807.

DORCHESTER, Dudley Carleton, Viscount, dor'-chester, an eminent English statesman, who, after visiting different European courts in a diplomatic character, was appointed ambassador to the United Provinces of the Netherlands, where he bore a distinguished part in the synod of Dort. On his return to England, he was, in 1626, created a peer by the title of Baron Carleton. He was soon after sent again to the Hague, and was employed there in several important measures, when he was recalled, created Viscount Dorchester, and made secretary of state. p. in Oxfordshire, 1573; p. 1632. — His letters during his embassy were printed in 1757, and again in 1775.

DORIA, Andrea, dor'-e-a, a celebrated Genoese naval commander, who, born of a noble family, early adopted the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the service of different Italian states. At length his own country required his assistance against the rebels of Corsica, and these he defeated. He was then appointed commander-in-chief of a fleet of galleys, and inflicted severe loss on the African pirates. On a revolution breaking out in Genoa, he entered into the service of Francis I. of France, which he quitted for that of Pope Clement VII., but shortly afterwards joined the party of Charles V. of Spain, and succeeded in driving the French out of Genoa. Charles now offered to invest Doria with the sovereignty of Genoa, but he nobly refused it, stipulating only that the republic should continue under the imperial protection. Having delivered Genoa from the oppression of the French yoke, he was, in 1523, honoured by the senate with the title of the "father and saviour of his country," and had a statue erected to his honour, and a palace built for him. He made his name famous through the Mediterranean by his naval exploits, particularly against Barbarossa and the African corsairs. p. at Oneglia, 1468; p. 1560.

DORÉ, Paul Gustave, dor'-ai, a French artist, noted chiefly for his drawings illustrative of the Bible, Milton, Dante, etc., which are marvelously effective. He is the most prolific draughtsman and painter of the present day. p. at Strasbourg, 1833.

DORIGNY, Nicholas, do'-reen'-ye, an eminent French engraver and designer, who resided for a lengthened period in Italy, and engraved many celebrated Italian paintings. Among these may be mentioned the "Transfiguration" by Raffaele; the "Taking down from the Cross," by Daniel da Volterra; and the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Domenichino. In 1711 he came to England for the purpose of engraving the cartoons of Raffaele, and had a room set apart for him at Hampton Court. He completed his task in 1719, when he received a purse of 100 guineas for a couple of sets which he presented to George I., who also knighted him. His sight having begun to fail, he, in 1723, disposed of his drawings, and in the following year returned to Paris. b. at Paris, 1657; d. 1746.—He had an elder brother named Louis, distinguished as a fresco-painter, who passed his life chiefly in Italy. b. at Verona, 1742.

DORISLAUS, Isaac, dor-is-lai'-us, a Dutch doctor of civil law at Leyden, whence he went to England, and was appointed to read lectures on history at Cambridge; but avowing republican principles, was obliged to resign. He afterwards became judge-advocate in the king's army, but quitted his majesty's service for that of the parliament, and assisted in drawing up the charge against Charles I. In 1649 he was sent ambassador to the Hague, where he was stabbed, while at supper, by some exiled royalists. The parliament caused his body to be brought to England, where it was interred in Westminster Abbey. Here, however, it was not suffered to remain. At the Restoration it was exhumed, and finally buried in St. Margaret's churchyard.

DOROSHOFF, Ivan, dor'-o-koff, a Russian general who entered the army at the age of twenty, and won distinction in the wars with the Turks in 1783. He displayed great courage in the siege of Warsaw in 1794, for which he was promoted and obtained a gold medal. He was made major-general in 1803, and from that time till 1807 served against the French, and was decorated both by his own sovereign and by the king of Prussia. He was charged with the defence of the fortresses on the Gulf of Finland; and in the campaign of 1812, again came into prominent notice, having greatly distinguished himself in the battles of Smolensko, Borodino, and Moskwa, for which he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. b. 1762; d. 1813.

D'ORSAY, Alfred, Count, dor'-sai, a clever Frenchman, distinguished as a man of fashion, and for his drawings and models, especially of horses. He married a daughter of the Countess of Blessington, but subsequently separated from her. He befriended Napoleon III. when residing in London as an exile, for which the emperor made him Director of Fine Arts in Paris in 1852, a few months before his death. b. 1793.

DORSET, Thomas Sackville, earl of, dor'-set, grand treasurer of England, was raised by Queen Elizabeth to the peerage, under the title of Lord Buckhurst. He was one of the Commissioners who tried Mary Queen of Scots, and it was he who was deputed to announce her sentence to that unfortunate lady. In 1593, he succeeded Lord Burleigh as treasurer, and was president of the commission appointed to try the earl of Essex. James I. created him earl of Dorset, and he continued to receive in his reign the same favour he had enjoyed in the preceding. b. at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536; d. at the council-board, 1603, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

DOSTRZEUS, dos-i-the'-us, a heresiarch of Samaria, who asserted that he was the Messiah, and had with him a woman whom he called the moon. Retiring into a cave, he there starved himself, in order that his disciples might believe he had ascended to heaven. His sect, which lasted till the 6th century, abstained mentioned in terms of high praise by Aristotle, b. about 1475; d. 1500.—His brother, Giobattista, aided Dosso in the execution of his work, though only in the subsidiary parts.

after taking a tour in the United States, he returned, and became one of the curators in the British Museum. Here he was enabled to pursue his favourite studies to a large extent, and commenced a work in parts, "On the Genera of Diurnal Lepidoptera." This work he did not live to complete. b. in London, 1810; d. 1849.

DOUCE, Francis, doce, an antiquarian, chiefly known by his work entitled "Illustrations of Shakspeare and Ancient Manners." At his death he bequeathed his writings and correspondence, in a strong box sealed up, to the British Museum, which would not accept it, on account of its being labelled with the following inscription:—"Mr. Douce's papers, to be opened in the year 1900." It was then presented to the Bodleian library. b. in London, 1762; d. 1831.—Mr. Douce also wrote a dissertation on Holbein's "Dance of Death," accompanied by 54 engravings on wood, which are admirably executed.

DOUGLAS, dug'-las, the name of a family who have played a distinguished part in Scottish history, and who were long the leading noble house in that kingdom. The name, which is of Gaelic derivation, signifies "dark gray," and is said to have originated in the following circumstance. In a battle between the Scots and an invading body of Danes, in which the latter were defeated, the Scottish king had observed a man of stalwart proportions, grizzled locks, and dusky aspect, perform prodigies of valour in the battle, and after the conclusion of the combat, seeing the hero leaning on his sword at a little distance, directed one of his attendants to call yonder dug-glas man to him. On the approach of the warrior, the monarch complimented him on his prowess, knighted him, and assigned him certain lands for his inheritance. This, according to a tradition, was the origin of the noble house of Douglas; and whether the story be true or not, it is certain that the race have generally been distinguished by the courage, the stalwart frame, and the swarthy complexion of their alleged progenitor. The family has produced many eminent warriors, of whom the following are the most distinguished:—

DOUGLAS, William, surnamed the "Hardy," was besieged in Berwick by Edward I., and notwithstanding a gallant defence, was taken prisoner. d. 1342.

DOUGLAS, James, eldest son of the above, usually called "The Good Sir James," was one of the most eminent of the associates of Sir Robert Bruce in his efforts to restore the independence of Scotland, and did distinguished service at the battle of Bannockburn, where he commanded the left wing of the Scottish host, and was made a knight banneret under the royal standard. He afterwards, in company with Lockhart of Lee, undertook to convey the heart

DOYLE, Sir John, doil, a military officer, who entering the army as ensign in 1771, won distinction in the first American war, in the principal actions in which he took part. He afterwards served under Lord Moira, and in Holland under the duke of York; was secretary at war in Ireland under earl Fitzwilliam and Lord Camden, and acquired great influence in the Irish House of Commons, in one of his speeches in which he produced a great sensation by relating the conduct of a corporal of the 16th dragoons, named O'Lavery, who, being sent with despatches through a dangerous country, was attacked by the enemy, wounded, and, to conceal his despatches, hid them in his wound, where they were afterwards found completely covered by the congealed blood. Sir John was subsequently employed (as brigadier-general) in Gibraltar, Minorca, and Malta; went as a volunteer to Egypt, and shared in the actions of the 8th, 13th, and 21st of March, 1801; accompanied General Hutchinson in the expedition to Grand Cairo, where he greatly distinguished himself; travelled from Rosetta to Alexandria, a distance of 40 miles, while suffering from fever, and, in command of a division of the army, defeated the attempts of General Menou upon his position. In 1804 he was appointed governor of Guernsey; in 1805 was created a baronet; in 1808 was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general; in 1812 was made a knight of the Bath; in 1819 attained the grade of general; and was subsequently made governor of Charlemont, an honorary office. p. 1756; p. 1834.

DOYLE, Sir Charles William, also a distinguished British officer, who began his career as lieutenant in the 14th foot, in 1793, and subsequently served with great merit in various parts of the world, but especially in Spain, principally in the armies of the country, but with the approval of Wellington and the British government, who had appointed him military commissioner with the patriotic forces. He attained the rank of major and lieutenant-general in the Spanish service, had the cross of Charles III. conferred upon him for his services in 1808-9, a corps called the Triadores of Doyle having been previously raised and named in commemoration of his conduct at Olite, in 1810; he took by assault the battery of Bagur, Sept. 10, and assisted in the capture of Palamos on the 14th, in honour of which services a special medal was struck by the Spanish authorities. For his defence of Tarragona, in 1811, and for his conduct in three battles in Catalonia, he received the Grand Cross of Distinction from the Spanish government, and was made commander of the army of reserve raised at Cadiz during the siege. He was made a companion of the Bath and a knight of the Legion of Honour in 1812; was created a knight of the Guelphic Order for his services with the Hanoverians at Valenciennes and Lanols, and was advanced grand cross of the same order in 1839. He attained the rank of colonel in the British army in 1813; major-general in 1815; and lieutenant-general in 1837. n. in Ireland; p. 1843.

DOYLE, Richard, an English artist who excelled in depicting the passing whims and oddities of the day, and was for some time a constant illustrator of the pages of "Punch." It was in that facetious periodical that he illo-trated with great success, and in endless variety, "Ye Manners and Customs of ye English," and produced many other sketches, discovering much originality of invention, as well as humorous appreciation. In 1850 he ceased to contribute to "Punch," and afterwards produced "The Foreign Tour of Brown, Jones, and Robinson," and other works. p. in London, 1826.

DRACO, drai'-ko, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, who exercised the office of archon, and, in 623 B.C., compiled a code of laws, which, on account of their severity, were said, by the orator Demades, to be written in letters of blood. He punished all crimes with death, alleging that, as the smallest crimes deserved it, he could not find a more severe punishment for the most atrocious. These laws were at first enforced, but were afterwards often neglected, on account of their extreme rigour. Solon ultimately totally abolishing them, except that which punished a murderer with death. Notwithstanding the severity of his code, his popularity was so great that it was the proximate cause of his death. The Athenians, agreeably to a custom among them, out of great respect, heaped hats and cloaks on him at the theatre to such a degree, that they smothered him. Flourished in the 7th century B.C.

DRAGUT, dra'-goot, the favourite and successor of the corsair Barbarossa, whom he equalled in skill and valour. After a series of daring exploits, he was killed before Malta in 1555. (See BARBAROSSA.)

DRAKE, Sir Francis, draik, a celebrated British admiral, who early went to sea, and served under his relative, Sir John Hawkins. After passing through some adventures, and playing some doubtful parts, he, in 1570, raised sufficient volunteers to man two ships, and went to the West Indies, where he reaped considerable advantages. In 1572 he sailed again for the Spanish Main, and after a short absence returned to Plymouth loaded with treasure. He next served under the earl of Essex, in Ireland, where he distinguished himself so much by his bravery, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to queen Elizabeth. In 1577 he made an-northward till he reached the 48th parallel. Here he took possession of New Albion, and then steered for the East Indies. He doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to Plymouth in 1580. This voyage round the world occupied two years and nearly ten months. Queen Elizabeth ordered his ship up to Deptford, and partook of a banquet on board of her, and then conferred the honour of knighthood on Drake. In 1585, and the whole of 1586, he was engaged in the West Indies, where he took several places from the Spaniards; visited the colony of Virginia, in America, planted by Raleigh, and brought some of the colonists to England with him, by whom it is supposed that tobacco was first introduced into England. Drake returned from this expedition also loaded with treasure. In 1587 he commanded a fleet of thirty sail, with which he entered Cadiz, and destroyed a quantity of shipping; and afterwards, between St. Vincent and Cadiz, burned 100 vessels, and destroyed several castles on the coast. This Drake humorously termed "singing the Spanish monarch's heard." The year following, he commanded as vice-admiral, under Lord Howard, and was instrumental in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. After this he went to the West Indies with Sir John Hawkins; but the two commanders disagreeing in their plans, little was done by them. a. at Tavistock, 1545; b. in the harbour of Nombre de Dios, in America, 1596. He was member of parliament for the town of Plymouth, to which he was a great benefactor, by causing water to be conveyed to it from springs at eight miles distance.

Drake, James, a political writer, who gave great offence by the publication, anonymously, of a pamphlet called "The Memorial of the Church of England." A proclamation was issued to discover this author, which was not successful; but Drake was afterwards prosecuted for editing a newspaper entitled "Mercurius Politicus," and, though acquitted, the trial caused so much excitement in him as to occasion his death. He was a physician by profession, and was, besides his political writings, author of a "System of Anatomy," in 3 vols. a. at Cambridge, where he was educated, 1687; b. 1707.

Drakenberg, Christian Jacob, dra'-ken-bairg, a Norwegian seaman, who is noticed here on account of the great age he attained. In his 13th year he went to sea, in his 65th was captured by Algerine pirates, and was kept in slavery till his 81st. In his 102nd he was taken into the service of Count Samsoe, with whom he went to Copenhagen. In his 111th he married a widow 60 years of age, and died at the age of 116. a. at Blomsholm, Norway, 1626. He was never known to be intoxicated.

Drakenborch, Arnold, dra'-ken-bork, professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, who published editions of Livy and Silius Italicus, with learned notes. a. at Utrecht, 1654; b. 1747.

Draper, Sir William, drai'-per, an English general, whose father was collector of customs at Bristol. He received his education at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, after which he went to the East Indies, where he rose to the rank of colonel. In 1763 he took Manila, in conjunction with Admiral Cornish; but the place was preserved from plunder, on condition of its paying a ransom of four millions of dollars, which was never discharged. In service he was created a knight of the Bath. In 1769 he was engaged in a controversy with Junius, in defence of his friend the marquis of Granby. In 1779 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Minorca. When that place surrendered, he brought an action against General Murray, the governor, after whose trial General Draper was commanded by the court to make an apology to him. a. at Bristol, 1721; b. at Bath, 1787.

Draper, William, a distinguished chemist, a native of Liverpool, but who emigrated to America in 1833. In 1836 he was appointed chair of chemistry and natural history in the university of New York, and was one of the founders of the medical college of that seat of learning. Dr. Draper contributed to a variety of scientific journals, and was a very prolific writer, having between 1837 and 1857 supplied no less than 40 treatises to the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal" alone. Among his other works may be mentioned "Memoirs on the Chemical Action of Light," &c., which has been translated into French, German, and Italian; "Human Physiology, Statistical and Dynamical; or, the Conditions and Course of the Life of Man," which is his principal performance; "Treatise on the Force which Produces the Organization of Plants;" and "Four Books on Chemistry and Natural Philosophy," a. May 11, 1805.

Drayton, Michael, drai'-ton, an English poet, who received his education at Oxford, but never took a degree. In 1593 he published a collection of pastorals, entitled "The Shepherd's Garland," which was followed by his poems of "The Baron's Wars," and "England's Heroical Epitaphs." The "Barons' Wars" contains many passages of great beauty, which were imitated by Milton. In 1613 he published his "Polybion," or a Description of England, to which Mr. Selden wrote notes. This is his great work, "exhibiting, at once, the learning of an historian, an antiquary, a naturalist, and a geographer, besides being embellished with the imagination of a poet." a. at Hartford, Warwickshire, 1593; b. 1631, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His works were reprinted in 1743 in one volume folio, and in 1768 in 10 vols. 8vo.

Dreruzel, Cornelius van, draeb-el, a Dutch philosopher, whose chief work is "De Naturæ Elementorum," 8vo. He invented the thermometer which bears his name, and is also said, although erroneously, to have been the inventor of the microscope and telescope. a. at Alkmaar, 1572; b. in London, 1

Drerze, Nicholas, draice, the inventor of the famous Prussian needle-gun, which was mainly instrumental in giving the Prussians the victory over the Austrians at Sadowna, and the encounters of the "Seven Weeks War" in 1866. He was brought up as a locksmith. a. at Sommerda, 1788; b. 1867.

Drew, Samuel, droo, was born of humble parents in the parish of Austell, Cornwall, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and though nearly destitute of education, he became noted for his shrewd and subtle powers of debate among his fellow-workmen, while his free manners of life induced him to slight the principles of religion. Having, however, heard Dr. Adam Clarke preach, he was induced to change his opinions; determined to obtain knowledge, which he pursued with great energy, and became a local Methodist preacher, while still following his trade of a shoemaker. In 1799, he appeared as an author, in a tract entitled "Remarks on Paine's 'Age of Reason,'" which was well received; he subsequently published "An Essay on the Immateriality and Immortality of the Soul," which established his fame as a metaphysical theologian. He now abandoned trade, and devoted himself to divine literature, producing, among other valuable works, a "Treatise on the Being and Attributes of God." He edited, with much ability and critical calmness and acumen, the "Imperial Magazine," from 1819 to his death, which occurred in 1833. a. 1765.

Drouet d'Erion, Jean Baptiste, droo-ai dair-lawng, a French marshal, who, at an early age, joined the army, and, after passing through the various ranks, became a general of division in 1805. In 1807 Dantzic capitulated to him, he was wounded at Friedland, served in Spain under Massena, and was opposed on many occasions to the English. On Napoleon's return from Elba, he was one of the most eager to receive him, and commanded the first corps d'armée during the "hundred days." He was condemned, in 1816, to death, but found an asylum in Prussia, and returned, in 1825, to his country; but did not rejoin the service till 1830. In 1834, he was appointed governor-general of Algeria. Here he was the author of several administrative reforms; but, not displaying against Abd-el-Kader the necessary energy, he was recalled in 1835, being made, however, a marshal in 1843. b. at Rheims, 1765; d. 1844. He wrote his autobiography, under the title of "The Military Life of General Drouet."

DROUET, Jean Baptiste, a leading actor in the great French revolution, and who, when postmaster at St. Menchould, recognised Louis XVI. and the queen, when attempting to escape in 1791, pursued them to Varennes, and caused them to be conducted back to Paris, for which service he was voted 30,000 francs by the National Assembly. He became a member of the Convention in 1792, and being appointed to keep guard over the Temple, where the king and royal family were confined, behaved towards them with the greatest rudeness and insolence. In 1793, he proposed that all the English in France should be shot, under the pretence that they were spies, and that all his associates in the Convention should declare themselves brigands. His next employment was as commissioner with the army of the North. He was taken prisoner at Maubeuge by the Austrians, who carried him to Brussels, from thence to Luxembourg, and in 1794 consigned him to the castle of Spielberg, in Moravia, where he remained for two years, till exchanged for a daughter of the unfortunate French monarch. He next acted as a member, and subsequently as secretary, of the Council of Five Hundred; but, falling under the displeasure of that body, he fled to Tencrille, where he took an active part in resisting the attack made upon the place by Nelson. At the revolution of 18th Fructidor he returned to France, became a member of the Convention, and on the overthrow of the Directory by Bonaparte on 18th Brumaire, he was named sub-prefect of St. Menchould, and became a warm partisan of Napoleon. On the final downfall of the emperor, Drouet was excepted from the amnesty, and banished. After living some time in Germany, he returned secretly to France, where he lived in concealment till 1824, when he died at Macon. b. at St. Menchould, 1763.

DROUIN DE LHUYS, Edward, drou'-awng del' (weeche), a modern French statesman, who early entered the diplomatic service of his country, and was employed in several minor positions at various courts. He was also elected to the Chamber of Deputies. Here he was opposed to the policy of M. Guizot, and was one of those who signed the list of charges drawn up against the ministry by Odillon Barrot. In the first cabinet of Louis Napoleon, after he became president, Drouin de Lhuys was appointed foreign minister, and acquitted himself with considerable ability in those difficult times. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to England, and subsequently, in 1852, being again foreign minister, addressed to the various powers despatches announcing the establishment of the empire under Napoleon III. During the dispute between Turkey and Russia, he strenuously exerted himself in favour of peace. He took part in the conferences at Vienna in 1855, and, on their breaking up without any result, resigned his office. The following year he also tendered his resignation as senator. In 1863 he again became minister of foreign affairs on the retirement of M. Thouvenel, but resigned office in 1866. b. at Paris, 1805.

DRUMMOND, William, drum'-mond, a Scotch poet, was the son of Sir John Drummond of Hawthornden, and was destined for the law; but Parnassus had more charms for him than the courts. In his retirement at Hawthornden, he wrote several beautiful poems; but the death of a lady, to whom he was about to be married, affected him so much, that he went abroad, where he remained some years. On his return, he settled at Hawthornden, and wrote his "History of the Six Kings of the Name of James," and several pieces to promote peace and union in that turbulent time. b. at Hawthornden, 1585; d. 1649.—This poet excited the envy of rare Ben Jonson, as well as attracted his praise. That bard, in 1619, made a journey to Scotland expressly to see him. Hazlitt says of his sonnets, that "they come as near as almost any others to the perfection of this kind of writing."

DRUMMOND, Sir William, of Logie Almond, an eminent scholar, and accomplished writer, statesman, and diplomatist, first became known by a work entitled "A Review of the Governments of Sparta and Athens," published in 1794. He was returned to Parliament for St. Mawes in 1795, and subsequently sat for Lostwithiel in the Parliaments which met in 1796 and 1801, on both occasions being elected while absent on diplomatic service—in 1798 at Naples, and in 1801 at Constantinople. While residing at the court of Palermo in 1803, he endeavoured to secure the regency of Spain, which had then taken up arms to get rid of the French yoke, for Prince Leopold of Sicily, for which he was severely censured. The latter part of his life was spent chiefly abroad, in consequence of the state of his health, and he died, after a lingering illness, at Rome, March 29, 1823. The date of his birth is not known. Besides that already mentioned, Sir William Drummond published the following works:—"Translations of the Satires of Persius," 1798, about the same time as Mr. Gifford's version of the same poet appeared; "Academical Questions," 1805; "Archæological and Philological Dissertations, containing a MS. found at Herculaneum," 1810; "Essay on a Punic inscription found in Malta," 1811; "Odin," a poem, 1815; "Origines, or Remarks on the Origin of several Empires, States, and Cities," 1824-1826, in 3 vols, which is his ablest work. His "Œdipus Judaicus," which was printed, though not for sale, in which he endeavours to prove that certain of the histories and other portions of the Old Testament are astronomical and other allegories, brought upon him severe criticism from Dr. D'Oyly, and the "Quarterly Review," and led to a controversy in which Sir William got the worst, both in science and scholarship. The style of the preface to the work in question is very elegant, but this does not compensate for the irreverence and flippancy of some of the remarks which it contains.

DRUMMOND, Captain Thomas Henry, was appointed to a cadetship at Woolwich, where he soon began to distinguish himself by his mechanical talents in the engineering department of the government institution of that place. Having served there some time, he went to Plymouth, thence to Chatham, and thence to Edinburgh, where he got acquainted with Captain Colly, then engaged in the trigonometrical survey. From this officer he obtained employment, and, in surveying a portion of Ireland, invented a new light, which greatly assisted his observations in foggy weather. He also invented a heliostat, an instrument for reflecting the rays of the sun, which was used in this survey. This instrument, in an improved form, connected with the theodolite, has been found of great service. He continued to devote himself to scientific pursuits, until ill-health compelled him, for a time, to resign his situation. He was subsequently engaged in laying down the boundaries to the old and new boroughs, under the provisions of the Reform Bill; in which capacity he distinguished himself by his usual perseverance and accuracy. In 1835 he became under-secretary for Ireland. His labours now took a political direction, into which it is unnecessary to enter. b. at Edinburgh, 1797; d. 1810.

DRURY, Robert, droo'-re, an English seaman, who, in 1702, was shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, where he remained fifteen years. After his return to England, he published a very exact and curious account of that island, 8vo, 1729.

DRURY, Dru, an English naturalist, supposed to have been descended from Sir Dru Drury, a knight of the reign of Elizabeth. He was for several years a jeweller in the Strand, London, and was a great collector of specimens of natural history. He wrote three volumes on insects. d. 1804.

DAVAX, Joseph, a learned divine and distinguished scholar, who was educated at Westminster school and Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1738 became head-master of Harrow school, where he had as pupils Lord Byron and Sir Robert Peel. Byron on various occasions speaks of him in the highest terms, saying, in the notes to "Childe Harold," "My preceptor, the Rev. Joseph Davax, was the best and worthiest friend I ever possessed; whose warnings I have remembered but too well, though too late, when I have erred, and whose counsels I have but followed when I have done well or wisely." Dr. Davax retired to Cockwood, Devonshire, in 1805, and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits. He held the prebendal stall of Dalingcote, in Wells Cathedral. b. in London, 1750; d. 1834. A cenotaph, with a suitable inscription, has been erected in Harrow church to his memory.

DRUSUS, dri'-sus, a name common to many eminent Romans, the most remarkable of whom are the following:—1. A son of Tiberius and Vipsania, who made himself famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raised to the greatest honours by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia, the wife of Drusus, and, in conjunction with her, the former caused him to be poisoned by a eunuch, 23 A.D.—2. A son of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greatest trust under Tiberius. His enemy, Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his insinuations;

Drusus was confined by Tiberius, and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after his confinement, 33 A.D.—3. Claudius Nero, was a son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, and was adopted by Augustus. He was brother to Tiberius, who was afterwards made emperor. He greatly signalized himself in the wars in Germany and Gaul against the Rhæti and Vindelici, and was honoured with a triumph. He died of a fall from his horse, in the 30th year of his age, 9 B.C. b. 33 B.C.

DEXANDER, John, dre-an'-der, a mathematician and physician of Wetteren, in Upper Hesse-Cassel. He was a professor at Marburg, and wrote several books on physic and mathematics, which were once held in great esteem. d. at Marburg, 1560.

DEXANDER, Jonas, a Swedish naturalist, a pupil of Linnæus, went to England, and there became a member of the Linnæan Society, being also charged by Sir Joseph Banks with the care of his library. He wrote several memoirs, and also compiled a catalogue of Sir Joseph's library. b. 1749; d. in London, 1810.

DRYDEN, John, dri'-den, an English poet, educated at Westminster school, under Dr. Busby, whose severe discipline and constant use of the rod are well known; whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650. He proceeded to the degree of M.A., and in 1657 removed to London, where, in the following year, he wrote an elegy on the death of Cromwell. His sorrow, however, was of short duration; for at the Restoration he complimented Charles II. in a poem, entitled "Astrea Redux." In 1662 appeared his first play, called "The Wild Gallant," which was indifferently received. Soon afterwards he produced "The Rival Ladies," and next "The Indian Emperor," which made him famous. This last was written in conjunction with Sir Robert Howard, who introduced him to the earl of Berkshire, whose eldest daughter he married, but who brought him no happiness. Soon after the fire of London, he engaged with the king's theatre for an annual stipend, on condition of furnishing a certain number of plays in each year. On the death of Sir William Davenant, he was nominated poet laureate, and in 1669 obtained the place of historiographer royal, with a salary of £200 a year and a butt of wine. His eminence as a dramatic writer was now established, but it exposed him to the envy of several rival wits. Among these the duke of Buckingham held him up to ridicule in the character of Bayes, in "The Rehearsal;" and the earl of Rochester being offended, it is supposed, at some allusions in an "Essay on Satire," written jointly by Dryden and Lord Mulgrave, caused the former to be cudgelled by some hired ruffians as he was going home from a coffee-house. Others, however, declare that the vanity of the duchess of Portsmouth, one of the king's mistresses, was wounded by a jeu d'esprit of Dryden, and that this procured him the cudgelling. To his antagonists in satirical weapons he was decidedly superior. "His keen and trenchant blade," says Sir Walter Scott, "never makes a thrust in vain, and never strikes but at a vulnerable point." The duke of Buckingham is the Zimri of the poet's "Absalom and Achitophel." On the accession of James II. Dryden became a Roman Catholic, and, like most converts, endeavoured to defend his new faith at the expense of the old one, in a poem called "The Hind and Panther," which was admirably parodied by Prior and Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, in "The Country Mouse and the City Mouse." At the Revolution he lost his posts, and was succeeded by Shadwell, whom Dryden satirized under the name of Mac Flecknoe. In 1687 his translation of Virgil appeared; which performance alone is sufficient to immortalize his name. Pope pronounces it "the most noble and spirited translation in any language." No other translations are equally excellent. n. at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, Aug. 9, 1681; d. in London, May 1, 1709, and was buried between the graves of Chaucer and Cowley, in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory, erected by Sheffield, duke of Buckingham. Dryden's works are too numerous to be here distinguished. His critical prefaces are admirable; his prose being matchless for its freedom, vigour, variety, and copiousness. It ranks with the best in the English language. His poetry is correct, harmonious, and strong, particularly his satires. As a dramatic writer, he chiefly excelled in tragedy. His plays are numerous, he having been the sole or joint author of twenty-seven.—He had three sons: Charles, who became usher of the palace to Pope Clement XI., and was drowned in 1704; John, who wrote a comedy, called "The Husband his own Cookbook;" and Henry, who entered into a religious order abroad.

DU BARRY, Jeanne Vaubernier, Countess. (See BARRY, Marie Jeanne.)

DU BARTAS. (See BARTAS, William de Sallust.)

DUAREN, or DUBAREN, François, doo'-ar-en, a French lawyer of eminence, who was originally a tutor in the family of M. Budé, Maître des Requêtes, at Paris, and acquired his knowledge of the rudiments of law from frequent conversations on the subject with the father of his pupils. When Cujacius attacked the old system of instruction in jurisprudence, Duaren, who was then settled at Bourges in the exercise of his profession, warmly defended it; and to this controversy, Cujacius allowed that he owed much of his knowledge of law. n. 1509; d. 1559.

DU BELLAY, doo bel'-lay, a French cardinal and statesman, who enjoyed the favour of Francis I., and was sent as ambassador to Henry VIII. of England and the pope, Paul III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom during the absence of Francis, who was engaged against the emperor Charles V. in Provence. Falling into disgrace on the death of this king, he retired to Rome. n. 1492; d. 1560. This cardinal protected and encouraged letters, and it was at his suggestion that the College of France was founded. Rabelais was attached to his establishment.—His brother William was one of Francis I.'s bravest generals, and was viceroy of Piedmont, where he defeated the Imperialists; he wrote some interesting memoirs, which he called "Ogdoades."

DUBOIS, Marie Anne le Page, doo'-bo-kaj, a talented French authoress, who was a member of the academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, and Rouen. She early distinguished herself by a taste for poetry, and translated Pope's "Temple of Fame" into French. In 1746 she obtained the prize given by the academy at Rouen, and afterwards translated Milton's "Paradise Lost," which she followed by a translation of the "Death of Abel." In 1749 she produced a tragedy, called "The Amazons," and subsequently "The Columbiad," an epic poem on the discovery of America, which is esteemed her greatest work. She also published "Travels through England, Holland, and Italy," in the epistolary form, n. at Rouen, 1710; d. 1802.

DUBOIS, William, doo'-bois, archbishop of Cambrai, cardinal, and prime minister of France, was the son of a poor French apothecary. He first became valet to the superior of the college of St. Michael at Paris, where he studied, and entered into orders. Being appointed private reader to the duke de Chartres, afterwards duke of Orleans and Regent, he received the rich abbey of St. Just, and subsequently became counsellor of state. In 1717 he was sent to England as plenipotentiary to sign the triple alliance, which had been entered into against Spain, between England, France, and Holland. On his return, he was made minister and secretary of state, and obtained the archbishopric of Cambrai. In 1721, the pope advanced him to the cardinalate, and, in the following year, he was appointed first minister of state. From that time he reigned absolute master, and the French court, already so depraved, sank still lower in its vices; but happily his death soon put an end to his power. n. at Brives-la-Gaillarde, in Limousin, 1666; d. 1723. He possessed great talents, but these were sullied and clouded by his vices of debauchery, avarice, and guilty ambition.

DUBOIS, Edward, a writer of light literature who attained a high degree of popularity in his time, and was connected with the "Mirror" and "Morning Chronicle" in their palmy days, under the direction of Thomas Hill and Mr. Perry respectively. Dubois had studied for the bar, but paid little attention to his profession, though he held two legal appointments, the deputy judgeship of the Court of Request and the secretarship to the Commissioners of Lunacy. His principal works were—"My Pocket Book, or Hints for a Right Merrie and Conceited Tour in Quarto," published anonymously, and written in ridicule of the books of travel got up by Sir John Carr, and which passed through several editions. "The Wraith," "Old Nick," a satirical poem; the "Decameron of Boccaccio," with remarks on his life and writings; a work on the "Letters of Junius," which he attributed to Sir Philip Francis, with whom he was said to have been connected. n. 1775; d. 1850.

DUBOS, John Baptist, doo'-bo', a French writer, who was employed in some secret transactions by M. de Torey, minister of foreign affairs, for which he was rewarded with several benefices. He is principally known by his "Critical Reflections on Poetry and Painting," 2 vols. 12mo; a work which, at the time of its appearance, was highly esteemed. He also wrote some political pieces, and a "Critical History of the Establishment of the French Monarchy in Gaul." n. at Beauvais, 1670; d. at Paris, 1742.

DU CANGE, Charles Dufresne, Seigneur, doo'-kangh, a French author, who studied for the profession of the law, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to history and philosophy. His first work was "A History of Constantinople under the French Emperors," which was succeeded by his "Scriptural Glossary," a work of great value in enabling us to understand the writers of the dark and middle ages. He also produced some other historical works, and left a large number of manuscripts. n. at Amiens, 1610; d. 1639.—His children received a pension of 2000 francs from Louis XIV.

DU CAREL, Andrew Coltee, doo'-ka-rei, an eminent civilian and antiquary, who published a number of topographical and antiquarian works. His best known is one on Anglo-Gallic, Norman, and Aquitaine coins, which appeared in 1757. "Anglo-Norman Antiquities," considered in a tour through Normandy, is another valuable work on the particular subject of which it treats. b. in Normandy, 1713; d. at South Lambeth, 1785. Ducarel was commissary of St. Catherine's and Canterbury, and was brought to England soon after his birth. When the Society of Antiquaries was incorporated, in 1755, he was appointed one of its first fellows.

DU CAS, Michael, doo'-kās, the author of a history of the Greek empire, from the reign of John Palæologus I. to its fall in 1453. His work was printed at the Louvre in 1649.

DU CASSE, Jean Baptiste, doo'-kas-sai, a French naval officer, who during the reign of Louis XIV. made himself formidable to the English while governor of St. Domingo, and gained fame by obtaining a victory over the renowned Admiral Benbow. d. 1715.

DUCKWORTH, Sir John Thomas, Bart, duk'-werth, a British admiral, who entered the navy in 1750, under Admiral Boscawen, and took part in several engagements with the French. Having served in various ships, and seen a great deal of active service, he, in 1793, was attached to Lord Howe's fleet, and, in the celebrated action of June 1, 1794, greatly distinguished himself by his bravery, as well as naval skill. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the Leeward Islands; and in 1801 for aiding in the reduction of the Swedish and West India islands, was created a K.C.B. In 1803 he was appointed commander-in-chief of Jamaica, and, for the vigorous measures he adopted in protecting the commerce of that island, received the thanks of its House of Assembly, with the presentation of a sword valued at £1000. In 1805 he defeated the French in the Bay of St. Domingo, for which he was thanked by both Houses of Parliament, and had an annuity of £1000 bestowed upon him. In 1807 he forced the passage of the Dardanelles, in spite of the Turks; and, from 1810 to 1815, was commander-in-chief at Newfoundland. He subsequently became governor of Plymouth, and, in 1813, was created a baronet. b. in February, 1748; d. at Devonport, 1817.

DU CLOS, Charles Pincau, doo'-klo', an historiographer of France, who became perpetual secretary to the French academy, and died in 1772. b. at Dinant, 1705. His principal works are—1. "Memoirs on the Manners of the 18th Century," 1 vol. 12mo; 2. "The History of Louis XI.," 3 vols. 12mo; 3. "The Confessions of Count ***"

DUDEVANT, Madame Amantine Lucile Aurore, doo'-vant, better known by her assumed name of Georges Sand, having been married at 17, parted from her husband in her 27th year, and went to Paris to pursue a life of literature.

which met with success. Her next performance, entitled "Indiana," was entirely her own, and it immediately made her celebrated.

Dudley

She affixed the name of Georges Sand to it, to commemorate her friendship with Sandeau. She subsequently wrote voluminously in the region of fiction; but perhaps the best of all her tales is "Consuelo." In 1843 she started a democratic newspaper of her own in Paris; but her views proving unpalatable to the régime of Louis Napoleon, it was suppressed. From that time she mostly wrote for the stage, but not with equal success to that which marked her former efforts in stories of the imagination. b. at Paris, 1794.

DUDLEY, Edmund, dud'-le, an English statesman, who being, when young, introduced to the court of Henry VII., became one of the favourites of that monarch. In 1494 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Grey, Lord Lisle. In the parliament of 1504 he was speaker of the House of Commons, and, two years afterwards, obtained the stewardship of Hastings. On the king's death, he and Empson were sent to the Tower, and in 1510 were beheaded on Tower-hill. b. 1462. While in confinement, Dudley wrote a piece, entitled "The Tree of the Commonwealth," which is still in MS.

DUDLEY, John, son of the preceding statesman, was created Viscount Lisle and knight of the Garter, by Henry VIII. In the next reign he was made earl of Warwick. On the execution of Sir Thomas Seymour, he was appointed lord high admiral, and in 1551 was created duke of Northumberland. Pursuing an ambitious policy, he effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guilford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey, the eldest daughter of the duke of Suffolk, and a branch of the royal family. When the days of Edward VI. were drawing to a close, he prevailed upon him to set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession, in favour of Lady Jane, and on his death he caused his daughter-in-law to be proclaimed. An insurrection being raised in favour of Mary, however, she was proclaimed in London, and the duke executed, 1553. b. 1502. (See EDWARD VI., ELIZABETH, MARY.)

DUDLEY, Robert, son of the above. (See LEICESTER, Robert Dudley, Earl of.)

DUDLEY, Ambrose, son of the above, was condemned with his father, but received a pardon. In 1557 he went with his two brothers to the Low Countries, and served in the Spanish army before St. Quentin. In the next reign, he was created earl of Warwick. He died of a wound, received in defending Newhaven against the French in 1599. b. 1530.

DUDLEY, Sir Robert, the son of the earl of Leicester by the Lady Douglas Sheffield, though treated by his father as illegitimate, yet was left the bulk of his estate, after the death of his uncle Ambrose. In 1594 he made a voyage to the South Seas, and, in the following year, commenced a suit to prove his legitimacy; but the countess dowager of Leicester filing an information against him for a conspiracy, he went to Florence, where the grand duke appointed him chamberlain to his wife, the archduchess of Austria, sister to Ferdinand II. That emperor created him a duke of the holy Roman empire, on which he assumed the title of duke of Northumberland. He drained the morass between Pisa and the sea, by which Leghorn became one of the first ports in the world. b. at Sheen, in Surrey, 1573; d. at Florence, 1639. He wrote several pieces, the chief of which is "Del Arcano del Mare."

Duillius Nepos

DUDLEY, Sir Henry Bate, a noted literary character and politician, was the son of the Rev. Henry Bate, incumbent of St. Nicholas, Worcester and of Farmbridge, Essex. He was educated for the church, and took orders, but was in early life notorious for living a free life about London, where his exigencies induced him to have recourse to literature, in order to recruit his finances. He established the "Morning Post" and "Morning Herald" newspapers, and was the author of several dramatic pieces, among others, the "Woodman," "Rival Candidates," and the "Flight of Bacon." He became curate to the Rev. Mr. Townley, author of "High Life below Stairs," at Hendon, Essex, and subsequently obtained a baronetcy and considerable church preferment, both in Ireland and England. In the discharge of his clerical functions, but particularly in the judicial sphere as a magistrate, Sir Henry Dudley was remarkable for the ability he displayed, and for always favouring and promoting improvements wherever his influence extended. b. 1745; d. 1824.

DUFRESNE, Charles Rivière, doo-fres-ne, a French comic writer, who was descended from Henry IV., to whom he bore considerable resemblance. He possessed great talents for landscape and ornamental gardening, and was, on this account, appointed by Louis XIV. comptroller of the royal gardens. The "grand monarch" also gave him several privileges; amongst which was the monopoly of the manufacture of looking-glasses. This right, however, with others, he soon disposed of for certain sums of ready money, and always managed to be penniless in an exceedingly short space of time. In reference to his want of funds, one of his friends observed that poverty was not a crime. "No, it's much worse," answered he. Louis XIV., who was very much attached to him, supplied him liberally with funds on many occasions, but at length grew tired of the continual demands made by Dufresne, saying, "I am not powerful enough to make Dufresne rich." Losing his first wife, he married his laundress, in order to pay the washing bill due to her. Paris was full of this occurrence for a few days, he being well badgered for this mesalliance; and the following is an anecdote told of him at this time. Meeting the Abbé Pellegrin, who was not conspicuous for cleanliness, he reproached him for always wearing such dirty linen. "Ah!" replied the Abbé, "every one isn't so fortunate as to marry a washerwoman." On leaving the court, Dufresne began to write for the theatres with Regnard, and afterwards alone, composing some dramatic pieces, which, though containing much wit, were uneven and irregular in their style. b. at Paris, 1648; d. 1724.

DUFFERIN, the Rt. Hon. Frederick Temple Blackwood, K.C.B., Lord, duff-fer-in, whose mother was a member of the Sheridan family, was born in 1826, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1860 he published an account of his voyage to Iceland in the preceding year, under the title of "Letters from High Latitudes." In the same year he went to Syria, as British Commissioner, to inquire into the massacre of Christians that had been perpetrated there. In 1866 he accepted office as under-secretary of state for India; and in 1868, at the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power, became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster.

DUGDALE, Sir William, dug-dail, an English antiquary, who, in 1633, was made a pursuivantat-arms by the name of Blanche Lyon. He subsequently became Rouge Croix, which gave him a residence in Herald's College, and opened up the treasures of antiquity to his inspection. He was with Charles I. in several engagements, and in 1642 was created M.A. by the University of Oxford. On the ruin of the royal cause, he compounded for his estate, settling in London, where he completed his "Monasticon Anglicanum," in 3 vols. folio. At the Restoration he was made Norroy, and in 1677 Garter king-of-arms, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood, which, on account of his limited estate, he would much rather have declined. b. at Shustoke, Warwickshire, 1605. d. there, 1686.

DUGUAY-TROUIN, René, doo-gai-troo-ñ, a famous French admiral, born at St. Malo, who showed as a boy a love for a seafaring life, and, when 18, was in command of a privateer. When 20, he fought an action with a 40-gun ship against six English vessels, but was defeated and captured, and carried to Plymouth, from which he escaped by a romantic adventure. In 1697 he encountered, vanquished, and took prisoner the Dutch admiral De Wassenaar; subsequently served during the war of the Spanish succession; and, in 1706, was made Chevalier of St. Louis for his defence of Cadiz, then threatened with a siege. In 1707, he was sent, along with Count de Forbin, to intercept an English convoy which was carrying provisions for the service of the archduke of Austria, competitor for the Spanish throne with Philip V., and in this service captured the Cumberland, of 82 guns, and scattered or destroyed the rest of the fleet. On September 23, 1711, he captured Rio Janeiro, his most notable exploit; and after serving in the West Indies, the Mediterranean, and elsewhere, and having greatly raised the character and fame of the navy of his country, died at Paris, respected and honoured by king and people, in September, 1736. b. 1673. His memoirs were published in Paris in 1740, and appeared in an English translation at London in 1742.

DUGOMMIER, Jean François Coquille, doo-gom-e-ai, a native of Guadaloupe, who had large estates in Martinique, which, having espoused the revolutionary cause, he defended against a body of royalist troops, and afterwards coming to France, entered the army, and rose through various grades till made commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, at the head of which he gained several victories over the combined Austrian and Sardinian forces. In 1793 he captured Toulon, after a severe contest and a protracted siege, during which Napoleon first made himself conspicuous. Dugommier subsequently commanded in the Eastern Pyrenees, gained the battle of Alberdes, and took possession of Montesquieu, where he captured 200 pieces of cannon and 2000 prisoners. He was killed in an engagement at St. Sebastian in 1794, after having further distinguished himself by repeated successes in the field. b. 1736.

DU GUESCLIN, Bertrand. (See GUESCLIN, Du.)

DUALDE, Jean Baptiste, doo-hald, a French Jesuit, who compiled, from the accounts of the missionaries, an "Historical and Geographical Description of the Empire of China and Chinese Tartary," 4 vols. folio, a work formerly held as an authority. b. at Paris, 1674; d. there, 1743.

man consul, who obtained a naval victory over the Carthaginians, near the Lipari Islands, in which they lost fifty-eight vessels, this being the first engagement at sea which the Romans had fought, 260 B.C. He was honoured with a naval triumph, the first that ever appeared at Rome, and was also allowed peculiar honours. Some medals were struck in commemoration of this victory, and there still exists at Rome a portion of the column which was erected in the Forum on this occasion, and the inscription on which is one of the most ancient specimens of the Latin language.

DUJARDIN, Charles, doosh'-ar-dā, a Dutch painter, distinguished for his representations of market scenes, mountebanks, and robbers. He also engraved in aquafortis. B. at Amsterdam, 1640; D. at Venice, 1678.

DUMARESCQ, Henry, doo-mar-esk, a lieutenant-colonel in the British army, who served throughout the wars with Napoleon, and was present in the thirteen battles for which medals were struck, besides many affairs of outposts in the sieges of Badajoz and Burgos, and the attack on the forts of Salamanca. His last field was Waterloo, where he was on the staff of Sir John Byng, and was sent with an order by the Duke of Wellington to his general of brigade. This he delivered, and in returning with the answer was shot through the lungs; but, determined to do his duty, he rode up to the duke, delivered his despatch, and then fell from his horse apparently a dying man. The wound was not immediately fatal, however; but as the ball was never extracted, it is supposed to have produced paralysis, and caused his death in 1833, at the establishment of the Australian Agricultural Company in New South Wales, where he was chief commissioner. B. 1792.

DUMAS, Lewis, doo'-ma, an ingenious Frenchman, who was brought up to the law, but applied himself to mathematical and mechanical studies, inventing an instrument called the bureau typographique, to teach children reading and writing mechanically. He also devised another for instructing them in music, and wrote works on these subjects, explanatory of his method. B. at Nîmes, 1676; D. 1744.

DUMAS, Alexandre Davy, one of the most fertile French dramatists and romancists. His dramas number more than eighty, and his novels more than forty. He wrote about 1200 volumes, many of them representing a low state of morals, rather repulsive than attractive to the general tone of English sentiment. He also wrote "Impressions of Voyages," and his "Memoirs," which were commenced in 1852, and by 1856 had extended to twenty-seven volumes. His most popular work is, perhaps, the "Count of Monte Christo," which has been reproduced in English in several forms. Dumas affected to be a universal genius, took to politics, and started a newspaper in Naples during the dictatorship of Garibaldi in 1860, which, however, did not live long. He also prided himself on his skill as a cook, and on the rapidity with which he could serve up a dinner. B. at Villers-Cotterets, in the department of the Aisne, 1803.

DUMAS, Alexandre fils, son of the above, wrote "Trois Hommes forts," "La Dame aux Camélias," and the "Demi-Monde;" productions which, however they may exhibit the possession of talent in their author, are very low in their morality. B. 1824.

Dumouriez

DUMAS, Jean Baptiste, a distinguished French chemist and botanist, who, in 1823, received the appointment of demonstrator of chemistry at the Polytechnic School, and was also made professor of chemistry at the Athénée of Paris. From this period the science of organic chemistry stands deeply indebted to his exertions. In 1829 he founded the Central School of Arts and Manufactures, and, in 1834, became professor of organic chemistry in the School of Medicine. In 1847 he was made president of the Society for the Encouragement of Industry, and, in 1849, received the porte-feuille of Agriculture and Commerce. In 1851 he acted as vice-president of the Great Exhibition in London, and subsequently became vice-president of the superior council of public instruction in France. B. at Alais, in the department of the Gard, 1800.

DUMONT, Pierre Etienne Louis, doo'-mawng, a Swiss divine, who became minister of the Protestant church in Geneva, and afterwards went to London, where he became acquainted with Sir Samuel Romilly, and other eminent men. After a visit to France, he returned, and became the editor of several of the treatises of Jeremy Bentham, from pure admiration of the wisdom of that philosopher. In 1811 he returned to Geneva, and became a member of its representative council; and there, on the panopticon plan of Mr. Bentham, had a prison erected, in 1824. B. at Geneva, 1759; D. travelling in Northern Italy, 1829.

DUMONT D'URVILLE, Jules Sébastien César, doo'-veel, a French naturalist and navigator. Being commissioned by Charles X. of France, in 1826, to go in search of La Perouse, the French navigator, and his companions, he took the command of the frigate DuRoi, and was so far successful, as to obtain a knowledge of the fate of these voyagers. Whilst engaged in this duty, he made some important surveys of the coasts of various islands in Australasia and the Eastern seas. An account of his labours was published in 1830, and is esteemed as a valuable contribution to science. In 1837 he proceeded on a voyage to the south pole, and penetrated to lat. 64° 20' S.; lon. 181° 18' E. On his return he published an account of his expedition. B. 1790; killed in a railway accident between Versailles and Meudon, 1842.

DUMOURIEZ, Charles François, doo'-moor'-e-ai, an officer in the French military service, who, at the commencement of the great revolution, espoused the liberal side, although attached to the constitutional monarchy of 1791. Suspected, as well as detested, by those whose political principles were more violent, he retired from internal politics, and took service under General Luckner, then fighting against the Austrians on the northern frontier. Here he soon distinguished himself, and, receiving the command of the army opposed to the duke of Brunswick, took up a position in the forest of Arsonne, which enabled Kellermann to beat the Prussians at Valmy, and saved France from invasion. He next entered Flanders, won the battle of Gemappes, took Liège, Antwerp, and a large portion of the country; but was compelled to return to Paris on the trial of Louis XVI. After the execution of that monarch, he resumed his command, entered Holland, and took Breda; but was defeated at Neerwinde and Louvain. As he still wished for a return of the government to constitutional monarchy, he displeased the Convention, because he was averse to their proceedings against the Belgians, and entered into secret negotiations with the enemy, which brought an accusation of treason against him, when, with several of his officers, he fled to the Austrian head-quarters. His ideas of a constitutional monarchy, however, were not conformable to the notions of the allies, and he refused to serve against his country. He now wandered through several parts of the continent, with a price set upon his head, and at length crossed to England; but was thence driven by the operation of the Alien Act. He then took refuge in Hamburg, where he remained for some time; but again returned to England, and, throughout the remainder of his days, enjoyed a pension from the British government. b. at Cambrai, 1739; d. at Henley-upon-Thames, 1823.

DUNBAR, William, dun'-bar, a Scottish poet, who wrote several beautiful effusions, and, after being almost unknown for 200 years, was resuscitated in his poems, which are now acknowledged to be amongst the most original in his language. His "Thistle and Rose," an allegory celebrating the matrimonial union of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., is a rich specimen of poetical imagery. b. it is supposed, about 1400; d. about 1520. His poems were published, with notes, by Sir David Dalrymple.

DUNCAN, Adam, Lord, dun'-kan, a British admiral, was bred to the sea, and, in 1761, attained the rank of post-captain. Being intimate with admiral Keppel, the latter appointed him his captain; and, in 1787, he became rear-admiral; in 1793, vice-admiral; and, in 1795, admiral of the Blue. In the war he was appointed to the North Sea station, where he blockaded the Dutch in the Texel, till the summer of 1797, when an alarming mutiny broke out in his squadron. His conduct on this occasion was firm, and, notwithstanding the difficulties in which he was placed, he detained the Dutch until he was enabled to meet them in action. An engagement then took place on October 11, off Camperdown, when the Dutch admiral, De Winter, after a brave resistance, was obliged to strike. Eight ships were taken, two of which carried flags. For this service the gallant admiral received the thanks of parliament, was created viscount Duncan, of Camperdown, and baron Duncan of Lundie, in the shire of Perth. An annual pension, also, of £2000 was granted him, and the two next heirs of the peerage. b. at Dundee, Scotland, 1731; d. 1804. Lord Duncan was of a singularly manly and athletic form, his height being six feet three inches. His character was that of an amiable, upright man. It is said that when Duncan and De Winter, who was also of gigantic stature, met on the surrender of the latter, each was struck with the fine physique of the other; and that Duncan exclaimed, neither having been wounded, "Why, Admiral, how has it happened that two such marks as we present should have been missed in such a shower of bullets as that we have just passed through?"

DUNCUMB, William, dun'-cum, a poet, and author of a tragedy entitled "Lucius Junius Brutus," besides other works, and a translation of Horace, was born in London in 1690, and died in 1769.—His son John was also a poet, and wrote "The Faminead," and other poems. b. 1730; d. 1786.

DUNDAS, Sir David, dun'-dass, a general in the British army, who enjoyed a high reputation as a tactician, was for a short time commander-in-chief on the resignation of the duke of York, and was author of two works, "Principles of Military Movements," and "Regulations for the Cavalry," which are both standard authorities in the army. b. at Edinburgh, 1736; d. 1820.

DUNDAS, Thomas, a gallant British officer, who greatly distinguished himself at the capture of Guadaloupe, in 1794, and died there in the succeeding year. There is a cenotaph to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral, London. b. 1750.

DUNDAS, Henry. (See MELVILLE, Lord.) DUNDAS, Sir James Whitley Deans, a modern English naval commander, entered the navy at an early age, and was present at several minor actions during the Napoleon wars. He was for some years a lord of the admiralty under lord Melbourne, and, in 1841, became rear-admiral. In 1853 he was appointed to the command of the English fleet which was to assist Turkey against Russia. At the commencement of the following year he entered the Black Sea, and in April the English and French fleets bombarded Odessa. In the December of the same year, however, Admiral Sir Edward (afterwards Lord) Lyons superseded him in the command. His family name was Deans, his father being James Deans, Esq., M.D., of Calcutta; but he took the names of Whitley and Dundas on marrying his cousin Janet, daughter of the late Lord Amesbury. b. in Scotland, 1785; d. 1862.

DUNDAS, Sir Rich. Saunders, K.C.B., an English naval commander, but having no relationship to the above. Entering the service at an early age, he was a captain at 23, and, in 1840, took a part in the war with China, and afterwards commanded a squadron in the Mediterranean, under the orders of admiral Parker. Between 1828 and 1846, he was twice secretary to the admiralty, and from 1852 to 1855 was a lord of the admiralty. In 1853 he was appointed rear-admiral, and, in 1855, was nominated to succeed Sir Charles Napier in the command of the English fleet sent to act against Russia in the Baltic Sea. Doubting, like his predecessor, the success of an attack on Cronstadt, he took vigorous measures to destroy the enemy's commerce in the north, and, assisted by the French admiral Penand, attacked Sweaborg. After a bombardment of 45 hours, the Russian arsenals, barracks, and magazines were almost entirely destroyed, with a loss also of 2000 men. This was the most terrible blow to the naval power of the czar during the whole of the war. b. at Melville Castle, Edinburghshire, 1803; d. 1861.

DUNDONALD, Thomas Cochrane, Earl of, dun-don'-ald, a British admiral, and the tenth earl of this name, entered the naval service in 1793. He soon distinguished himself by his bravery, being almost continually engaged in the most difficult and daring enterprises, in boarding vessels, or cutting out rich prizes from beneath the very mouth of the guns in the land fortresses of the enemy. In 1809 he commanded a fleet of fire-ships, with which he destroyed the French fleet in the Basque Roads, for which he was rewarded with the knighthood of the Bath. In 1814 he was charged with having spread a report relative to the abdication of the emperor Napoleon I., which had a great effect on the funds, and which caused him to be brought to trial. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay £1000, to stand in the pillory, and to undergo one year's imprisonment. When this happened, he was a member of the House of Commons; he was therefore deprived of his seat, stripped of the order of the Bath, and struck off the list of captains. These proceedings were iniquitous in the extreme, as they arose almost entirely from his being a radical reformer and strong opponent of the Liverpool-Castlereagh administration. The public were enraged at such a sentence. The punishment of the pillory was remitted, he was re-seated in parliament, and his fine paid by public subscription. His prospects of advancement in the service of his country were, however, for the time, annihilated. Accordingly, he sought employment abroad, and in 1818 received the command of the fleet of the Chilians, to fight for their independence. In this war he displayed his usual bravery. In 1823 he exchanged the Chilian for the Brazilian service, and, in the following year, was made marquis of Maranao by Don Pedro. On leaving this service he returned to Europe, and, in 1827 and 1829, assisted the Greeks in their war of independence. He had hitherto borne the title of Lord Cochrane, but by his father's death he now succeeded to that of Earl of Dundonald, and, on the accession of the Whigs to power in 1830, was reinstated in his command in the British navy, and made a rear-admiral. In 1811 he became vice-admiral of the Blue, and, in 1817, had his order of the Bath restored to him. In 1831 he became vice-admiral of the White, and, in 1854, admiral of the United Kingdom. Being greatly devoted to scientific pursuits, he offered, in 1856, to blow up the walls of Sebastopol during the siege of that fortress; but the committee appointed to consider his plan, rejected it. B. 1775; D. 1859. His Life, written by himself, was recently published under the title of "Autobiography of a Seaman," by Thomas, Earl of Dundonald.

DUNNING, John, dun'-ning, an eminent lawyer, was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After studying under his father some time, he entered the Middle Temple in 1752, and in 1756 was called to the bar. He soon rose to distinction in his profession, and obtained a seat in parliament, where he distinguished himself on the side of the opposition. Afterwards he became solicitor-general, recorder of Bristol, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1782 he was created Lord Ashburton, but died in the following year. B. at Ashburton, Devonshire, 1731. His lordship was an upright lawyer, and often pleaded the cause of the poor, unsolicited, and without a fee.

DUNOIS, John, doo'-nois, count of Longneville, and called the "Bastard of Orleans," grand chamberlain of France, was a natural son of Louis, duke of Orleans. It is said that when but a youth, his mother-in-law, the duchess of Orleans, who was a daughter of the Viscount of Milan, when on her death-bed, called her family together, and charged them never to rest till they had revenged the death of her husband, who had been assassinated by the Burgundians. On this young Dunois stepped forward, and pledged himself never to forget his father's wrongs while he could wield a sword or rein in steed. "Ah," exclaimed the dying duchess, "they have robbed me—you should have been my son." At a very early age he distinguished himself by his great bravery, and had the better in an action with the English in 1427, at Mortargis. At the siege of Orleans, he shared the laurels of success with Joan of Arc, and in 1432 contributed greatly to the victory at Patay. The same year he brought under the royal authority the town of Chartres, and in 1436 re-occupied Paris, which had been taken by the English. After these considerable services to the state, he sullied his fair fame by engaging in a conspiracy against Charles VII., and instigating against first king the revolt of his son, afterwards Louis XI. He repaired his disloyalty, however, by throwing himself at the feet of the former monarch, and caused all to be forgotten in his devotion at the sieges of Harfleur, Gallardon, and Dieppe. In 1444 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and, from this time to 1450, was engaged against the English, who were now driven out both of Normandy and Guienne. He was appointed, for his services, grand chamberlain. B. at Paris, 1402; D. 1463. This is the warrior alluded to in the opening lines—

"C'était le jeune et brave Dunois"— of the favourite French national air "Partant pour la Syrie," which was composed by H. Rense Beauharnais, the mother of Napoleon III.

DUNN, John, dunn, commonly called "Dunn Scotus," a famous Franciscan divine, who was educated at Oxford. In 1391 he became professor of theology at Oxford, and was so distinguished by his eloquence, that it is said 30,000 scholars came to listen to his precepts. In 1394 he went to Paris, where he acquired a great reputation as a disputant, and was called the "subtle doctor." He opposed the notions of Thomas Aquinas, which produced two parties, the Thomists and the Scotists. B. supposed at Dunstanoe, near Alnwick, Northumberland, 1265; D. at Cologne, 1308. His works were printed at Lyons in 12 vols. folio, 1639.

DUNSTAN, Sr., dun'-tan, an English monk and celebrated statesman, who, at a very early age, was made abbot of Glastonbury by king Edmund I. King Edgar made him bishop of Worcester, and, in 929, archbishop of Canterbury. The pope confirmed the appointment, and appointed him his legate. Dunstan extended the papal power in a most arbitrary manner, though opposed by the English clergy; for which he deprived many of their benefices, and placed monks in their room. On the death of Edgar, in 975, he placed on the throne his son Edward, who being a minor, Dunstan directed the regency. Under Ethelred, however, he lost his influence, and died of grief, 983. B. at Glastonbury, 925. The popular story of his taking the devil by the nose with a pair of tongs when his satanic majesty was too inopportune with the saint, is well known, and is believed to have had its origin in the fact of Dunstan having rather rudely separated the young king and the wife he had presumed to marry without the sanction of the reverend minister.

DUNTON, John, dun'-ton, a noted bookseller, who published the "Athenian Mercury," which was reprinted in 4 vols. 8vo, under the title of the "Athenian Oracle." In 1710 appeared the "Projects of Mr. John Dunton." He also wrote a book called "Dunton's Life and Errors" which abounds in literary history of a curious kind. B. in Huntingdonshire, 1669; D. 1738.

eminent French publicist, and president of the parliament of Bordeaux, was author of "Historical Reflections on Penal Laws," "Academical Discourses, and Letters on Italy." b. at Rochelle, 1746; d. at Paris, 1783.—His son, Charles, was a famous sculptor, whose works are distinguished by their classic purity of style. b. 1771; d. 1825.

DUPERREY, Louis Isidore, doo-pair-re, French hydrographer, who in 1817 made a voyage in the North Pacific Ocean, and mapped the Ladrone Islands and several others; but, whilst engaged in his duties, suffered shipwreck among the Sandwich Islands, in 1820. After remaining ten weeks on an island, he and the crew were taken by an American ship to Monte Video, whence he returned to France in the same year. He was subsequently engaged in making surveys in the South Pacific, and afterwards published the results of his expeditions. b. at Paris, 1786.

DUPIN, Louis Elie, doo-pà, a French writer, who, about 1684, commenced his valuable work entitled "Bibliothèque Universelle des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques," &c., or "History of Ecclesiastical Writers," which, notwithstanding its general excellence, was much censured by zealous Romanists for some freedom of sentiment, which the author was compelled to retract. He afterwards became involved in a profitless dispute with Dr. Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, on a projected union between the English and Gallican churches. b. at Paris, 1657; d. there 1710. Besides the above work, he wrote several others on the scriptures, church government, and practical divinity.

DUPIN, André Marie Jean Jacques, an eminent French lawyer, who, in 1815, became a member of the Chamber of Representatives, and opposed the emperor to proclaim the son of Napoleon I. emperor, under the title of Napoleon II. In the same year he was united with Berryer in the defence of Marshal Ney. Subsequently, he defended several others, among whom may be named Déranger, in 1821, from the vengeance of arbitrary power. In 1826 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and assisted by his influence and opposition to produce the revolution of 1830. In the same year he was made procureur-général of the Court of Cassation, and, in 1832, became president of the Chamber of Deputies, to which office he was re-elected seven times. After the forced abdication of Louis Philippe, in 1848, he proposed the young count of Paris as king of the French, but failed in this attempt to stem the republican tide. He then endeavoured to form a new government, and, in the following year, became president of the Legislative Assembly. During this stormy period of political vicissitude, his conduct was marked by great firmness and courage. In 1852, when the decrees confiscating the property of the House of Orleans were published, he resigned his procureur-généralship. In 1857, however, he again accepted the office of procureur-général, and in his address, written at the time, he says, "I have always belonged to France, and never to a party." He wrote several valuable works on law. b. at Varzy, in the department of the Nièvre, 1783; d. 1865.

DUPIN, Charles, Baron, brother of the above, entered the French navy in 1803, as an engineer, and, after performing some services in the Mediterranean, became professor of mechanics and the physical sciences in the Ionian Academy, which he assisted in forming, at Corfu. In 1812 he returned to Paris, and, in 1813, instituted the maritime museum at Toulon. After the peace of 1815, he visited Great Britain, for the purpose of examining her public engineering works, and afterwards published the results of his observations. In 1828 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, as representative for the department of Tarn, and, after the revolution of 1830, represented Seine. When the change of 1848 was effected, he became a representative in the Constituent Assembly, and also in the Legislative Assembly. After the revolution of 1851, he became a senator. In 1851 he was president of the French jury at the Great Exhibition in London. He wrote a great number of important works connected with the science of engineering. b. at Varzy, 1784.

DUPIN, Charles François, doo-pe'-no, a modern French philosopher, who, during the revolutionary era, distinguished himself as a politician, and rose to the presidency of the Legislative Assembly. Previous to this, however, he had filled the chair of rhetoric in the college of Lisieux, and had deeply devoted himself to astronomical studies. He was the inventor of a telegraph, by which he corresponded with a friend at some distance, until dread of the political factions then rampant compelled him to lay it aside. By this time he had published several scientific works, and, in 1794, appeared his "Origine de tous les Cultes; ou, la Religion Universelle," a great work, which ultimately led to the "commission" undertaken to explore the ruins of Upper Egypt, in the time of Napoleon I. This production was succeeded by other volumes, relating to astronomy and mythology. b. at Frye-Château, near Chaumont, 1742; d. at Issur-Lille, 1809.

DUPLEIX, Scipion, doo-plai', historiographer of France, wrote a work on the liberties of the Gallican church, which he presented to the chancellor Seguier to be licensed; but that magistrate threw it into the fire. This so preyed upon his mind, that he died in 1661. b. at Condom, 1569. Besides the above, he produced,—1. "Mémoires of the Gauls;" 2. "History of France," 6 vols. folio; 3. "Roman History," 3 vols. folio; 4. "A Course of Philosophy," &c.

DUPLEIX, Joseph, a celebrated French merchant, who, in 1731, was sent as director of the colony of Chandernagore, where he carried on an extensive commerce through all parts of the Indies. In 1742 he was made governor of Pondicherry, which, in 1748, he defended against two English admirals. For this he was created a marquis by the French king, and a nabob by the Mogul. He was recalled, however, in 1754, and died in 1763.

DUPONCEAU, Peter S., LL.D., doo-pawn'-so, a native of the Île de Rhé, in France, after completing his education in his native province, went to Paris, where he acted for some time as secretary to De Gebelin, author of a well-known work entitled "The Primitive World." Duponceau accompanied Baron de Steuben to America in 1777, served four campaigns in the colonial army during the War of Independence; and after the conclusion of peace in 1783, was appointed to a post in the office of the Republic's secretary for foreign affairs. He subsequently studied for the bar, then devoted himself to literary pursuits, and wrote two very learned and ingenious works, the one being on the languages of the aboriginal American Indians, and the other on the nature of the Chinese written character, which, although neither alphabetic nor syllabic, he explains to be still lexicographic or strictly representative of particular vocables, with their grammatical accidence, and not pictorial or vaguely indicative of ideas or things. Later investigations have elucidated those questions more fully; still Duponceau's work is of considerable value. B. some time between 1750 and 1760; D. 1844.

DUPONT, Pierre, doo'-paung, a gifted French song writer, the son of humble parents, made himself famous by his lyrics, especially those from rural scenes. He has been called the "Burns of France," and is so, perhaps, more truly than even Béranger. His first published production is entitled "The Two Angels," and was issued in 1844. This was followed by "The Oxen," which was received with a burst of applause, which encouraged the author to sing of the scenes and occupations of the country, and the joys and sorrows, the manners and the lives, of the French peasantry. Having obtained an appointment in the bureau of the Institute, he became a resident of Paris, and was affected by the political and social questions of the time. His "Song of Bread" was produced prior to the revolution of 1848, as was likewise his "Song of the Workers." In the midst of the din of the convulsion which cost Louis Philippe his throne, the strains of Dupont sounded clearly out in tones of triumph and encouragement. He was arrested after the coup d'état, and condemned to transportation to Cayenne; but strong representations having been made to Louis Napoleon, he ordered his release. The poems of Dupont have been published in a collected form under the titles "Cahiers de Chansons," "La Muse Populaire," and "Chants et Chansons, Poésie et Musique," Paris, 1850-54. B. at Lyons, April 21, 1821.

DUPONT DE NEMOURS, Pierre Samuel, doo'-paung-dai-nai-moo(r), a political economist of France, was twice president of the Constitutional Assembly, and held several high official positions, and was eminent for his steady opposition to the anarchists, from whose enmity he was obliged to fly to America in 1797. He returned thence in 1805, became president of the Chamber of Commerce, and, in 1814, was appointed secretary to the provisional government. On the return of Bonaparte from Elba in 1815, Dupont finally retired to America. He was the author of a variety of works on various departments of political economy and other subjects, the most prominent of which are his "Tableau raisonné de Principes de l'Economie Politique," "Reflexions sur l'Ecriture. Richesses de l'Etat," and "Philosophie de l'Univers." B. 1739; D. 1817.

DUPPA, Brian, dup'-pa, a pious prelate, who, in 1638, was appointed tutor to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II., and, about the same time, made bishop of Chichester, whence, in 1641, he was removed to Salisbury. He attended Charles I. in the Isle of Wight, and is supposed to have assisted him in the composition of "Eikon Basilike." At the Restoration he was made bishop of Winchester and lord almoner. B. at Lewisham, Kent, 1589; D. 1662. He published a few devotional pieces, but his greatest works were those of charity.

DUPRAT, Anthony, doo'-pra', a French statesman, who became president of the parliament of Paris in 1507, and chancellor of France in 1515. He was also appointed tutor to the count of Angoulême, afterwards Francis I., and was the author of the famous Concordat, which rendered him so acceptable to the court of Rome, that he obtained several ecclesiastical preferments and a cardinalship. D. 1535.

DUPRÉ DE ST. MACE, Nicholas Francis, doo'-prai, a French writer, who was a member of the Academy of Paris, and translated Milton's "Paradise Lost" into French. He also wrote an essay on the coins of France, "Inquiries concerning the Value of Moneys," &c. B. at Paris, 1696; D. 1775.

DUPUYTREN, Guillaume, le Baron, doo'-pre'-tren, a distinguished modern French surgeon and anatomist, who invented several surgical instruments, and greatly extended the limits of his profession by the scientific character which he gave to his clinical instructions. He wrote very little, and on the evening before he expired, desired that a medical paper might be read to him, "that I may carry," said he, "the latest news of disease out of the world." B. at Pierre-Buffière, in the department Haute-Vienne, 1777; D. in Paris, 1835. Whilst pursuing his studies, Dupuytren was so poor that he could hardly obtain the means of keeping life in his body; yet he bequeathed a fortune of £20,000 to an only daughter, and £3000 for the endowment of a pathological and anatomical chair in Paris.

DUQUESNE, Abraham, Marquis, doo'-kain', a celebrated French naval warrior, first went to sea under his father, who was in the service. He distinguished himself at so early an age, that at seventeen he had the command of a vessel, in which he fought several successful actions with the Spaniards. In the troubles which occurred in France during the minority of Louis XIV., he was in the service of Sweden, and defeated the Danish fleet commanded by King Christian IV. Recalled to France in 1647, he got together a squadron at his own expense, and was engaged several times both with the English and Spanish. In the French war of 1672 with Holland, Louis XIV. sent him against De Ruyter, and Duquesne defeated him in a terrible engagement near Messina, in 1676. He afterwards gained great successes against the pirates in the Mediterranean, and humbled the dey of Algiers. D. 1610; D. 1688. Being a Protestant, Louis XIV. did not raise him to those high positions which his services entitled him to; and thus he never became an admiral. (See EUTYCH, DE.)

DURAN, Don Augustin, doo'-an, a modern panish critical and miscellaneous writer, who made some excellent collections of the romances of his native country, and acquired considerable fame by some of his own poetical imitations of old ballads. B. at Madrid about 1793; D. 1862.

DURAND, Jean Nicholas Louis, doo'-rant, an eminent French architect, who, in 1780, obtained the great prize for an architectural design from the Royal Academy of Architecture in Paris. He afterwards became professor of architecture in the Polytechnic School, and produced several works illustrative of his Art. These are not considered very valuable, although they have been greatly commended. B. at Paris, 1760; D. at Thiais, in the vicinity of Paris, 1834.

THE DICTIONARY

Duranti

DURANTI, Jean Etienne, doo-ran-ti', first president of the parliament of Toulouse in 1591, wrote "De Ritibus Ecclesiarum," printed at Rome in 1591. b. 1534; murdered by the Leaguers in 1590.

DURAS, Clara, duchesse de, doo-ra', a French literary lady of considerable talent and of high moral excellence, was authoress of "Ourika" and "Edouard," two imaginative works. She was more distinguished, however, for exertions to promote education, and her support of charitable institutions, than even for her mental capacity. Her father, the Comte de Kersaint, was sacrificed to the popular fury for having voted against the regicides in the National Convention. The Duchess de Duras was born in 1779, and died at Nice, where she had gone for her health, in 1823.

DÜRER, Albert, doo-rer, the first engraver on wood, and an eminent artist, the son of a goldsmith in Nuremberg. He engraved more than he painted; so that his pictures are scarce, and highly valued. The people of Nuremberg show with pride his portraits of Charlemagne and other emperors; but it is as an engraver that he is most celebrated. He is said to be the first who engraved upon wood; yet, as a painter, he was so highly esteemed, that the emperors Maximilian I. and Charles V. appointed him their artist, and conferred upon him rank and riches. Dürer's best historical paintings are in the collections of Dresden, Vienna, Munich, and Prague. He was also the first who printed woodcuts in two colours. b. at Nuremberg, 1471; d. there, 1528. Dürer wrote a book on the rules of painting, and some other works; and since the revival of German art, he is looked upon as its great exemplar.

D'URFEX, Thomas, dur'-fe, a facetious English poet, who wrote a number of plays and songs, which are very licentious. Charles II. was wont to lean upon his shoulder, and hum the tunes of some of his songs. His effusions, however, on account of their looseness, are now justly forgotten. He resided frequently with the earl of Dorset at Knowle, where is a portrait of him, painted when he was asleep, after dinner; for he had such an ordinary visage, that he could not bear to have his likeness taken. His ballads, &c., were printed in 6 vols. 12mo, under the title of "Pills to purge Melancholy." b. at Exeter, about 1645; d. in London, 1723.

DURHAM, John George Lambton, Earl of, dur'-ham, was educated at Eton, and, in 1813, became member of Parliament for the county of Durham. In 1828 he was raised to the peerage, by the title of Baron Durham, of the city of Durham, and, in 1830, became prominently connected with the reform agitation. In the same year he was made lord privy seal, under the administration of Earl Grey. In framing the Reform Bill at that time, he proposed the introduction of the ballot; but this was rejected. In 1833 he resigned his office in the government, and was created earl of Durham. In the same year he was sent on a special mission to Russia, and, on his return, differed from his colleagues, but was, in 1835, again sent to Russia, where he remained for two years, and became an especial favourite with the emperor of that country. In 1838 he was sent as governor-general, with extraordinary powers, to Canada; but conceiving himself not supported in his measures by the home government, he returned, without being recalled, in the same year. For this step he was rebuked, and not permitted to land under the usual salute. This may be regarded as the close of his public life. b. at Lambton Castle, Durham, 1702; d. at Cowes, Isle of Wight, 1840.

DURHAM, Joseph, sculptor, was the son of a London merchant, and sprung from an old family at Houghton-le-Spring, in the county of Durham. He was the pupil of Francis, and of Mr. E. H. Baily, R.A., and first attracted notice by his bust of Jenny Lind, in 1848, of which more than 1000 copies were sold in a brief period. In 1855 he executed, for Sir F. E. Moon, a bust of the queen for presentation to the corporation of London; and shortly afterwards was commissioned to make a bust of Hermione for the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion-house. He also executed a statue of Frank Crossley, Esq., for the public park at Halifax; and his design was selected for the work of art commemorative of the Exhibition of 1851—his design being unanimously adopted from among the many sent in in response to the invitation which had been issued to the "artists of all nations." Amongst Mr. Durham's minor works are "Paul and Virginia," "Chastity," "Fate of Genius," "Go to Sleep," &c., all displaying much merit. b. 1821.

DURCQ, Michael, doo'-rok, entered the French army in 1792, and accompanied Napoleon I. to Egypt, where he greatly distinguished himself, and was severely wounded by the bursting of a howitzer. When the imperial court was formed, in 1805, he was made grand-marshal of the palace, and was subsequently engaged in several diplomatic missions, although he still continued to play his part in the wars of France. He was made Duke of Friuli, and fell in the battle of Wurtzelen, 1813. b. 1772. (For full details of Durc's connexion with the emperor and the Imperial family, see Bourrienne's "Mémoires.")

DRESSEK, John Louis, doo'-sek, a celebrated musical composer, and an excellent performer on the pianoforte, was a native of Bohemia, and a pupil, at Hamburg, of Emanuel Bach. Having gone to France, the occurrence of the revolution forced him to leave that country and come to London, where he established a musical warehouse in the Haymarket; but this speculation did not succeed, and he returned to the continent, and was successively attached to the household of Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia and of Talleyrand. His compositions, though unequal, are very voluminous, and few authors have written so much that is both good and popular. b. 1762; d. 1812.

DUVAL, Nicholas, doo-val', a Dutch painter, who studied in Italy under Pietro da Cortona, whose manner he adopted. King William III. appointed him director of the Academy at the Hague. b. 1644; d. 1732.

DUVAL, Valentine Jamerai, an extraordinary person, who, after serving as a shepherd, became, in his eighteenth year, keeper of the cattle belonging to the hermits of St. Anne, near Lunenburg. Under these brothers he ardently devoted himself to study, and, by an accident, got introduced to the duke of Lorraine, who placed him in the college of Pont à Mousson. The duke afterwards made him his librarian, and professor of history in the Academy of Lunenburg. In 1738 he followed the grand-duke Francis to Florence, and on the marriage of that prince with the heiress of the house of Austria, he accompanied him to Vienna, where the emperor appointed him keeper of his cabinet of medals. B. 1693; D. 1775.

DWIGHT, Timothy, dwite, an American divine of high reputation, both as pulpit orator and lucid expounder of the Scriptures. In 1795 he became president of Yale College, Newhaven, where he also held the professorship of theology. He wrote several religious works, but the one upon which his fame rests is entitled "Theology Explained and Defended, in a Series of Sermons." This is an extensive work, and consists of a course of lectures delivered by him, as professor of divinity, on the Sundays in term-time. These extended over four years, and although exhibiting no great depth or originality of thought, are still, as a whole, a pleasing collection of divinity. B. at Northampton, Massachusetts, 1752; D. 1817.

DYER, William, B.A., dice, a distinguished Scottish painter, who was taught the rudiments of his art in the Scottish Academy. In 1841 he exhibited at the Royal Academy "King Josiah shooting the Arrow of Deliverance," which raised him to the rank of an associate of that institution. He afterwards exhibited specimens of his skill in fresco-painting, and soon afterwards received a commission from Prince Albert to paint, in that style, one of the compartments of his summer-house at Buckingham Palace. He was subsequently similarly employed at Osborne. He was also among the first artists engaged upon the new palace of Westminster, and his "Baptism of Ethelbert," in the House of Lords, is considered one of the best paintings in the chamber. After this he was appointed to paint the queen's robing-room. In 1849 he was elected B.A.; after which he produced "Omnia Vanitas," the "Meeting of Jacob and Rachel," "King Lear and the Fool in the Storm," "Christabel," the "Good Shepherd," and several other works of more or less merit. B. in Scotland, about 1800; D. 1864.

DYER, Rev. Alexander, was educated for the church, and officiated, for some years, in both Cornwall and Suffolk; but, going to reside in London, in 1827, he entered upon a literary career, and soon rose to distinction. He edited editions of the poems of Collins and Skelton, "Specimens of British Poetesses," and several of the elder dramatists. He also appeared as a commentator on Shakspeare, and edited works for both the Camden and Shakspeare Societies. In 1856 he edited a volume of "Recollections of the Table Talk of Samuel Rogers." B. at Edinburgh, 1798.

DYER, Sir Edward, di-er, a poet of the Elizabethan era, who was educated at Oxford, and after having travelled, received many appointments from the queen, principally in the foreign diplomatic service. He studied chemistry, was thought to be a Rosicrucian, and was made a dupe by the famous astrologers and impostors, Dee and Kelly. His pieces were mostly pastoral odes and madrigals, and are to be found in "England's Helicon," published at the close of Elizabeth's reign, and reprinted in the "Bibliographer." B. about 1540; D. some time after the accession of James I.

DYER, John, an English poet, who was educated for the bar; but, quitting the legal pro-called "Grongar Hill," which, according to Dr. Johnson, is "the happiest of his productions." Not long after his return, he entered into orders, and obtained the living of Calthorpe, in Leicestershire, which he exchanged for Leicestershire, in Lincolnshire. He also had the rectory of Coningsby, in the same county, to which was added that of Kirby. In 1757 appeared "The Fleece," a poem which possesses considerable merit, notwithstanding that it only treats of "The care of sheep, the labours of the loom." B. in Carmarthenshire, 1700; D. 1758.

DYER, George, a poet, a scholar, and an antiquary, deeply versed in books and their history, was educated at Christ's Hospital, London, and at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1773. He spent some time as usher at a school, and in officiating as a Baptist minister. He ultimately settled in London, where his time was occupied first as a parliamentary reporter, which, however, he abandoned after a trial of two months, then as a private teacher, and finally in various literary undertakings. As a poet, Dyer attracted notice, but not fame; as a scholar he edited some plays of Euripides, and an edition of a Greek Testament, but is best known as editor, or joint-editor, of "Valpy's Editions of the Classics," in 141 volumes, in which all the original matter, except the preface, was contributed by him; as an antiquary, his principal works are a "History of the University of Cambridge," in 2 vols., and "Privileges of the University of Cambridge," also in 2 vols. Dyer was a man of great simplicity of character, and his studious habits made him somewhat absent-minded—traits of character which afforded his friend "Elia" (Charles Lamb) an opportunity of making sundry jokes at his expense in articles in the "London Magazine." B. 1755; D. 1841.

DYMOND, Jonathan, di-mond, a linen-draper, and a member of the Society of Friends, published, in 1823, an "Inquiry into the Accordance of War with the Principles of Christianity." This work was well received; but his fame rests more particularly upon his "Essay on the Principles of Morality, &c.," which first appeared in 1829. This work was reviewed by Southey, at great length, in the "London Quarterly Review." It may be regarded as one of the most valuable works on moral government in the language, even by those who may not be inclined to indorse all the views it contains. B. at Exeter, 1796; D. 1823.

EACHARD, John, e'-chard, an eminent English divine, who became fellow, and afterwards master, of Catherine Hall, Cambridge. In 1670 he published a piece entitled "The Grounds and Reasons of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion inquired into." This he attributed to the improper education of the young men for the ministry, and to the absurd style of preaching too generally adopted. He blended much humour with his remarks, which occasioned considerable controversy. His best work, however, is his "Dialogues between Philanthus and Timothy," which were intended to expose, what he considered, the absurdity of the philosophy of Hobbes. He had great powers of ridicule, but on serious subjects he exhibited not much talent. B. in Suffolk, 1636; p. 1697. His work were published in 3 vols. 12mo, in 1779.

EADMER, edc'-mer, an ancient English historian, who, in 1120, was elected bishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland, but was never consecrated. He was the friend and biographer of Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; but his principal work is the "Historia Novorum," or History of his own Times, which was first printed by Selden in 1623. He also wrote lives of St. Wilfrid, St. Oswald, St. Dunstan, &c., which were inserted by Warton in his "Anglia Sacra." D. 1124.

EARLE, John, earl, an English bishop, who was tutor to Charles II. while Prince of Wales, and suffered much during the civil war and the Commonwealth. At the Restoration, he was made dean of Westminster, and afterwards bishop of Worcester, and then of Salisbury. Dr. Earle was a scholar and author, having written a humorous work called "Microcosmography, or a Piece of the World Discovered; in Essays and Characters." He also translated into Latin the "Eikon Basilike," and Hooker's "Ecclesiastical Polity;" the latter, however, was destroyed through the carelessness of the bishop's servants. B. at York, 1601; D. 1665.

EARLON, Richard, er'-lon, an eminent English engraver, who was distinguished for his skill in mezzo-tint, and produced a great number of imitations of chalk-drawings. He engraved after many of the most celebrated masters, both English and foreign. B. in London, about 1742; D. about 1822.

EASTLAKE, Sir Charles Lock, P.R.A., east'-lake, a modern English artist, early became a student under Fuseli, at the Royal Academy of Painting, and afterwards settled at Plymouth as a portrait painter. In 1817 he visited Italy and Greece; in 1823 he began to exhibit at the Royal Academy, and in 1827 was elected an associate of that institution. In 1829 he exhibited on its walls his "Peasants on a Pilgrimage to Rome," &c., which is a work of great merit, and has been several times engraved. His next great work was his "Christ weeping over Jerusalem." This placed him at the head of his profession, and was, at the time of its production, esteemed as one of the best paintings in the historical style that had appeared for a lengthened period of time. It was succeeded by his "Christ blessing little Children" and his "Hagar and Ishmael;" both, though excellent, are considered, as pictures, by no means equal to the other. In 1841 he was president of the Royal Academy, with the honour of knighthood, and in 1855 was made director of the National Gallery, with a salary of £1000 a year. In the same year he was created a knight of the Legion of Honour, and two years previously, had the degree of D.C.L. presented to him by the University of Oxford. Besides his eminence as an artist, Sir Charles has contributed some valuable works to the literature of art. Among these may be named his "Contributions towards a History of Oil-Painting," first published in 1847. B. 1793; D. 1865.

EASTLAKE, Elizabeth Rigby, Lady, the wife of Sir Charles, won, under her maiden name, considerable literary celebrity by a work which appeared in 1841, entitled "Letters from the Shores of the Baltic," being a record of observations made during a lengthened visit to that region, which the authoress paid to a sister who was married to a nobleman of Esthonia. Subsequently she published "Livonian Tales," and was a contributor to the "Quarterly Review," some of her papers in which have been reprinted in a separate form. She was the daughter of Edward Rigby, M.D., of Norwich, and was married to Sir Charles Eastlake in 1849. B. about 1816.

EASTMAN, Mary H., east'-man, an American authoress, the daughter of Dr. Thomas Henderson, U.S. army, and the wife of Captain S. Eastman, of the same service. Her writings principally relate to the aborigines of America, and are entitled "Dacotah; or, Life and Legends of the Sioux," "Romance of Indian Life," "American Aboriginal Portfolio," "Chicora, and other Regions of the Conquerors and the Conquered," and "Aunt Phillis's Cabin," designed as an answer to Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin." She likewise contributed to various magazines and other periodical works.

EBERHARD, John Augustus, ai-ber-hard, a German philosopher and divine, was professor of theology at Halle, a member of the Royal Academy at Berlin, and privy councillor of Frederic the Great of Prussia. He was a decided opponent of Kant's philosophy; and wrote "A General Theory of the Faculty of Thought and Sentiment," "A General History of Philosophy," &c. B. at Halberstadt, 1739; D. 1809.

EBION, e'-bi-on, a Jew, the founder, in the 1st century, of a sect called Ebionites. This sect differed little in its doctrines from the Nazarenes, denying the divinity of Jesus Christ, and the writings of the apostles, with the exception of the gospel of St. Matthew, which they mutilated. To the precepts of the Christian religion they added Mosaic practices. The first Ebionites were strictly moral, but, in process of time, they gave themselves up to great excesses. Some think that the Ebionites derived their name from a Hebrew word meaning "poor."

ECHARD, Laurence, e'-chard, an English divine and historian, was brought up at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1695. On entering into orders, he obtained two livings in Lincolnshire. In 1699 he published a "History of Rome," 3 vols. 8vo, and, in 1702, his "General Ecclesiastical History," 2 vols. 8vo. His principal work, however, is the "History of England," 3 vols. folio. He also published a "Gazetteer, or Newsman's Interpreter," which was once a popular book, and the foundation of all of its class. In 1712 he was made archdeacon of Stowe, and, some time after, obtained three livings in Suffolk. B. in Suffolk, about 1670; D. 1730.

ECHHELLENSIS, Abraham, ek'-el-len'-sis, a Maronite, and professor of the Oriental languages at Rome. He translated Apollonius's "Comics" from the Arabic into Latin, and assisted Le Jay in his Polyglot Bible. D. 1654.

ECKIUS, or ECKHUS, John, ek'-s-us, was professor in the university of Ingoldstadt, and was chosen to be the champion of the church against the early reformers. He accordingly disputed with Luther, before the duke of Saxony, at Leipsic, in 1518; with Carlstadtus, in 1519; and at the Diet of Augsburg, in 1533, he argued against the Protestant Confession. He held a three days' debate with Melancthon and others at Weimar, in 1541, on the continuance of sin after baptism; and again, on the same topic, at Ratisbon, to which place the discussion had been adjourned. He was the author of numerous polemical works, and some homilies. He was considered a clever debater, but it is believed that he did not greatly aid the cause he defended. b. 1436; d. 1543.

ECLUSE, Charles de l', ai-klooze, a physician of Arras, and professor of botany at Leyden, whose works on botany were published at Antwerp, in 2 vols. folio, 1601. b. 1526; d. 1609.

EDELINCK, Gerard, ed'-e-link, an eminent Dutch engraver, who mostly resided in France, where he executed the bulk of his works; among which may be noticed, as his finest, the picture of the "Holy Family," by Raffaele, and the "Tent of Darius," by Le Brun. b. at Antwerp, 1649; d. 1707.

EDMA, Gerard, e'-de-ma, a Dutch landscape-painter, who went to Norway and Newfoundland to delineate the plants and insects of those countries. He settled in London in 1670, and became famous for painting landscapes. b. about 1652; d. 1700.

EDGAR, ed'-gar, king of England, at the age of 16 succeeded his father Edwy, in 959. He made war against the Scots, and compelled Wales to pay him yearly a certain number of wolves' heads, which cleared the country of those animals. Securing his kingdom from invasion by a large fleet, he is said to have subdued Ireland, and governed his people with a vigorous success. His queen dying, and hearing of the great beauty of Elfrida, a daughter of the earl of Devon, he sent Earl Ethelwald, one of his favourite courtiers, to see if the charms of the lady were equal to what was reported of them. The moment he beheld her, the earl forgot his duty to his master, gave a false report of her charms, and married the lady himself. His conduct ultimately became known to the king, who caused him to be slain for his treachery, when the beautiful Elfrida became the wife of Edgar. b. 975. The quiet enjoyed in England during his reign procured him the name of the Peaceable. (See ELFRIDA.)

EDGAR, king of Scotland in 1093, was the son of Malcolm III., by the sister of Edgar Atheling of England. His sister married Henry I. of England, which circumstance terminated a war which had been raging between the two countries. b. 1107.

EDGEWORTH, Richard Lovell, edg'-werth, an English writer, was designed for the profession of the law; but on the death of his father, in 1769, he relinquished all intention of carrying out this design, and went to Ireland, in 1782, to dedicate the remainder of his life to the improvement of his estate and the education of his children. To this duty he nobly devoted himself, and reared a large family by four different wives, he having been as often married. b. at Bath, 1744; d. at Edgeworthstown, Longford, Ireland, 1817. He greatly assisted his celebrated daughter, Maria, in her works, although he himself was by no means "a ready writer." The following, however, appeared in his name:—"Poetry Explained," "Rational Primer," "Professional Education," "Speeches in Parliament," and an "Essay on the Construction of Roads and Carriages." He was a member of the last Irish House of Commons, and an active magistrate in the neighbourhood where he resided.

EDGEWORTH, Maria, the daughter of the preceding, a favourite modern English authoress, was the offspring of his first marriage, and resided in England till 1782. She then removed to Ireland, where her education proceeded under the direction of her father, and in 1793 they published a joint production on "Practical Education." "Early Lessons" was the next production, which attained great popularity. In 1802 appeared the "Essay on Irish Bulls," another joint production; but it is not on these that the fame of Miss Edgeworth rests, but on the excellent series of novels, which already had begun to appear under her sole name; the first of these was "Castle Rackrent," which was issued in 1801, and which indicated the possession of powers of a very rare character. In all her novels her pen was devoted, not only to make us feel what is good, but to make us do what is good. This is especially the case in her "Belinda," "Leonora," "The Modern Griselda," "Moral Tales," "Popular Tales," "Tales of Fashionable Life;" in short, in all that she has written. Her last and most popular novel was "Helen," which appeared in 1834, and which was closed by the juvenile story of "Orlando." It was to her "rich humour, pathetic tenderness, and admirable tact" in the delineation of her Irish characters, that Sir Walter Scott was indebted for the suggestion to do something in a similar way for his own country. He accordingly began the Waverley novels, keeping, no doubt, the productions of Miss Edgeworth clearly in his view. As a general estimate of her genius, the following discriminating criticism of Lord Jeffrey is as just as it is happily expressed:—"The writings of Miss Edgeworth exhibit so singular a union of sober sense and inexhaustible invention—so minute a knowledge of all that distinguishes manners, or touches on happiness, in every condition of human fortune—and so just an estimate, both of the real sources of enjoyment, and of the illusions by which they are so often obstructed—that it cannot be thought wonderful, that we should separate her from the ordinary manufacturer of novels, and speak of her tales as works of more serious importance than much of the true history and solemn philosophy that come daily under our inspection. . . . It is impossible, we think, to read ten pages in any of her writings, without feeling not only that the whole, but that every part of them, was intended to do good." b. at Hare Hatch, Reading, 1767; d. at Edgeworthstown, Longford, Ireland, 1819.

EDINBURGH, Duke of. (See ALFRED, Prince.)

EDMUND, St., ed'-mund, became king of the East Angles in 855, and was in 870 conquered, and put to death, by the Danish princes Ingwar and Hubba, whose propositions for peace, from their humiliating conditions, he had rejected. "His body," Fuller says, "was placed in a goodly shrine, richly adorned with jewels and precious stones, at Bury, in Suffolk." He was canonized, and Bury St. Edmund's was so named from its being the place of his burial.

EDMUND I., king of England, son of Edward the Elder, succeeded his brother Athelstan in 940. He subdued Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland. For his personal elegance and splendour, he received the name of the Magnificent, and was stabbed at a feast in Gloucester, in 948, by Leolf, a robber, whom he had caused to be banished.

EDMUND II., commonly known as Ironside, son of Ethelred, whom he succeeded on the English throne in 1016. A fierce war raged between him and Canute, king of Denmark, and he ultimately was forced to agree to a partition of the kingdom with the Danish prince. Assassinated in 1017, at Oxford, by two of his chamberlains. (See CANUTE.)

EDWARD, ed'-red, king of the Anglo-Saxons, was the youngest son of Edward the Elder, and succeeded his brother Edmund in 946. He repressed several revolts of the Danes, and defeated Malcolm, king of Scotland. d. 955, leaving the throne to his nephew, Edwy.

EDWARD, ed'-re-se an Arabian writer on geography, who produced a work on that science, which has been translated into several languages. In 1830-1840, it was published in France, and formed the fifth and sixth volumes of the "Revue de Voyages et de Mémoires" of the French Geographical Society. b. 1069; d. 1164.

EDWARD the Elder, ed'-ward, son of Alfred the Great, succeeded his father in 901. He subdued Northumbria and East Anglia, and extended his dominions as far as Scotland. d. 925.

EDWARD the Martyr, son of Edgar the Great, king of England, was murdered by order of his stepmother Elfrida, at Corfe Castle. His youth and innocence, coupled with his tragical death, procured for him the designation of the Martyr. b. 961; assassinated 973, after a reign of three years.

EDWARD, king of England, called the Confessor, was the son of Ethelred. He succeeded Hardicanute in 1042, and was crowned at Westminster on Easter-day. Having been brought up in Normandy, he brought over many of the natives of that country, whom he preferred at his court, which gave great disgust to his Saxon subjects. Notwithstanding this, he kept possession of his throne, and framed a code which is supposed to be the origin of the common law of England. He abolished the tax of Danegelt, was the first who pretended to cure the king's evil by touch, and restored Malcolm to the throne of Scotland, which had been usurped by Macbeth. He consulted William of Normandy about the choice of a successor, and this afterwards furnished that prince with a plea for invading the kingdom after the death of Edward, in 1066, when he was buried in Westminster Abbey. b. at Islip, Oxfordshire, about 1005.

EDWARD I., king of England, surnamed Longshanks, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1272. At the time of his father's death he was in Palestine, fighting against the Saracens for the recovery of Jerusalem, and when he returned, completed the conquest of Wales and subdued Scotland. To preserve Wales, he caused his son, who was born in Caernarvon, to be called the "Prince of Wales," which, ever since, has continued to be the title of the eldest son of the king of England. In endeavouring to break the spirit of the Scotch, he was unsuccessful, the patriotism of Wallace and his followers completely baffling his attempts at the entire subjugation of that people. b. at Westminster, 1239; d. at Carlisle, on his way to Scotland, 1272.—Whilst in the Holy Land, Eleanor, the wife of this sovereign, is said to have saved his life by sucking the poison from a wound which he received from a vengeful assassin. She was the daughter of Ferdinand III., king of Castile. His second wife was Margaret, daughter of Philip the Hardy, king of France. The laws which he framed entitle him to the name of the English Justinian. (See HENRY III., and MONTFORT, Simon de.)

EDWARD II., the son of the above, was created Prince of Wales in 1284, and after his accession to the throne, suffered himself to be governed by his favourites, Gaveston and the Despensers, which occasioned the barons to rise against him. In his reign the battle of Bannockburn was fought near Stirling, in Scotland, which restored to that country whatever she had lost of her independence in the previous reign. In 1327 he was deposed by his subjects, and his crown conferred on his son, when he was confined in Berkeley Castle, Gloucestershire, where he was murdered in 1327. b. at Caernarvon, 1284.

EDWARD III. was the son and successor of the above, and ascended the throne when about fourteen years of age. His reign was active and glorious. He obliged the Scots to acknowledge Edward Baliol for their king, who did him homage for his crown. This was the result of the battle of Halidon Hill, in which the Scots were defeated, and had 14,000 men slain. He next laid claim to the crown of France, and gained the battles of Cressy and Poitiers. In the first was defeated Philip of Valois, and in the last king John, who was taken prisoner, and sent to England. He also defeated the French in a naval engagement off the coast of Flanders, which is the first sea fight on record between the English and the French. His queen also, about the same time, defeated David Bruce, king of Scotland, and took him prisoner. He afterwards reduced Calais, and peopled it with English. b. at Windsor, 1312; d. at East Sheen, near Richmond, Surrey, 1377. In this reign Chaucer, the father of English poetry, lived; the order of the Garter was instituted; the art of weaving cloth introduced from Flanders; gunpowder invented; and cannon first used at Cressy. As his gallant son, Edward the Black Prince, died before him, he was succeeded by his grandson, Richard II. (See EDWARD, Prince of Wales, etc.)

EDWARD IV. was the eldest son of Richard, duke of York, and disputed the crown with Henry VI., whom he succeeded in 1461. He married Lady Elizabeth Grey, whose husband had fallen, as an adherent of the house of Lancaster, and whose beauty, whilst pleading for the restoration of her husband's lands, won the heart of the king. This marriage so disgusted the earl of Warwick, commonly called the King-maker, that he joined the Lancastrian party, and, in 1469, defeated Edward's forces near Banbury. Soon afterwards Edward was taken prisoner, but, effecting his escape, he put himself at the head of his followers, and obtained a victory over Warwick, near Stamford. The earl fled to France, whence he returned with a supply of troops, and proclaimed Henry VI., who had been confined in the Tower for six years, and set him on the throne. This event procured for Warwick the title of "king-maker." Edward had fled to Holland, but soon returned with assistance, and marched to London, where he took Henry prisoner. Shortly afterwards, he met Warwick on the field of battle at Barnet, where the Lancastrians were defeated, and the earl slain. Another victory at Tewkesbury secured Edward the quiet possession of the throne, after which there are few memorable events to record of this monarch. n. at Rouen, 1411; n. 1483, and was buried in Westminster. In Edward's reign the art of printing was introduced into England.

Edward

EDWARD V., king of England, son of the above, succeeded his father at the age of twelve. Richard, duke of Gloucester, his uncle, afterwards Richard III., took the guardianship of both him and his brother, and placed them in the Tower, where they were smothered in their beds, in 1483. n. in the sanctuary of Westminster Abbey, 1470. The bodies of these princes were discovered in 1674, and removed, by command of Charles II., to Westminster Abbey. (See RICHARD III.)

EDWARD VI., the son of Henry VIII., by Jane Seymour, ascended the throne in 1547, at the age of ten years. He was a prince of promising talents, virtue, and piety. The Reformation, begun by his father, was energetically carried on by Archbishop Crommer throughout his reign. His aversion to popery was so great, that he signed a will, in which he set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession, lest they should favour the Roman Catholics, and settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey. n. at Hampton Court, 1537; n. at Greenwich, 1553. He founded the hospitals of Christ Church, Bridewell, St. Thomas, and a number of grammar-schools, which are still popularly known as King Edward's Schools.

— n. Prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour, was the eldest son of Edward III. He accompanied his father to France in his 16th year, and distinguished himself there above all the warriors of his age; particularly at the battle of Crécy, or Cressy, where he captured the standard of the king of Bohemia, embroidered with three ostrich feathers, and the motto Ich dien, "I serve." These he adopted himself; and from that time to the present, they have continued to be the crest and the motto of the princes of Wales. He also gained the victory of Poitiers, where he took prisoners John, king of France, and his son, whom he brought captives to London. Their entry into the capital took place in 1356. In 1361 he married the daughter of Edmund, earl of Kent, brother to Edward II., a widow, by whom he had a son, who was afterwards Richard II. By the peace of Bretigny, he obtained the principality of Aquitaine and Gascony, taking up his residence at Bordeaux. Here he gave an asylum to Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, who had been driven from his throne by his brother Henry, count of Trastamare. Peter was restored to his kingdom by Edward; but the Castilian behaved to him with the basest ingratitude, refusing to find supplies for the English troops, and, it is alleged, even causing poison to be administered to the English hero, from the effects of which he never recovered. n. at Woodstock, 1330; n. 1376.

EDWARD PLANTAGENET, the son of George, duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. and Richard III., by Isabella, daughter of the famous earl of Warwick, the "king-maker," was allowed by his uncle Edward to take the title of earl of Warwick, but refused the dukedom of Clarence. When Henry VII. attained to the throne, he confined the young earl in the Tower, and in 1486 Lambert Simnel assumed his name, and got up a party to maintain his right to the crown as the last of the Plantagenets. On this the king paraded the prince through the streets of London, but again consigned him to the Tower, where he was involved in a plot by Perkin Warbeck, who had personated Richard, duke of York, second son of Edward IV., and both were in consequence executed in 1499. This unfortunate prince was of weak intellect, and was left by Henry VII. almost totally uneducated.

EDWARDS, Richard, a/k/a Edward, an early English dramatic writer, was appointed by Queen Elizabeth in 1561 master of the singing boys of the chapel royal, and in 1566, when her majesty visited Oxford, one of his plays, "Palamon and Arcite," was performed before her. His compositions consist of dramas, masques, and poetry for pageants, the best known of his works being the "Paradise of Dainty Devices," from which Shakespeare quoted the song "When Grief Grief," in "Romeo and Juliet," act iv. scene 5. n. in Somersetshire, 1523; n. it is believed about 1584.

EDWARDS, Thomas, a famous polemical divine, who warred both with Episcopalian and Independents, and withdrew into Holland when the latter party gained the ascendancy, having previously hurled against the "Separatists," as he called them, a work called "Gangraema," which exhibits a curious picture of the religious animosities of the time. He belonged to the Presbyterian party, and was utterly inrant of all opposition to the tenets of his... He was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A., and died in exile in 1647.

EDWARDS, George, an eminent English naturalist, who, after traveling some time abroad, returned, and became librarian of the College of Physicians, London. He published a "History of Birds," 7 vols. 4to; "Gleanings of Natural History," 3 vols. 4to; and a volume of "Essays," 8vo. n. at West Ham, Essex, 1663; n. 1773.

—, Thomas, an English divine, who, in 1755, printed a translation of the Psalms, and afterwards was chosen master of the grammar-school at Coventry, and presented to the rectory of St. John Baptist in that city. In 1759 he published the "Doctrine of Irresistible Grace proved to have no Foundation in the New Testament;" and, in 1782, defended Bishop Hare's system of the Hebrew metre against Dr. Lowth, in which he failed. In 1766 he took his doctor's degree, and, four years later, obtained the living of Nuneaton, in Warwickshire, where he died in 1785. n. at Coventry, 1729. Besides the above works, he published selections from Theocritus, with notes, and some other pieces.

EDWARDS, William, an architect who acquired great skill in bridge-building. He was only a common mason, but by dint of genius and skill, he rose to distinction in the line mentioned. His first performance was on the river Tanf, which brought him into notice, and gave him opportunities for displaying his powers, which he did in numerous other structures. n. in Glamorganshire, 1719; n. 1789.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, an American divine, who, in 1757, was chosen president of the college of New Jersey, where he died in 1788. n. at Windsor, Connecticut, 1703. Mr. Edwards was an acute metaphysician, but a rigid Calvinist. He wrote "A Treatise concerning Religious Affections," "An Inquiry into the prevailing Notion of that Freedom of Will which is supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency;" "The Great Doctrine of Original Sin Defended," "Sermons," &c. &c.

EDWARDS, Bryan, an ingenious writer, who became a member of the Assembly of Jamaica, W. Indies, where he delivered a speech against Mr. Wilberforce's proposition concerning the slave trade, in 1789. He afterwards settled in England, and became member of Parliament for Grampound, in Cornwall. He made his first speech in defence of his countrymen against the advocates for the abolition of slavery, and distinguished himself by a blunt roughness of manner, blended with sound sense and judgment. b. in Wiltshire, 1743; d. 1800. He wrote "The History, Civil and Commercial, of the British Colonies in the West Indies," 2 vols. 4to; "The Proceedings of the Governor and Assembly of Jamaica in regard to the Maroon Negroes;" and "An Historical Survey of the French Colony in the Island of St. Domingo," 8vo.

EDWARDES, Sir Herbert Benjamin, K.C.B., a gallant British officer, who, entering the service of the East India Company in 1840, soon became noted for his talents, which first particularly displayed themselves in a series of letters in an Indian newspaper, from "Brahmince Bull in India to his cousin John Bull in England." He was present as aide-de-camp to Sir Hugh Gough at the battles of Moodkee and Sohraon. He afterwards served against the Afghans in the Bannoo Valley, of the operations in which he published an account; but his principal achievement was against Dewan Moolraj of Mooltan, who, having rebelled against the Sikh government at Lahore, Lieut. Edwardes collected a Sikh force, defeated Moolraj in two pitched battles, and shut him up in the fortress of Mooltan till a regular army could be brought against him. The siege of the rebel governor's stronghold shortly followed by a British force under General Whish, and Moolraj surrendered on Jan. 22, 1849, just as a breach in the walls was about to be stormed. For his services in this war in the course of which he lost his right hand by the accidental explosion of a pistol, Lieut. Edwardes was raised to a brevet majority, and by special statute was created an extra companion of the Bath. He subsequently served under Sir Henry Lawrence in the Punjab, and was of essential service in raising troops to aid in the suppression of the great Indian rebellion of 1857, for which he was made a K.C.B. in 1860, and was promoted to brevet colonel in 1861. b. at Frodesley rectory, Shropshire, in 1819; d. December 23, 1908.

EDWY, ed'-we, king of England, son of Edmund I., succeeded his uncle Edred in 956. He married Elgiva, his relation within the prohibited degrees of kindred, which proved the ruin of both. Archbishop Odo seized the queen, and having branded her in the face with a hot iron, sent her to Ireland, after which she was put to a cruel death. Edwy was driven from the throne, and died under excommunication in 958; b. 939.

EGBERT, eg'-bert, the first king of all England, and the last of the Saxon heptarchy, was proclaimed king of Wessex in 800, and, in 827, united all the other kingdoms under him. He distinguished himself against the Danes. d. 837.

EGGE, Hans, ai'-geed, superintendent of the Danish missionaries in Greenland, went, in 300

1721, and resided there for fifteen years, labouring to convert the inhabitants. b. 1686; d. 1753. Egde wrote a description of Greenland, published first in 1729.—His son Paul became assistant to his father, and afterwards bishop of Greenland. He published a new edition of his father's book, and a journal respecting Greenland. b. 1708; d. 1789.

EGERTON, Thomas, edj'-er-ton, lord chancellor of England in the reign of James I., received his education at Oxford, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, and, in 1592, received the honour of knighthood, and was made attorney-general. Soon afterwards he became master of the rolls, which was followed by the office of lord keeper. In 1603 he was made Baron Ellesmere and lord chancellor. In 1616 he was created Viscount Brackley. b. about 1540; d. 1617. After his death were published his "Privileges and Prerogatives of the High Court of Chancery," and his "Observations concerning the Office of Lord Chancellor."

EGG, Augustus, R.A., eg, a painter, who first exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1838, and was elected an associate in 1845. His forte lay in depicting scenic and humorous subjects, Shakspeare in his lighter moods and Le Sage furnishing him with themes. He also executed some historical pieces; but even in these his sense of the humorous exhibits itself. Mr. Egg was entrusted with the arrangement of the gallery of modern paintings at the Manchester Art Treasures Exhibition in 1857; and exhibited at the Royal Academy, in 1859, a triptych, which was considered to be superior to anything he had previously produced. His other works are numerous and much esteemed. He was made R.A. in 1860. b. 1816; d. 1863.

EGINHARD, ai'-gin-hard, a German historian at the court of Charlemagne, and appointed secretary to that sovereign, who gave him his daughter Imma in marriage. He afterwards embraced a religious life, and became superintendent of several monasteries. d. about 841. Eginhard wrote a curious "Life of Charlemagne," in elegant Latin; also the "Annals of France from 741 to 829."

EGZ, Scallegrim, ai'-giz, an Iceland poet and warrior of the 10th century, who was in the habit of joining the incursions made by his countrymen into the north of England and Scotland, in one of which he slew a son of Eric of the Bloody Axe, the exiled king of Norway; and being afterwards taken prisoner, was condemned to death, but having delivered extemporaneously a poem in praise of Eric, he was pardoned. This poem has been preserved, and is entitled "The Ransom." A Latin version of it was printed in Wormius's "Danish Literary Antiquities," in 1638.

EGMONT, Lamoral, Count, eg'-mont, a distinguished nobleman in Flanders, who served in the armies of Charles V. with great reputation. He was made general of horse by Philip II., and distinguished himself at the battle of St. Quentin in 1557. But the duke of Alva, on the pretence that he meditated designs in favour of the prince of Orange, caused him, together with count Horn, to be beheaded at Brussels in 1568. b. 1522.—(See ALVA, and Motley's "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic.")

EHRENBERG, Christian Gottfried, air-en-bairg, a distinguished German microscopist and naturalist, who made several scientific expeditions into various parts of the globe; among which may be noticed one with Humboldt into the Ural and also the Altai mountains. He wrote largely on his favourite pursuits, and investigated the fossil forms of microscopic organic beings with success. b. at Delitzsch, in Prussian Saxony, 1795.

EHRET, George Dionysius, ai'-rait, a botanical painter, a native of Germany, who was employed in 1786 in illustrating the "Hortus Cliffortianus," and afterwards came to England, where he was liberally encouraged, and became a member of the Royal Society. b. 1710; d. 1770.

EICHORN, Johann Gottfried, ike'-horn, a German professor of oriental and biblical literature in the university of Göttingen. He filled several important posts, and in 1819 was appointed privy councillor of justice for the kingdom of Hanover. His writings, illustrative of oriental literature, are numerous, and procured for him a reputation of being amongst the most learned and distinguished scholars of Germany. b. at Dorrenzimmern, 1752; d. 1837.—Charles Frederick, a son of the preceding, distinguished himself as a juriconsult. b. at Jena, 1781; d. 1854.

ERBEE, Gigot d', dai(l)-bai, the general-in-chief of the Vendéans in the war of the French revolution, was a native of Dresden, but became naturalized in France, and served some time in the army. He quitted the service, however, in 1783, and retired to Beaupréau, in Anjou. In 1793 he became leader of the royalists in La Vendée. b. 1732; taken and shot, Jan. 2, 1794.

was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and, in 1841, was returned to parl. for East Gloucestershire. Since 1847 he has represented Haddingtonshire. He was a lord of the treasury under Lord Aberdeen in 1852, and a prominent member of the "Adu'llamite" party that aided the Tories to throw out Gladstone's Reform Bill in 1860.

ERBANO, el'-e-nor, duchess of Guienne, succeeded her father, William IX., at the age of 15, in 1137, and the same year married Louis VII., king of France. She accompanied him to the Holy Land, where she is said to have intrigued with her uncle, Raymond, prince of Antioch, and a young Turk named Saladin. A separation ensued between her and her husband, and in 1153 she married the duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II., king of England, which occasioned a succession of wars between the two kingdoms. Her jealousy of Henry, and subsequent conduct to Fair Rosamond, have afforded a copious subject to poets and romance-writers. She excited her sons to rebel against their father, for which she was imprisoned sixteen years. On the accession of Richard I. she was released, and in his absence in the Holy Land, was made regent. d. in 1204, a nun in the abbey of Fontevrault.

ERDON, John Scott, earl of, el'-don, after passing through the university of Oxford, entered himself a student of the Middle Temple in 1773, and took his degree of Master of Arts in the following year. After patient and laborious study, he rose into notice, and in 1783 was returned member of parliament for Weobly. In 1787 he was appointed chancellor of the bishopric and county palatine of Durham; and, in the following year, solicitor-general. In 1793 he was made attorney-general, and in 1799 was raised to the chief-justiceship, with a seat in the House of Lords, as Baron Elbion. In 1801 he became lord chancellor, which office he finally resigned in 1827. In 1821 he had been created Viscount Encombe and Earl of Eldon. b. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1751; d. Jan. 13, 1834.

ELGIN, Thomas Bruce, seventh earl of, el'-gin, entered the army at an early age, and, in 1783, accompanied the Prussian army in its operations in Germany. In 1795 he was made envoy extraordinary, and sent to Berlin, and in 1799 dispatched to Constantinople in the same capacity. Here he remained till the French were expelled from Egypt, in 1802. In 1800 he made a journey to Athens, for the purpose of recovering some of her remains of Grecian art, and was so far successful as to make an excellent collection, which, in 1816, was purchased by the government, and placed in the British Museum, where it is known as the "Elgin Marbles." b. 1766; d. at Paris, 1841.

ELGIN, James Bruce, eighth earl of, was, in 1841, returned member of parliament for Southampton; but on the death of his father in the same year, succeeded to the earldom, and in the following year was appointed governor of the island of Jamaica. In 1840 he became governor-general of Canada, where the character of his policy rendered him an especial favourite, not only with those over whom he had been called to rule, but with the ministers in England. In 1849 he was created an English peer, and in 1854 appointed to the lord-lieutenancy of Fifeshire, Scotland. War having broken out between England and China, Lord Elgin was, in 1857, sent out by the British government as plenipotentiary to China, with the view of obtaining satisfactory terms of peace, or, if this could not be done, to prosecute the contest with vigour. The Indian mutiny of the same year, however, prevented him from carrying into effect his instructions so soon as he would otherwise have done; for not only was part of the force destined for China diverted from its route and sent to Calcutta, but he himself left Hong-Kong with all the troops that could be spared, to go to the assistance of Lord Canning. Returning to China at the end of the year, he immediately made a demand of redress for injuries sustained by the British, and upon the refusal of the Chinese, through commissioner Yeh, to comply, Canton was attacked and captured. Lord Elgin then, in conjunction with Baron Gros, the French plenipotentiary, determined to proceed with an armed force to the vicinity of Peking, and reached the mouth of the Peiho river, which he found strongly defended by forts on each bank. These being taken by Admiral Sir M. Seymour, the force proceeded to Tien-tsin, and there the plenipotentiaries were met by Chinese commissioners, to adjust the terms of a treaty. After much procrastination, on various pretexts, which were met by Lord Elgin with great determination, the Chinese commissioners agreed to execute a treaty in conformity with the terms proposed to them, and on the 25th June, 1858, this was signed at Tien-tsin. This great point gained, Lord Elgin determined to proceed to Japan, in order to obtain from that government a treaty which would throw open its ports to British commerce, so that it might participate in the advantages possessed by the Dutch. Taking with him a yacht, as a present from the queen of England to the emperor of Japan, he reached the port of Nagasaki, and proceeded up the Gulf of Jeddo, beyond where any foreign vessel had hitherto been allowed to pass. After effecting a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Japan, he returned to England, and took office, in 1559, under Lord Palmerston as postmaster-general. In 1560, in consequence of the Chinese having refused to permit the British envoy to Peking to pass up the Pei-ho, and having fired on the British ships of war when endeavouring to force the passage of the Taku forts, Lord Elgin was again sent to China in company with the French plenipotentiary, Baron Gros. His expedition was successfully ended by the capture of the Summer Palace near Peking, which induced the Chinese minister, Prince Kang, to promise a strict observance of the treaty of 1563. In 1862 he succeeded Earl Canning as viceroy of India, but died the following year at Dhurumsala, in Cashmere. B. 1811.

ELLOR, John, cl-yof, a pious divine, called the "Apostle of the Indians," was educated at Cambridge; but on embracing puritanism, he, in 1631, emigrated to New England, and became pastor of a congregation of Independents at Roxbury, where he established a grammar-school. In 1646 he began to learn the Indian language, that he might devote himself to the conversion of the natives. In this he met with great success, and obtained a considerable influence over the various tribes. He translated the Bible into their language, and several pieces of practical divinity. B. 1604; D. at Roxbury, 1690. Baxter says of this divine, "There was no man on earth whom I honoured above him." A handsome memorial, to perpetuate his name, was erected in the "Forest Hills Cemetery," at Roxbury.

ELLIOTT, or ELLIOT, George Augustus, Lord Heathfield, educated at Leyden and the military school of La Fere, in France. He afterwards entered the Prussian service as a volunteer, and returned to Scotland in 1735. Not long after this, he joined the engineer corps at Woolwich, and obtained an adjutancy in the 2nd troop of horse grenadiers, with which he went to Germany, and was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1759 he was appointed to raise the 1st regiment of light horse, with which he served on the continent with great reputation. On his recall from Germany, he was sent to the Havannah, in the reduction of which he had an eminent share. At the peace, the king conferred on his regiment the title of royal. In 1775 General Elliott was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland, whence he returned soon after, and was made governor of Gibraltar, for which important post no man could have been better fitted. He was very abstemious, his constant food being vegetables, and his drink water. He never allowed himself more than four hours' sleep at a time, and was so accustomed to hardness, that it became habitual, and enabled him to defend that important fortress against the formidable operations of the French and Spaniards, 1779-83, with such persevering obstinacy, that the siege of Gibraltar will always stand out as one of the most glorious incidents in military history. On his return to England, he was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Heathfield and Baron Gibraltar. B. in Roxburghshire, Scotland, 1718; D. at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1790. Lord Heathfield married Anne, daughter of Sir Francis Drake, of Devonshire, who died in 1769, leaving one son and a daughter. His remains were brought to England, and buried at Heathfield, in Sussex, where a monument was erected to his memory.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, was the daughter of Henry VIII. by Anne Boleyn, who was beheaded in 1536. She was educated in the Protestant religion, and, in the reign of her sister Mary, was sent to the Tower, whence she was afterwards removed to Woodstock, where she was kept till 1553, and then taken to the royal palace of Hatfield. On the death of her sister, in 1553, she was proclaimed queen, and Philip of Spain, the husband of Mary, made her an offer of marriage, which, after a considerable amount of coquetting, she civilly declined. Now was commenced the restoration of those religious reforms which had been proscribed in the previous reign, but with that prudence and moderation, which showed how well qualified she was to guide the destinies of the people over whom she had been called to reign in such troublous times. One of her first measures was to send succours to the reforming party in Scotland, which produced the treaty of Edinburgh and the departure of the French from that country. She next gave her assistance to the French Huguenots, who put Havre de Grâce into her hands, whilst she continued gradually to tighten the reins of government upon her own Catholic subjects, and such other religionists as would disturb the peace of the state by their zeal and violence. Dudley, earl of Leicester, became her favourite, and had the ambition to aspire to her hand; she, however, preferred to make an apparent effort to unite him to Mary queen of Scots. In 1563 that unfortunate princess fled to England for protection from the religious persecution of her subjects; but being a Catholic, and having offended Elizabeth, she was taken prisoner, and after being kept many years in confinement, was at last beheaded in Fotheringhay Castle. Her treatment of the queen of Scots, against whom she would appear to have contracted a feeling of jealousy, is one of the blackest spots in the reign of Elizabeth. She afterwards endeavoured to clear herself of the odium which the death of Mary raised against her, and caused Davison, her secretary, to be prosecuted for issuing the warrant for the execution; but such conduct only made her guilt more transparent in the eyes of the penetrating and thoughtful. The French and Spaniards having formed a league for the extirpation of heresy, Elizabeth was induced to protect the Protestants; and her assistance was of great effect in bringing about the separation of the United Provinces from the dominion of Philip II. The king of Spain, in return, sent a body of troops to invade Ireland; but they were all cut off by Lord Grey, the deputy. In the mean time, various offers of marriage were made to the queen, the most remarkable of which was that of the duke of Anjou, who came to England for the purpose of espousing her; but after staying some time, and after Elizabeth had taken up the pen to sign the marriage articles, she withdrew her hand, and broke off the alliance. In 1588, Philip of Spain sent against England his famous armada, to which the pope gave the appellation of Invincible. It consisted of 130 vessels, carrying 2,431 pieces of artillery, 4,575 quintals of powder, and was manned by about 27,000 soldiers and seamen. To oppose this formidable force, Elizabeth had 131 ships, manned by about 13,000 sailors. On this occasion the queen distinguished herself by her great presence of mind and inflexible courage. he rode on horseback through the camp at Tilbury, and inspired her people with heroism by her deportment and her speeches. The English fleet, however, assisted by the winds, repented the Spaniards from landing, and the boasted armada was destroyed. The duke of Medina-Sidonia, who commanded the Spanish fleet, escaped, and arrived at Santander, in the Bay of Biscay, with no more than 60 sail out of his whole fleet, and these very much shattered. In speaking of this victory, Camden says, "Several monies were coined; some to commemorate the victory, with a fleet flying with full sails, and this inscription, Venit, vidit, fugit,"—'It came, it saw, it fled;' others in honour of the queen, with fireships and a fleet all in confusion, inscribed Dux fœmina facti,"—'A woman the leader of the exploit.'" In this same year, Leicester, her favourite, died, when Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, took his place; but this nobleman, on account of treason, was executed in 1601. After this event Elizabeth seems to have become weary of the world, for she never recovered the shock which the execution of the Earl of Essex gave her. b. at Greenwich, September 7, 1533; d. March 24, 1603. Elizabeth was endeared to her subjects by the glory of her reign, by the wisdom of her measures, and by the frugality of her administration, which rendered the public taxes few and light. She had, however, much vanity, thought herself the most beautiful and accomplished of women, and was, besides, violent and haughty in her temper. She understood the learned languages, and some of her letters and prayers, written with her own hand, are extant.

ELIZABETH, queen of Bohemia, eldest daughter of James I. of England and Anne of Denmark, was married in 1613 to Frederick, then Elector Palatine. The Bohemian states, in 1619, offered Frederick their crown, which, unfortunately for himself and his family, he accepted; but after the battle of Prague, in November, 1620, he lost not only Bohemia but his own dominions, and was obliged to fly from one place to another for several years, until he at last found refuge with the Prince of Orange at the Hague. All his wanderings and sufferings were shared by Elizabeth, who, after her husband's death in 1632, at the restoration of their son Charles Louis to a portion of his patrimony, resided for some time in the Palatinate, but came to England with her nephew, Charles II., in 1660, where she died in 1683, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. b. 1596. She was the mother of the famous Prince Rupert, and of Sophia, wife of Ernest Augustus, Elector of Hanover, and mother of George I.

ELIZABETH of Austria, daughter of the emperor Maximilian II., was married to Charles IX. of France, in 1570. She sent to Margaret, queen of Navarre, two books of her writing; one on the Word of God, and the other a relation of the chief events in France during the time she resided there. b. 1554; d. in a convent, 1592.

which was effected without the shedding of blood. At her accession, she made a vow that no capital punishments should take place in her reign. But her humanity was at least equivocal, as she afterwards inflicted upon the countesses Beaufort and Louisa the punishment of the knout, and had their tongues cut out, for betraying some of her secret amours. Though dissolute in her manners, she was extremely superstitious, and perfumations with rigorous exactness. In 1756 she joined Austria and France against Prussia, and died in 1761. b. 1703.

ELLENBOROUGH, Edward Law, first earl of, ell-en-bru(r), was the son of the first Lord Ellenborough, and in 1819 succeeded to the peerage as second baron. In 1828 he was made president of the Board of Control, which office he filled under the administrations of the duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel. In 1842 he superseded the earl of Auckland as governor-general of India, and under his government Scinde was annexed to the British crown. In 1843 he was recalled, contrary to the wishes of the government of Sir Robert Peel, who, in 1845, appointed him first lord of the Admiralty. In the following year, with the fall of the ministry, he resigned his post, and after that time discussed in the House of Peers the affairs of India with considerable ability. In 1855 he was appointed, under the Derby administration, president of the Board of Control, where he resigned the same year, in consequence of the censure inflicted on a severe letter written by him to Lord Canning, in reference to a proclamation issued by that nobleman while governor-general of India. b. 1790.

ELLESMERE, Francis Leveon Gower, Earl of, els-mer, brother of the late duke of Sutherland, distinguished himself by several translations from the German, and, from 1826 to 1834, represented Sutherlandshire in the House of Commons. In 1827 he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury; in the following year he became secretary for Ireland, and in 1830, secretary at war. On the death of his father, in 1833, he took the name of Egerton, and as Lord Francis Egerton, represented South Lancashire from 1835 to 1846. In this last year he was created earl of Ellesmere and Viscount Brackley, and in 1849 was elected president of the Asiatic Society. In 1855 he was created a knight of the Garter, and became colonel-commandant of the Lancashire yeomanry cavalry. Besides translations, he wrote works, in the form of tragedy, history, and biography, of considerable merit. The gallery of paintings collected by him is, perhaps, the finest possessed by a private individual in the kingdom. b. in London, 1800; d. 1857.

ELLIOTSON, Dr. John, el-yot-son, a distinguished English physician, who, from the opposition which his views met with in reference to the mesmeric treatment of patients, resigned some important appointments, and, in 1849, became physician to a mesmeric hospital in London. He was an unflinching advocate of what he deemed the truths of mesmerism; made considerable contributions to medical science, and was a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, of the Royal Society, and the founder and president of the London Phrenological Society. b. 1735; d. 1868.

came famous as a writer of "Rhymes" against the Corn Laws. These first appeared in a local paper, after their author had settled at Sheffield, and produced a powerful effect upon all who read them. When they re-appeared in a single volume, in conjunction with "The Ranter," he no longer sung in comparative obscurity, but commanded a wide circle of admirers. In 1831 a collected edition of his works was published. His effusions have procured for him the right of being emphatically the bard of Yorkshire, as he is certainly, like Crabbe, the poet of the poor and of the Corn-law struggle, before that ended in the triumphal achievement of the aspirations of his muse. b. near Rotherham, Yorkshire, 1781; d. near Barnsley, 1849.

ELLIS, John, el'-lis, an English poet, brought up as a scrivener, and for many years deputy of his ward, and master of the Scriveners' Commission. See also JOHNSON. See also JOHNSON. See also JOHNSON. "The Surprise, or Gentleman turned Apothecary," a tale in Hudibrastic verse; and "A Travesty of the Canto added by Maphias to the Æneid." b. in London, 1693; d. 1791. In reference to this person, Dr. Johnson remarks to Boswell, "It is wonderful what is to be found in London. The most literary conversation that I ever enjoyed, was at the table of Jack Ellis, a money-scrivener, behind the Royal Exchange, with whom, at one period, I used to dine, generally once a week."

ELLIS, George, one of the authors of the "Holliad," to which he contributed "The Birthday Ode," "The Ode on Dundas," &c., and was also a writer of the "Probationary Odes," and an acute contributor to the "Anti-Jacobin." His greatest work, however, is his "Specimens of the Early English Poets," which suggested Southey's "Specimens of the Later English Poets." He also produced "Specimens of the Early English Romances in Metre," which is another excellent work. b. 1745; d. 1815. Sir Walter Scott addressed to Ellis the 5th canto of "Marmion," and says, "He was the first converser I ever saw. His patience and good-breeding made me often ashamed of myself, going off at score upon some favourite topic."

ELLIS, Sir Henry, an English writer, who became connected, as a librarian, with the British Museum in 1805, and, in 1827, was made principal, which office he held till 1856, when he resigned it. During that time he produced many antiquarian works; amongst which was an edition of "Brande's Popular Antiquities," which is highly esteemed. He also published original letters illustrative of English history, from autographs in the British Museum; and, in 1816, wrote the general introduction to the "Doomsday Book," which is considered an able performance. In 1832 he was created a knight of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic order, and, in 1838, was raised to the rank of knight bachelor. b. in London, 1777; d. 1869.

ELLIS, Mrs. Sarah Stickney, the wife of the Reverend William Ellis, officially connected with the London Missionary Society, was one of the most fruitful writers of her time. As a poetess she received well deserved praise, whilst, as a prose writer, she held a highly respectable rank, especially among those whose productions have a special reference to the social condition of women. A bare enumeration of her works would occupy a considerable space; but those which are, perhaps, best known to the public, may be specified as suggestive of the moral tone of her works. "The Wives of England," "The Daughters of England," "The Mothers of England," "Look to the End," &c. All these have, more or less, a character of practical good, conveying, in a meek and modest spirit, the best advice, and having in view the special improvement and edification of her own sex. n. about 1812.

ELLISTON, Robert William, el'-lis-ton, a celebrated English actor, who was esteemed the best comedian of his time. "The Venetian Outlaw" was the only literary work he produced. b. in London, 1774; d. 1831.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, el'-wood, was bred in the Church of England, but was converted to Quakerism, through which he lost the favour of his father. He became reader to Milton, suffered imprisonment for his profession, and wrote a number of books in its defence. He also edited George Fox's "Journal," and published a "History of the Old and New Testament," a sacred poem on the life of David, &c. b. 1639; d. 1713. A casual remark of Ellwood's to Milton, suggested to the latter the idea of writing the "Paradise Regained."

ELMES, James, elms, was brought up for an architect, but became rather an expounder than a professor of the science in the pursuit of which he began life. He wrote largely on architecture, the fine arts, and edited "Elmes's Quarterly Review," to which Haydon contributed. He also produced a "General and Bibliographical Dictionary," and contributed to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." b. in London, 1782.

ELMORE, Alfred, A.R.A., el'-mor, an Irish artist, whose pictures of the "Crucifixion" and the "Martyrdom of Thomas à Becket" brought him prominently into notice in 1840; after which time he became a pretty regular contributor to the walls of the Royal Academy. His works are numerous; among which we may specify "The Inventor of the Stocking-loom," as, perhaps, one of the best known. b. at Clonakilty, Cork, 1815.

ELMSLEY, Peter, elms'-le, an eminent littérateur, and early contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," and also to the "Quarterly Review," on literary subjects. He became Camden professor of modern history at the university of Oxford, and was, besides, principal of St. Alban's Hall. As a Greek scholar, he was highly distinguished. b. in London, 1773; d. 1825.

ELPHINSTONE, William el'-fin-stone, a bishop of Aberdeen, who founded King's College, in the University of Aberdeen. He was also the principal means of establishing the Grayfriars' convent and the chapel royal at Stirling. b. at Glasgow, in 1431 or 1437; d. at Edinburgh, 1514.

ELPHINSTONE, Arthur, Lord Balmerino, during the reign of Queen Anne had a company in Lord Shannon's regiment; but joining in Mar's rebellion in 1715, fought at Sheriffmuir, and, in consequence of the defeat of the partisans of the Pretender, was compelled to fly to France, in the army of which country he served for some time, but returned to England in 1733. He again embarked in the attempt to restore the Stuarts made in 1745, under the auspices of Prince Charles Edward, who made him captain of the second troop of his life guards. Balmerino was taken prisoner at the battle of Culloden, was committed to the Tower, brought to trial in Westminster Hall, July 29th, 1746, along with Lords Kilmarnock and Cromarty, condemned, and executed on Tower-hill, on the 18th of the following month. B. 1683.

ELPHINSTONE, George Keith, Viscount. (See KEITH, Viscount.)

ELPHINSTONE, James, a native of Edinburgh, who spent his life in attempting to effect what he called a reformation in the orthography of the English language, on the principle of spelling all words according to their pronunciation—an attempt in which he of course failed, but the idea has again been revived by the Pitmans of Bath, under the name of phonography. This effort is not likely to be more successful than that of Elphinstone, who wrote several works on the subject, and wasted his time, energies, and substance in vain. B. 1721; D. 1809.

ELPHINSTONE, the Honourable Mountstuart, joined the Bengal civil service at the age of 13, and was an attaché to the political resident at the court of the Peishwah, adoptive father of Nana Sahib, the Cawnpore slaughterer, when the duke of Wellington visited it at the commencement of the nineteenth century. He then became attached to the duke's suite, and acted as his aide-de-camp at the battle of Assaye. He was afterwards resident at Nagpore, envoy to Cabul, and, in 1816, when the marquis of Hastings took the command of the armies of the three presidencies against the confederated Mahratta powers, of which the Peishwah was the chief, Mr. Elphinstone was the British representative at his court, and penetrated the inmost soul of the wily, treacherous chief, although the latter had succeeded in making Sir John Malcolm believe that he was a faithful ally of the English. In the course of a few weeks, Elphinstone's opinion of the Peishwah was verified to himself by his being burnt out of his own ambassadorial dwelling by the emissaries of this friend; and he reached the British camp with nothing except the horse he rode and the clothes he wore. In 1820 he became governor of Bombay, to which presidency the Peishwah's country was attached, and during the seven years he ruled Western India, the "Elphinstone Code" became law, and for its brevity, its completeness, its clearness, its enlightened provisions, might be compared to the "Code Napoléon," in imitation of which its leaves were coloured. The education of the upper classes was commenced, and, on the principles he advocated, extended itself far and wide among the natives. At the close of his administration, in 1827, he left India, when, in addition to the presentation of addresses from all classes, a college, called after him, was established by the natives; a statue of him by Chantrey was erected, and other substantial tokens of respect and affection were offered. After his arrival in England, he produced his "History of India." It is said he was subsequently offered the peerage twice, with the high offices of governor-general of India and of Canada. On her majesty's accession, a deputation of the directors of the late East India Company waited upon him to ask him to accept the order of the Bath, and a seat in the privy council. Other honours, which most men esteem and covet were also offered, and in turn declined. D. 1863.

Emerson

ELMYER, Henri, el'-sin-jé, clerk of the House of Commons, was remarkable for his skill and tact in conducting the business of the House, and it was said in consequence that more respect was paid to his stool than to the speaker's chair. He resumed his place, which had been procured for him by archbishop Laud, in 1643, rather than, as he privately stated, have any hand in the king's death. He wrote a very useful work, entitled "The Ancient Method and Manner of Holding Parliaments in England," which was published in 1693, and several times reprinted. He also left in MS. "A Treatise Concerning the Proceedings in Parliament," which has not yet been printed. It is in Lincoln's Inn library. B. at Battersea, 1593; D. 1654.

ELWES, John, el'-wes, an extraordinary miser, whose family name was Mezgot, which he altered, in pursuance of the will of Sir Harvey Elwes, his uncle, who left him at least £250,000. At this time, he was possessed of nearly as much of his own, and was in the habit of attending the most noted gaming-houses. After sitting up a whole night at play, he would proceed to Smithfield to meet his cattle, which were coming to market, from his seat in Essex, and there stand disputing with a butcher for a shilling. If the cattle did not arrive, he would walk on to meet them. More than once, he walked, without stopping, the whole way to his farm, which was 17 miles from London. He would walk in the rain in London sooner than pay a shilling for a coach; sit in wet clothes to save the expense of a fire; eat his provisions in the last stage of putrefaction, and he once wore a wig a fortnight which he had picked up in a lane. In 1774 he was chosen knight of the shire for Berkshire, his conduct in Parliament being perfectly independent. B. about 1712; D. 1780, leaving a fortune of half a million sterling, besides entailed estates.

ELZEYR, el'-ze-ir, a family of famous printers at Amsterdam and Leyden. There were five of this name,—John, Bonaventura, Abraham, Louis, and Daniel. Louis began to be known at Leyden in 1595, and was the first who made the distinction between the v consonant and the u vowel. Daniel died in 1680. He published, at Amsterdam, in 12mo, 1674, a catalogue of books printed by his family. A particular style of type is called by their name at the present day.

EMANUEL, e-mán'-u-el, king of Portugal, succeeded John II. in 1485. He restored the nobility to their privileges, and greatly encouraged maritime expeditions, by one of which a new passage to India was discovered by Vasco da Gama, and to Brazil, in 1501, by Cabral. Emanuel also sent an expedition to Africa, and established a commercial intercourse with the kingdom of Congo. D. 1521.

EMERSON, William, em'-er-son, an English mathematician, who began life as a schoolmaster, but quitted that employment, and contented himself with a small paternal estate. He was a profound mathematician, but of singular habits, vulgar in his manners, fond of low company, and extremely shabby in his dress. He always walked to London when he had anything to publish, and carefully revised every sheet himself. B. at Hurworth, near Darlington, 1701; D. there, 1782. He wrote treatises on Fluxions, Mechanics, Algebra, Optics, Astronomy, Navigation, Arithmetic; a "Commentary on the Principia of Newton," and several other works.

THE DICTIONARY

Emerson

EMERSON, Ralph Waldo, an American essayist, the son of a Unitarian minister of Boston, U.S., was designed for the same profession. The peculiarity of his views, however, led him into other studies, which broke his connexion with the religious body to which he belonged. After publishing several essays or orations, he, in 1840, started a publication called the "Dial," devoted to the discussion of prominent questions in philosophy, history, and literature. It lived for four years, during which period Mr. Emerson kept himself before the public by delivering orations upon popular subjects. In 1841 he published "Lectures on New England Reformers," and subsequently lectured on Swedenborg, Napoleon, and other eminent men. In 1846 appeared a volume of poems, and in 1849 he visited England, where he delivered a series of lectures, and afterwards published them, under the title of "Representative Men." Soon after, he published "English Traits," embodying some of his observations on English manners, customs, and characteristics. Besides these more special labours, he contributed to various reviews and other periodicals. b. at Boston, U.S., 1803.

EMERY, John, em'-er-ee, a comic actor of considerable merit, especially in the delineation of rustic characters, in which line he was very successful on the London stage. He was a native of Sunderland, where he was born in 1777; d. 1822.

EMERY, Thomas, em'-lin, an English Arian divine of high reputation, and remarkable on account of the persecution he suffered for his opinions. He published a book entitled "A Humble Enquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ," in consequence of which he was accused of blasphemy, tried, condemned, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment; and £1000 fine. The fine was subsequently reduced to £70, and after suffering the year's imprisonment, Emlyn was set at liberty. He was of an amiable disposition, and enjoyed the friendship of Dr. Samuel Clarke, Whiston, and other distinguished men. b. 1603; d. 1743.

EMMA, em'-ma, daughter of Richard II., duke of Normandy, and mother of Edward the Confessor, king of England. She was first married to Ethelred, who was obliged to flee to Normandy with his sons Alfred and Edward, when the Danes invaded the kingdom. After his death she married Canute. In the reign of her son, the earl of Kent accused her of a too intimate familiarity with her relation, the bishop of Winchester. To prove her innocence, she is said to have walked barefoot over burning ploughshares without being hurt. Lived in the 11th century.

EMMET, Thomas Addis, em'-met, the son of a physician in Dublin, was called to the bar, but did not practise his profession, becoming, instead, one of the active and prominent leaders of the "United Irishmen." He was apprehended by order of the Privy Council, made a full confession of his participation in the rebellion of 1793, was kept for some time in confinement, and then set at liberty. He ultimately settled in America, and rose to great eminence at the New York bar. b. 1764; d. 1827.

EMMET, Robert, younger brother of the above, was also educated for the legal profession, but became involved in the plots of the "United Irishmen," having acted as secretary to the secret direction of that body. On the failure of the rebellion he fled the country, but subsequently returned, and, in 1803, attempting a new rising, with very slender means, was apprehended, tried, condemned, and executed as a traitor. Emmet was full of zeal, enthusiasm, and energy; he also possessed a wonderful power of eloquence, and these qualities, together with his ardent attachment to the daughter of Curran, have thrown an interest of a peculiar kind around his brief and unhappy career. His memory is still held in much reverence by his countrymen, who consider him to have been a true and devoted patriot. It was his attachment to Miss Curran that led to his tragic end; he might have escaped from the country, but lingered about the residence of the young lady. The correspondence between them became known to her father, who gave information to the attorney-general, and the apprehension of Emmet, with its fatal catastrophe, was the result. Moore has celebrated this sad story in his song beginning, "She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps." b. 1780; executed, 1803.

EMPEDOCLES, em-ped'-o-kleez, a philosopher, poet, and historian of Agrigentum, in Sicily, adopted the doctrine of the metempsychosis, and wrote a poem on the system of Pythagoras, very much commended. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verses were so universally esteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with those of Homer and Hesiod. It is said that his curiosity to view the flames of the crater of Etna proved fatal to him. Some maintain that he wished it to be believed that he was a god, and, that his death might be unknown, he threw himself into the crater, and perished in the flames. His expectations, however, were frustrated by the volcano throwing up one of his sandals, which discovered to the world that Empedocles had perished by fire. Others report that he lived to an extreme old age, and that he was drowned in the sea. Lived between 450 and 350 b.c.

EMERSON, Sir Richard, emp'-son, the son of a sieve-maker at Towcester, Northamptonshire, became a favourite with Henry VII., and, on account of his oppressions, rendered himself odious to the nation. He was beheaded with his coadjutor, Dudley, in 1510.

ENCKE, Johann Franz, enk, a German astronomer, director of the royal observatory at Berlin. He enlarged the boundaries of astronomical science, and resolved the orbit of the comet called after his name, which was first seen by Pons on the 26th of November 1818. b. at Hamburg, 1791; d. 1865.

ENGELBRECHT, John, en'-gel-breesht, a Lutheran fanatic, who gained the attention of ignorant and vulgar people by pretended intercourse with spirits. He asserted that he had received letters from heaven, and called himself "the mouth of the Lord." He ultimately died neglected and despised, in 1641. b. at Brunswick, 1599.

ENGELBRECHTSEN, Cornelius, en'-gel-breeshtsen, a German artist, who was the first of his countrymen who painted in oil, and has been regarded as one of the most eminent limners of his age. b. at Leyden, 1468; d. 1633.

ENFIELD, William, en'-field, a dissenting minister, who was educated under Dr. Ashworth, at Daventry, and, in 1763, became minister of a congregation at Liverpool. About 1770 he removed to Warrington, as tutor in the belles-lettres in the academy there. During his stay at Warrington, he published several works; as the "History of Liverpool," "Institutes of Natural Philosophy," &c. In 1735 he undertook the pastoral care of a congregation at Norwich, and continued there till his death in 1797. b. at Sudbury, 1741. He is best known as the author of "The Speaker," a school book in general use. He published also a volume of Prayers and Hymns; "Biographical Sermons;" a "History of Philosophy," in 2 vols. 4to; and two volumes of Sermons.

ENGHIEN, Louis Antoine Henri de Bourbon, Duc d', dong'-e-ä, son of the duke of Bourbon, and a descendant of the "Great Condé." He entered the army at an early age, and under his grandfather, served in the ranks of the French emigrants against the troops of the French republic. When the corps was disbanded in 1801, the young prince took up his residence at the château of Ettenheim, near the banks of the Rhine, in Baden. To this spot the agents of Napoleon I. came by night, and having seized him in his bed, hurried him to France, where he was tried by a mock tribunal for taking up arms against his country in the time of Robespierre, and condemned. In the night of the 22nd March, 1804, he was shot in the wood of Vincennes; an event which roused the indignation of Europe, and excited an interest and sentiment of sorrow wherever it was known. b. at Chantilly, 1772.

ENGLAND, Sir Richard, G.C.B., ing'-land, a distinguished military officer, began his career in the great war with France, and saw considerable service at Flushing, in Sicily, and in France. In 1832-33 he commanded the troops in Caffaria, and distinguished himself in the war there in 1835-36. He then went to India, and commanded the column which relieved Candahar in the Afghan war, for his services in which he was made a K.C.B. He commanded a division in the Crimea in 1854-5, and was present in the battles of the Alma and Inkermann, as well as the unsuccessful attack on the Russian stronghold, in June 1855. Sir Richard returned to England at the close of the latter year, and was nominated G.C.B. He became a general in the army, and colonel of the 41st foot. b. in Canada, 1793.

ENNIUS, Q., en'-no-us, a Roman poet, who wrote in heroic verse the annals of the Roman republic, and displayed much knowledge of the world in some dramatical and satirical compositions. b. of the gout, contracted by his frequent intoxication, 189 B.C.; b. at Rudiae, now Ruvo, in Calabria, 239 B.C. Scipio, on his deathbed, ordered his body to be buried by the side of this poetical friend. Conscious of his merit as the first epic poet of Rome, Ennius bestowed on himself the appellation of the Homer of Latium. Of all his writings, nothing now remains but fragments collected from the quotations of ancient authors.

ENYCKE, John, en'-tick, an English divine, who published a history of the war which ended in 1763, 5 vols. 8vo; a "History of London," 4 vols. 8vo; a "Latin and English Dictionary;" "An English Spelling Dictionary," and other works. b. 1713; d. 1773.

ENTECASTEATX, en'-tin'-o-pus, an architect, who on the invasion of Italy by the Visigoths in 405, took refuge in the marshes in the Gulf of Venice, and there built himself a house. In 413, on the second invasion under Alaric, a number of others flew to the Venetian marshes, and built houses beside that of Entinopus, and this was the origin of the great city of Venice, of which he may thus be said to have been the founder. His own house Entinopus converted into a church, which stood on the site of that of San Giacomo, in the Rialto. b. about 120 A.D.

ENTRECASTEAUX, Joseph Antoine Bruni d', entr'-kas'-to, a famous French admiral, who became, in 1785, commander of the naval forces of his country in the East Indies. In 1791 he was appointed to the command of two frigates destined to search for La Pérouse, and also to explore those coasts which that unfortunate navigator had not reached. In spite of all his endeavours, Entrecasteaux was unable to fulfil but the second part of his instructions. He explored the eastern coast of New Caledonia, the isle of Bougainville, and nearly 1000 miles of the S.W. coast of Australia, besides visiting many points of the Tasmanian seaboard. b. at Aix, 1740; d. at sea, near Java, 1793.—Captain Rossel, who succeeded him, wrote an interesting account of the expedition.

ÉÖTVÖS, Joseph, e'-ot'-vos, an eminent Hungarian politician and litterateur, who wrote some dramas, and, in 1826, set out upon his travels, and visited England, of whose institutions he formed a high opinion. Some of his works have been translated into English, and are held in high estimation for the talent they display. b. at Buda, 1813.

EPAMINONDAS, e'-päm-i-non'-das, a famous Theban, descended from the ancient kings of Boeotia, and celebrated for his private virtues and military accomplishments. His love of truth was so great that he never disgraced himself by a lie. He formed a sacred and inviolable friendship with Pelopidas, whose life he saved in a battle. By his advice, Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the signal for war. Epaminondas was put at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, 371 B.C. Pursuing his victorious career, he entered the territories of Lacedæmon with 50,000 men, and gained many partisans; but, on his return to Thebes, he was seized as a traitor for violating the laws of his country. In the midst of his successes he had neglected the decree which forbade any citizen to retain the supreme power more than one month, and all his eminent services seemed insufficient to redeem him from death. He bowed to his fate, and only begged of his judges that it might be inscribed on his tomb that he suffered death for saving his country from ruin. This reproach produced such an effect that he was pardoned, and again invested with the sovereign power. He was successful in a war in Thessaly, and assisted the Eleans against the Lacedæmonians. The hostile armies met near Mantinea, and while Epaminondas was bravely fighting, he received a fatal wound in the breast. Being informed that the Boeotians had gained the victory, he expired, exclaiming that he died unquelled. Fell in the 48th year of his age, 362 years B.C. b. 411 B.C. The Thebans deeply lamented his death; in him their power was extinguished; for only during his life had they enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian states. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous, and indignantly refused the rich presents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes, king of Persia. He is represented by his biographer as an elegant dancer and a skilful musician, accomplishments highly esteemed among his countrymen.

EPHREM, Syrus, ef-rem, an eminent Christian author, and deacon of Edessa, who wrote against the opinions of Sabellius, Arius, the Manicheans, &c., and acquired such reputation that he was styled the doctor, and the prophet of the Syrians. His works have been published in various editions, the best being those of Oxford, 1708, folio, and Rome, 1732-1739, folio, in Syriac, Greek, and Latin. He was a native of Nisibis, in Syria, and died about 378.

EPICHRAMUS, ep-i-kar-mus, a poet and philosopher of the Pythagorean school, and mentioned as being the first writer of comedy. Aristotle attributes to him the invention of the letters θ and χ . β . in Cos, and flourished in the 5th century B.C.

EPICURETUS, ep-ik-te-tus, a Phrygian Stoic philosopher, originally the slave of Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. Though driven from Rome by Domitian, he returned after that emperor's death, and gained the esteem of Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. He supported the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and declared himself strongly against suicide. β . at Hierapolis, and flourished in the 1st century. His "Enchiridion" is a faithful picture of the Stoic philosophy. His style is concise, devoid of all ornament, and full of energy and useful maxims. The emperor Antoninus thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honour to himself and advantage to his country. His favourite maxim was "Bear and forbear." Into this he resolved every principle of practical morality.

EPICURUS, ep-i-ku-rus, the founder of a celebrated sect of philosophers, studied at Samos and Athens, whence he removed, in consequence of the war with Perdiccas, and opened a school, first at Mitylene, and next at Lampsacus. He finally settled at Athens, where he obtained a number of disciples, owing to the pleasantness of his system and his deportment. They lived together, and had all things in common. It is said that he wrote no fewer than 300 volumes. β . about 342 B.C.; γ . near Athens, 270 B.C. The system of Epicurus, some think, tends to atheism, by ascribing too little to the Deity, and too much to nature. His doctrine of pleasure being the supreme good, has been much misrepresented and abused; for his own life was irreproachable, and he inculcated virtue as the essence of pleasure. It must be admitted, however, that his system was afterwards grossly perverted from the author's original meaning.

EPIMENIDES, ep-i-men-i-dee, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. He is reckoned one of the seven wise men, by those who exclude Periander from the number. While he was tending his flocks one day, he entered into a cave, where he fell asleep. His sleep, according to tradition, continued for fifty-seven years, and when he awoke, he found every object so considerably altered, that he scarcely knew where he was. After death he was revered as a god by the Athenians. Lived between 650 and 550 B.C.

EPINAY, Louise, Madame d', dai-pe-nai, was the daughter of a gentleman of Flanders, who having been killed in the service of the king of France, a suitable match was found for his daughter, and she was accordingly married to

M. d'Epinay, the son of a rich financier. Her husband, however, treated her cruelly, and she separated from him at an early age, became intimate with all the literary persons of note in Paris, especially Rousseau, for whom she formed a warm attachment, and loaded him with gifts, which he repaid by becoming violently attached to her sister-in-law, and violently hostile to herself. She afterwards became the associate of the famous Grimm, with whom she deposited some memoirs of her life, with fictitious names, and which, after Grimm's death, were published with the real names inserted in place of the fictitious ones, under the title of "Memoirs and Correspondence of Madame d'Epinay." During her own lifetime she had published "Les Conversations d'Emilie," which went through several editions, was awarded a prize by the French Academy, in 1783, and has been translated into several languages. Among her other benefactions to Rousseau was the cottage in the valley of Montmorency, called the Hermitage, where he occasionally resided, and which was long visited by his admirers with great reverence. β . about 1725; γ . 1783.

EPIPHANIUS, ep-i-fai-ne-us, a bishop of Salamis, active in refuting the writings of Origen; but his compositions are more valuable for the fragments of others which they preserve, than for their own intrinsic merit. γ . 403.

EPIPHANIUS, St., a Christian bishop, who wrote in Greek several religious works, the principal of which is the "Panarion," or a treatise on heresies. β . near Eleutheropolis, in Palestine; γ . at sea, on a voyage to Cyprus, EPISCOPIUS, Simon, e-pis-ko-pe-us, a learned divine, who, in 1612, was chosen divinity professor at Leyden, but met with considerable trouble on account of his being an Arminian. He was the principal of the Arminian remonstrants at the synod of Dort, which assembly deposed him and the other deputies from their ministerial functions, and banished them the republic. He then went to Antwerp, but in 1626 returned to Holland, and became minister to the remonstrants at Rotterdam. In 1634 he removed to Amsterdam, and was chosen rector of the remonstrants' college. β . at Amsterdam, 1593; γ . there, 1643. His works make 2 vols. folio.

EPHÉMESNIL, Jas. Duval d', e'-prai-mes-neel, a French advocate, who became counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and distinguished himself by his violence during the French revolution. γ . on the scaffold with his old antagonist, Chapelier, in 1794. β . at Pondicherry, 1746. On his way to the place of execution, he said to his companion, "We have at this moment a terrible problem to solve; namely, to which of us two the shoutings of the mob are addressed." He was the author of "Remonstrances," published by the parliament, 1788; "Nullity and Despotism of the Assembly," 8vo; "Actual State of France," 1790, 8vo.

ERARD, Sébastien, ai-rard, a celebrated French pianoforte-maker, the son of an upholsterer. He early went from the provinces to Paris, and there established a pianoforte manufactory, improving considerably all that related to that instrument, as likewise to the harp and organ. He also founded an establishment in London. β . at Strasburg, 1752; γ . 1831.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Erasmus

Gerard, a native of Tergou, by the daughter of a physician. Erasmus was called Gerard, which he afterwards altered to the Latin name Desiderius, and the Greek, Erasmus, all signifying amiable. At an early age he lost both his parents, when his patrimony was left to the care of guardians, who, in order that they themselves might enjoy it, removed him from one convent to another, till at last, in 1486, he took the habit among the canons regular, at Stein, near Tergou. The monastic life being disagreeable to him, he accepted an invitation from the archbishop of Cambrai to reside with him as his private secretary. During his abode with this prelate, he was ordained a priest; but in 1496 went to Paris, and supported himself by giving private lectures. In 1497 he visited England, and met with a cordial reception from the most eminent scholars, and applied himself to the study of the Greek language, of which he was before ignorant. His first literary works were philological; as his "Adagia," "De Copiâ Verborum," and "De Ratione Conseribendi Epistolas." His "Adagia" is a collection of proverbs, commented upon with great learning. In 1503 we find him at Louvain, where he studied divinity under Adrian Florent, afterwards Adrian VI. The next year he published his "Enchiridion Militis Christiani," a book of practical religion. In 1506 he took his doctor's degree at Turin, and went to Bologna, where he continued some time; thence he removed to Venice, and resided with the famous Aldus Manutius. From Venice he proceeded to Padua and Rome, where many offers were made him to settle; but having received an invitation from Henry VIII., he set out for England, and arrived there in 1510. He at first lodged with Sir Thomas More, and while there, wrote his "Praise of Folly," designed to show that fools are everywhere to be found, even in "high places," and at the court of Rome. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, now invited him to Cambridge, where he was made Margaret professor of divinity, and Greek professor. In this seat of learning a lodging was assigned him in Queen's College, in the grounds of which his walk is still shown. In 1514 we find him at Bale, preparing for the press his "New Testament," and "Epistles of Jerome," which were published in 1516. This was the first time the New Testament was printed in Greek; and is Erasmus's greatest work. The Reformation now began under Luther; and though Erasmus approved of his principles and object, he was afraid to irritate the court of Rome. A friendly correspondence passed between these two great men; but afterwards a controversy ensued on free-will, and Luther treated Erasmus as a hypocrite. It is certain that Erasmus approved the Reformation in his heart, but had not courage to express himself openly; and the consequence was, that he was disliked by both parties. Indeed, he says of himself, "Even if Luther had spoken everything in the most unobjectionable manner, I had no inclination to die for the sake of truth." In 1522 appeared his "Colloquies," which gave great offence to the monks, who used to say that "Erasmus laid the egg which Luther hatched." His next controversy was with Scaliger and others, who, in their zeal for the purity of Latin composition, objected to the use of words not in the works of Cicero; whence they were called Ciceronians. Against these pedants

Erasmus wrote an admirable dialogue, entitled "Ciceronianus," printed in 1523. The same year appeared his learned work, "De rectâ Latini Græcique Sermonis Pronunciatione." His last publication was his "Ecclesiastes, or the inhabitants of Rotterdam still show the house where he was born, and there is a statue erected to his memory in the great square of that city. His works were edited at Leyden in 1703, in 10 volumes folio, by Le Clerc.

ERASISTRATUS, er-a-sis'-tra-tus, an ancient physician of great eminence, who acquired a high reputation at the court of Seleucus Nicator, was the first to dissect human bodies, and has been called the father of anatomical science. He wrote several works, none of which are extant, except in the form of fragments in Galen and Caelius Aurelianus. He lived to a great age, and ultimately put an end to his life by drinking hemlock, in order to escape the pain caused by a cancer in his foot. Lived in the 4th century, B.C.

ERASTUS, Thomas, er-âs'-tus, a physician, and the author of several medical works. He is remembered principally from the religious controversy known by his name. His general principle was, that the censures of the church, and other inflictions, were not the proper means to be adopted for the punishment of crimes. The celebrated Beza was his chief opponent. B. at Baden, Switzerland, 1524; D. at Bale, 1583.

ERATOSTHENES, er-a-tos'-the-nes, a native of Cyrene, intrusted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He has been called a second Plato, the cosmographer, and the geometer of the world. He first observed the obliquity of the ecliptic, and discovered the means of measuring the extent and circumference of the globe. Starved himself, after he had lived to his eighty-second year, 195 B.C. He collected the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies.

ERATOSTRATUS, er-a-tos'-tra-tus, an Ephesian, who burnt the famous temple of Diana, the same night that Alexander the Great was born. His object was to transmit his name to posterity by an action so uncommon.

ERCILLA Y ZUNIGA, air-zeel'-ya e thoo'-ne-ga, a Spaniard, who was brought up at the court of Charles V., and joined the expedition against the Araucanians in Chili, S. America. The scenes in which he was engaged suggested the composition of an epic poem, which he produced, and called "La Araucana." He wrote it on scraps of paper and bits of leather, during those intervals he was enabled to snatch from his military duties. It describes the perils of the contest in which he was engaged with great spirit and vividness. This poem is considered the first epic in the Spanish language. The author's career was on one occasion nearly brought to a premature end while in the new world. A tournament was being held at the imperial city in that country in honour of the accession of Philip II. to the throne, when a dispute occurred between Ercilla and another gentleman. Hot blood arose, swords were drawn, partisans joined both sides, and a general mêlée was the result. Don Garcia, the governor, hastily setting the disturbance down as an act of mutiny, condemned both the originators of the quarrel to death. Ercilla was led to the scaffold, everything was ready for the execution, when, at the last moment, and barely in time to save his life, the innocence of the poet was discovered, and the tragedy averted. He subsequently took part in an expedition against some rebels in Venezuela, and then returned to Spain, where he was neglected by his former patron, Philip, and after living for some years in obscurity in Madrid, he died in that city in 1595. n. In 1533, some biographers say in Madrid, others in the town of Bermea, Biscay. The "Araucana" was published in separate portions between 1577 and 1590; and has been introduced to English readers by Mr. Hayley, who in his "Essay on Epic Poetry," translated select passages, and gave an analysis of the whole piece.

ERIC, er'-ik, is the Swedish synonyme for the English Henry. Of this name there are many kings of Sweden and Denmark. The following are the most deserving of notice:—

ERIC XIII. of Sweden and VII. of Denmark, who succeeded Margaret in 1412. He married the daughter of Henry IV. of England, and made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but was taken prisoner in Syria, and paid a large ransom for his liberty. Soon after his return the Swedes revolted, and were joined by the Danes; on which he withdrew to the isle of Gothland. In 1439 he was formally deposed, and afterwards settled in Pomerania, where he died in 1459. This monarch compiled a "History of Denmark to the Year 1288."

ERIC XIV., son and successor of Gustavus I., king of Sweden, made proposals for the hand of Princess Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England; but being refused, he married the daughter of a peasant. This alienated from him the hearts of his subjects, and, together with his cruelties, occasioned a revolt. He was compelled to renounce his throne in 1563, and died in prison, 1578.

ERICSSON, John, er'-ik-son, a Swedish mechanic, who, early displaying considerable ability, was appointed an engineer cadet, and subsequently entered the army of his country. He was employed in the survey of Northern Sweden, and devoted much of his time to mechanical speculations, more particularly to his "flame-engine." This was intended to work independently of steam, by condensing flame, and so obtaining the necessary power. Visiting England in 1821, he discovered that when worked by mineral fuel, the experiment failed. In 1829 he competed for the prize offered by the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company for the best locomotive, and his engine attained a speed of fifty miles an hour. He subsequently removed to the United States, and many useful inventions, developed there, made his name familiar to the world. His caloric engine, however, was that which attracted most attention, as likely to supersede the use of steam. It seemed, at first, to meet with some success in England, but was ultimately allowed to drop, Brunel and Faraday deciding against its practicability. A vessel called the Ericsson was, however, built in the United States, and fitted with his caloric engine, and, on her trial trip, she made 12 miles an hour. Returning from this, however, a squall overtook her, and she sank. Since that catastrophe, Ericsson's scheme does not appear to have proceeded farther. In 1863, he constructed an iron-clad cupola war-ship, called the Monitor, for the Federal government of America, which was followed by several others on a similar principle. The idea of this vessel, however, Ericsson is alleged to have borrowed from the plans of Captain Cowper Coles, of the British navy. n. in Vermeland, Sweden, 1803.

ERIGENA, John Scotus, er'-ig'-e-na, a learned Scotchman, who is said to have travelled to Athens, where he acquired the Greek and Oriental languages. He resided many years at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France, with whom he lived on terms of the greatest familiarity. At the request of his patron, he translated the works of Dionysius into Latin, which drew upon him the resentment of the pope, to avoid whose fury he fled to England. His greatest work was the "Division of Nature; or, the Nature of Things," printed at Oxford in 1631. Some say that he was employed by Alfred in restoring learning at Oxford, and that he kept a school at Malmesbury, where he was murdered by his pupils on account of his severity. Lived in the 9th century.

ERINNA, er-in'-na, a Grecian poetess, who was contemporary with Sappho, and wrote several pieces, fragments of which are extant, and were published in the Edinburgh edition of Anacreon of 1754. Flourished 600 b.c.

ERLACH, John Louis, er'-lak, a noble Swiss, who distinguished himself in the service of France, and obtained several victories, for which, on the defection of Turenne, he was made commander-in-chief of the army, by Louis XIV. b. at Berne, 1695; d. 1680.

ERLE, Sir William, erl, an eminent lawyer, who represented the city of Oxford from 1837 to 1841, and after a successful career in his profession, became chief justice of the Common Pleas. This office he resigned in 1866. b. 1793.

ERNEST II., Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, er'-nest, the brother of the late Prince Consort, noted as the leader of the reform party in Germany. He is an accomplished musician. b. 1818.

ERNESTI, John Augustus, er'-nes'-te, a German writer, was in 1732 chosen extraordinary professor of ancient literature at Leipzig, and, in 1756, professor of eloquence. Two years afterwards, he took his doctor's degree, and obtained the divinity chair, which he held with great reputation till his death, in 1781. b. at Tennstadt, 1707.

EROS, er'-os, a servant, of whom Mark Antony demanded a sword to kill himself. Eros produced the instrument, but, instead of giving it to his master, killed himself in his presence.

EROSTRATUS. (See ERATOSTRATUS.)

EREPNIUS, or ERPEN, Thomas van, er'-pen, a learned Dutchman, who was educated at Leyden, after which he travelled into several countries to perfect himself in the oriental languages. He returned to Leyden in 1613, and was chosen professor of the oriental tongues. b. 1584; d. 1624. He wrote "Grammatica Arabica," "Rudimenta Linguæ Arabicæ," "Præcepta de Linguâ Græcorum Comuni," "Grammatica Hebræa," "Orationes de Linguarum Hebræa atque Arabicæ Dignitate." He also translated several Arabic works into Latin, with annotations, and the New Testament and Pentateuch into Arabic.

sion connected with them. Along with Mr. Locke, he was engineer to the Glasgow and Greenock railway and dock, the Lancaster and Carlisle, the Caledonian, the East Lancashire, the Scottish Central, Scottish Midland, and Aberdeen railways. About the year 1830 he was, again with Mr. Locke, appointed consulting engineer for the northern division of the London and North-Western railway, and in that capacity constructed many of their branches and extensions. He was also up to the time of his death engineer-in-chief to the London and South-Western railway. He superintended the construction of the lines connecting that system with Exeter and the West of England. He was, like his partner (Mr. Locke), a strong advocate for economy in the first cost of construction, and the lines executed by him all bear testimony to this. Mr. Errington, at the time of his death, was vice-president of the Society of Civil Engineers. b. at Hull, 1806; d. 1832.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, ers'-kin, the founder of the Secession church of Scotland, wrote many sermons and discourses, which, in their day, were highly esteemed. "Were I to read in order to refine my taste," says Hervey, in his "Theon and Aspasia," "I would prefer Bishop Atterbury's sermons, Dates' works, or Seel's discourses; but were I to read with a single view to the edification of my heart in true faith, solid comfort, and evangelical holiness, I would have recourse to Mr. Erskine, and take his volumes for my guide, my companion, and my own familiar friend." b. at Dryburgh, Berwickshire, Scotland, 1680; d. 1751.—In his evangelical labours, Ralph, a brother of Mr. Erskine, greatly assisted him, acting with him, and sustaining him in his great work. He published "Gospel Sonnets," and—

b. 1685; d. 1752.

ERSKINE, Thomas, Baron, was the third son of the tenth earl of Buchan, and, in his 14th year, entered the navy, in which he served four years. In 1763 he quitted the sea, and entered the army, in which he remained for eight years, when he renounced the profession of war for that of the law. In 1775 he became a student of Lincoln's Inn, and, in 1778, was called to the bar, where his advancement was both rapid and brilliant. In 1783 he became member of parliament for Ports-mouth; but his talents did not here appear to the same advantage as they did at the bar. He, however, became attorney-general to the prince of Wales; but, in 1792, was forced to resign the appointment, for determining to defend Thomas Paine when prosecuted for the publication of "The Rights of Man." In 1802 Erskine was made chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall; and, in 1806, when the Grenville ministry was formed, became lord chancellor, being raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Erskine, of Restormel Castle, in Cornwall. In 1807 he retired from public life, and, in 1815, received the order of the Thistle. In the intervals of his leisure, Lord Erskine wrote a political romance, called "Armata," a preface to the speeches of Fox, "A View of the Causes and Consequences of the War with France," which passed through numerous editions. His works have been published in 5 vols. 8vo. b. at Edinburgh, 1750; d. 1823.

ERSKINE, Henry, brother of the preceding, was likewise a lawyer, having become a member of the Scottish Faculty of Advocates in 1768.

He was gifted with great oratorical powers, his speeches before the courts and in the General Assembly of the Church having eclipsed those of all his rivals and contemporaries. Mr. Erskine was also famous as a wit, and for his love of humorous practical jokes; he was exceedingly popular everywhere, and had the happiness to continue to enjoy celebrity and universal favour all his life. When Lord Rockingham's ministry was formed in 1762, Mr. Erskine was appointed Lord Advocate and entered Parliament; on the accession of Pitt to power, however, he retired, and was then elected dean of Faculty. He was again Lord Advocate in 1800, under the Grenville cabinet; and retired from public life in 1812. b. at Edinburgh, 1746; d. 1817. Innumerable anecdotes illustrative of the wit, humour, polish, and popularity of "Harry Erskine" are still current in Edinburgh.

ERSKINE, John, a writer on law, was the grandson of Lord Cardross, and cousin-german of Lord Chancellor Erskine. He passed the life of a studious recluse, and there are few incidents in his career to notice. He was a member of the Faculty of Advocates of Edinburgh, having been called to the bar in 1719, but does not appear to have had much practice. In 1737 he became professor of Scotch Law in the university of Edinburgh, and in 1751 published "Principles of the Law of Scotland," in one volume, a work remarkable for its lucid arrangement and the clearness and terseness of its exposition of the leading principles of the laws. It became a leading authority, and passed through several editions. He resigned his professorial chair in 1760, and employed his time in his retirement in expanding the materials of his "Principles" into a more elaborate work, which he left nearly finished at his death, and which was published in two volumes folio, in 1773, under the title of "An Institute of the Law of Scotland," and has since been many times reprinted, with notes and commentaries, so as to make it harmonise with all recent changes in the law. It has long been, and is still, the great standard of Scottish law, and is as firmly established as "Coke upon Littleton," or "Blackstone" in England. Unlike the great English standards, however, it is of little value for its constitutional law, which is slightly treated; and the great changes which have taken place since Erskine's time, have made that portion of his work relating to matters of trade and commerce meagre and out of date; but as to the rights of person and property it is sound and comprehensive, and of great value both to the practical lawyer and to the theoretical student. b. 1695; d. 1768.

ERWIN DE STEINBACH, air'-ch, a continental architect, who built Strasburg cathedral, with the exception of the tower, which was not completely finished until the 15th century. b. at Steinbach, Baden; d. 1318.

EXLEYEN, John Christian Polycarp, air'-le-ben, a German naturalist, who studied physic at Göttingen, and there gave lectures on the veterinary art and natural history. He also wrote on those subjects. His "Principles of Natural History," 8vo, 1768, is a valuable work. b. at Quedlinburg, 1744; d. 1777.

EXYCEIRA, Ferdinand de Meneses, Count, air'-e-se-er'-a, a Portuguese historian, who devoted himself to military service, and distinguished himself as an able leader at Tancris b. at Lisbon, 1614. He wrote "The Hi Tangier," folio, 1723; "History of Portugal," 2 vols. folio; "The Life of John I., King of Portugal," &c.

ERYCEIRA, Francis Xavier Mexeses, Count, a descendant of the above, was also a soldier and an author. B. at Lisbon, 1673; D. 1743. He wrote on the "Value of the Coins of Portugal," "Reflections on Academical Studies," "Parallels of Illustrious Men and Women," and a translation of the "Henriade."

ESCHENBACH, Wolfram von, aish-en-bak, a German troubadour of the middle ages, deemed one of the best poets of his time, adopted a military life, as was customary at the time, but he won more laurels with the lyre than with the sword. He lived principally at the court of Herman, landgrave of Thuringia, and in 1207 won the prize in one of those poetic contests which were common at that time, and have since been celebrated by a modern poet as the "Wars of Wurtzburg." Eschenbach was acquainted with Latin, French, and Provençal, besides his native tongue. His principal poems are the "Titarel" and the "Parcival," or the "History of the Guardians of the San Greal," of which so much mention is made in the "Morte d'Arthur." The "Titarel" was printed in 1477; and is contained in Müller's collection of the German poets of the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries. The dates of Eschenbach's birth and death are unknown, but he was living in 1227.

ESPAÑAC, John Baptist, Baron d', des-pa-niak, a gallant French general, who served with great glory under Marshal Saxe, and wrote a number of books on military art, with a history of the Marshal, in 8 vols. 4to. B. 1713; D. at Paris, 1783.

ESPARTERO, Joaquin Baldomero, aís-par-tair-o, a modern Spanish general and statesman, though designed, on account of the delicacy of his constitution, for the literary profession, was so captivated by the charms of a military life, that in 1808 he enlisted as a common soldier in an infantry regiment at Seville. He subsequently entered a military school at Cadiz, where he studied the art of war generally, with the science of engineering and fortification. In 1815 he joined an expedition to Peru, in South America, and there became captain in a regiment. He was now on the way to advancement. From his being successful in no fewer than seventeen consecutive actions, he was raised to the command of a battalion; and, in 1820 and 1822, successively became colonel, brigadier, and chief of the general staff. Subsequently, the successes of Bolívar defeated the efforts and blasted the hopes of the royalist Spanish generals, and Espartero was thrown into prison at Arequipa. From this situation he soon afterwards made his escape, and arrived in Spain in 1825. He now enjoyed repose for a few years, although still following his profession. In 1833 the civil war commenced, when he sought and obtained leave to proceed against Don Carlos. Throughout the stormy period which now ensued, he took a leading part, and rose to the dignity of field-marshal and general-in-chief of the army of the North. In 1838 he acted with General Evans in the relief of Bilbao, and continued vigorously to oppose the efforts of the Carlists till 1839, when the supremacy of the queen was acknowledged. In that year he was created a grandee of the first class, and duke of the Victoria. In 1841 he became regent of the kingdom, but in 1843 was forced to quit his country, and take refuge in England. He there took up his residence in London, and did not return to Spain till 1847, where he lived for some years in retirement, but in 1854 was again called to assume the reins of government, which he held till 1856, when he was forced to tender his resignation. B. at Granatula, in Ciudad Real, 1792.

ESPEY, Zeger Bernard van, es'-pen, a learned professor at Louvain, who opposed the formula and the bull Unigenitus, by which he brought himself into trouble, and went to Amersfort to avoid his enemies, where he died in 1728. B. 1646. His works on the canon law were printed at Paris, 4 vols. folio, 1753.

ESPEY, Johann Friedrich, es'-pair, a naturalist and astronomer, and author of a work entitled "A Method of determining the Orbits of Comets and other Celestial Bodies without astronomical instruments or mathematical calculations." He was the first to explore the caverns in the neighbourhood of Bayreuth, and to describe the curious fossil remains which they contain. One of these caverns has been named after him. B. at Drossenfeld, Bayreuth, 1732; D. 1781.

ESPRONCEDA, José de, aís-prone-thai'-da, a Spanish poet of some reputation, but whose political predilections brought him, at an early age, into difficulties with the government of his country. He was twice imprisoned before he was eighteen, and, on the last occasion, fell in love with the daughter of a brother prisoner, when he was shipped to England with some other Spanish refugees. Here he made himself acquainted with the language, and devoted himself to the study of Shakspeare and other poets. In 1830 he took part in the political disturbances in Paris, and fought at the barricades. On the death of Ferdinand, the king of Spain, he returned to Madrid, and entered the regiment of body-guards of the queen. In 1835 and 1836 he was fighting in defence of the barricades in the streets of Madrid; and, in 1841, became secretary to the embassy at the Hague. On his return to his country, he became a member of the Cortes, which had long been an object of his most fervent ambition. B. near Almendralejo, Estremadura, 1810; D. at Madrid, 1842. The poetry of Espronceda is estimated highly by his countrymen; but it consists only of a few short effusions, which altogether do not amount to more than would be comprised in a single volume little larger than the "Vicar of Wakefield." The character of his muse may, in some degree, be indicated by naming a few of the titles of the subjects upon which it was exercised—"The Beggar," "The Executioner," and "The Pirate."

ESSÉ, André de Montalembert d', des-sai, a distinguished French military commander, who joined the army of Vivonne in the first expedition to Naples, and at the battle of Fornovo, in 1495, when only 12 years of age, gave remarkable proofs of valour and coolness. He was present in all the wars waged for some years in Italy between the French and Spaniards, and won so high a name for courage that Francis I. chose him for one of his four companions-in-arms as challengers at a tournament held between Ardres and Guines in 1520, the exploits performed on the occasion being always after a favourite theme of conversation with the king. In 1543, d'Essé, with a very weak garrison, defended Landrecies against Charles V. and 50,000 men, and compelled him to raise the siege. B. 1493; killed at the siege of Terouane, 1558.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Essex

Esquinos, Henri Alphonse, es'-ke-ros, a talented French writer, formerly representative for the department Saône-et-Loire in the French legislative assembly. He was exiled in 1853 for his opposition to the government of Napoleon III., and, in 1855, came to England, where he has since resided, acting as Examiner to the Military Council of Education. He has written some admirable sketches of English life and character in the Revue des Deux Mondes. 1814.

Essex, Thomas Cromwell, Earl of, es'-sels, was the son of a blacksmith at Putney. Early in life he became clerk to the English factory at Antwerp; but, leaving that situation, he went into several countries as the secret emissary of the state. On his return to England, he was taken into the service of Cardinal Wolsey, who obtained him a seat in the House of Commons, where he defended his patron with great spirit. On the fall of the cardinal, Cromwell became the chief adviser of Henry VIII., who gave him several important places. He was very instrumental in the dissolution of the monasteries, and greatly promoted the Reformation. For these services, the title of earl of Essex, with many manors and estates, chiefly the spoils of the Church, were conferred upon him. At length his affairs took an adverse turn. He had been so unfortunate as to advise the marriage of the king with Anne of Cleves, who, not proving agreeable to Henry, that capricious sovereign wreaked his vengeance on the adviser of the marriage, and caused him to be tried for high treason and heresy. To be so accused was certain death. Accordingly, he suffered decapitation on Tower-hill, in 1540. 2. at Putney, Surrey, about 1490. He was a man of a liberal mind, and promoted more men of merit while he was in power than any of his predecessors. He left a son, who was created Lord Cromwell; which title continued in the family many years.

Essex, Robert Devereux, Earl of, was the son of Walter, earl of Essex, and in 1586 accompanied the earl of Leicester, the favourite of Queen Elizabeth, to Holland, where he behaved with bravery at the battle of Zutphen. On his return to England, he was made master of the horse, and rose rapidly in the royal favour. In 1589, he accompanied Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris in an expedition to Portugal, which gave great displeasure to the queen, whose dissatisfaction was further increased by his marrying a daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham and the widow of Sir Philip Sidney. In 1591, he commanded the forces sent to the assistance of Henry IV. of France, but was unsuccessful, and lost his only brother, to whom he was greatly attached. In 1596, he was appointed joint-commander with Lord Howard in an expedition against Spain, where he contributed to the capture of Cadiz, and also to the destruction of fifty-seven ships of war belonging to the enemy. After this, he had the command of a force sent out to intercept the Spanish fleet; but nothing was done except the taking of Fajal by a separate division of the squadron, commanded by Sir Walter Raleigh; and this occasioned a dispute between him and the earl. In the following year, Essex was made earl-marshal of England, and spoke vehemently against a peace with Spain, in opposition to Lord Burlleigh, who supported the measure. On the death of that statesman, Essex succeeded him as chancellor of Cambridge; but about this time, at a private council held respecting the appointment of a proper person to govern Ireland, he had the imprudence to oppose her majesty with rudeness; on which she gave him a box on the ear. The earl instantly laid his hand on his sword, and swore that he would not have endured such treatment even from her father, and withdrew from the court. At length a reconciliation was effected, and he was sent to Ireland to subdue the province of Ulster, which had risen in rebellion. The ill success which attended him in this expedition was the true beginning of his downfall, as it gave his enemies an opportunity of poisoning the queen's mind against him, with apparent justice, during his absence. On his return to England, however, he met with a better reception than he expected; but, soon after, fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned. In 1600 he regained his liberty; but instead of conducting himself with caution, he began to vent his indignation in bitter terms, and said that "the queen grew old and cankered, and that her mind was become as crooked as her carcass." His enemies having intelligence of his actions and speeches, sent for him to attend the council, which he refused, and began to arm in his own defence. Some blood was shed before he surrendered; on which he was made prisoner, tried, and beheaded, in 1601. 2. at Netherwood, Herefordshire, 1567. A story is told of the queen having given Essex, whilst in her favour, a ring, with the assurance that, on his sending it to her at any time when he might be in trouble, he should receive her pardon. This ring, it is said, he gave to the countess of Nottingham, his relation, and the wife of his inveterate enemy, the admiral, to carry to the queen; but that lady, in obedience to the commands of her husband, kept it, and the unhappy Essex suffered. On her deathbed the countess is stated to have confessed this fact to Elizabeth, who said, that "God might forgive her, but she never could." The authenticity of this story is doubtful; but it has served to embellish a tragedy called "The Earl of Essex." (See ELIZABETH.)

Essex, Robert Devereux, Earl of, son of the above, was educated under Sir Henry Savile at Merton College, Oxford, and was restored to his family honours by James I. He married Lady Frances Howard, daughter of the earl of Suffolk; but she, contracting an affection for the royal favourite, Robert Carr, afterwards earl of Somerset, instituted a shameful suit against her husband, and obtained a divorce. In 1620 Essex served under Sir Henry Vere in the Palatinate, and afterwards under Prince Maurice in Holland. On his return to England, he acted as a member of Parliament in opposition to the court; and on the breaking out of the rebellion, had the command of the parliamentary army. He fought against the king at Edgehill, after which he took Reading, raised the siege of Gloucester, fought in the double battle of Newbury, and succeeded in covering London. In 1644 he marched into the West; but was so completely inclosed in Cornwall, that he and his principal officers were glad to escape by sea. By the Self-denying ordinance, in 1645, he was deprived of his command, and died the year following. 2. 1592.

Essex, James, an architect, was the son of a carpenter and builder, of Cambridge, and specially applied himself to reviving the gothic style, in which aim, though deficient in education and theoretic knowledge, he was very successful. He was entrusted with the repairs of King's College chapel and of the cathedrals of Lincoln and Ely; and wrote some memoirs on architecture, &c., in the "Archæologia." n. 1723; p. 1761.

ESTAING, Charles Heitor, Count d', des-tang, a French commander, who served under Count Lally in India, where he was made prisoner by the English; but was released on his parole, which, however, he broke. In the American war he was employed as vice-admiral and general of the French armies, and took the island of Grenada. In 1787 he became member of the Assembly of Notables, and commandant of the national guards at Versailles at the commencement of the Revolution. b. in Auvergne, 1729; guillotined at Paris, 1794.

ESTAMPES, Anne de Pisseieu, duchess d', es-tamp, a favourite mistress of Francis I. of France. She carried on a correspondence with Charles V. of Spain, and informed him of the state of the armies and the country. By her means Charles was enabled to gain considerable advantages, and to humiliate France. After the death of Francis, she retired to her country seat, where she died in 1578.

ESTR, Horse of, one of the oldest historical families of modern Europe, its origin being traced as far back as the 5th century. The last offspring of this house was Maria Beatrice, wife of the archduke Ferdinand of Austria, who died in 1800. Their son, Francis IV., was restored to the Modenese dominions of his maternal ancestors by the treaty of Paris, in 1814. He died in 1846, and was succeeded in his possessions and titles by his son, Francis V., deposed in 1859.

ESTRADES, Godfrey, Count d', des-trad, a French general and statesman, who, in 1661, was sent ambassador to England, and again in 1664, where he strenuously maintained his right of precedence over the Spanish ambassador. The year following he went to Holland, and concluded the treaty of Breda. In 1673 he was at the conference at Nimwegen, and continued to be engaged in politics up to the time of his death. b. at Agen, 1607; d. 1686. The negotiations of the Count d'Estrades were printed at the Hague in 1772, in 9 vols. 12mo.

ESTRÈS, Francis Annibal d', des-trai, duke and marshal of France, was educated for the church, and appointed bishop of Laon, which he quitted for a military life. b. 1573; d. at Paris, 1670. He wrote "Memoirs of the Regency of Mary de Medeis," and a "Narrative of the Siege of Mantua." Gabrielle d'Estrées, the mistress of Henry IV., was this nobleman's sister; and several of his descendants were distinguished in the military and naval service of France.

ETHELBALD, eth-el-bald, king of Wessex, was the eldest surviving son of Ethelwolf. He married his step-mother, Judith of France, but was forced to abandon that connection, and she became the wife of Baldwin, count of Flanders, and the ancestress of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror, and through her, of the kings of England. Ethelbald was engaged in military conflicts with the Danes, and distinguished himself by the common quality of bravery, but otherwise holds no remarkable place in history. d. 860.

ETHELBERT, eth-el-bert, king of Kent, married Bertha, daughter of Caribert, king of France. By her means he was induced to embrace Christianity, which he had permitted to be preached to his subjects by Augustine, the monk. After enacting several laws, he died 616.

ETHELBERT, king of England, the second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald in 880. He was a virtuous prince, beloved by his subjects, and mostly engaged in repelling the incursions of the Danes. d. 866, and was buried at Sherborne.

ETHELRED, eth-el-red, king of England, the son of Edgar, succeeded his brother, Edward the Martyr, in 973. His unmanly spirit submitted to pay a tribute to the Danes, by a tax levied on his subjects, called Danegelt. To free himself from this oppression he caused the Danes to be treacherously massacred, throughout the country, in one day. On this, Sweyn, king of Denmark, entered his kingdom, and compelled him to fly to Normandy; but Sweyn dying soon after, Ethelred returned, and, after an inglorious reign of 37 years, died in 1016.

ETHELWOLF, eth-el-wolf, king of England, came to the crown in 837, and rendered his reign famous for being that in which tithes were instituted. He was a mild and religious prince, and went to Rome with his youngest son, Alfred. d. 857, and was buried at Winchester.

ETHELREGE, George, eth-el-redj, an English dramatic writer of the reign of Charles II. In 1664 he produced the comedy of "The Comical Revenge; or, Love in a Tub." Encouraged by the favourable reception of this piece, he brought out another in 1668, entitled "She Would if She Could." In 1676 appeared his "Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter." These productions raised him to a place among the best wits of his time, although they are more remarkable for spirit of dialogue than originality of invention. Their licentiousness, however, has long ago excluded them from public representation. In 1683 he received the honour of knighthood. b. 1636; d. at Ratisbon, from a fall down a stair, after a convivial entertainment, 1688.

ETTY, William, R.A., et-te, an eminent English artist, who, in 1807, entered as student of the Royal Academy; but, after what might be called, without a metaphor, no end of labour and disappointment, he was unable to get himself represented by any of his pictures on the walls of the academy till 1811, when "Telemachus rescuing Antiope" was permitted to appear. From this time he continued to plod at, but not to attract by, his art; and, in 1816, was induced to visit Italy, for the purpose of study; but he returned, almost immediately, to work again in London. Labour, as usual, met its reward. In 1820 he commanded notice by his "Coral-Finders;" and the following year his "Cleopatra arriving in Cilicia" procured an established reputation. He was now famous, and produced a great many works, and especially excelled in representing the nude female. His aim, in all his large pictures, was to paint some great moral on the heart; as, for example, in "Ulysses and the Syrens," he meant to show the importance of resisting sensual delights. The only picture which the nation possesses of his painting is "Youth at the Prow, and Pleasure at the Helm," which is in the Vernon Gallery. b. at York, 1787; d. there, 1840.

EVOLTO, w-kliid, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, who immortalized his name by his books on geometry, in which he digested all the propositions of the eminent geometers who preceded him, as Thales, Pythagoras, and others. Ptolemy became his pupil, and his school was so famous, that Alexandria, where he taught, continued for ages the great university for mathematicians. Lived in the 3rd century B.C. The best, indeed only, edition of his whole works is that of Gregory, Oxford, folio, 1703. His "Elements" have gone through innumerable editions, and have been used in every country where mathematics are taught.

EUCLIDES, u-kli'-dee, a native of Megara, and a disciple of Socrates. When the Athenians had forbidden all the people of Megara, on pain of death, to enter their city, Euclides disguised himself in woman's clothes to introduce himself into the presence of Socrates. He was the founder of the school called the Megarian, distinguished by its dialectic subtlety. He wrote six dialogues, which are lost. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

EUDEMON, John Andrew, u'-de-mon, a learned Jesuit, descended from the imperial family of the Paleologi, was educated in Italy, and taught philosophy at Padua and Rome with much reputation. Urban VIII. appointed him principal of the Greek college re-established at Rome, and he accompanied Cardinal Barberini in a mission to France. He left a variety of works behind him, chiefly of a polemical character, having been engaged in religious controversies with many individuals, among whom were the English anti-papal divines Abbot, Prideaux, Collins, and others. b. in Candia; d. at Rome, 1625.

EUDOCIA, eu-do'-she-a, a learned Athenian lady, whose original name was Athenais. She was the daughter of Leontius, the philosophical sophist, who left her only a small legacy, bequeathing the rest of his property to his two sons. Conceiving herself ill-used, she went to Constantinople to lay her complaint before Theodosius II. Here she became the favourite of Pulcheria, sister of that emperor, and embraced the Christian religion. In 421 she was married to the emperor, who afterwards divorced her in a fit of jealousy. She then went to Jerusalem, where she built churches, and led a life of great devotion, always protesting her innocence of the crime laid to her charge by Theodosius. d. 460. This empress wrote some Greek poems, and paraphrases on some of the prophets. She is said also to have written a life of Christ, composed of lines taken from Homer.

EUDOCIA, or EUDOXIA, widow of the emperor Constantine Duces, on whose death, in 1067, she assumed the imperial diadem, and married the general Romanus Diogenes. When her son Michael ascended the throne, he shut her in a convent, where she amused herself in writing on the pagan mythology. She left a treatise on the genealogies of the gods and heroes, which was printed in Villoison's "Anecdota Græca," 1781.

EUDOCIA, Feodorevna, first wife of Peter I., czar of Russia, and daughter of the boyard Feodor Lapukin. Peter married her in 1689, but a few years afterwards he sent her to a nunnery, on account of her complaints of his infidelity. d. 1731.

EUDOXUS of Cnidus, u-dox'-us, an eminent astronomer of Caria, in Asia Minor. He studied in Egypt with Plato, and afterwards opened a mathematical school at Athens. It is said that he passed a great part of his time on a high mountain, where he made celestial observations. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

EUGENE, Francis, oo'-zhain, Prince of Savoy Carignan, was the son of the count of Soissons, by the niece of Cardinal Mazarin. He was intended for the church, but the death of his father changed this design, and determined him to follow the military profession. His mother being banished to the Netherlands by Louis XIV., and his family otherwise wronged by that sovereign, he went to Vienna, where the emperor gave him a regiment of dragoons, and he served in Hungary with great reputation against the Turks. In 1691 he, at the head of the imperial army, entered Piedmont, where he relieved Coni, which was at that time besieged by the French, and took Carmagnola. In 1697 he commanded the imperialists in Hungary, and, the same year, defeated the Turks at the battle of Zenta. On the death of the king of Spain, in 1701, the "war of the Spanish succession" commenced, and Prince Eugene achieved new laurels. At the close of the campaign of 1702, he returned to Vienna, and was made president of the council, and associated in the command of the allied army with the duke of Marlborough. In 1704 he had a principal share in the famous battle of Blenheim. In 1707 he was repulsed at Cassano by Vendôme; but he soon recovered his reputation in a bloody action near Turin, which was then besieged by the French, whose trenches he forced, and gained a complete victory. The same year he entered France, and laid siege to Toulon, but did not succeed in taking the place. In 1709 he shared in the victory of Oudenarde and the capture of Lille. In 1709 he fought at Malplaquet, where he was severely wounded, but would not quit the scene of action. In 1712 he visited London, to induce the English ministers not to make a separate peace; but his arguments were ineffectual, and England signed the treaty of Utrecht. Now left to carry on the war alone, he was successfully opposed by Marshal Villars, with whom he entered into a negotiation, which was followed by the peace of Radstadt in 1714. In 1716 a war broke out between the emperor and the Turks, on which the prince was again intrusted with the command in Hungary, where, in that year, he defeated the grand vizier at Peterwardein, this splendid victory being followed by the no less great exploit of the capture of Belgrade. It was here, with 40,000 men, he defeated a relieving army of 150,000 Turks. Peace being concluded at Passarowitz, in 1718, he retired into private life; but in 1739, when the election for the crown of Poland was disputed, he was again employed. This campaign, however, was short and unproductive of any remarkable action, although successful in its results. b. in Paris, 1663; d. at Vienna, 1736. During the few years of repose which the peace of Passarowitz brought this warrior, he worthily employed himself in public affairs and in the arts of peace. The emperor Charles VI. found in him as faithful a counsellor as he was a skilful captain; and in the days of his misfortunes, he would cry, "Alas! the fortune of the empire has departed with Prince Eugene!" The prince was of the middle height, but stoutly built, and was exempt from those excesses which have so often sullied the characters of great men. Napoleon places him in the same rank of generals as Turenne and Frederick the Great, and considered the plans of his campaigns as conveying a perfect knowledge of the art of war.

EUGENIUS I., u-je'-ne-us, a pope and saint, succeeded Martin in 654. He is praised for his liberality and piety. d. 657.

EUGENIUS II. succeeded Pascal I. in 824, and decreed that in every country personage a master should be kept to read and explain the Scriptures. He, however, defended image-worship, though the practice was condemned by the council of Paris. d. 827.

EUGENIUS III. Pope, ascended the papal chair in 1145. Rome was at that time in a turbulent state, and finding that he could do little good, Eugenius retired to Pisa, and thence to Paris. d. 1153.

EUGENIUS IV. (Gabriel Condolmera) succeeded Martin V. in 1431, in which year the council of Bale assembled. This pope and the members of that assembly differed in their judgment, when he issued a bull against them. This, however, was disregarded, and he was under the necessity of confirming the decrees. In 1438 he called a council at Ferrara, to bring about a reconciliation between the Greek and Latin churches. At this council appeared the emperor Palaeologus, with several Greek bishops; but the plague breaking out at Ferrara, the council was removed to Florence, where, in 1439, a sort of union was agreed to, but was soon broken. In 1439 the council at Bale deposed Eugenius, and elected Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy, who took the name of Felix V. Eugenius, however, triumphed over his adversaries. d. at Venice; d. at Rome, 1447.

EUGENIUS, an obscure grammarian, who was proclaimed emperor in Dauphiné by Count Arbogast, after the murder of Valentinian II., in 392. He crossed the Alps, and made himself master of Milan in 394; but was defeated and slain by the emperor Theodosius. Lived in the 4th century.

EULER, Leonard, oo'-ler, a Swiss mathematician, who received his education in the university of Bale, with a view to the church, but principally devoted himself to mathematical studies under the famous John Bernoulli. In 1727 he followed his friends Hermann and Daniel Bernoulli to St. Petersburg, where, in 1733, he became professor of mathematics in the Academy of Sciences. In 1735 he impaired his sight by intense application to the solution of a difficult problem. His memoir on Fire obtained the prize from the French Academy of Sciences, in 1738, and, in 1740, he divided another, on the Flux and Reflux of the Sea, with Maclaurin and Daniel Bernoulli. In 1741 he went to Berlin, at the invitation of the king, to assist in establishing the academy there. When introduced to the queen-dowager, she expressed her surprise at the paucity of his conversation; upon which he replied, that he had just come from a country where those who spoke were hanged. He continued at Berlin till 1766, when he returned to St. Petersburg, where he soon after entirely lost his sight. Still he continued his favourite pursuits. He also received another prize from the French Academy, for three Memoirs on the Inequalities in the Motions of the Planets; which were followed by two others for solutions of questions on the Theory of the Moon. In 1772 appeared his Lunar Tables. b. at Bale, 1707; d. at St. Petersburg, 1783. Besides the above works, he wrote a great number of papers in the Memoirs of several academies; "Opuscula Analytica," "Introduction to the Analysis of Infinitesimals," &c. In 1760, when the Russians invaded Brandenburg and advanced to Charlottenburg, they plundered a house belonging to Euler. When this was told to General Tottleben, he immediately caused reparation to be made to the mathematician, and the empress Elizabeth of Russia presented him with 4000 florins.

EUMENES, u'-me-nees, a Greek commander, and accounted the most worthy of all the officers of Alexander to succeed him after his death. He conquered Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealousy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He then joined his forces to those of Perdiccas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. He was put to death by order of Antigonus, 316 b.c. The latter, however, honoured his remains with a splendid funeral, and conveyed his ashes to his wife and family in Cappadocia.

EUMENES I., king of Pergamos, succeeded his uncle Philaretus, 263 b.c., and reigned 22 years. —Eumenes II., nephew of the preceding, succeeded his father, Attalus, 197 b.c. He assisted the Romans against Antiochus the Great, and reigned 38 years.—Both of these sovereigns were greatly attached to learned pursuits, and the latter enriched the famous library of Pergamos, which had been founded by his predecessors, in imitation of the Alexandrine collection of the Ptolemies.

EUNARIUS, u-na'-ri-us, a Byzantine sophist and historian, who wrote a history of the Cæsars, of which few fragments remain. His "Lives of the Philosophers" of his age is still extant. It is composed with fidelity and elegance, precision and correctness. d. 347; d. 420.

EUNUS, u'-nus, a Syrian slave, who inflamed the minds of the people by pretended inspiration and enthusiasm. Oppression and misery impelled 2000 slaves to join his cause, and he soon found himself at the head of 50,000 men. With this force he defeated the Roman armies, till Perpenna forced him to surrender by famine, and he and the greater number of his followers were impaled on crosses, 132 b.c.

EUPHRANOR, u'-fra'-nor, a Greek sculptor, whose principal works were effigies of the Greek gods and heroes, a figure of Paris being esteemed his best performance. He was a native of Corinth, but seems to have practised his art at Athens, and is mentioned as the first sculptor who gave an appropriate expression to the subject of each of his works. He worked with equal success on both marble and bronze, and was also clever as a painter. Lived about 364 b.c.

EUPHORION, u'-for'-e-on. The most remarkable of this name is a Greek poet of Chalcis, in Eubœa. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing. d. 220 b.c.

EUPOLIS, u'-po'-lis, a comic poet of Athens, who severely condemned the vices and immoralities of his age. It is said that he had composed 17 dramatic pieces at the age of 17. Some supposed that Alcibiades put Eupolis to death, because he had ridiculed him in his verses; but Suidas maintains that he perished in a sea-fight between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians in the Hellespont. Lived in the 5th century b.c.

Euripides

u-rip'-i-dees, a Grecian tragic poet, who studied at Athens under Anaxagoras the philosopher and Prodicus the rhetorician. He was twice married, but was unfortunate in both wives, which is supposed to have suggested some of the severe remarks levelled against the female sex which are found scattered over his works. He left Athens in disgust, on account of the rivalry of Sophocles and the raillery of Aristophanes, and went to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. Here he enjoyed all the tranquillity he sought; but as he was walking one evening in a wood, he was attacked by the king's hounds and torn in pieces. b. at Salamis, 480 b.c.; killed, 406 b.c. The Athenians, out of respect for his talents, went into mourning, and asked for his body; but the Macedonians would not part with it, but erected over it a magnificent tomb at Pella. Only 19, out of 75 of his tragedies are extant; and the best editions are those of Barnes, Cambridge, 1694, folio; and Musgrave, Oxford, 1773, 4to. He has been well translated into English by Woodhull and Potter.

EURIBADES, u-ri-bi'-a-dees, a Spartan commander of the Grecian fleet, at the battles of Artemisium and Salamis, against Xerxes. He was on the point of striking Themistocles, when the latter was advising an attack on the Persian fleet; upon which the Athenian cried, "Strike, but hear me." (See THEMISTOCLES.) Lived in the 5th century b.c.

EUSDEN, Laurence, use'-den, an English poet, who in 1718 obtained the laureateship, which made him several enemies, particularly Pope, who placed him in the "Dunciad." Cooke, in his "Battle of the Poets," refers to him in these lines:

"Eusden, a laurel'd bard, by fortune raised,
By few been read, by fewer still been praised."
The duke of Buckingham, in his "Session of the Poets," also ridicules him:—

"In rush'd Eusden, and cried, 'Who shall have it

But I, the true laureate, to whom the king gave it?"

Apollo begg'd pardon, and granted his claim,
But vow'd that, till then, he had ne'er heard his name."

He became rector of Coningsby, in Lincolnshire, where he died, 1730. His poems are in Nichols's collection. b. in Yorkshire.

EUSEBIUS, u-se'-be-us, succeeded Marcellus as bishop of Rome, in 310, and died the same year. He was strongly opposed to the readmission of lapsed Christians to communion. His opinions on this subject gave great offence at Rome, and the emperor Maxentius banished the pope to Sicily. He was by birth a Greek.

EUSEBIUS, Pamphilus, an ecclesiastical historian, who, in the persecution by Diocletian, assisted the suffering Christians by his exhortations, particularly his friend Pamphilus, whose name, out of veneration, he assumed. He was chosen bishop of Caesarea about 313, and was at first the friend of Arius, because he considered him as persecuted; but on perceiving the dangerous tendency of his opinions, he abandoned him, and assisted at the council of Nice, which he opened with an address; he was also at that of Antioch. The emperor Constantine had a particular esteem for him, and showed him several tokens of favour. b. in Palestine, about 265; d. 338. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," the "Life of Constantine," and other works. The best edition of his "Ecclesiastical History" is that of Cambridge, 3 vols. folio, 1720. He wrote, besides, many other works, the principal of which is one entitled "Evangelical Preparation," 2 vols. folio, Paris, 1623.

EUSTACHIUS, Bartholomew, u-stai'-she-us, a distinguished Italian physician, who settled at Rome, and made several discoveries relative to medical science. The most important of these was the passage from the throat to the external ear, since known by the name of the Eustachian tube. He formed some anatomical tables, and Boerhaave, in 1707, published his "Opuscula Anatomica." d. 1574.

He, u-stai'-the-us, an Homeric commentator, was a native of Constantinople, who, in the latter part of his life, was made archbishop of Thessalonica, in which station he exhibited much ability and prudence. He is best known, however, for his commentaries on Homer and Dionysius Periegetes, the first of which is a compilation from the works of older scholiasts and commentators, to which Eustathius added but little of his own. It is, however, a work of immense labour, and was first printed at Rome in 1542-1550, and has been reprinted at several other times and places since, as, for instance, at Paris, in 1577, and at Oxford in 1697. The date of his death is unknown, but is believed to have occurred subsequent to 1194.

EUTHYPIUS, Flavius, u-thro'-pe-us, a Latin historian, who wrote an epitome of the History of Rome, from the age of Romulus to the reign of the emperor Valens, to whom the work was dedicated. Of all his works, the Roman history alone is extant. It is composed with conciseness and precision, but without elegance. Lived in the 4th century.

-----, u'-ti-kees, a monk, who lived near Constantinople, and who is said to have founded the sect called Eutycheians, in the East. Lived in the 5th century.

EUTHYRIUS, u-ti-k'-us, a physician and divine, who, after practising physic for many years, was ordained, and in 938 became patriarch of Alexandria. b. at Cairo, 876; d. 950. He wrote, in Arabic, "Annals from the Creation to 800," published at Oxford by Pocock, in 1659, 4to. He also wrote a "History of Sicily," the MS. of which is in the public library at Cambridge.

EVAGORAS, e-vag'-o-ris, a Greek historian, who wrote a "History of Egypt," the "Life of Timagenes," "De Artificio Thucydidis Oratorio," "Lexicon in Thucydidem." Lived in the 1st century a.d.

EVAGORAS, king of Cyprus, who re-took Salamis, which had been wrested from his father by the Persians. He made war against Artaxerxes, the king of Persia, with the assistance of the Egyptians, Arabians, and Tyrians, and obtained some advantages over the fleet of his enemy. The Persians, however, soon repaired their losses, and Evagoras saw himself defeated by sea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be stripped of all his dominions, except the town of Salamis. Assassinated soon after this fatal change of fortune, by a eunuch, 374 b.c.—He left two sons; Nicocles, who succeeded him, and Protogoras, who afterwards deprived his nephew Evagoras of his possessions, upon account of his oppression.

ments in the common corn-mill; but is chiefly remarkable as the inventor of the high-pressure steam-engine, and as having proposed the application of steam power to the propulsion of carriages, having, though ridiculed and sneered at, actually constructed a locomotive engine. n. near Philadelphia, 1735; p. 1811.

EVANS, General Sir De Laey, G.C.B., entered the army in 1807 as ensign in the 22nd Foot, and after serving several years in India, returned and fought in the Peninsular campaigns of 1812, 1813, and 1814. He also fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, where he had his horse shot under him. In 1835 he volunteered to command the British Legion in Spain, and for his valour throughout the campaigns in which he served against the Carlists, he was invested with the order of the Bath and the Cross of San Ferdinand and San Charles of Spain. In 1834 he became commander of the second division of the Army of the East, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of the Alma. At Inkermann he rose from a bed of sickness to join his division; but when he saw the manner in which General Pennycuik was leading his men, he refused to take the command, but left his share of the merit entirely to that officer. He returned to England in 1855, and received the Grand Cross of the order of the Bath. With the exception of two short intervals, he had a seat in parliament from 1831 to 1865. n. at Moig, Ireland, 1787.

EVANSON, Edward, ev'-en'-son, an English divine, who became curate to his uncle at Mitcham, in Surrey. In 1768 he obtained the living of South Mimms, and was afterwards presented to the living of Tewkesbury, in Gloucestershire, to which was added that of Longdon, a village in Worcestershire. Here his sentiments on the doctrine of the Trinity underwent a change, and he ventured to make alterations in the Common Prayer, which gave such offence to the parishioners that a prosecution was instituted against him, which failed, on account of some irregularity in the proceedings. In 1778 he resigned his livings and returned to Mitcham, where he undertook the education of some pupils. n. at Warrington, Lancashire, 1731; p. 1805. He wrote the "Dissonance of the four generally-received Evangelists;" "A letter to Bishop Hurd on the Grand Apostasy;" "Reflections on the State of Religion in Christendom;" and some other works.

EVANS, David Morier, for some years assistant city correspondent of the Times newspaper, and afterwards manager of the commercial department of the Standard and Morning Herald. He is the author of many important commercial works, the chief of which is "Facts, Failures, and Frauds," published in 1859. He is the editor of the "Bankers' Magazine." n. 1819.

EVELYN, John, ev'-lin, an English author, who, by marriage with the daughter of Sir Richard Browne, became possessed of Sayes Court, a manor in Kent, where he led a retired life till the Restoration, to which he in some measure contributed. At the establishment of the Royal Society, he became one of its first members. In 1663 appeared his "Sculptura; or, the History and Art of Chalcography and Engraving in Copper." This curious and valuable work has since been reprinted. In 1664 came out his "Sylva; or, a Discourse of Forest Trees," which has gone through many editions, and is a great repository of all that was, in the author's time, known of the forest trees of Great Britain. He was appointed a commissioner for the sick and wounded seamen, one of the commissioners for rebuilding St. Paul's, and afterwards had a place at the Board of Trade. In the reign of James II. he was made one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord privy seal, and after the revolution was appointed treasurer of Greenwich hospital. In 1697 appeared his "Numismata, or Discourse of medals." Mr. Evelyn has the honour of being one of the first who improved horticulture, and introduced exotics into this country. Of his garden at Sayes Court a curious account may be seen in the "Philosophical Transactions," n. at Wotton, Surrey, 1620; p. 1708. Evelyn was buried at Wotton, where, on his tombstone, he had it recorded, "That all is vanity which is not honest; and that there is no solid wisdom but real piety." He wrote several books besides the above, and of his "Memoirs" Sir Walter Scott says, "We have never seen a mine so rich."—His son John wrote a Greek poem, prefixed to his father's "Sylva," and translated Rapin's poem on gardens into English, and the "Life of Alexander" from Plutarch. He was also the author of a few poems in Dryden's collection. p. 1693, aged 45.

EVERDINGER, Aldert van, ever-din'-jen, a clever Dutch landscape painter and etcher, who excelled in delineating the rude and grand features of nature. He spent upwards of a year in Norway, and took great delight in sketching the wild scenery of its rugged coast. Some of his forests are extremely picturesque and truthful; and he likewise excelled in sea stories and in figures. He executed numerous etchings, which are now scarce; among them are a series of views in Norway, and fifty-six original illustrations of the fable of "Reynard the Fox." He was born in Alkmaar in 1621, and died there in 1675.

EVERETT, Alexander Hill, ev'-s-ret, an American author of note, who began life as a tutor in an academy, but afterwards entered into the office of John Quincy Adams, as a student of the law. In 1800 he went to Russia as an attaché of the mission of Mr. Adams, and spent two years in St. Petersburg, studying political economy, and making himself acquainted with the modern languages. On returning to America, he connected himself, in Boston, with both law and literature. From 1818 to 1824 he served as chargé d'affaires in the Netherlands, where he pursued his literary studies, and, in 1821, published a work entitled "Europe; or, a General Survey of the Principal Powers," &c., which was highly spoken of. In the following year he issued another, which entered into a consideration of the Godwin and Malthusian theories of population. In 1825 he became American minister at the court of Spain, which he held for nearly five years, during which he continued to devote himself to his studies, and produced a political work on America, whilst at the same time contributing to the "North American Review," then under the editorship of his brother. In 1841 he was chosen president of Jefferson College, Louisiana, and, in 1845, minister-plenipotentiary to China. Through ill-health, he did not reach Canton till 1846, where he died 1847. n. at Boston, 1790.

EVERETT, Edward, D.C.L., brother of the above, studied divinity with a view to the office of pastor, and became, before he was twenty, minister of a large Unitarian congregation a Boston. In 1815 he relinquished the pulpit for the professorial chair of Greek Language and Literature in Harvard university. Previous to his entering upon his duties, he visited Europe, and for two years resided at Göttingen studying German, and making himself acquainted with the best modes of instruction adopted in the German universities. After sojourn in Europe of five years, during which he visited various countries, he returned to America, and entered upon his university duties with large stores of accumulated learning & knowledge. In 1820 he added to the duties his chair those of editor of the "North American Review," which he continued to perform for four years. In 1824 he was elected to the House of Representatives, and, in 1836, became governor of Massachusetts. In 1841 he was appointed minister to the English court, which post he held for about five years, and on his return was elected president of Harvard university, which he was subsequently compelled to resign on account of ill-health. In 1853 he was elected a member of the Senate for Massachusetts. b. 1791; d. 1895.

EVERSLEY, the Rt. Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, Viscount, ev'-ers-le, for many years member for the northern division of the county of Hampshire, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons in 1839, an office which he retained until 1857, when he was raised to the peerage. b. 1794.

EVERMOND, St., air'-mont, Charles de St. Denis, Lord of, a French writer, who relinquished the law for the military profession. He served under Condé, as lieutenant of the Guards, and in the civil wars of France fought at the battles of Rocroi and Nordlingen. He attended Mazarin in the negotiation with Spain; but having betrayed some confidential secrets, in a correspondence with the marquis de Cregui, was obliged to quit France. Accordingly, he found a refuge in England, where he was in great esteem with Charles II. In 1639 permission was granted him to return to his country; but he preferred ending his days in the land of his adoption. b. near Coutances, Normandy, 1613; d. in London, 1703, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He was a man of wit and ingenuity. His works were printed in 1703, in 3 vols. 4to, by Des Maizeaux.

EWALD, Johannes, u'-all, a distinguished Danish poet, who wrote several dramatic pieces, and a poem entitled "The Temple of Fortune," which prove his genius to have been considerable. His principal work is named "Balder's Death," a drama which takes a high standing in Danish literature. n. at Copenhagen, 1743; d. 1781.

EWING, John, u'-ing, an American divine and mathematician, was educated, or rather completed his education, at Princeton college, and acted for some time as teacher of the grammar school there. He took his degree in 1755, and was chosen instructor of philosophy in the college of Philadelphia, and minister of a Presbyterian congregation in that city. While on a visit to this country, in 1773, the university of Edinburgh conferred upon him the degree of D.D.; and in 1779 he was chosen provost of Philadelphia university. He contributed some papers to the American edition of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica;" published a volume of lectures on natural philosophy, and was commissioner for settling the boundary lines between several of the states of the American union. n. in Maryland, 1732; d. 1802.

EXMOUTH, Edward Pellew, Viscount, a distinguished British naval commander, who, in 1770, entered the navy, and first brought himself prominently into notice in 1776, at the battle of Lake Champlain, N. America. Having risen successively through the ranks of lieutenant and post-captain, in 1793 he was appointed to the command of the Nymph frigate, of 36 guns, and falling in with the Cleopatra French frigate, he captured her, after a desperate fight, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. Continuing in active service, in 1799 he was appointed to the command of the Impetuous, of 78 guns, and was engaged in various services on the French coast. In 1802 he was named colonel of the marines; and, in the same year, was chosen member of parliament for Barnstaple, in Devonshire. In 1804 he commanded the Zouave, of 84 guns, and received the rank of rear-admiral of the Red. He was also made commander in the East Indies, on which he resigned his parliamentary seat. In 1803 he was raised to the rank of vice-admiral of the Blue. In 1810 he blockaded Flushing, and, shortly afterwards, was appointed to the commander-in-chiefship in the Mediterranean. Here he co-operated with the British forces on the eastern part of the coast of Spain with great skill. The value of his services was recognised in 1814, when he was raised to the peerage as Baron Exmouth, of Canonteign, Devonshire. In the same year he was promoted to the rank of full admiral, and, subsequently, made a K.C.B. and G.C.B. In 1816 he proceeded to Algiers, to chastise the Dey for having violated a treaty concluded for the abolition of Christian slavery. His plan of attack is considered to be one of the boldest ever adopted by a naval commander. He entered the harbour with his ship, the Queen Charlotte, and being admirably supported by the other ships of his fleet, set fire to the warships of the Algerines, bombarded the city, and forced the Dey to yield to all his demands. For this service he was thanked by both houses of Parliament, and raised to the rank of viscount. On the death of Admiral Duckworth, in 1817, he was appointed to the chief command at Plymouth; but, after 1821, retired from public service. b. at Dover, 1757; d. 1833.

EXUPERIUS, ex-u'-per'-e-us, bishop of Toulouse, and a saint of the Roman calendar. He expended all his own wealth, and sold the sacred vessels, to maintain the poor in a time of famine. b. about 417.

EXCK, Hubert van, ike, an eminent artist, and founder of the Flemish school of painting. One of his finest works, in which he was assisted by his brother, is the "Adoration of the Lamb," in the church of St. Bavon, Ghent. He painted in distemper and in oil. b. at Meneseyck, 1306; d. 1426.

EXCK, John van, brother of the above, painted history, portraits, and landscapes; but is chiefly known by his being the inventor of a new method of mixing his oils, which really improved the style of painting. b. 1370; d. 1441.

governor of New Zealand and Antigua, he became governor of Jamaica in 1862. Here he suppressed a rebellion of the negroes in 1865, which threatened the lives of all the whites in the island. He was superseded in a charge of having exceeded his powers as governor, but completely exonerated by the result of a commission of inquiry held on his conduct. n. 1817.

EBRE, Sir William, K.C.B., an English general, entered the army in 1823, and, after serving in Canada, proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope, and distinguished himself as lieutenant-colonel in both the Caffre wars. In acknowledgment of his eminent services, he was made a companion of the order of the Bath, promoted to be colonel in the army, and appointed an aide-de-camp to the queen. On the military force being sent out to the East, during the Russian war, he was appointed to a brigade of the 3rd division of the army, and was present at the battle of the Alma. He commanded the troops in the trenches during the battle of Inkermann, and remained in the Crimea until after the fall of Sebastopol. In 1855 he was created a knight commander of the order of the Bath, was made a commander of the Legion of Honour, a knight of the imperial order of the Medjidie of the 2nd class, and was among the general officers who received the Sardinian war-medal. After his return, in 1856, he was selected by the commander-in-chief to command the troops in Canada, which appointment, on account of ill health, he was forced to resign. b. 1806; d. at Bilton Hall, Warwickshire, 1859.

F

FABER, Johann, fa'-ber, a German divine, who was created doctor at Cologne, and in 1526 was appointed confessor to Ferdinand, king of the Romans. He was subsequently presented to the see of Vienna, and was called the "Mallet of Heretics," owing to the zeal which he showed against Luther. b. in Swabia, 1470; d. 1541. His works were printed at Cologne, in 3 vols. folio.—There was another controversialist of this name, who wrote several works against the Protestants.

FABERT, Abraham, fa'-bair, a gallant French officer, who was the son of a bookseller at Metz. He was educated with the duke d'Epervon, became a soldier, and saved the royal army in the celebrated retreat of Mayence in 1635. He was wounded in the thigh at the siege of Turin, and on being recommended to have the limb amputated, he refused, remarking, "I won't die by piecemeal; death shall have me entire, or not at all." He, however, recovered, and subsequently distinguished himself in the battle of Marfée in 1641, and at the siege of Bapaume. He was afterwards governor of Sedan, and in 1654 captured Stenai, and received the baton of a marshal in 1658. He refused the decorations of the king's orders, as he said he was not entitled to wear them; and being unable to produce the proofs of nobility which had been conferred on his family by Henry IV., he likewise declined that honour, "because he would not," he declared, "have his cloak decorated with a cross, and his name disgraced by an imposture." b. 1599; d. 1662.

FABIAN, fa'i-be-an, a pope and saint, according to the Roman calendar. He ascended the papal chair in 236, and erected churches, and sent bishops into Gaul to propagate Christianity. He suffered in the persecution under Decius, 250.

FABIVS MAXIMVS, Rullianus, fa'i-be-us, an illustrious Roman, who, as master of the horse in the war against the Samnites, charged the enemy, and obtained a victory. Having done this in the absence of the dictator, and contrary to his orders, he was condemned to death, but was rescued by the people. In 303 B.C. he served the office of censor, and obtained the name of Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace in elections. He triumphed over seven nations, and served the office of dictator a second time 287 B.C.

FABIVS MAXIMVS, Quintus, surnamed Cunctator, a Roman, distinguished for his prudence, valour, and generosity. He was consul the first time 233 B.C., when he gained a great victory over the Ligurians. When Hannibal the Carthaginian defeated the Romans at the battle of Thrasymene, he was nominated prodictator, to oppose that general. He succeeded in surrounding Hannibal, whom, however, he allowed to escape, when he was recalled by the senate, who refused to confirm an agreement which he had made for the ransom of prisoners. On this, Fabius sold his estates to raise the money. When the time of his dictatorship expired, he advised his successor, Paulus Æmilius, not to hazard an engagement; his advice, however, was neglected, and thus was lost the famous battle of Cannæ. Fabius was now looked upon as the only refuge of the Romans, and he quickly recovered Tarentum, which had been betrayed to Hannibal. In his advanced years, he was superseded by Scipio, yet his death was lamented by the people as a common loss. b. about 275; d. 203 B.C.

FABRE, John Claude, fabr, a French priest of the Oratory at Paris, who compiled two dictionaries, translated Virgil into French, and continued Fleury's "Ecclesiastical History." b. 1603; d. 1753.

FABRI, Honoré, fa'-bre, a learned Jesuit, who wrote "Physica, seu Rerum Corporearum Scientia," 6 vols. 4to; "Synopsis Optica," 4to; "De Plantis, de Generatione Animalium, et de Homine," 4to, &c. He is said, by some, to have discovered the circulation of the blood before Harvey. b. at Bellay, 1607; n. at Rome, 1683.

FABRIANO, Gentile da, fab'-re-a'-no, an Italian artist of great skill and merit, whose principal works were a picture of the Madonna for the Cathedral of Orvieto, "The Adoration of the Kings," now in the Florence Gallery, and many other works at Florence, Siena, Rome, and Venice, the senate of the latter city having invested him with the patrician toga in acknowledgment of his merit as an artist. A great many of his best works have been lost, and one of these is said to have elicited from Michael Angelo the remark that the artist's style was like his name—gentile. b. at Fabriano, in the Marches of Ancona, about 1370; d. about 1450.

FABRICIVS, Caius, fa'-bri-ush'-ous, a celebrated Roman, who, in his first consulship, obtained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honoured with a triumph. Two years after, he went as ambassador to Pyrrhus, and refused with contempt the presents offered him. Pyrrhus admired the magnanimity of Fabricius, but his admiration was increased when he made a discovery of the perfidious offers of his physician, who had volunteered to the Roman general to poison his master for a sum of money. To this greatness of soul was added the most consummate knowledge of military affairs, and the most perfect simplicity of manners. Fabricius wished to inspire a contempt for luxury among the people. He lived and died in the greatest poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters, when they had arrived at years of maturity. Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

FABRICIUS, George, a learned German antiquary and poet, who, in 1550, published a work entitled "Roma," being an elucidation of the antiquities, &c., of the seven-hilled city. His poems appeared at Bale, in 1567, in two volumes, and besides these he wrote a variety of other pieces, all of which are characterized by great purity and elegance of style. His Latin especially was of high excellence. The emperor Maximilian is said to have conferred a laurel crown upon him shortly before his death, which occurred in 1571. B. at Chemnitz, Upper Saxony, 1516.

FABRICIUS, Jerome, an Italian physician, usually called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth, professed anatomy with extraordinary reputation at Padua. B. 1537; D. 1619. His works on anatomy have been printed in 2 vols. folio.

FABRICIUS, Johann Albert, a learned divine, who became professor of eloquence at Hamburg, and published "Bibliotheca Latina," 2 vols. 4to; "Bibliotheca Græca," 14 vols. 4to; "Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti," 3 vols. 8vo; "Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti," 2 vols. 8vo; "Bibliographia Antiquaria," 4to; "Bibliotheca Latina Ecclesiastica," folio; "Bibliotheca medicæ et infimæ Latinitatis," 5 vols. 8vo. B. at Leipsic, 1668; D. at Hamburg, 1736.

FABRONI, Angelo, fa-bro'-ne, a learned Italian, who was educated first at Faenza, and afterwards at Rome, where he obtained a canonry. He was afterwards appointed prior of the church of St. Lorenzo at Florence, where he remained till called to be curator of the university of Pisa. He is generally known by his Biographies of Italian literati of the 17th and 18th centuries, of which work he published 18 volumes, and left another ready for the press. Besides this, he wrote separate biographies of Cosmo, Lorenzo, Leo, and other eminent persons of the house of Medici, with many panegyrics on learned men. He also conducted the "Giornale di Letterati," and published some religious pieces. B. in Tuscany, 1732; D. at Pisa, 1803.

FABYAN, or FABIAN, Robert, fa'-bi-an, an English historian, and author of a work called the "Concordance of Histories," being a chronicle of the history of England from the first landing of the Romans down to his own time. The first edition was printed by Pinson, in 1516, and the work has been several times republished since. Fabyan was a merchant of London, a member of the Drapers' Company, served the offices of alderman and sheriff, and represented the corporation in certain deputations to the king for redress of grievances in connexion with the duties charged upon English cloth in its importation into the Low Countries. He declined the office of mayor in 1502, on the ground of poverty, though he is known to have been opulent at the time; but then he had sixteen children, which, in his opinion, was a sufficient reason for declining to incur the expenses attending the chief magistracy of London even then. He is believed to have been born in London, though the family from which he sprung had an estate in Essex. B. about 1450; D. about 1512.

FACCIOLEATI, Jacopo, fat'-che-o-la'-te, an Italian scholar, who gave much attention to the study of classical literature, to the revival of which he greatly contributed. He compiled a Latin dictionary, upon which, in conjunction with his pupil Forcellini, he spent nearly forty years of labour, and which was published at Padua in 1771 in four vols. folio. He was professor of logic in the university of Padua, and his lectures and other compositions, which are very voluminous, show him to have been one of the most erudite men of his own or any other time. B. 1683; D. 1769.

FADLALLAH, or GHODSA RASCHID ADDIN FADLALLAH, fad'-lal-la, a Persian historian, was vizier to the sultan Cazan, who reigned at Taurus, and at whose command he compiled a history of the Moguls, which he finished in 1294. He added a supplement to this work by the order of Cazan's successor. The first part was translated into French by La Croix. Lived in the 13th century.

FÆD, John, faed, artist, having early displayed a taste for art, went to Edinburgh when 21 years of age, and exhibited there, in 1850, some pictures delineating humble life, which were readily bought. He afterwards frequently exhibited the productions of his pencil, his subjects being drawn from Shakspeare and his contemporaries, Burns's "Cotter's Saturday Night," "Tam o' Shanter," &c. B. in the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, 1820.

FÆD, Thomas, R.A., brother of the above, a painter of distinction, whose earliest exhibited work was a water-colour drawing from the "Old English Baron." He soon, however, adopted oil as the medium of his conceptions, and successively produced "Scott and his family at Abbotsford," "The Mitherless Bairn," "Home and the Homeless," "The First Break in the Family," "Sermons in the Backwoods," "His Only Pain," "From Dawn to Sunset," &c. Mr. Fæd became an associate of the Scottish Academy in 1849, and shortly afterwards fixed his residence in London, where he was made A.R.A. in 1859, and R.A. in 1864. B. at Burley Mill, Kirkcudbright, 1826.

FAGAN, Christopher Bartholomew, fa'-gan, a comic author, of Irish extraction, was a clerk in a public office in Paris, and devoted his leisure to literary pursuits. His works were published in 1760, in four vols., and the most approved of his pieces, all of which are executed in a delicate and racy style, are entitled—"La Rendezvous," "La Pupille," "L'Amitie Rivale," "Les Originaux," and "Joconde." He had the aversion to business which generally distinguishes men of genius, but, what is more singular, he had also a strong dislike to society. B. at Paris, 1702; D. 1775.

FAGIUS, Paul, fa'-je-us, a German Protestant divine, whose real name was Buchlein. For some time he exercised the office of a schoolmaster, but afterwards entered into orders. In 1541 the plague broke out at Isny, where he resided at the time, and he remained in the place, comforting and ministering to the sick. In 1543 he and Bucer went to England, where archbishop Crammer employed them on a new translation of the Scriptures. b. at Heidelberg, 1504; d. at Cambridge, 1550. In Mary's reign his body was taken up and burnt. He wrote several books on the Hebrew language and the Targums.

FAGEL, Gaspard, fa'-jel, a famous Dutch statesman, who after filling the offices of counsellor-pensionary of Haarlem and recorder to the States-general, was, on the murder of De Witt in 1672, advanced to the vacant position of grand pensionary; and, in 1673, co-operated with Sir William Temple, English ambassador, in arranging the treaty of Nimeguen. Louis XIV., in the course of his war with Holland, attempted to corrupt the pensionary, but the offers were indignantly spurned, and Fagel continued to give the most effective aid to the Prince of Orange, afterwards William III. of England, especially in preparing the way for that prince to the throne of James II., but unfortunately did not live to learn the official notification of William's accession, having died on the 15th of December, 1638. b. 1620. He was a man of great sagacity, of impressive eloquence, and wielded much political influence. He was never married.—Several other members of the same family played prominent and honourable parts in the affairs of Holland, one of whom, Francis Nicholas Fagel, nephew of Gaspard, was one of the most eminent military commanders the republic produced. He enjoyed the friendship of William III.; displayed marked gallantry at the battle of Fleurus in 1690; as well as at the siege of Mons in 1691, at the siege of Namur, at the capture of Bonn in 1703, at the taking of Tournay, and at the battles of Ramillies and Malplaquet, under Marlborough. b. 1718.

FACON, Guy Crescent, fa'-gawen, physician to Louis XIV., who defended the doctrine of the circulation of the blood, and collected numerous plants to enrich the royal gardens, of which he was superintendent. b. at Paris, 1633; d. 1718.

FAHRENHEIT, Gabriel Daniel, fa'-ren-hite, an experimental philosopher, who improved the thermometer, by making use of mercury instead of spirits of wine, and formed a new scale for the instrument, grounded on accurate experiments. The English have generally adopted his scale; but the French prefer Réaumur's. b. at Dantzic, 1686; d. 1736. Fahrenheit wrote "A Dissertation on Thermometers."

FALKE, Sir William Charles, fa'-ke, one of the many distinguished officers who illustrated the annals of the British navy during the last war with France, served as a lieutenant with great credit in the West Indian campaign of 1794, obtained post rank in 1796, and from that time till 1810 he was in constant employment in the West Indies, during which period he captured the French men-of-war L'Armée d'Italie and Hautpoul, assisted in the reduction of the Dutch West Indies in 1807; at the capture of Martinique in 1809, and at that of Guadeloupe in 1810. He subsequently reduced the islands of St. Martin, St. Eustatius, and Saba; and the flags of Holland and France being now expelled from the Antilles, he returned to England. He continued in command of the Aber- cromby (formerly the French ship Hautpoul, which he had himself captured) till the conclusion of the war. He was nominated C.B. in 1815; and, after the escape of Napoleon from Elba, co-operated, in the Malta, 74, with the Austrian general, Lane, in the siege of Gaeta, which surrendered, after an obstinate defence, in August, 1815. For this service Captain Falke received the insignia of a Knight of St. Ferdinand and Merit from the King of the Two Sicilies. He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral in 1819, vice-admiral and Knight Commander of the Bath in 1830, and from 1820 till his death held the commands in the Leeward Islands and at Halifax. b. 1763; d. 1833, at Bermuda.

FAIRBAIRN, William, fair'-bairn, a Scotch mechanist and civil engineer, who was among the first, if not the first, to construct sea-going vessels of iron. He was also continually engaged in experimenting on the qualities of iron, and did much to advance mechanical knowledge in the department of engineering. b. at Kelso, Scotland, 1789.

FAIRFAX, Edward, fair'-faks, an English poet, who translated Tasso's poem of "Godfrey of Bouillon" into English verse, and wrote a curious book entitled "Demonology," in which he avows his belief in witchcraft. b. about 1632.

FAIRFAX, Thomas, Lord, general of the parliamentary army in the civil war, was the eldest son of Ferdinando, Lord Fairfax. He began his military career under Lord Vere, in Holland, and when hostilities commenced between the king and parliament, he took a decided part in favour of the latter, being, like his father, a zealous Presbyterian. He had a principal command in the northern counties of England, where he and his father were defeated in several engagements; but, afterwards, Sir Thomas had better fortune, and distinguished himself so greatly at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, that he was appointed general of the army, in the place of the earl of Essex, and Cromwell became his lieutenant-general. In 1645 he defeated the king's forces at Naseby, after which he marched into the west, where he took Bath, Bristol, and other important places. In 1647 he was made constable of the Tower, and the following year succeeded to the title, by the death of his father. He then proceeded into the eastern counties, and took Colechester, after a brave resistance by Sir George Lisle and Sir Charles Lucas, whom his lordship, after the surrender, caused to be shot. On his return to London, he was named one of the king's judges, but refused to act, though he took no steps to prevent the death of the king, and, at the time of the execution, was kept engaged in prayer by Major Harrison. In 1650 he resigned his commission, and lived in retirement till the Restoration, when he made his peace with Charles II., upon whom he waited at the Hague. b. at Denton, Yorkshire, 1611; d. at Nun Appleton, Yorkshire, 1671. He wrote an account of his public life, and this, in conjunction with the "Fairfax Correspondence," published a few years since, throws much light on the motives which influenced himself and others in taking a prominent part in the important events of those times.

FAITHORNE, William, fa'-thorn, an English painter and engraver, was a soldier in the royal army during the civil war, and was taken prisoner by Cromwell. On obtaining his liberty, he went to France, where he studied under

Falconberg

Champagne. At his return, he practised painting in miniature, and engraving, but chiefly the latter. He also published a book on drawing, graving, and etching. n. in London, 1616; p. 1691. Walpole gives a considerable list of the prints of this artist.—His son, William, was a good engraver in mezzotinto.

FALCONBERG, Mary, Countess of, ful'-kon-berg, the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, and wife of Thomas, Viscount Falconberg, was a woman of considerable talents, a member of the church of England, and contributed to the restoration of Charles II. She was possessed of great personal beauty, and so much spirit and energy that Burnet says, "She was more worthy to be Protector than her brother." p. 1712. (See CROMWELL.)

FALCONER, Thomas, ful'-ko'-ner, a great student and eminent scholar, was the author of "Chronological Tables" from the reign of Solomon to the death of Alexander the Great, "Observations on Pliny's Account of the Temple of Diana at Ephesus," published in the "Archæologia," and an edition of Strabo, published long after the author's death. Such was his passion for the acquisition of knowledge, that he used to read in a kneeling posture, the only one he could bear during an illness of nearly thirty years. He was almost constantly enduring acute pain, and that he was able under these circumstances to study at all, much less compose his various works, is wonderful. p. at Chester, 1736; p. 1792.

FALCONER, William, brother of the preceding, a physician in large practice at Bath, was a clever writer on medical and chemical subjects, many valuable treatises having been produced by him. He ascertained the properties of carbonic acid gas, a discovery which has been erroneously attributed to Dr. Priestley. p. at Chester, 1743; p. 1824.

FALCONER, William, a Scotch poet, who was born of humble parents, and bred to the sea. In 1751 he published a poem on "The Death of the Prince of Wales;" but his reputation rests on "The Shipwreck," a poem in three cantos, which is highly descriptive and pathetic. It was suggested by a shipwreck, suffered by himself, in a voyage from Alexandria to Venice, when only he and two others of the crew were saved. Falconer also wrote "An Ode to the Duke of York," which obtained him the post of purser to the Royal George. He likewise compiled a useful work, entitled "The Marine Dictionary," 4to, and published a poem against Wilkes and Churchill, under the title of "The Demagogue." He sailed from England, in the Aurora, for the East Indies; but, after her departure from the Cape of Good Hope, the ship was never heard of. p. about 1780; lost, it is supposed in the Mozambique Channel, in the winter of 1769. His father was a barber in Edinburgh.

FALCONER, Stephen Maurice, ful'-ko'-nai, a famous sculptor, was a native of Paris, was admitted a member of the Academy in 1741, and soon produced a rapid succession of admirable works that won for him a European fame. In 1766, Catharine II. invited him to Russia to execute a statue of Peter the Great, and the result was the well-known colossal figure of the emperor on horseback at St. Petersburg. Falconer was an author as well as an artist; and after his return to Paris in 1779, published some works in reference to sculpture. p. 1716; p.

Falkner

1791.—Peter Falconet, his son, a painter of historical pictures and portraits, visited England in 1776, and gained two prizes from the Society of Arts.

FALCONIA, Proba, ful'-ko'-ne-a, a Latin poetess, who composed a cento from Virgil, containing the sacred history from the Creation, and the history of Christ in verse. Lived in the 4th century.

FALISBI, Ordelafo, ful'-e-air'-e, doge of Venice, who sailed with a fleet to the assistance of Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, about 1102. He conquered Dalmatia, Croatia, and other provinces; but, in defending the republic against the Hungarians, was killed, 1117.

FALISBI, Marino, doge of Venice in 1354, formed the design of murdering all the senators, to render himself absolute; but the plot being discovered, he was beheaded. This forms the subject of one of Byron's dramas. p. 1355.

FALK, John Peter, falk, an ingenious Swede, who studied medicine at Upsal, where, also, he applied himself assiduously to botany under Linnaeus, by whose recommendation he was appointed professor of botany in the Apothecaries' Garden, and keeper of a cabinet of natural history at St. Petersburg. p. 1727; shot himself, 1774. His observations, made in his travels, were published at St. Petersburg, in 1785, 3 vols. 4to.

FALKLAND, Henry Cary, Viscount, faulk'-land, was lord-deputy for Ireland, from 1623 to 1629. His administration, however, was by no means popular. He wrote "A History of that most unfortunate Prince, Edward II." p. 1633.

FALKLAND, Lucius Cary, Viscount, the eldest son of the preceding, was educated in Trinity College, Dublin, where he became distinguished for his proficiency in classical and general literature. He married a lady of small fortune, which greatly displeased his father, when he retired to a country house, and devoted himself to the study of Greek. On the breaking out of the rebellion he joined the army.

marked the conduct of Charles I. In the midst of the troubles which distracted the kingdom, he lost the buoyancy of his spirits, and would frequently ejaculate to himself, in mournful tone, "Peace! peace!" which, however, he was not destined to live to see. At the battle of Newbury, he volunteered into the cavalry commanded by Lord Byron, and fell, shot through the body. His remains were not found till the following day. p. 1610; killed, 1643. Lord Clarendon, in his "History of the Rebellion," says that this nobleman "was a person of such prodigious parts of learning and knowledge, of that inestimable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity." Notwithstanding the apparent excess of this panegyric, Falkland seems to have deserved it; for he was an ornament to the nation, and the envy of the age. One of his sayings was, "I pity unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day." He is represented among the statues in the lobby of the House of Commons.

FALKNER, Thomas, falk'-ner, an English surgeon, who became a Jesuit, and acted as a missionary in Paraguay. He returned to England after the suppression of the order to which he belonged, and lived subsequently in retirement. He was the author of a "Desecration of Patagonia," &c. D. 1780.

FALLOPO, Gabriel, fał-lo-po-o, an eminent physician and anatomist, who discovered the tubes of the uterus which bear his name. He was professor of anatomy, first at Pisa, and afterwards at Padua, where he died in 1562. D. at Modena, 1523. His works were printed in 3 vols. folio, at Venice, in 1584.

FANCOUET, Samuel, fau'-koi, a dissenting minister, who became pastor of a congregation at Salisbury, whence he was obliged to remove for rejecting the Calvinistic notions of election and reprobation. He then went to London, and established the first circulating library, about 1740, in which, however, he had little encouragement. He wrote some controversial tracts, and died poor, in 1763. D. in the W. of England, 1678.

FANNIUS, Caius, fan'-ne-us, surnamed Strabo, was consul of Rome 591 A.U.C. and rendered himself remarkable by a law, which prohibited any person from spending more than a certain sum daily.—His son was distinguished for eloquence. He was consul in the 630th year of Rome.—There was another of this name, who wrote a history of Nero's cruelties, the loss of which is greatly regretted by Pliny the Younger. He lived in the 1st century.

FANSHAWE, Sir Richard, fan'-shaw, a statesman and poet, who was educated at Cambridge, and in 1635 was sent ambassador to Spain, whence, in 1641, he returned, and acted steadily for the royal cause. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and closely confined for a considerable time; but at last recovered his liberty, and went to Breda, where he was knighted by Charles II. in 1656. At the Restoration he was made master of requests, and sent to Portugal to negotiate the marriage with the king and the infanta Catharine. In 1664 he was sent ambassador to Spain, where he died of fever in 1688. D. in Hertfordshire, 1608. He translated into English the "Pastor Fido," or Faithful Shepherd, of Guarini; also the "Lusiad" of Camoens. His letters during his embassies in Spain and Portugal were printed in 1702, 8vo.

FARADAY, Michael, far'-a-dai, a distinguished English chemist and natural philosopher, who was at first apprenticed to the trade of book-binding, but whose mechanical genius and talent for investigation procured him the ultimate patronage of Sir Humphry Davy. Through his interest he was taken into the laboratory of the Royal Institution of London, where he was enabled to pursue his studies. In 1827 he published his work on "Chemical Manipulations," and from that time continued a regular contributor to the "Philosophical Transactions," spreading his investigations over the wide field of electricity. He succeeded, if not in discovering, at all events in establishing, the laws of electro-magnetism, and has, perhaps, done more than any other man towards the elucidation of electric phenomena. On this subject he published three volumes, entitled "Experimental Researches in Electricity," in which are included his researches into the magnetic nature of oxygen gas, light, and other important subjects. A true philosopher, he rejected all posts of honour, confining himself to his sphere in the Royal Institution, where the charm of his lectures was a continual attraction to those who delighted to follow him through the paths of magnetic science. In private life his character was irreproachable, and characterized by great goodness and humanity. D. in London, 1794; D. 1807.

FARDELLA, Michael Angelo, far-dail'-la, was professor of natural history and astronomy at Padua, and wrote several books on his favourite sciences, which are little known. D. in Sicily, 1650; D. at Naples, 1718.

FAREL, William, far'-el, a Protestant divine, who studied at Paris; but having embraced the Reformed religion, he left France and settled at Geneva, where he laboured with great zeal against popery, and was there the chief actor in establishing the Reformation. He was banished thence, with Calvin, in 1538, for refusing to submit to the synod at Berne. Farel then settled at Neuchâtel, where he died in 1565. D. in Dauphiné, 1489. His writings are few.

FAREY, John, fai'-re, a clever geologist and surveyor, who made a survey of the county of Derby for the Board of Agriculture, which was published in two volumes. He took great pains to investigate the relative position of the various strata throughout Great Britain, and collected specimens illustrative of this valuable department of science; and it is in this last respect that his chief merit lies. His observations on this subject were published in a series of papers in Nicholson's "Philosophical Journal." D. at Woburn, Bedfordshire, 1786; D. 1826.

FARIA E SOUSA, Emanuel, fa-re'-a ee soo'-sa, a Portuguese knight, who wrote a "History of Portugal" to the reign of Henry the Cardinal, a "History of the Portuguese Dominions in Europe, Asia, and Africa," and some other works. D. 1590; D. at Madrid, 1640.

FARINATO, Paolo, far'-re-na'-to, a celebrated painter of Verona, who was a pupil of Titian, and of whose works there are several excellent specimens in the churches of Verona and the vicinity. His style of design is robust and vigorous, and his colouring partakes largely of the character of the Venetian school. He likewise etched a few designs from sacred and mythological subjects. D. 1522; D. 1606, on the same day as his wife.

FARINELLI, far'-e-nail'-le, a distinguished Neapolitan vocalist, whose real name is said to have been Carlo Broschi. He studied under Porpora at Rome, whence he went to Vienna, where he became a great favourite with Charles VI., who loaded him with riches and presents. In 1734 he visited London, and, by the captivating power of his melody, drew all who could afford to hear him. So great was the attraction of his voice, that Handel was forced to dismiss a rival company, over which he was presiding, notwithstanding his own immense popularity. His influence over the musical sympathies of his audiences seems never to have been equalled. D. at Naples, 1706; D. 1782.

FARMER, Hugh, far'-mer, a learned dissenting divine, who wrote "An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of our Lord's Temptation in the Wilderness," 8vo, in which he considered that event as a divine vision, representing the different scenes of our Saviour's future ministry. It was considered by several writers. In 1771 he published his "Dissertation on Miracles." His next publication was an "Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament," whom he maintained to have been afflicted with natural diseases. This work was replied to by Dr. Worthington and Mr. Fell; to the former Mr. Farmer returned a temperate answer, but on the other he was unmercifully severe. His last performance was entitled "The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient Heathen Nations, asserted and proved." This was also attacked by Mr. Fell, in an acute and learned treatise, in 1785. In the same year Mr. Farmer was almost deprived of his sight; but was relieved by a surgical operation, and enabled to pursue his studies. b. at Shrewsbury, 1714; n. at Walthamstow, 1787. He directed his executors to burn his papers; but some of his letters, and fragments of a dissertation on the story of Balaam, were published in 1804, with his life

FARRER, Richard, a divine and antiquary, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1760, and the same year was appointed classical tutor. In 1767 he took the degree of B.D., and became one of the preachers at Whitehall. In the preceding year he published his "Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare," in which he proved that all the knowledge of ancient history and mythology possessed by the immortal bard was drawn from translations. In 1775 Mr. Farmer was chosen master of his college, and took his degree of D.D. He also became chancellor and prebendary of Lichfield, librarian to the university of Cambridge, and prebendary of Canterbury, which last situation he resigned for a residentiaryship of St. Paul's. He collected ample materials for a history of Leicester; but these, with the plates, he gave to Mr. Nichols, for the use of his history of that county. b. at Leicester, 1735; n. 1797.—His collection of scarce and curious books was sold by auction.

FARNABY, Thomas, far'-na-be, an eminent English schoolmaster, who, after a variety of fortune, settled in London, where he acquired great reputation as a teacher. In 1616 he was admitted to the degree of M.A. at Cambridge. In the civil war he was imprisoned for his loyalty, and died in 1647. b. in London, about 1575. He published Juvenal and Persius; Seneca's "Tragedies"; Martial; Lucan's "Pharsalia"; and other classical authors, with notes; "Index Rhetoricens et Poeticus;" "Florilegium Epigrammatum Græcorum;" and "Systema Grammaticum."

FARNESI, Pier Luigi, far'-nai-se, the first duke of Parma and Placentia, was the son of Pope Paul III. by a secret marriage, before he became a cardinal. He was assassinated by his subjects, on account of his oppressive conduct, in 1547.

FARNESI, Alexander, a Roman cardinal, was the eldest son of the above. Charles V. said, that if all the members of the sacred college were like Farnese, it would be the most august assembly in the world. b. 1520; d. 1589.

FARNESI, Alexander, third duke of Parma, and nephew of the preceding, his mother being Margaret, a princess of Austria, distinguished himself as an able general in the service of Philip II. against the Netherlands, and afterwards in the Catholic army in France, in support of the League against Henry IV. He was wounded at the siege of Candebec, and died soon after, at Arras, in 1592. b. 1548.—(For an account of this commander's exploits, see Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic.") in Derbyshire, where he died, 1736. b. in Derbyshire. He translated the "Life of Pope Sixtus V." from the Italian, 1754, folio; Davila's "History of the Civil Wars of France," in 1757, 2 vols. 4to; the Works of Machiavelli, 1761, 2 vols. 4to; and Fleury's "History of the Israelites," 12mo.

FARQUHAR, George, far'-quor, an English comic writer, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and quitted that seat of learning for the boards of the Dublin theatre. Here, while playing Guoymar, in the "Indian Emperor" of Dryden, he was so unfortunate as to stab a brother actor, when he relinquished the stage and proceeded to London, where he received from the earl of Orrery a lieutenancy in his lordship's regiment. He now commenced writing for the theatre, and in 1693 appeared his first dramatic piece, entitled "Love in a Bottle," which met with success. This was followed, in 1700, by the "Constant Couple, or Trip to the Jubilee." The same year he was in Holland, of which country he has given a humorous description in his Letters. In 1701 appeared the comedy of "Sir Harry Wildair," and the year following, his "Miscellanies." In 1703 he brought out "The Inconstant, or the Way to Win Him." His next piece was the popular play of "The Recruiting Officer." His last comedy was "The Beau's Stratagem," which also had a great run, and is his best production. b. in Londonderry, 1678; d. 1707. Farquhar's comedies are lively, natural, and full of business; but they are also extremely licentious. Cibber, in his "Lives," thus speaks of him and his comedies:—"He seems to have been a man of genius rather sprightly than great, rather flowery than solid. His comedies are diverting, because his characters are natural, and such as we frequently meet with; but he has used no art in drawing them, nor does there appear any force of thinking in his performances, or any deep penetration into nature; but rather a superficial view, pleasant enough to the eye, though capable of leaving no great impression on the mind."

FARRAGUT, David, far'-ra-gut, a distinguished admiral in the United States navy, born towards the close of the eighteenth century, who entered the service in 1810. He served in the Essex in the war with Great Britain, 1812-14, and had the command of the Saratoga in the Mexican war, 1845-8. In the American civil war he assisted in the reduction of New Orleans and Vicksburg, and, after suffering defeat at Wilmington in 1864, took that place and Mobile in 1865.

FABREN, Eliza, far'-ren, countess of Derby, a celebrated actress, was the daughter of a surgeon at Cork, who afterwards became a provincial actor, and died at an early age, leaving his family in difficult circumstances. Eliza made her first appearance in 1773, appeared at the Haymarket in 1777, and subsequently at Drury Lane and Covent Garden. While conducting the private theatricals at the Duke of Newcastle's mansion in Privy-gardens, she became acquainted with the earl of Derby, who married her in 1797. She was of irreproachable moral character, and was received by George III. and his consort at court. b. 1759; d. 1829.

FASTOLFE, Sir John, fas'-tolf, a famous English general, who served with great reputation in France, where he obtained several high posts while the English held possessions in that kingdom. In 1440 he returned to his own country, and distinguished himself as a friend to the poor, and an encourager of learning. He was a considerable benefactor to the university of Cambridge, and to Magdalen College, Oxford. B. at Yarmouth, 1377; d. 1459. Though there be a strong similarity in the names, he is not to be taken for Sir John Falstaff, the knight so humorously rendered by Shakspeare in some of his historical plays and comedies.

FAUCHET, Claude, fo'-sha, a French antiquary, whose works are "Gaulish and French Antiquities;" "The Liberties of the Gallican Church;" "The Origin of Knights, Armorial Bearings, and Heralds;" "Origin of Dignities and Magistrates in France;" all printed together at Paris, in 1610, 4to. B. 1530; d. 1601.

FAUCHET, Claude, a French priest, who became vicar-general to the archbishop of Bruges and preacher to Louis XVI. That monarch, however, was disgusted with his excessive vanity and theatrical mode of action, which, it is said, made Fauchet a violent revolutionist. He took a leading part in storming the Bastille, and preached a thanksgiving sermon on the occasion. In another address, he designated Jesus Christ as the first sans culotte in the world. He entered among the Illuminati, and, in 1791, became what was called the constitutional bishop of Bayeux. He was also deputy for the department of Calvados to the Legislative Assembly, and afterwards a member of the Convention. B. in Dorne, 1744; guillotined, 1793. His works are, "A Panegyric on St. Louis," pronounced before the French Academy; "A Funeral Oration for the Duke of Orleans," "Enlogium on Benjamin Franklin," "Discourse on Universal Manners," &c.—There are several other French writers of this name.

FAUST, or FOST, John, foust, a goldsmith of Mentz, who is said by some to have been the inventor of printing. He is, however, supposed only to have assisted Gutenberg, and his own son-in-law Schoeffer, in bringing this noble discovery to perfection. The first production, by the new process of metallic types, was produced in 1459, and was entitled "Durandi Rationale Divinorum Officiorum," by Faust and Schoeffer. This was succeeded by the "Catholicon Joannis Jannensis." The greatest work, however, of all was the Bible, in 1482; previous to which they had executed two beautiful editions of the Psalter. The story of Faust's being arrested as a magician at Paris, on account of the exactness of the copies of the Bible which he took thither for sale, is not entitled to credit. He was there in 1466, and is supposed to have died soon after.

FAUST, Dr. John, a German philosopher, who, educated at Wittenberg, thence proceeded to Ingolstadt, where he studied medicine with great success, and, it is said, astrology and magic also; expending, in prosecuting his chemical experiments, a considerable fortune, left him by an uncle. His countrymen, in their ignorance, imagined him one having dealings with supernatural powers; and this view of Faust subsequently formed a fertile theme for the dramatist, poet, and musician, as well as for the sculptor and painter. Goethe, especially, in his "Faust," has depicted, with a rich imagination, the doctor and his spirit attendant, Mephistopheles. Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

FAUSTA, Flavia Maximiana, faw's-ta, the second wife of Constantine the Great. By her accusations the emperor put his son Crispus, by a former wife, to death; but her infidelity becoming notorious, she was suffocated in a bath, 326.

FAUSTINA, Annia Galeria, the elder, faw'st'-na, was the daughter of Annus Verus, and the wife of Antoninus Pius. Notwithstanding her debaucheries, the emperor would not divorce her. D. 141, aged about 37.—Her daughter was the wife of Marcus Aurelius, and exceeded her mother in dissoluteness. D. 175.

FAVART, Charles Simon, fav'-ar, a French composer of operas, whose pieces are numerous and excellent. They make 10 vols. in 8vo. B. at Paris, 1710; d. there, 1792.—His wife was an admirable actress and singer. She died in 1772; B. 1727.

FAVRE, Jules Gabriel Claude, favv'-r, an eminent French barrister, who commenced his public life by taking part in the revolution of 1830, and soon acquired notoriety as one of the chief advocates of republicanism in France. He was under-secretary for foreign affairs in 1848, and became a determined opponent of Napoleon III. after his election to the presidency, and still more so after the coup d'état of December 2, 1851. He was returned to the legislative assembly as one of the representatives for Paris in 1853; conducted the defence of Orsini for his attempt on the life of Napoleon III. in the same year; and, in 1863, was elected to fill the chair that the death of Victor Cousin left vacant in the French Academy. B. at Lyons, 1809.

FAWCETT, Sir William, faw'-set, an English general, whose military predilections were early discovered, when he offered himself as a volunteer to serve in Flanders, and was soon presented with a pair of colours. He paid unremitting attention to his duty, and, in his leisure hours, studied the French and German languages. While a lieutenant in the Guards, he translated from the former the "Reveries, or Memoirs upon the Art of War, by Field-Marshal Count Saxe," published in 4to, in 1757. He also translated from the German, "Regulations for the Prussian Cavalry," published the same year. This work was followed by "Regulations for the Prussian Infantry," to which was added "Prussian Tactics," published in 1759. On General Elliott being ordered to Germany, in the Seven Years' War, Mr. Fawcett accompanied him as aide-de-camp. Subsequently he was attached, in the same capacity, to the marquis of Granby, who sent him to England with the account of the battle of Warburgh. He was soon afterwards promoted to a company in the Guards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Frederick the Great, king of Prussia, made him flattering offers to induce him to enter into his service, which, however, he declined. His services and high character were duly valued by his king and country, and he was made knight of the Bath, colonel of the 3rd regiment of Dragoon Guards, and governor of Chelsea Hospital. B. near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1728; d. 1804, and was buried with great pomp in the chapel of Chelsea College.

FAWKES, Guido, or Guy, fawks, the most active and daring conspirator in the "Gunpowder Plot," which was designed, in 1605, to blow up king, lords, and bishops, in the House of Parliament assembled. He was of a respectable family in Yorkshire; but entered into the Spanish army in Flanders, and in 1598 was at the taking of Calais by the Archduke Albert. Little more is known of his history, beyond his connexion with the conspirators, who had pledged themselves by an oath to blow up the House of Lords, on account of James I. having given an assurance to his council, "that he had never any intention of granting toleration to the Catholics." Fawkes had undertaken to fire the powder which had been concealed under the devoted house; but about twelve o'clock, on the night of the 4th of November, was caught in the cellar, with matches and a dark lantern, ready to perform the deed for which he and seven others suffered on the scaffold in 1606.

FAWKES, Francis, an English poet and divine, who took his degree in arts at Jesus College, Cambridge. On entering into orders, he settled at Bramham, Yorkshire, but afterwards obtained the vicarage of Orpington, in Kent, which he exchanged for the rectory of Hayes, where he died in 1777. b. in Yorkshire, 1721. He published a volume of poems and translations of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, and Theocritus. His version of the "Argonautics" of Apollonius was published in 1750. Mr. Fawkes also lent his name to an edition of the Bible with notes. It was in translation, however, that he excelled. The "Odes of Anacreon," Dr. Johnson says, are finely translated.

FAY, Charles François de Cisternal du, fai, an eminent French naturalist and chemist, who, as superintendent of the Jardin des Plantes in Paris, raised that establishment to be one of the greatest of the kind in Europe. He obtained distinction also by his researches concerning phosphoric light in the mercurial vacuum in the barometer, and in connexion with the salts of lime, the magnet, and the nature of electricity. Dufou, through his influence, was named his successor at the Jardin des Plantes. His writings appeared in the "Transactions of the Academy of Sciences," of which he was a member. b. at Paris, 1693; d. 1739.

FAYDIT, Anselm, fai-de, a Provençal poet, or troubadour, who was patronized by Richard Cœur de Lion. b. 1220. He wrote a poem on the death of Richard I., "The Palace of Love," and several comedies.

FAYDIT, Peter, a French priest of the congregation of the Oratory, whence he was compelled to remove, for publishing a book on the Cartesian philosophy, contrary to a prohibition from his superiors. He also wrote "Illustrations of Ecclesiastical History," 8vo; "A Treatise on the Trinity," for which he was imprisoned; and a wretched critique on Telemachus. b. 1649; d. 1709.

FAYET, Mary Magdalene, Countess de la fai-et, the wife of the Count de la Fayette, wrote the romances of "Zaide," and the "Princess of Cleves," also the "Prince de Montpensier," "Memoirs of the Court of France," the "History of Henrietta of England," and other works. b. 1632; d. 1693.

FAYETTE, LA. (See LA FAYETTE.)

FAZIO, Bartolomeo, fa'-se-o, an Italian biographer and historian of the 15th century, was sprung from humble parents, but obtaining a knowledge of Greek and Latin, was patronized by Alfonso, king of Naples, at whose instance he translated into Latin Arrian's "History of Alexander the Great." His principal original work is entitled "De Viris Illustribus," and contains short memoirs of the most eminent of his contemporaries. b. near Spezia, in the Gulf of Genoa, 1400; d. 1457.

FEARNE, Charles, fern, an English writer on jurisprudence and metaphysics, was educated at Westminster school, and became a member of the Inner Temple. He subsequently practised as a chamber counsel and conveyancer, and was eminently successful. He wrote a great many works on legal subjects, besides compiling cases and opinions on interesting causes, and was the author of a metaphysical work entitled "An Essay on Consciousness; or, a Series of Evidences of a Distinct Mind." b. 1749; d. 1794.

FEATLEY, Daniel, feel-le, a controversial divine, who studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and was afterwards rector of Lambeth. He won distinction by maintaining a controversy with two Jesuits, in recompense for which Archbishop Abbot gave him the livings of Allhallows, Breadstreet, London, and Acton, Middlesex. His principal work is entitled "Clavis Mystica; a Key opening divers difficult Texts of Scripture." He held disputes likewise with the Anabaptists, and wrote a tract against them with the quaint title of "The Dipper Dipt; or, the Anabaptist plunged over Head and Ears, and Shunk in the Washing." b. at Charlton-upon-Otmore, Oxfordshire, 1552; d. 1635.

FEBRE, Philip François Nazaire, félr, was sprung from mean parentage, but, possessed of a restless spirit and some ability, he became successively actor, comic writer, and statesman. When sixteen, he received the prize from the French Academy for a poem called the "Study of Nature;" and soon afterwards had awarded to him the poetical prize at the Floral Games of Toulouse. This prize was a golden eglantine, or wild rose, and from this circumstance he thenceforth called himself D'Eglantine. He threw himself into the revolutionary movement, and came prominently into notice in the insurrection of the 10th of August, and shortly afterwards obtained the post of secretary to Danton, then minister of justice. He joined Danton in the schemes of the Hébertists, aided in the ruin of the Girondists, and then joined Robespierre against his former associate Hébert. These intrigues, however, led to the downfall of Danton and his associates, and Febre was tried along with his chief, and guillotined in 1794. b. at Carcassonne, 1775.

FECHTER, Charles Albert, fek-ter, an actor who acquired celebrity in London for his performance of Hamlet. He became lessee of the Lyceum theatre in 1863, and produced many sensational melodramas with much success. b. in London about 1823.

FECKENHAM, John de, fek-en-ham, the last abbot of Westminster, whose right name was Howman, but who was called Feckenham from the place of his birth. On the commencement of the Reformation, he opposed it with spirit, and was sent to the Tower, where he continued till Queen Mary's accession, when he was made abbot of Westminster. Queen Elizabeth, whose life he had saved by his remonstrances with Mary when the latter designed her death, would have made him archbishop of Canterbury, if he would have conformed; but he refused. He sat in her first parliament, and protested against the Reformation; for which he was committed to the Tower. He continued in confinement till 1563, and was then delivered to the care of the bishop of Winchester. b. at Feckenham, Worcestershire; d. in the castle of Wisbeach, in 1585. He was a learned and FEDOR I., Ivanovich, fat-dor, the last czar of the dynasty of Rurik, on the throne of Russia. He began his reign in 1584, and being weak, both in body and mind, assigned the government of his affairs to Godonoff, who seems to have managed them with dexterity and vigour. In his reign the peasants of Muscovy were converted into serfs, and attached to the land. Previously, they had enjoyed personal liberty. The conquest of Siberia was achieved in the reign of his father, Ivan IV., and many negotiations with foreign courts were effected; so that this period may be deemed by no means the least remarkable in the Muscovite annals. n. 1587; n. 1598.

FEDOR II. Alexievich czar of Russia, and eldest brother of Peter the Great, ascended the throne when only nineteen years of age, and evinced a strength of will and determination of character, which, had he lived, might have anticipated the reforms which his younger brother was subsequently destined to effect among the people over whom he was called to reign. Fedor's sway is rendered memorable, on account of his calling into his presence the Muscovite nobles, who desolated the country with broils about their claims to family precedence, and throwing the rolls of the "Kazriad," or Arrangement, into the fire. The genealogical records, which did not relate to claims of precedence, were preserved and properly arranged, in accordance with his will. n. 1657; n. 1682.

FELIX, Rhynvis, fit, a distinguished Dutch writer in the paths of poetry, fiction, and the drama. His most successful poem, which is entitled "Fanny," made its appearance in 1787. His novels never enjoyed a high reputation, and his best drama is named "Thirza; or, the Triumph of Religion." His muse had a religious cast; and two poems of the didactic kind, entitled "Old Age," and "The Grave," were very much extolled by his countrymen. His works, in 13 volumes, were printed at the Hague, in 1825. n. at Zwolle, 1753; n. there, 1824.

FELIBIEN, André, fe-lib'-e-en, a French historiographer, who wrote "Entretiens sur les Vies, et sur les Ouvrages des plus excellens Peintres," 5 vols. 4to; "The Principles of Architecture, Paintings, and Sculpture," 4to; and "Conferences of the Royal Academy of Painting." He became superintendent of the royal buildings at Paris, and was the friend of Nicholas Poussin, whose acquaintance he made at Rome. n. at Chartres, 1619; n. 1695.—His sons, John François and Michael, were also ingenious men. The first succeeded him in his place, and wrote "The Lives of Celebrated Architects," 4to; and "A Description of Versailles." n. 1733.—Michael was a Benedictine of St. Maur, and wrote "The History of the Abbey of St. Denis," folio; and began "The History of Paris," which was afterwards completed by Lobineau, in 5 vols. folio. n. 1679.—James Felibien, the brother of André, was canon of Chartres and archdeacon of Vendôme. He wrote several religious works. n. 1624; n. 1716.

FELICE, Fortuné Barthélemy de, fat-le-chai, an indefatigable continental writer, who was originally a professor of sciences at Rome and Naples. Compelled to quit Rome in consequence of an intrigue with the countess of Panzutti, he for a long time wandered in Italy and Switzerland, finally taking up his residence at Berne, where he continued his scientific labours, and connected himself with Haller. Here he embraced Protestantism and married. Subsequently he formed, at Yverdun, in the canton of Vaud, a large printing establishment, whence issued a number of good books, he, at the same time, successfully directing an academy. His first publications were translations, from the English and French into Italian and Latin, of those scientific works which he wished to make known to Italy; among others, those of Newton, Descartes, Maupertuis, and D'Alembert. From 1753, he edited, with Tscherner, some literary and scientific journals, which were held in high estimation, as also several other writings of great merit. Finally he published, from 1770 to 1780, in 48 vols. 4to, and 10 vols. of plates, the Encyclopædia, known as that of Yverdun. In this great work, of which Diderot's formed, in some measure, the base, he had, as collaborators, Euler, Haller, Lalande, and other German, French, and Italian writers. Besides the works here named, his country owes to him the production of other instructive and well-digested volumes. n. at Rome, 1723; n. at Yverdun, 1789.

Fell

FELIX I., fe'-lix, succeeded Pope Dionysius in 269, and was canonized. He wrote an epistle against Sabellius and Paulus Samosatenus, which is extant. n. 275.

FELIX II., antipope, was placed in the papal chair in 355, by the emperor Constans, during the exile of Liberius, on the return of whom he was expelled. Constans would have had the two popes reign together; but the people exclaimed, "One God, one Christ, and one bishop!" Felix was then exiled, and died in 365.

FELIX III. succeeded Simplicius, in 483. He had a violent dispute with the emperor Zeno in behalf of the Western church, and died in 492.

FELIX IV., a native of Benevento, ascended the chair after John L. in 526. He governed the church with zeal and piety, and died in 530.

FELIX V. (See AMADEUS VIII.)

FELIX, bishop of Urgella, in Catalonia, espoused the notion of his friend Elipand, archbishop of Toledo, that Jesus Christ was the son of God only by adoption. For this, Charlemagne caused him to be deposed and banished to Lyons, where he died in 815.

FELL, John, fel, a learned English prelate, who was educated at Christchurch, Oxford, of which his father was dean. In the civil war he was ejected from the college for his loyalty. At the Restoration he was made canon and dean of Christchurch, to which college he was a liberal benefactor. He served the office of vice-chancellor several times, and, in 1675, was made bishop of Oxford, with leave to hold the deanery in commendam. n. at Longworth, Berkshire, 1625; n. 1686. His works are, "The Life of Dr. Hammond," "A Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles," editions of several ancient authors, with notes; as Cyprian and others. The bishop's father was turned out of his deanery by the Parliamentarians, in 1647, and died of grief for the execution of the king.

of that institution, which ended in his dismissal, without being heard in his own defence. Some friends then subscribed for him a yearly stipend of £100, for which he was to deliver a course of lectures on the evidences of Christianity. Four of these were given by him in 1797; but the treatment he had received brought on a complaint, of which he died in that year. b. at Cockermouth, Cumberland, 1735. Mr. Fell was the author of an answer to Mr. Farmer's "Essay on the Demoniacs," and another in reply to that gentleman, "On the Idolatry of Greece and Rome;" an "Essay on the Love of One's Country," "Genuine Protestantism," "A Letter to Mr. Burke on the Penal Laws," "An Essay towards an English Grammar," and several other papers.

FELLENBERG, Emanuel de, fell-en-bairg, a Swiss nobleman, who, after taking part in the public affairs of his country during the occupation of the French, which he did all in his power to resist, devoted his life and fortune to the cause of education. In 1799, he purchased an estate near Berne, where he organized a system of tuition which was designed to show what education could do for humanity. His life from this time is a continued record of benevolent enterprises, labours for the diffusion of knowledge, and the improvement of the people. He possessed singular tact in disarming the opposition of interested or jealous opponents, and ultimately accomplished a large measure of success for his favourite projects. b. at Berne, 1771; d. 1814.

FELLER, Joachim Frederick, fell-ler, a learned German, who became secretary to the duke of Weimar, and published "Monumenta Varia inedita," 1714, &c.; "Miscellanea Leibnitiana," "Genealogy of the House of Brunswick," &c. b. 1673; d. 1726.

FELLER, Francis Xavier, an ex-Jesuit, who published, at Luxembourg, "An Historical and Literary Journal," from 1774 to 1794, "A Geographical Dictionary," and "The Historical Dictionary," in 8 vols. 8vo, at Liège. The editors of the last edition of the "Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique" are very severe on him on account of this last work, which they call a piracy committed on their own. b. at Brussels, 1735; d. at Ratisbon, 1802. Feller also wrote "Observations on the Philosophy of Newton," "An Impartial Examination of the Epochs of Nature," by Buffon, &c.

FELLOWS, Sir Charles, fell-lows, a traveller, who, in 1838, made a tour in Asia Minor, and explored the banks of the ancient Xanthus, and discovered the ruins of Xanthus, the ancient capital of Lycia, Tlos, and thirteen other cities, in all of which he found a greater or less number of works of art. A large proportion of these were ultimately transported to England, and now form the Lycian saloon in the British Museum. In 1852 he republished the journals of his travels in a cheap form, under the title of "Travels and Researches in Asia Minor; particularly in the Province of Lycia." In 1845 he was knighted for his discoveries. b. at Nottingham, 1799; d. 1860.

FELTON, John, fell-ton, a Catholic gentleman, who placed the pope's bull, excommunicating Queen Elizabeth, upon the gates of the bishop of London's palace, for which he was executed, in 1570.—His son Thomas was an ecclesiastic of the order of St. Francis, and, visiting England as a missionary, was apprehended and executed, in 1588.—John Felton, grandson of the first-named, assassinated the Duke of Buckingham in 1628, for which he was tried and executed.

FELTRE, Henri Jacques Guillaume Clarke, Duc de, feltr, entered the French military service in 1781, and, by the time he was twenty-seven years of age, he had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, chiefly by the patronage of the duke of Orleans. In 1793 he was made general; and, in 1795, was sent on a secret mission to Vienna, and to the seat of war in Italy, for the purpose of watching the ambitious movements of Napoleon I. In a short time, however, he was fascinated by the rising star of that great man, entered his service, and, throughout his varying fortunes, continued with him till his fall. In 1807 he was made Minister of War, an office which he retained, through much ill-will and clamour, till 1814. In 1809 he was made duke of Feltre. After the fall of the emperor, he served Louis XVIII.; but his merits, however appreciated by the sovereign, were not proof against the continual attacks of other courtiers, and he was sent into a kind of honourable exile at Rouen, with the command of the 3rd division. b. at Landrecies, 1765; d. at Rouen, 1818.

FÉNELON, Francis de Salignac de Lamoignon, faï-nai-lauwgn, archbishop of Cambrai, completed his studies at Paris, where, when young, he distinguished himself as a preacher. In 1686 he was employed by Louis XIV. as a missionary in Poitou, to convert the Protestants; and, by his persuasive eloquence, made many friends. In 1689 he became tutor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri, which office he discharged so well, that he was preferred to the archbishopric of Cambrai. About this time he fell into trouble, on account of his book entitled "The Maxims of the Saints," which was charged with favouring the mystical principles of Madame de Guyon. Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, who was a violent enemy of that celebrated mystic, attacked the archbishop, and by his influence with the king obtained an order for him to be banished to his diocese. The book was also condemned at Rome by Pope Innocent VIII., and, to his censure, Fénelon submitted with profound deference, and even read the decree from the pulpit. He spent the remainder of his days in his diocese, and never recovered the king's favour, owing, in a great measure, to his composing, for his royal pupil, the duke of Burgundy, "Telemachus," in which Louis imagined he discovered some passages reflecting on himself. The good archbishop, however, bore his exile with the serenity of conscious integrity. His charities were unbounded, and so revered was his character, that the duke of Marlborough, and other generals of the allies, when possessed of that part of Flanders, exempted his lands from pillage or exaction. b. at the Castle of Fénelon, in Perigord, 1651; d. 1715, without money and without debt. Besides the above works, he wrote "Dialogues of the Dead," "Dialogues on Eloquence," a "Treatise on the Education of Daughters," a "Demonstration of the Existence of God," and "Spiritual Works." Fénelon is inferior in force and sublimity to his countryman Bossuet, but no author has, perhaps, surpassed him in the grace and charm of his style; he has been one of the most successful of writers in modern times in reproducing the noble simplicity of the ancients. As a man and Christian, he practised virtue, as he taught it, and calved the name and essence of religion to be loved and respected. Many of his works are lost; for, on the death of the duke of Burgundy, Louis XIV. caused several of his writings to be burned, which were found amongst the prince's papers.—His grand-nephew, the Abbé du Fénelon, was chaplain to Maria Leszinski, wife of Louis XV., and undertook the direction of an establishment charitably founded for the support of the little Savoyards in Paris. In spite, however, of his virtues and benevolence, he was arrested and brought before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to death. All the Savoyards in Paris hastened to the Convention to demand pardon for him, whom they called their "good father." Their prayers were vain; he was executed in 1794. n. at St. Jean des Tullais, 1714.

FENN, Sir John, fin, an English antiquary who edited the well known "Paston Letters," written during the reigns of Henry VI., Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII., two volumes of which were published in 1737, dedicated to George III., who, in recompense, knighted the compiler. In 1759 two more volumes appeared, illustrated with notes. p. 1739; p. 1794.

FENTON, Edward, fen'-ton, an English navigator in the time of Elizabeth, who accompanied Sir Martin Frobisher in search of a north-west passage, and after the failure of Sir Martin's attempt, he, in the spring of 1582, sailed on a similar expedition, with four vessels. He did not accomplish the object of the voyage, but meeting with a Spanish squadron, he gave them battle, and after a severe conflict, sunk their vice-admiral's ship. He returned home in 1583, and had a command in the fleet opposed to the Spanish Armada in 1588, and distinguished himself by bravery and skill in sundry encounters with the enemy. He was descended from an ancient family of Nottinghamshire, and died at Deptford in 1603, where a monument to his memory was erected by Richard, earl of Cork, who had married his niece.

FENTON, Sir Geoffrey, a writer and statesman, was the brother of the preceding, and enjoyed a large measure of the confidence of Queen Elizabeth, who employed him in Ireland, where he was the means of extinguishing more than one rebellion. He always endeavoured to persuade Elizabeth that the Irish were only to be governed by adherence to the strict rules of justice, equality, and security in the possession of their property and personal liberty. Sir Geoffrey was the translator of Guicciardini's "History of the Wars of Italy," and wrote, besides, a vast number of works more or less of an ephemeral character, which were published at various times between 1571 and 1579. He was married to a daughter of Dr. Robert Warton, lord-chancellor of Ireland, and dean of the arches in England; and, in 1603, his only daughter, Katherine, was married to Mr. Boyle, afterwards earl of Cork, a man of first eminence in his time. Sir Geoffrey Fenton was born in Nottinghamshire, and died at Dublin in 1603.

FENTON, Elijah, an English poet, who was for some time usher of a school in Surrey, and afterwards master of one at Sevenoaks, in Kent. In 1710 he became secretary to the earl of Orrery, and tutor to his son. He afterwards lived with Lady Trumbull as tutor to her son, and died at her seat in Berkshire, in 1730. n. at Shelton, Staffordshire, 1633. He wrote some poems; the "Life of Milton," the tragedy of "Marianne," and assisted Pope in his translation of the "Odyssey."

FERDINAND, fer'-di-nand, a name derived from the German verdienet, "to merit," and which has been borne by several emperors of Germany, kings of Spain, Naples, Sicily, &c.

EMPERORS OF GERMANY.

FERDINAND I., emperor of Germany, succeeded his brother Charles V. in 1558, at which time Ferdinand was king of the Romans, and of Hungary and Bohemia. He made peace with the Turks, and died in 1564, leaving the character of a wise and humane prince. b. 1503.

FERDINAND II. was the son of the archduke of Styria, and was elected king of Bohemia and of Hungary. Soon afterwards he succeeded Matthias as emperor. The Bohemian states having chosen the elector palatine Frederick to be their king, the latter raised an army of Protestants against the emperor, and thus was commenced the struggle known as the "Thirty Years' War," lasting from 1618 to 1648. Ferdinand defeated Frederick at Prague in 1620, and deprived him of his states. A second league was then formed against the emperor by the Protestant princes, headed by Christian IV. of Denmark, who was defeated by Tilly, and forced to sign a treaty of peace at Lubeck, in 1629, which put an end to the war. Another league was now formed, at the head of which was Gustavus Adolphus, who defeated the Imperialists in different battles, but was himself slain at Lutzen, in 1632. A partial peace was afterwards made between the emperor and some of the Protestant princes, but it was soon broken, and the war renewed. p. 1637. Maximilian of Bavaria, Tilly, and Wallenstein, were amongst Ferdinand's generals. (See those names.)

FERDINAND III., the son of the above-named, was made king of Hungary in 1625, of Bohemia in 1627, and succeeded his father in 1637. Sweden and France being in alliance, gained several advantages over the Imperialists in the war carried on between the belligerents, and which terminated with the peace of Westphalia in 1648. b. 1608; p. 1657.

SOVEREIGNS OF SPAIN (CASTILE, LEON, ARAGON, &c.)

FERDINAND I., king of Castile and Leon, called the Great, was the second son of Sancho II., king of Navarre. By the death of Bermudo, in 1307, he became king of Leon. He then made war against the Moors, from whom he took several cities, and pushed his conquests as far as Portugal. He next declared war against his brother, Garcia III., king of Navarre, in which that prince lost his kingdom and his life. p. 1065.

FERDINAND II., son of Alphonso VIII., king of Leon in 1157, gained great advantages over the Portuguese, and made their king, Alphonso Henriquez, prisoner, whom he used with moderation. p. 1188. In the reign of this prince, the military order of St. James was instituted, for the purpose of defending the dominions of the Christian powers against the Saracens.

FERDINAND III., surnamed the Saint, son of Alphonso IX., obtained the crown of Castile and Leon at the death of Henry I. in 1217.

From this time these states remained united. He took many places from the Moors; but while he was projecting an expedition against Morocco, died, in 1252. He was canonized by Pope Clement X., and is regarded as the founder of the university of Salamanca.

FERDINAND IV. succeeded to the throne of Castile in 1295, at the age of ten years, under the guardianship of his mother, who governed the kingdom with great prudence. d. 1312. His reign was marked by constant conflicts with the Moors. This prince, in a fit of anger, was proclaimed his successor, and immediately assumed the reins of government. Meanwhile the French advanced towards Madrid, when Ferdinand sent a deputation requesting the preservation of amity with Napoleon; but that sovereign replied that Charles IV. was his friend and ally, and he could not recognise the right of any other claimant to the Spanish most remarkable event which signalized his reign, was the discovery of America by Columbus. He also made himself master of part of Navarre, and by the brilliancy of his successes, placed himself generally at the head of European princes. d. 1316. In 143 great successes, he has been reproached for his instability and craft, which procured for him the surname of the "Crafter," in addition to that of the Catholic for his victories over the Moors. In all his enterprises he was ably seconded by his consort Isabella, his minister Cardinal Ximenes, and his general Gonsalvo de Cordova. (See ISABELLA OF CASTILE and COLUMBUS.)

FERDINAND VI., son of Philip V. and of Mary of Savoy, ascended the throne in 1746. This prince distinguished his reign by acts of beneficence, restoring liberty to prisoners, proclaiming pardon to smugglers and deserters, and assigning two days in each week to rendering justice to his subjects. He took part in the war of 1741, and signed the peace in 1743, which confirmed to one of his brothers the crown of the Two Sicilies, and to the other the dukedom of Parma and Placentia. He re-established his marine, and reformed and promoted arts and agriculture. d. at Madrid, without issue, 1759. A singular coincidence of earthquakes occurred in this monarch's reign, no less than three severe shocks occurring in South America and Europe. In 1744, Lima, the capital of Peru, was almost entirely destroyed; Quito, in the same country, experienced a like misfortune in 1755; and seven months after this, many cities and towns in Spain suffered considerably from the earthquake which overthrew Lisbon.

FERDINAND VII., king of Spain and the Indies, was the son of Charles IV., and was, when only six years old, recognised as prince of Asturias. During his minority, Spain was governed by Godoy, who vainly endeavoured to acquire the same influence over his mind that he had gained over the minds of his parents. In 1801 he married Maria Antonia, a princess of Naples, possessed of great beauty and accomplishments. She, however, is supposed to have been poisoned in 1806, when Napoleon I. began to form his designs upon Spain. With the view to disconnect Ferdinand from the projects of Godoy, the French emperor proposed a matrimonial alliance between him and the daughter of Lucien Bonaparte, which was entertained by Ferdinand, but prevented by Godoy, who informed Charles IV. of the design, and so exasperated the king against the prince, that he was imprisoned in the Escorial. Soon afterwards a public reconciliation took place, when the French army entered Spain, and the public indignation rose to a high pitch against Godoy, was proclaimed his successor, and immediately assumed the reins of government. Meanwhile the French advanced towards Madrid, when Ferdinand sent a deputation requesting the preservation of amity with Napoleon; but that sovereign replied that Charles IV. was his friend and ally, and he could not recognise the right of any other claimant to the Spanish emperor demanded his renunciation of the Spanish crown. Charles IV., with his queen and minister Godoy, resumed possession of the throne and government, whilst the Spaniards, in all directions, were rising in arms. Napo-

Joseph Bonaparte, the brother of Napoleon, was proclaimed king, whilst Ferdinand was placed in confinement at Valençay, where he and his family remained till 1813, when he was restored to the exercise of his regal rights. On returning to his kingdom, he was received with open arms by his people; but on arriving at Madrid, he dissolved the Cortes, and assumed the powers of an absolute monarch. The Inquisition was re-established, and those liberals who had fought for the expulsion of the French from the Spanish soil, were persecuted with the utmost rigour, despoiled of their property, and forced to flee or submit to the axe of the executioner. These measures exasperated the people, who, in 1820, rebelled against Ferdinand and re-established the Cortes, who endeavoured to stay the progress of the revolution, and adjust the affairs of the kingdom. In 1823 France again declared war against Spain, and the duke of Angoulême, at the head of an army of 100,000 men, entered the country, with the avowed purpose of restoring Ferdinand to all his absolute powers. The object was effected, but Ferdinand was not permitted to govern entirely by his own will. His despotic disposition was checked on one side by the dread of the liberals, and on the other by doubts of the friendship of the more violent absolutists, who deemed even the rule of Ferdinand too moderate to satisfy their tyrannical propensities. In this position he continued to reign, though hardly to govern, till 1833, when he died, and was buried with great pomp in the vaults of the chapel of the Escorial. d. 1734. By his will he left the crown to his daughter Isabella, under the regency of her mother, Maria Christina, to the exclusion of Don Carlos, his brother. A long and disastrous civil war was the consequence. (See CARLOS, DON.) the Cruel, king of Castile, he assumed the latter title, which produced a war between him and Henry of Trastámara, who ravaged Portugal, and forced Ferdinand to make peace and marry his daughter. This marriage he afterwards disowned, and entered into an alliance with John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who laid claim to the Castilian throne. This war proved very disastrous to the Portuguese, and Ferdinand was obliged to sue for peace. Another war was entered into, in which he was supported by the English, and was for a time successful, but was at last under the necessity of making peace. p. 1333.

FERDINAND, infant of Portugal, son of John I., passed into Africa, at the age of 14, to attack the Moors, and laid siege to Tangier. He was, however, made prisoner by the Moors, and spent the remainder of his life in captivity, dying of chagrin, 1443. This prince's misfortunes have formed the subject of a great number of legends and tales.

SOVEREIGNS OF NAPLES AND SICILY, AND OF AUSTRIA.

FERDINAND I., king of Naples (not of Sicily), succeeded Alphonso in 1458. In his reign, a civil war raged in his kingdom; but, uniting his arms to those of Scanderbeg, prince of Albania, he was enabled to defeat his barons in 1462. His rule, however, was again disturbed by them; when, in 1480, on the occasion of the marriage of his niece, he had many of the leading barons arrested in Naples, where they were thrown into prison, and numbers of them strangled. He was detested for his debaucheries and cruelties; yet he enacted many good laws, and restored the university of Naples. p. 1494.

FERDINAND II. ascended the throne in the year 1495, and entered into a war with the French, who afterwards expelled his successor from Naples. His reign was short, and marked by no event of general public importance. p. at Naples, 1496.

FERDINAND III. is the same as Ferdinand the Catholic. (See FERDINAND V. of Spain.)

FERDINAND IV. of Naples, and I. of the Two Sicilies, ascended the throne in 1759, and reigned for 30 years. On the breaking out of the French revolution, in 1792, the French demanded that Naples should renounce all connexion with Great Britain; but, on the death of Louis XVI. of France, Ferdinand joined the coalition, and participated in the general war against France, from 1793 to 1798. Two years of peace now intervened; when the victory of Nelson, at Aboukir, once more brought Ferdinand into the field against the French, who defeated him, drove him from his kingdom, and proclaimed the Parthenopean Republic in 1799. In the same year, however, the capital was retaken by the royalist army. In 1806 he lost his dominions again, Napoleon conferring the crown, first on his brother Joseph, and afterwards on Murat; Ferdinand, however, by the aid of the English, continuing to reign in Sicily. In 1814, the congress of Vienna finally established Ferdinand as king of the Two Sicilies. In 1820 a revolutionary movement commenced, under the auspices of a secret society called Carbonari, which proclaimed a constitution similar to that of Spain, and convoked a parliament at Naples. Another revolt broke out at Palermo, which was not suppressed without much bloodshed. This state of things excited the interest of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, who would not acknowledge the new system of government established at Naples; and resulted, in 1821, in an Austrian army crossing the Po, and moving on Naples. The Neapolitans resisted, but were defeated; and the Austrians entered the city. Ferdinand, who had quitted his capital, now returned to it, and the government again became and continued absolute throughout the remainder of his reign. B. 1761; D. 1825.

Ferdinand

FERDINAND II., king of the Two Sicilies, surnamed "Bomba," from permitting the city of Messina to be bombarded by Filangieri, was the son of Francis I. and Isabella of Spain. He succeeded his father on the throne of Naples and Sicily in 1830. On his accession, by the introduction of a few liberal measures, the announcement of an amnesty for political offenders, and the promise to heal the wounds of this unhappy country, he was received with quite an ovation of joy and gratitude. These feelings were not destined, however, to last long. No sooner did he feel himself securely fixed in his seat, than he, like his father, placed himself in the hands of the clergy, more especially the Jesuits, to whom he at first allowed the monopoly of instruction; and thus they soon obtained supreme power. This they shared to some extent with the police, the latter seizing on all the highest posts in the government, without, however, being able to hinder conspiracies and risings amongst the people. The reign of king Bomba is but a long recital of these. Three attempts at insurrection were made in the year 1833; others, more serious, took place in 1837, 1841, 1844, and 1847. The king now instituted a procedure of torture, and put a price on the heads of those who were suspected of designs against his authority; many lost their lives, and numerous families were forced into exile. This rigorous rule served only to exasperate the people, and hasten the events of the revolution of 1848. In that year, when the thrones of Europe seemed trembling in the balance, the rebellion in Sicily, and the popular manifestation at Naples, forced the king to promulgate and swear to a constitution. Public opinion also forced him to send a corps d'armée to the support of the revolution in Lombardy; but, after having succeeded in repressing the revolutionists at Naples, he recalled the troops, and employed them to extinguish the insurrection in Calabria. Emboldened by his success, he treated with contempt the parliament, which had been assembled by virtue of the new constitution, and in the early part of 1849 declared it dissolved. He then turned his attention to his revolutionary subjects in Sicily, and at the same time undertook his unfortunate campaign against the Roman republic. Sicily being now conquered by Filangieri, and Rome occupied by the French, who had driven out the republicans, Ferdinand II.'s tyranny knew no bounds. The picture of his rule, as drawn by Mr. Gladstone, in 1851, in his famous "Letter to Lord Aberdeen," struck no one as an exaggeration. Vexatious and arbitrary proceedings substituted for the law; the civil code mutilated and defaced; education at a standstill; literature and science humiliated; a rigorous and puerile censorship of the press; relations with other countries rendered difficult, or altogether interdicted; punishments multiplied; the most honourable citizens exiled,—such is the history of the last years of Bomba's reign. The use that he made of his power seemed to the most absolute of European sovereigns a stigma and disgrace to all government, and grave complaints were made at the congress of Paris, in 1856, and even warnings addressed to him by the diplomatists at his court. In vain, however, all this,—he protested against the slightest interference in the internal affairs of his kingdom: and although France and England proceeded to the extremity of jointly recalling their ambassadors, it had no effect in causing a more gentle rule of the Neapolitans on the part of the king. This conduct totally alienated the affections of his subjects, and even of the army, and led to the easy overthrow of the throne of his son, Francis II., by Garibaldi, in 1860. n. at Palermo, 1810, when the throne of Naples was occupied by Murat; p. at Naples, 1859.

I., Emperor of Austria, son of Francis I., ascended the imperial throne in 1835, and continued to pursue the policy of his father, leaving the chief direction of affairs in the hands of Prince Metternich. In his reign the republic of Cracow was annihilated, and a portion of it added to the empire. During the revolutionary year of 1848 he dismissed Metternich, and declared that the new minister should be responsible, and caused him to prepare a constitution. The concessions not being sufficient, Vienna revolted in May, the emperor retiring to Innsbruck, whence he was induced to return at the pressing solicitations of the Viennese. The city rising again in October, Ferdinand established himself at Olmutz, and on December 2, 1848, abdicated, having no children, in favour of his nephew, Francis Joseph I. n. at Vienna, 1793.

FERDOUSI, or FERDUSI, fer-doo'-se, a celebrated Persian poet, whom Mahmoud commissioned to write the "Shah Nameh," or History of the Persian Kings. The bard was employed thirty years in executing this immense work, which contains no less than 60,000 couplets; and he was to receive a thousand pieces of gold for every thousand couplets. Whilst, however, he was giving himself up to the execution of his task, his enemies at court managed to damage him in the estimation of the king, and forced him, by their calumnies, to fly the kingdom. He retired to Bagdad, where his great reputation, which had preceded him there, obtained for him the protection of the caliph. After several years' exile, Ferdousi was recalled to his country, and passed there the remainder of his days. The "Shah Nameh" was published in London, in Persian, in 1829, and was afterwards translated into English, in 1831. It has also been translated into Arabic. n. at Shadab, in the province of Tus, about 930; p. about 1020.

FERGUS I., fer'-gus, king of Scotland, was the son of Fergus, king of the Irish Scots, and was invited to Scotland to repel the Picts, and for this was chosen king. Drowned in his passage to Ireland, about 404.

FERGUSON, Adam, LL.D., fer'-gus-on, was the son of the Rev. Adam Ferguson, minister of Logierait, Perthshire, and was educated at the University of St. Andrew, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1744, he entered the 42nd regiment as chaplain, the duties of which office he discharged till 1757, when he became tutor in the family of lord Bute. In 1759 he was chosen professor of natural philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and in 1764 professor of moral philosophy. From 1773 to 1775, he travelled on the continent with the earl of Chesterfield, and in 1778 received the appointment of secretary to the commissioners sent to America to endeavour to effect an amicable compromise with the Congress representing the different States. In 1785 he resigned his professorship of moral philosophy in favour of Dugald Stewart. Subsequently he retired to St. Andrews, where he passed the remainder of his days. n. at Logierait, 1724; p. 1816. His works are, "An Essay on the History of Civil Society;" "Institutes of Moral Philosophy;" and the "History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic." This last is a work of great merit.

FERGUSON, Robert, an English nonconformist, who was ejected, in 1692, from the living of Godmersham, in Kent, and afterwards distinguished himself by his political intrigues. He joined the duke of Monmouth, whom he is supposed to have betrayed, but was never long attached to any party. p. 1714. He wrote the "Interest of Reason in Religion," &c.; a "Discourse concerning Justification," &c.

FERGUSON, James, a Scotch philosopher and astronomer, whose father was a day-labourer, and who was enabled to send him to school only for three months at a small village in the north of Scotland. When about nine years of age he was placed out as servant to a farmer, who employed him as a shepherd, in which situation he acquired a surprising knowledge of the stars. His abilities being discovered by some neighbouring gentlemen, one of them took him to his house, where he learned decimal arithmetic and the rudiments of algebra and geometry. From a description of the globes in Gordon's grammar, he made, in three weeks, one of these instruments, sufficiently accurate to enable him to work problems. He afterwards made a wooden clock and a watch, which induced the country gentry to employ him in repairing and cleaning their clocks; and, having a taste for drawing, he earned something by designing patterns for ladies' work. He next began to paint portraits with Indian ink, by which he supported himself creditably for some years. In 1743 he went to London, where he continued to draw portraits, and published some astronomical tables and calculations. He also gave lectures in experimental philosophy, which he repeated with success throughout the kingdom. In 1754 he published a brief description of the solar system, with an astronomical account of the year of the crucifixion of Christ, &c.; also an "Idea of the Material Universe, deduced from a Survey of the Solar System." His greatest work, however, is his "Astronomy explained upon Sir Isaac Newton's Principles, and made easy to those who have not studied Mathematics." It first appeared in 1756, 4to, and has frequently been reprinted. On the accession of George III., to whom he had read lectures, Mr. Ferguson obtained a pension of £50 a year. In 1763 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, without paying the admission-fee, or the annual subscriptions; the same year appeared his "Astronomical Tables and Precepts," 8vo. In 1787 he published "Tables and Tracts relative to several Arts and Sciences," 8vo. Besides these, he published "Select Mechanical Exercises;" an "Easy Introduction

Under the title of the "Peasant-Boy Philosopher," Mr. Henry Mayhew has most delightfully described this youth's marvellous pursuit of knowledge under real difficulties.

FERGUSON, William, a Scotch artist, distinguished as a painter of dead game and still life. b. 1690.

FERGUSON, Robert, a Scotch poet, who was educated for the ministry; but habits of dissipation disqualified him for that profession, and he obtained a place in the sheriff clerk's office at Edinburgh. He contributed to the pages of Ruddiman's "Weekly Magazine," and was greatly admired by Burns, whose own genius was stimulated to poetical composition by the perusal of his effusions. b. at Edinburgh, 1750; d. insane, in the lunatic asylum of that city, 1774. The poems of Ferguson consist of pastoral, humorous, and lyrical effusions; but his genius is greatly inferior to that of Burns, who often bewails his unhappy end, both in his prose and poetical pieces, and erected a monument to his memory in Canongate churchyard, Edinburgh.

FERGUSON, James, a Scotch author and architect, was designed for a mercantile life, but, after passing a couple of years in a counting-house in Holland, and a like period in another in London, he went, in 1829, to India. Here he resided for ten years, during which period, as managing partner in a large firm in Calcutta, he amassed a fortune sufficiently large to enable him to return to England, where he began to devote himself to literary and scientific pursuits. His work entitled "Ancient Topography of Jerusalem," appeared in 1847; but it had been preceded by the "Ancient Architecture of Hindostan." Both were illustrated. These works were considered as exquisite specimens of artistic skill, "enhanced in value by the faithfulness with which every scene and place was recorded." In 1849 they were succeeded by an "Historical Inquiry into the True Principles of Beauty in Art, more especially with reference to Architecture," a work highly extolled at the time of its appearance. In 1851 he produced "The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis restored," which contains many things of general interest, relating to one of the most wonderful discoveries ever made in the history of the world. The principles of this work are illustrated in the Assyrian Court at the Crystal Palace, which was planned and produced under the superintendence of Mr. Ferguson. In 1851 he illustrated, by a model, a new system of fortification, and subsequently issued "The Peril of Portsmouth; or, French Fleets and English Forts," which was designed to subvert the approved systems of military engineers. A sequel to this work appeared with notes on Sebastopol, which showed that the subject was well understood by its author. After this, Mr. Ferguson became general superintendent of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. b. at Ayr, Scotland, 1808.

FERISHTA, Mohammed Kasim, fer-ish-ta, a Persian historian, author of the "History of India under the Mussulmans," portions of which have been translated into English, was born at Astrabad, and was liberally patronized by the

Fernandez

Mohammedan princes of India. His history is divided into twelve books, with an introduction, in which he gives a resumé of the history of India before the advent of the Mohammedans, and a narrative of the conquests of the Arabs in their progress from their native deserts to Hindostan. He gives an account of the geography, climate, and other physical features of Hindostan at the close of his work; and is regarded as a very trustworthy writer, as he evidently took great pains in consulting authorities and verifying his statements. b. about 1570; d. shortly after 1611.

FERMAT, Peter de, fair'-ma, a distinguished mathematician, poet, and civilian, who wrote poetry in the Latin, French, and Spanish languages. He was universally respected for his talents, and became a counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse. His prose works were collected and published under the title of "Opera Varia Mathematica," in 1670, and also in 1679. b. about 1601; d. 1685.

FERMOR, William, fer'-mor, a famous Russian general, the son of a Scotchman, entered the army of the czar in 1720 as a common bombardier, and rose by his bravery, intelligence, and skill to be adjutant-general to Count von Munich in 1729. He became acquainted with Frederick William of Prussia at Dantzic, and received from him the order of La Générosité. He greatly distinguished himself in the war with Turkey in 1736, and was promoted to the rank of general, and made governor of Zolberg. As inspector of buildings, to which office he was appointed in 1746, he superintended the erection of the imperial palace at St. Petersburg; and, after the new organization of the Russian army, he was commander in St. Petersburg, Novgorod, and Finland; and, in 1755, was commander-in-chief of the whole army. In the war with Prussia he captured the city of Memel after a severe bombardment, succeeded Count Apraxin as general of the army, took possession of the kingdom of Prussia, of which he was made governor, and was created a count of the German empire by Francis I. In 1776 he fought the battle of Zorndorf against Frederick II. of Prussia, and led the first division, under Soltikow, at the battle of Kunersdorf, for his bravery at which he received large honours from the empress. He took the city of Berlin in October, 1760, and in the same year went on an expedition to Siberia. Peter III. recalled him from the army, but after Peter's death Catharine II. made Fermor governor-general of Smolensko, and a member of the supreme senate. b. at Pleskow, 1704; d. 1771.

FEAR, Fanny, fern. Under this nom de plume, an American lady wrote some sketches of domestic life called "Fern Leaves," which in the United States and Great Britain have attained some degree of success. She was a sister of N. P. Willis, known also as an author of some celebrity, and was originally married, in 1837, to Dr. Eldredge, who died in 1846. She subsequently married Mr. Farmington, from whom, however, she afterwards separated. Besides "Fern Leaves," she wrote two tales, called "Ruth Hall" and "Rose Clark." b. at Portland, Maine, 1811.

FERNANDEZ, Juan, fair-nan'-deiz, a Spanish navigator, who, in 1563, discovered the island which bears his name. d. 1576.

FERNANDEZ, Navarrete, surnamed El Mudo, or the Dumb, was one of the most distinguished of the pupils of Titian, and became painter to Philip II. of Spain, who employed him mostly in adorning the Escorial. His principal works are a "Martyrdom of St. James," a "Nativity of Christ," "St. Jerome in the Desert," and "Abraham with the Three Angels." This last is esteemed his greatest work. He painted with great ease, and, on account of his colouring, was named the Spanish Titian. b. at Logrono, on the Ebro, 1520; d. at Segovia, 1579.

FERNET, John Francis, fai'-ri-uel, physician to Henry II. of France, published a number of works on medical subjects, which have been frequently reprinted. b. 1497; d. 1553. He was surnamed the modern Galen, from the extent of his medical knowledge, and the number of works he wrote on the subject.

FERRARI, Gaudenzio, fai'-ac-re, a celebrated Lombard painter of the Milanese school of Leonardo da Vinci. He worked under Raphael at Rome, and has been called one of the seven great painters of modern times, which is an extravagant eulogy, for, although correct in design, careful in execution, and often brilliant in colouring, his works are devoid of tone, and show a want of appreciation of, or feeling for, harmony of colour. His principal works are in Milan, and have all a reference to sacred subjects. b. 1481; d. 1539.

FERRARI, a distinguished family of Milan, several of whose members became eminent in the 16th and 17th centuries for their attainments. Octavian Ferrari was professor of mathematics and physics at Milan and Padua collected at Lisbon, 1593, and his comedies were reprinted in 1651. He was in his time the chief of the classical school, and seems to have deserved his title of the Portuguese "Horace." b. at Lisbon, 1535; d. 1600.

FERRERAS, Don Juan d', fai'-rai'-ass, a learned Spanish divine, who was a member of the Spanish Academy at its commencement, and contributed largely to the dictionary produced by that body. He also wrote a "History of Spain," 10 vols. 4to, and other works, highly esteemed for their minuteness and accuracy. b. at Labanera, 1652; d. 1735. As an historian of Spain, this writer is much more to be depended on than Mariana, whose pages, however, are more elegant and fascinating.

FERRI, Ciro, fai'-re, a celebrated Roman fresco painter, was the most distinguished scholar of Pietro da Cortona, and greatly assisted that artist in his extensive works both at Rome and in the Pitti Palace at Florence. After the death of his master, he took the leading position among the fresco painters of Rome, and many of his works have been engraved. b. 1631; d. 1689.

FERRIER, Miss, fei'-ri-er, was the daughter of a writer to the signet in Edinburgh, who held an appointment in the Court of Session as the colleague of Sir Walter Scott. Her early introduction to the best literary society of Edinburgh gave a bias to her tastes, and she became the authoress of three excellent novels, entitled the "Marriage," the "Inheritance," and "Destiny, or the Chief's Daughter." b. at Edinburgh, Francesco Bernardino Ferrari was celebrated throughout Europe for his knowledge of books and literature generally. He was a doctor of the Ambrosian college at Milan, and his collection of valuable works was the foundation of the celebrated library of that name. His own writings display much and profound learning. b. 1535; d. 1609.—Ottavio Ferrari, after being historiographer and professor of rhetoric at Milan, settled at Padua, and was patronized by many students and crowned heads, among the latter being Christina queen of Sweden and Louis XV. of France, the latter of whom conferred on him a pension of 500 crowns. He was distinguished for the mildness of his disposition and the suavity of his manners, qualities which procured him the designation of the "Pacifensor." He was the author, in continuation of Scaliger, of a work entitled "Origines Lingue Italiane," and wrote a variety of treatises on ancient customs, manners, &c. b. 1637; d. 1692.—Besides these, there were several other distinguished Italians of this name, who do not, however, appear to have belonged to the same family. Among them may be mentioned—1. Giovanni Andrea Ferrari, distinguished as a painter of historical subjects, and of fruit and flower pieces, was born at Genoa, in 1699; d. 1669.—2. Ludovico Ferrari, a native of Bologna, was a professor in that city, and was the discoverer of the method of resolving biquadrate equations. b. 1522; d. 1565.

FERRIERA, Antonio, fai'-rai'-eer-a, a Portuguese poet, who held the office of judge, and wrote, with considerable success, elegies, odes, comedies, tragedies, and also epics. His best piece is "Inez de Castro," one of the first complete tragedies of modern times. His works were from the field, conscious that there remains behind, not only a large harvest, but labourers capable of gathering it in. More than one writer has already displayed talents of this description; and if the present author, himself a phantom, may be permitted to distinguish a brother, or, perhaps, a sister shadow, he would mention, in particular, the author of the very lively work entitled "Marriage." Miss Ferrier was a frequent guest at Abbotsford, and helped to cheer the melancholy which clouded the last moments of the life of the great novelist.

FESCH, Cardinal Joseph, fei'-sk, a distinguished Corsican, and the half-brother of Letitia Ramolini, the mother of Napoleon I. After suffering considerable privations in the revolutionary period of France, he suddenly found his fortunes changed by the elevation of his nephew to the command of the Army of Italy. He became one of its commissioners, or factors; but, in 1802, was appointed archbishop of Lyons. In the following year he was sent ambassador to the Holy See; and, from the court which he paid to the pope, he received a cardinal's hat, and the consent of that dignitary to visit Paris to crown Napoleon. After the coronation, he, in 1805, became imperial almoner, and received the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour. In 1809 he rejected the archbishopric of Paris, on account of the severity with which the pope was treated by the emperor; and, in 1810, actually openly rebuked Napoleon before the council of Paris. For this he was driven into exile, and took refuge in Rome, where he passed the remainder of his days. b. at Ajaccio, 1763; d. at Rome, 1839.

FESTUS, fei'-tus, a celebrated Latin grammarian, whose age is not accurately ascertained; but he is believed to have lived in the 3rd century. He compiled some voluminous works on his favourite science, and is classed by Scaliger amongst the best or most useful etymologists for assisting the student in understanding the language of ancient Rome.

FERRI, Domenico, fai'-te, called the "Mantuan," from being the court painter to Ferdinand Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, executed several works in that city, some of which have been engraved; his masterpiece being his "Feeding of the Five Thousand." b. at Rome, 1539; d. at Venice, 1624, being only thirty-five years of age.

FEUERBACH, Paul Joseph Anselm, foir'-bak, an eminent German writer on criminal law, who became successively professor at the universities of Giessen, Jena, Kiel, and Landshut. Although he wrote a number of able papers on criminal jurisprudence, his fame did not become established till he produced his "Review of the Fundamental Principles and Ideas of Penal Law." This work, in conjunction with another which appeared shortly afterwards, exercised a great influence on German criminal legislation, and placed Feuerbach in an eminent position in the eyes of his countrymen. In 1808 he became a privy councillor in Bavaria; in 1817 second president of the court of appeal at Bamberg; and in 1821 first president of appeal at Anspach. To these offices his sphere of action was entirely confined throughout the rest of his life. b. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1775; d. there, 1833.

FAUILLE, Louis, fol'-lai, a French astronomer, botanist, and mathematician, was a Franciscan friar, and having received orders from Louis XIV. to proceed to the Levant to make certain astronomical observations, performed the duty assigned him, and afterwards visited the Antilles, Carthage, Martinique, and western South America, investigating the natural productions of the various places he went to. These voyages occupied him from 1707 to 1712, when he retired to an observatory erected for him at Marseilles, where he lived during the remainder of his days. He published the results of his observations in a work entitled "Journal of Physical, Botanical, and Mathematical Observations in Western Central America, and the West Indies," 2 vols. folio, with numerous plates. By his means the magnificent Datura arborea was first made known to botanists. b. in Provence, 1660; d. at Marseilles, 1732.

FEUQUIERES, Isaac Manasses de Pas, Marquis de, fo'-que-aire, a brave French officer of the seventeenth century, conducted the siege of Rochelle, where he was taken prisoner, and afterwards acted as ambassador to Gustavus Adolphus in Germany; for his services on which mission he was made lieutenant-general of Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and died in 1640 at Thionville, of the wounds he had received at the siege of that place the preceding year, and where he was made prisoner. b. 1580.

FEUQUIERES, Isaac de Pas, Marquis de, son of the preceding, was also a lieutenant-general in the French army, and ambassador to Germany, Sweden, and Spain, and died in the last-named country, in 1683.

FEUQUIERES, Antoine de Pas, Marquis de, son of the last-named, likewise distinguished himself in the armies of his country, having in the German campaign of 1689 performed such eminent services as to be made marshal-d camp. He next went to Italy, where he won the rank of lieutenant-general in 1693. Although an excellent officer, he was very strict and severe in enforcing discipline, and was consequently no favourite with his troops. Indeed, it was said of him, in reference to the feeling of his men, that "he was the boldest man in Europe, since he slept amidst 100,000 of his enemies." He wrote memoirs of the generals of Louis XIV., in which he points out the faults committed by those officers on various occasions, enumerating no less than twelve radical blunders which the French commanders fell into at the battle of Blenheim alone. The work is regarded as one of the most able on the theory and practice of war in existence. b. at Paris, 1648; d. 1711.

FAYRE, Tannegui le, or Tanaquil Faber, fai'-re, a learned critic, pensioned by Richelieu, at 2000 livres, to inspect the books printed at the Louvre; but on the death of the cardinal his salary was stopped. He then removed to Saumur, where he embraced the reformed religion, and obtained the classical professorship. b. at Caen, 1615; d. 1672. He was the father of the celebrated Madame Dacier, and published several comments on Greek and Latin authors; two volumes of letters; "Lives of the Greek Poets," in French; "Greek and Latin Poems;" a "Method of Education."—There are several other French writers of this name.

FIAMMINGO, Arrigo, fa'-aum-in'-go, a famous artist, whose real name is unknown, but who was called Fiammingo from being a native of Flanders. He visited Italy in the time of Gregory XIII., and was employed by that pontiff in the Vatican. He likewise painted a picture of the "Resurrection" for the Sistine chapel, and another of St. Michael conquering Lucifer for the church of the Madonna degli Angeli, both of which are works of high merit. b. 1601.—There was another painter, named Enrico, also a native of Flanders, and called Fiammingo by the Italians, who was a pupil of Guido, and whose style resembles that of his master, except that the shadows are darker.

FICKTE, Johann Gottlieb, feesht-s(r), a learned German, who, in 1794, became professor of philosophy at Jena, and thence promulgated his system, known as the "Doctrine of Science." Shortly afterwards, a suspicion of irreligious tendencies fell upon him, when he retired to Prussia, and, after living some time in Berlin, received the appointment of professor of philosophy at Erlangen. Here he continued for some time highly esteemed, but in 1814 he visited Berlin, where, in the military hospital of that city, his wife caught a fever, and communicated it to him. She recovered, but he died, in 1814. b. at Rammensau, 1762.

FICINO, Marsilio, fe'-che'-no, a learned Italian, whose father was physician to Cosmo de Medici, by whom Marsilio was greatly esteemed, on account of his attachment to the doctrines of Plato. Under the patronage of Cosmo he made rapid progress in all kinds of learning, and was chosen first president of an academy founded by him at Florence. After this, he published a complete version of Plato's works in the Latin language, and translated Plotinus, Iamblichus, Proclus, and other Platonists. Lorenzo the Magnificent was also a liberal patron of Ficino, and thus Platonism revived with great splendour in Italy. At the age of forty-two he entered into orders, and obtained considerable preferment through the means of the high patronage with which he had been honoured. n. at Florence, 1433; p. 1499. His works were collected and printed together in two vols. folio.

FIELD, Nathaniel, feeld, a dramatic author, who is supposed to have been a member of Shakspeare's company, and to have been one of the players at the Globe and Blackfriars theatres. He wrote "A Woman's a Weathercock," "Amends for Ladies," and, in conjunction with Massinger, "The Fatal Dowry." Lived between the reigns of James I. and Charles I.

FIELD, Richard, D.D., a learned English divine, who was chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, was a great favourite with James I., and wrote several works on theological subjects, the most important of which is entitled "Of the Church." He had likewise begun a book on the "Controversies on Religion," which he did not live to finish. He was a man of a mild and loving disposition, and was ever anxious to heal dissensions in the Christian church. n. 1561; p. 1616.

FIELD, Cyrus West, an American merchant, who, in 1854, took up the subject of ocean telegraphy. After getting a cable laid between Cape Ray and Cape Breton to connect Newfoundland with the mainland of America, he turned his attention to laying a cable along the bottom of the Atlantic between Newfoundland and Ireland. This, after some failures, was successfully accomplished in 1866. n. 1819.

FIELDING, Henry, feeld-ing, a celebrated English author, son of lieutenant-general Fielding, and great-grandson of William, third earl of Denbigh. After receiving the rudiments of his education at home, he went to Eton, whence he was sent to Leyden, where, for two years, he devoted himself to the investigation of civil law, and then returned to England. The narrowness of his father's circumstances, and the largeness of his family, prevented him from providing in a suitable manner for his son, who, in his twenty-first year, went to London, and began writing for the stage. His first piece was entitled "Love in several Masks," and met with a favourable reception; as did his next performance, called "The Temple Beau." Some of his future dramatic efforts, however, were not so successful, and he had the courage to prefix to one of them, "As it was damned at the theatre royal, Drury-lane." A large number of his plays are now, by the generality of readers, entirely unknown. In 1734 he was fortunate enough to marry Miss Charlotte Cradock, a lady of some wealth, and, by the death of his mother, came into the possession of £200 a year. His extravagances, however, were such, that, at the age of thirty, he had reduced himself to his former condition; on which he entered the Temple, and studied the law with considerable ardour, still exercising his pen for immediate support, as assistant editor of a periodical paper called "The Champion," and by occasional contributions of a poetical kind. About this time he produced the "History of Jonathan Wild," a notorious character, whose story Fielding wrought up into an entertaining romance. This has been pronounced to be, perhaps, the most ingeniously-arranged description of a tissue of blackguardisms which has ever been given to the world. In 1742 appeared his "Joseph Andrews," a novel full of humour and admirable delineations of human nature. During the rebellion of 1755 he edited the "Jacobite Journal," for which he was made a Middlesex justice, in which situation he gained considerable reputation by his "Inquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robberies," and his "Proposal for the Maintenance of the Poor." In 1749 he published his principal work, the novel of "Tom Jones," which exhibits a great knowledge of life, and is equally rich in comic delineation and pathetic expression. His "Amelia" followed in 1751, and is more correct in sentiment, though deficient in humour and variety. For this novel he received £1000. A complication of complaints had now produced a dropsy, and after undergoing the operation of tapping, he went with his family to Lisbon, where he ended his days. n. at Sharpsham, Somersetshire, 1707; p. at Lisbon, 1754. His works have been printed uniformly in 12 vols. 8vo, with his life prefixed by Mr. Murphy. That Fielding had a great genius as a writer is unquestionable; and when we consider the comparative brevity of his life, and the difficulties under which he almost invariably wrote, we are amazed at the number and general excellence of his productions. He wrote twenty-four dramatic pieces; and although his talents were not of a decidedly theatrical cast, still it was something to escape general disapprobation, though he was, at times, received with indifference. Of his three great works,— "Joseph Andrews," "Amelia," and "Tom Jones," upon which his reputation rests, it must be confessed that, however they may occasionally err in their morality, they are extremely happy representations of those features of human nature which must always interest, simply because they are immediately recognised as genuine by every mind that has been brought into contact with the various elements at work in society at large. "Joseph Andrews" Fielding tells us himself, was written as an imitation of the style and manner of Cervantes, and it cannot be denied that he has well succeeded in copying the humour, the gravity, and the fine ridicule of his master. His "Amelia" is also an admirable production. "It is, perhaps, the only book," says Dr. Johnson, "of which, being printed off betimes one morning, a new edition was called for before night." The same stern moralist read the book through without stopping; and further adds, that "Fielding's 'Amelia' is the most pleasing heroine of all the romances." "Tom Jones" is considered as the greatest work of Fielding, yet it has not escaped severe censure. "Sir," said Johnson, "there is more knowledge of the heart in one letter of Richardson's, than in all 'Tom Jones,'"—an opinion, however, in which few will concur. There is no novel with which we are acquainted so skillfully conducted in its fable, and evincing so much art in the development of the plot. In composition, also, Fielding is a great master. Indeed, "taking him for all in all," we believe it is the general opinion that he is what Byron calls him,— "the prose Homer of human nature."

FIELDING, Sarah, was the third sister of the above great novelist, and accounted a woman of considerable learning. She wrote the novels of "David Simple" and "The Cry;" and translated "Xenophon's Memoirs of Socrates" into English; "The Lives of Cleopatra and Octavia;" "The History of the Countess of Delwin;" "The History of Ophelia;" and several other works. She lived and died unmarried at Bath. n. 1714; p. 1763.

FIELDING, Sir John, the half-brother of Henry, the novelist, and his successor as a justice for Middlesex, was blind from his childhood, yet discharged his office with great credit, and in 1761 received the honour of knighthood. n. 1780. He laboured to reform the vicious, and published some tracts on police; a "Charge to the Grand Jury of Westminster," &c.

FIELDING, Copley Vandyke, an English painter, belonged to a family of artists, and first exhibited his pictures in 1810, at the Artists' Exhibition in Spring Gardens. He early became a teacher of his art, and from his great success in this vocation secured a wide circle of friends and patrons. It is as a water-colour painter that he is best known and most admired; and there are few, if any, who have risen to the same height of popularity in representing English scenery under the same or similar aspects in which he delighted to exhibit it. His path was one of unvarying prosperity, and for many years he held the office of president of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours. His subjects are generally chalky downs, stretching far away, until they are lost in the softened haze of distance. He has also represented both Scotch and Welsh mountain scenery, under peculiar atmospheric effects, and usually with the most striking success. He had great mechanical dexterity in the use of his pencil, notwithstanding which, he had frequently recourse to both the sponge and the cloth to produce appearances, which were not entirely free from a charge of a kind of ingenious trickery. n. 1787; p. at Worthing, Sussex, 1855.

FRENCH, William, Lord Say and Sele, fe-en, was educated at New College, Oxford, and in 1624 was made a viscount. In the Rebellion he sided with the parliament, and became "very active" with Hampden and Pym, for which he was declared an outlaw by the king, after whose execution he retired to the Isle of Lundy, on the coast of Devon, where he continued till Cromwell's death. At the Restoration he was made privy seal and chamberlain of the household. n. in Oxfordshire, 1583; p. 1662. His lordship wrote some pamphlets against the Quakers. Clarendon pronounces him "a man of a close and reserved nature, of great parts, and the highest ambition."

FRENCH, Nathaniel, second son of Lord Say and Sele, was also educated at New College, Oxford, after which he went to Geneva. On his return he was intrusted with the government of Bristol, but surrendered it to Prince Rupert, for which he was condemned to death by a council of war. His father's interest, however, saved his life. Cromwell, with whom he was in great favour, made him one of his lords. He was a distinguished leader of the independent party, and printed some speeches and pamphlets. n. 1608; p. 1809. Lord Clarendon says of this person, "If he had not encumbered himself with command in the army, to which men thought his nature not so well disposed, he had been second to none in the councils of the Parliamentarians after Mr. Hampden's death."

FRESCHI, Joseph Marie, fe-es-ke, a Corsican, and the author of one of the most terrible conspiracies of which history has preserved the remembrance. In 1835, whilst Louis Philippe was king of the French, he made an attempt to destroy that sovereign and the princes of the royal family. Preparing an "infernal machine," in a house on the Boulevard du Temple, &c, on the 28th July, on the occasion of a grand review, discharged it as the king and staff were passing his windows. Eighteen persons lost their lives, among whom was Marshal Mortier, duke of Treviso; twenty-two others were severely wounded, the king escaping only by a miracle. The assassin was taken and condemned to death, with Pépin and Morez, his accomplices. This man had formerly been a shepherd, then a soldier, and had been, prior to this, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for robbery. n. in Corsica, 1790; executed February 19, 1836.

FIESCO, Giovanni Luigi, fe-ist-ko, a noble Genoese, who, out of hatred to the famous Andrea Giovanni Doria and his nephew, formed, in 1547, a conspiracy, with the assistance of France and Pope Paul, to revolutionize Genoa. In the attempt to seize the galleys Fiesco was drowned. The conspirators, disheartened, gave up the enterprise, and the family of Fiesco was proscribed.

FILANGIERI, Gaetano, fe-lawn-je-air-e, an Italian political writer, who studied the law, but never practised it. In 1777 he entered into the service of the court, was appointed a gentleman of the bedchamber, and an officer in the marine. In 1780 he published the first volume of his work on the "Science of Legislation," which made him famous throughout Europe, and the 8th volume in 1791. It was never completed. In 1787 he obtained a place in the Royal College of Finance, which he designed to reform, but was taken ill, and died on the 24th of July, 1788, n. at Naples, 1752. His work has gone through several editions.

FILANGIERI, Charles, an Italian general, son of the above, having lost his father at an early age, was forced by the troubles of his country, in 1800, to leave it, and set out, on foot, with his younger brother, for France. Arriving in Paris in a state of utter destitution, the name of their father procured for them at the hands of Bonaparte, then first consul, admittance to the school of the Prytaneum. Charles afterwards served in Napoleon's army, being present at Austerlitz, and subsequently distinguished himself as one of the first officers in the Neapolitan service. He afterwards served in Spain, and received for his signal acts of bravery advancement and honours from Murat. He does not appear to have been much employed from 1820 till the accession of Ferdinand II., in 1830, to the throne of the Two Sicilies. He then had the direction of the artillery and engineers confided to him, and in 1848 was appointed to the command of the army sent into Lombardy. (See FERDINAND II.) He was now the docile instrument of Bomba, and, at the head of the expedition directed against Sicily, took possession of Messina after a bombardment of four days and a terrible slaughter. The same fate was in preparation for Palermo, but the English and French admirals, seeing humanity so shamed in these proceedings, demanded and obtained an armistice for the suffering Sicilians. Six months later, however, hostilities again commenced, the submission of the island was completed, and Filangieri was appointed governor, with the fullest powers. n. at Naples, 1783.

FILELFO, Francis, or PHILELPHUS, fe-lail'-fo, an Italian philosopher, and one of the restorers of letters. After studying at Padua, he opened a school of rhetoric at Venice, the state of which appointed him chancellor, and ambassador to Constantinople. Here he made himself acquainted with the Greek language, when, on returning to Venice, he took with him many Greek manuscripts. In 1423 he removed to Bologna, where he was appointed professor of moral philosophy; but in 1429 he went to Florence. A difference having occurred between him and Cosmo de Medici, he was forced to retire to Siena, and afterwards to various other places. b. at Ancona, 1393; d. at Florence, 1431. He was a man of learning and abilities, but restless and quarrelsome. His epistles were printed at Venice in 1502.—His eldest son, Mario Filelfo, born at Constantinople, 1426, was also a good scholar, and died at Milan in 1480.

FILIPPI, Sandro, or Alessandro, fa'le-pep'—usually called Botticelli, from the name of a goldsmith to whom he was apprenticed, having studied painting under Filippo Lippi, rose to be one of the greatest painters of his time. He executed many works for the churches of Florence, some of which still exist in the Florentine Academy. His chef-d'œuvre was a picture representing the adoration of the kings, in which the likenesses of Cosmo, Julian, and Cosmo's son, Giovanni Medici, were taken for the kings. He also painted, for the Sixtine chapel at Rome, three grand works from the history of Moses and the Israelites. He subsequently illustrated Dante's "Inferno," and attempted to engrave his own designs, in which he failed. b. at Florence, 1357; d. there, depending on the charity of Lorenzo de Medici, 1515.

FILLANS, James, fil'-lans, a Scotch sculptor, who, from the humble occupation of a keeper of sheep, became a weaver in Paisley, and next a stonemason. Whilst engaged in these occupations, he laboured privately to improve himself in the art of drawing, and also obtained a local celebrity by modelling in clay. Meeting with some success, and attracting the notice of William Motherwell the poet, and also the editor of the "Paisley Advertiser," he was brought further into notice, and encouraged to proceed to Glasgow, where he would have a wider field to work in. Here he gradually rose in his circumstances, until he found himself in a condition to visit Paris for the purposes of study. On his return, he settled in London, and was introduced to Chantrey by Allan Cunningham. He performances, do not seem to have done much for him. His greatest works are—"The Blind Teaching the Blind," "The Boy and Fawn," and a colossal head of Professor Wilson. To these may be added a colossal statue of Sir James Shaw for the town of Kilmarnock. This work established his fame, and Fillans would have become eminent; but his life was drawing to a close, and although he had been long engaged on a work entitled "Rachel Weeping for her Children," he did not live to finish it. b. at Wilsontown, Lanarkshire, 1808; d. at Glasgow, 1852.

FILMER, Sir Robert, fil'-mer, an English writer, who was the author of the "Anarchy of a limited and mixed Monarchy," "Patriarcha," in which he proves that government was monarchical in the patriarchal ages, but the arguments in which, according to Hallam, "are singularly insufficient," and were admirably answered by Mr. Locke in his book on government. He also wrote the "Freeholder's Grand Inquest." b. in Kent; d. above.

FINCH, second earl of Nottingham, who likewise knighted him. In 1661 he was chosen member of parliament for Oxford university; became attorney-general in 1670; in 1673 was made lord-keeper, and raised to the peerage; in 1675 he was made lord chancellor, and in 1681 was created earl of Nottingham. His wisdom and eloquence were rated very highly, and Dryden has commemorated him under the name of Amri, in his "Absalom and Achitophel." b. 1621; d. 1682.—His son, Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham, was a distinguished lawyer and state-man, who, disapproving of the course pursued by James II., never went to court during that king's reign, and, on his abdication, wished for the appointment of a regency, rather than the election of another king. When William and Mary were put on the throne, however, though he declined the lord chancellorship, he accepted one of the principal secretaryships of state. He attended King William at the famous congress at the Hague, and was excepted by King James I.

issued previous to his intended descent upon England, in 1632, from the general unanimity then promised to those who had supported the new order of things. Finch resigned in 1694, but was again re-appointed at the accession of Queen Anne; and when George I. came to the crown, he was one of the lords for the administration of affairs, and was chosen president of the council. He retired from public affairs in 1716, in consequence of making a speech in favour of the Scots gentlemen concerned in Mar's rebellion; and, while in retirement, wrote an eloquent reply to Whiston on the Trinity, for which the university of Oxford thanked him. b. 1647; d. 1730.

FINDEN, William, fin'-den, an English line-engraver, who, by study and intelligence, acquired a highly-finished taste, and rose rapidly to eminence as an engraver of steel-plates. From the excellence of his line, he was chosen to engrave the royal portrait of George IV. seated on a sofa, and painted by Lawrence. For this work he received 2000 guineas, although the plate was not a large one. He also engraved by Wilkie, and the by the same artist. great popularity, he commenced publishing works of art on his own account, and formed an extensive engraving establishment, which he carried on in conjunction with a younger brother, also a good engraver. The result of this was the production of engraved serials, among the most popular of which were the "Byron Gallery," and the "Gallery of British Art." But whatever may have been the successes of Mr. Finden in this line, they could only have been transitory, as the great expense necessary to support his establishment proved ultimately ruinous in a pecuniary point of view. The last work upon which he engaged himself was Hilton's "Crucifixion," undertaken for the Art Union, which he finished, with a broken spirit, shortly before his death, in 1852. b. 1787.

FINGAL, fin'-gal, prince of Morven, an ancient province of Caledonia, the principal hero of Ossian's poems, where he is celebrated for his bravery, prudence, and patriotism, fought against the Romans, and made expeditions into the Orkneys, Sweden, and Ireland. b. about 262 A.D.

FINLEY, John, fin'-lai, a Scotch poet, author of "Wallace of Ellerslie," a "Life of Cervantes," and editor of a "Collection of Scottish Ballads," was born at Glasgow, in 1782, and educated at the university of his native city. d. 1810.

FIORILLO, Johann Dominik, fi'-or-el'-lo, distinguished German painter and author, who is, however, best entitled to notice for his labours in the latter character. He was a native of Hamburg, went to Rome in 1761, where he studied under Pompeo Batoni, was elected a member of the academy of Bologna in 1769, and in 1784 was appointed professor of art in the university of Göttingen. His great works, besides essays on the history of modern art, are his "History of Art in Italy, France, Spain, and England," and "History of the Arts of Design in Germany and the United Netherlands." Although Fiorillo continued to use his brush to the end of his life, he did not produce many great pictures. His masterpiece is a theme from Homer, "The Surrender of Briseis to the Herald of Agamemnon." b. 1743; d. 1821.

FRIMILIAN, fr'-mil'-yan, a bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, who was the friend of Origen, and took part with Cyprian in the dispute concerning the rebaptizing of converted heretics. He presided at the first council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, and died in 269.

FRIMIN, Thomas, fr'-min, a benevolent Englishman, noted for his extensive charities, began business as a linendraper in London, and amassed a considerable fortune. His piety and benevolence procured him the esteem of many of the most eminent men of his time, especially Archbishop Tillotson, who particularly courted his friendship. He erected a warehouse for the employment of the poor in the linen manufacture, and when the French Protestants landed in England, set up another for their use at Ipswich. He was one of the governors of Christ's and St. Thomas's hospitals, to which he was a liberal benefactor, as he was to almost every charitable institution brought under his notice. b. at Ipswich, Suffolk, 1632; d. 1697. He published, in 1678, "Some Proposals for the Employing of the Poor, and especially in and about the City of London, and for the Prevention of Begging," 4to. Donaldson, in his "Agricultural Biography," says of this pamphlet, "The author's views were sufficiently benevolent, but not very enlarged."

FISCHER, Karl von, fish'-er, a distinguished German architect, who, after studying at Mannheim and Vienna, and visiting Italy, went, in 1609, to Munich, and became professor of architecture in its academy. Here he superintended the erection of several mansions of great merit; but his greatest work is the "Hof Theatre," which is still one of the chief ornaments of Munich. This building was commenced in 1811, and opened in 1818; and although, in 1823, it suffered considerably by fire, it was rebuilt in accordance with the original designs of Fischer. He is considered the founder of the Munich school of architecture. b. at Mannheim, 1782; d. at Munich, 1820.

FISKE, Simon, fish, an English lawyer, who, on account of his active support of the principles of the Reformation, was obliged to fly to Germany, where, in conjunction with William Tyndale, he wrote the "Supplication of Beggars against Monks and Friars." This piece so pleased Henry VIII., that Fish had liberty to return. He also translated from the Dutch a little book, entitled "The Sum of the Scriptures." d. of the plague, 1571. The "Supplication of the Beggars" was a satire upon the Popish clergy, and was answered by Sir Thomas More in his "Supplications of Souls in Purgatory."

FISHER, John, fish'-er, an English prelate, who was educated at Cambridge, and became confessor to Margaret, countess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. By his advice the countess founded St. John's and Christ's colleges, Cambridge. In 1502 he was chosen chancellor of that university, and became a liberal encourager of learning. In 1504 he was appointed to the bishopric of Rochester, from which he would never remove to a better see. He was a zealous opponent of the Reformation, and could not be induced by Henry VIII. to concur with that monarch's divorce of Queen Katharine. Great efforts were made to bring him to acknowledge the king's supremacy, which proving ineffectual, he was sent to the Tower. While in confinement, the pope made him a cardinal, which so enraged the king, that he caused him to be tried for high treason, when he was condemned and beheaded in 1535. b. at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1459. He wrote a "Commentary on the Penitential Psalms," a "Defence of the King's Book against Luther," a "Funeral Sermon for the Lady Margaret," &c. A collective edition of his works was published at Wurtzburg in 1695.

FISHER, Mary, a member of the Society of Friends, who conceived the idea of going to Constantinople to convert the grand seignor. The sultan, Mahomet IV., heard her patiently, and then caused her to be sent back to her own country, where she married a preacher of her own sect. This couple afterwards went to Languedoc, to preach the tenets of Quakerism among the Protestants there. Lived in the 17th century.

FISHER, Payne, an English poet, whose principal claim to remembrance arises from his having held the laureateship during the rule of Cromwell, notwithstanding that he had served on the royalist side in the Civil War. He had, however, abandoned the king's cause when affairs became desperate, joined the republicans, and celebrated their victories in some Latin poems. He had been a student both at Oxford and Cambridge, and, besides his poetical compositions, wrote a "Synopsis of Heraldry." b. in Dorsetshire, 1616; d. in poverty, in 1693.

FITZGERALD, Lord Edward, fiss-ger'-ald, was the son of James, first duke of Leinster, and Lady Emily Lennox, daughter of the duke of Richmond. Entering the English army, he fought in the American war, but in 1790 quitted the service, and took his place in the Irish Parliament. When the French revolution broke out, he supported its principles, and in 1793 hastened to Paris. Here he married Pamela, the daughter, it is said, of Louis Philippe Joseph, duke of Orleans, and Madame de Genlis. On his return to Ireland, Fitzgerald was desirous of effecting a separation of that country from England, and induced the French Directory to furnish him with a fleet and troops. A landing was attempted on several occasions; but all efforts only proved the futility of the scheme, and Fitzgerald was seized, tried, and condemned to death, but died of his wounds before the time fixed for his execution, 1793; a. October 15th, 1793.—His wife, distinguished for her wit and beauty, had been educated with the daughters of the duke of Orleans, by Madame de Genlis, and married a second time, Mr. Pitcairn, the American consul at Hamburg, from whom, however, she separated soon afterwards. b. almost in want of common necessities, 1831.

FITZGIBBON, John, fis-gib-bon, earl of Clare, and lord chancellor of Ireland, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Oxford. He rapidly rose in the legal profession, till he became Irish chancellor, in 1789, with the title of Baron Fitzgibbon; and in 1795 was raised to the peerage as the earl of Clare. He was an eminent lawyer, and an earnest promoter of the Union in the Irish Parliament. b. 1749; d. 1802.

FITZHERBERT, Maria, fis-her'-bert, was the youngest daughter of Waller Smythe, Esq., of Brambridge, and was twice a widow before she was twenty-five years of age. In 1785 she became acquainted with George IV., then prince of Wales, and was, in the same year, privately married to him at Carlton House, in the presence of her uncle and brother. This marriage was invalid by the law of the land, and the prince afterwards married the princess Caroline of Brunswick. This alliance proving unhappy, Mrs. Fitzherbert again lived for several years with the prince as his wife. His gross irregularities, however, drove her into retirement, and she went to Brighton, where she lived, not only in the enjoyment of the affection and respect of a large circle of friends, but retaining the good opinion of George III. and William IV. a. 1786; d. at Brighton, 1837.

FITZJAMES, James. (See BRERWICK, Duke of.)

FITZROY, Admiral Robert, R.N., fis-roi, an English naval officer, who, from 1828 to 1830, was employed in surveying the S. American coasts of Patagonia, Terra del Fuego, Chili, and Peru. Another expedition was planned, and in 1831 he sailed again, and surveyed the southern shores of S. America, circumnavigated the globe, and returned after an absence of four years. In 1841 he became member of parliament for the city of Durham, and in 1843 was appointed governor and commander-in-chief of the colony of New Zealand. In 1846 he was replaced by Sir George Grey, and, on his return to England, wrote a pamphlet in justification of the course of policy he had pursued in the colony. In 1850 he published "Sailing Directions for S. America, &c." accompanied by charts, which show the results of his surveys. In 1855 he was appointed chief of the meteorological department of the Board of Trade, a department which was then established for the purpose of giving notice, on the coasts and elsewhere, of approaching storms, in which office he was of immense service to fishermen and sailors. a. 1805. d. by his own hand, 1865.

FITZSTEPHEN, William, fis-ste'-fen, a monk of Canterbury, who wrote the life of his master, Thomas à Becket, in which he gives a curious description of London, and which is the earliest extant. d. 1191.

FITZWILLIAM, William Wentworth Fitzwilliam, earl, fis'-william, an English statesman, who took his seat in the House of Lords in 1769, and for a time acted with the Whigs, but on Mr. Fox approving of the French revolutionary ideas, he joined the Duke of Portland and Mr. Pitt, and was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In the discharge of the duties of this office, he favoured the agitation for Catholic emancipation, and this not being approved by his colleagues, he was recalled to make way for Earl Camden. On Pitt's death, in 1806, he became president of the council, an office he continued to hold till the Grenville administration fell, in 1807. He did not, after that time, take much share in public affairs. He was possessed of very large estates, and this, and his family connexions, gave him an immense amount of influence; to which circumstance, more, perhaps, than to his own abilities, he was indebted for the position he held in the national councils. a. 1743; d. 1833.

FLACCUS, Caius Valerius, flak'-kus, a Latin poet, who lived in the reign of Vespasian. A poem of his on the Argonautic expedition is extant, the best edition of which is that of Burnan, 1724.

FLACCUS, or FRANCOWITZ, Mathias, a Lutheran divine, who assumed the name of Flaccus Illyricus, on account of his having been born in an ancient part of Illyricum. He became a disciple of Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg, where he taught the Hebrew and Greek languages, of which he was there appointed professor. He was the principal author of the "Centurie Magdeburgenses," and a great defender of the principles of Luther against those who were for moderate doctrines; on which account he settled at Magdeburg, and afterwards removed to other places. a. at Istria, 1520; d. at Frankfurt, 1575. He wrote "Clavis Sacra Scriptura," 2 vols. folio; "Catalogus Testium Veritatis," folio; "De Translatione Imperii Romani ad Germanos;" and "De Electione Episcoporum, quod æque ad Plebem pertinet," 8vo.

FLAMEL, Nicholas, fla'-mel, a notary of Paris, who accumulated, by some unknown means, a vast property, which he appropriated to benevolent purposes and the endowment of hospitals and churches. The multitude ascribed his great wealth to his possessing the philosopher's stone; whilst others attributed to him the authorship of some works on alchemy. However this may be, he certainly founded no less than four hospitals in Paris. d. 1418.

FLAMINIO, Mercantonio, fla-mi'-no-o, an eminent Italian poet, whose Latin effusions rank among the finest productions of the Italian school. He was a man of amiable temper as well as profound learning, and was held in very high esteem by his contemporaries. His poems were published in the "Carmina quinque illustrium Poëtarum," which appeared at Florence in 1549, and of which they constitute the principal portion. He also composed Latin versions of thirty of the Psalms, and a short exposition of the Sacred Lyrics. He was secretary to Cardinal Pole, whom he accompanied to the council of Trent. a. 1494; d. 1550.

FLAMINIUS, Caius, fla-min-i-us, a brave and warlike Roman consul, who was drawn into a battle near the lake Thrasymenus, by the artifice of Hannibal. He was slain in the moment, with an immense number of a celebrated Roman consul, who, B.C. 197, was sent against Philip, king of Macedonia, and against the Achaian league. He totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Loeris, Phocis, and Thessaly tributary to the Roman power. He proclaimed all Greece independent, at the Isthmian games. This celebrated action procured him the name of father and deliverer of Greece. He was afterwards sent ambassador to Prusias, king of Bithynia, where, by his prudence and artifice, he caused Hannibal, who had taken refuge at this court, to kill himself, rather than be given up to his enemies the Romans. Flaminius was found dead in his bed, after he had imitated, with success, the virtues of his model, Scipio.—Lucius, the brother of the preceding, signalized himself in the wars of Greece.—Flaminius, a tribune, who, at the head of 300 men, saved the Roman army in Sicily, 238 B.C. by engaging the Carthaginians, and cutting them to pieces.

FLAMSTEED, flam'-steed, an English astronomer, who, when very young, discovered a strong predilection for mathematical learning, and, in 1690, calculated an eclipse of the sun which was to happen the next year. He also calculated five appulses of the moon to the fixed stars. He sent the same to the Royal Society, for which he received the thanks of that learned body. Soon after this, he visited London, and then went to Cambridge, where he entered himself of Jesus College. One of his best friends was Sir Jonas Moore, who introduced him to the king, and in 1674 procured for him the place of astronomer royal. The same year he entered into orders. In 1675 the foundation of the royal observatory at Greenwich was laid, and he being the first resident and astronomer royal, it was called Flamsteed House. In 1725 appeared his great work, entitled "Historia Cælestis Britannica," in 3 vols. folio. In the "Philosophical Transactions" are many of his papers, and in Sir Jonas Moore's "System of Mathematics" is a tract by him on the Doctrine of the Sphere. B. at Derby, 1646; D. 1719. It was to the mass of lunar observations made by Flamsteed, that Newton was indebted for the means of carrying out and verifying his immortal discovery of gravitation.

FLAVIAN, flav'-i-an, patriarch of Antioch, in which see he was confirmed by the council of Constantinople in 332. This act, however, occasioned a schism, numerous bishops adhering to Paulinus, and others to Flavian. The prudence of the latter at length restored peace to the church. He was a zealous opposer of the Arians. D. 404, having governed his church twenty-three years.

FLAVIAN, patriarch of Constantinople, to which he was elected on the death of Proclus, in 447. He condemned the Eutychian heresy, in a synod held at Constantinople; but the followers of Eutychius afterwards got Flavian banished to Lydia, where he died.

FLAVIAS, flav'-i-as, patriarch of Constantinople. When Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, died, the emperor Zeno was weak enough to leave a blank paper under the altar, in expectation that an angel would write upon it the name of a person to succeed him. Flavias, by bribing the grand-chamberlain, gained admittance into the church, and inscribed his own name in the letter; on which he was chosen patriarch. He died about three months afterwards, and the cheat being discovered, the chamberlain was executed. Lived in the 5th century.

FLAXMAN, John, flax'-man, an eminent English sculptor, who from his boyhood discovered a remarkable genius for modelling in clay. In 1787 he visited Rome, where, during a residence of seven years, he executed his celebrated designs in outline from Homer, Æschylus, and Dante. These were engraved and published, as were some which he made from Hesiod. While at Rome, he also executed the splendid group from Ovid's "Metamorphoses," entitled "The Fury of Athamas," consisting of four figures, larger than life. For this work he received £600, a sum insufficient to defray even the cost. It was executed for the earl of Bristol. At this time he also produced his "Cephalus and Aurora." In 1794 he returned to England, and executed the monument for Lord Mansfield, now in Westminster Abbey: for this he received £2500. After this he produced a large number of fine works, and has been pronounced "the greatest of modern sculptors." B. at York, 1755; D. in London, 1826. Byron says that "Flaxman translated Dante the best;" and Allan Cunningham says that "the progeny of his pencil and chisel were of the highest rank."

FLÉCHIER, Esprit, flé'-she-ri, a famous French bishop, who was greatly admired as a preacher at Paris, and whose funeral orations placed him on a level with Bossuet. In 1679 he published his "History of Theodosius the Great;" in 1685 he was made bishop of Lavaur, on which Louis XIV. said, "I should have rewarded you much sooner, but that I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses." Shortly after, he was promoted to the see of Nîmes. As a bishop, he was exemplary, and when a famine raged in 1709, his charity was unbounded, and manifested to all persons, without any respect to religious persuasion. B. at Pernes, near Carpentras, 1632; D. at Nîmes, 1710. His works are, "Miscellaneous Works," 12mo; "Panegyrics of the Saints;" "Funeral Orations;" "Sermons;" the lives of Cardinal Ximenes and Theodosius the Great; "Posthumous Works." They were all published together at Nîmes in 1782, in 10 vols. 8vo.

FLECKNOE, Richard, flek'-no, an English poet and dramatist, noticed here, not on account so much of his own productions, as on account of his name having been borrowed by Dryden, to serve as a scourge for the punishment of Shadwell. He was poet laureate to Charles II., and wrote several miscellaneous pieces; a short treatise on the English Stage; "Love's Dominion," a dramatic piece; "Ermina; or, the Chaste Lady;" and several other performances, which are now all but forgotten, even by the antiquarians in literature. Of his birth nothing is known. He is believed to have died about 1678.

FLEMMING, or FLEMMINGE, Richard flem'-ming, an English prelate, who received his education at University College, Oxford, and, in 1408, obtained a prebend in the cathedral of York. He, for a time, zealously defended the doctrines of Wickliffe, but afterwards as strenuously opposed them. In 1420 he became bishop of Lincoln, and soon after was sent deputy to the council of Constance, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence. At his return, he executed the decree of that assembly for digging up Wickliffe's bones and burning them.

Fleetwood

was afterwards raised to the see of York by the pope; but Henry VI. refusing to concur in his advancement, he was obliged to remain at Lincoln. b. in Yorkshire; d. at Lincoln, 1431. He founded Lincoln College, Oxford.

FLEETWOOD, Charles, fleet'-wood, one of the parliamentary generals during the civil war, was the son of Sir William Fleetwood, cup-bearer to Charles I.; but on the breaking out of the quarrel between the king and the parliament, young Fleetwood declared for the latter. He commanded a regiment of cavalry in 1644; held the rank of lieutenant-general at the battle of Worcester, to the gaining of which, by Cromwell, he largely contributed. He married the Protector's daughter after the death of her first husband, Ireton, and was appointed commander of the forces in Ireland, in 1652, and commissioner for the settlement of the affairs of that country, which he reduced to subjection, and was named lord-deputy there by his father-in-law. He strongly opposed Cromwell assuming the title of king in 1657, and was soon after superseded in Ireland by Henry Cromwell, the Protector's younger son.

Oliver, he concurred in the appointment of Richard as his successor; but soon after joined in inducing him to resign, and thus paved way for the Restoration, an event, however, which he did not long survive. d. 1662.

FLEETWOOD, William, an English prelate, became chaplain to William and Mary, was fellow of Eton, and rector of Antin's, London. He was lecturer at St. Dunstan's, was installed canon of Windsor in 1702; and in 1706 succeeded bishop Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, from whence he was translated to Ely in 1714. He was greatly admired as a preacher, and was esteemed and honoured on account of the exemplary and blameless life he lived. His sermons are the best known of his writings, although he also composed several learned works on theological subjects, and on some points of what is now known as political economy. b. in the Tower of London, 1656; d. at Tottenham, Middlesex, 1723.

FLETCHER, Richard, fletch'-er, an English prelate, who, in 1583, was made dean of Peterborough; and, in 1587, attended Mary queen of Scots at her execution, with a view of converting her to the Protestant religion. In 1589 he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, whence he was translated to Worcester, and lastly to London. On the death of his first wife he married again, and this gave such offence to Queen Elizabeth, that she suspended him from his episcopal functions. b. in Kent; d. 1593.

FLETCHER, John, an English dramatic poet, who received his education at Cambridge, and wrote several plays in conjunction with Beaumont. We do not know whether to consider it a fair inference, that, because the plots of many of his plays were taken from works in the Spanish, Italian, and French languages, he was acquainted with these; but be that as it may, it is certain that he possessed other merits sufficient to establish a fair claim to the reputation which time and posterity have alike awarded him in the literature of his country. Out of the fifty-two plays composed under the united names of Beaumont and Fletcher, it is stated that Beaumont had a share in the production of only seventeen. If such was the case, the friendship which could excite such generous conduct on the part of Fletcher was equally creditable to both. In addition to his other works, he assisted Ben Jonson and Middleton in "The Widow," and is believed to have been also a literary partner with Shakspeare, Massinger, and some other authors. b. 1576; d. of a plague which happened 1625, and was buried in St. Saviour's Church, Southwark. (See BEAUMONT.)

FLETCHER, Phineas, cousin to the above poet, was educated at Eton and Cambridge. In 1621 he obtained the living of Hilray, in Norfolk, where he died in 1630. He is best known by a poem entitled "The Purple Island," which is an allegorical description of man, in the manner of Spenser, reprinted at London, in 1783. He also wrote a work, now very rare, entitled "Locusts, or the Apollyonists," a satire against the Jews. b. 1584; d. 1650.—His younger brother Giles was also a divine and a poet, and wrote "Christ's Victory." To this work Milton is said to have confessed that he owed the idea of his "Paradise Lost." He was born in 1558, and died in 1623.

FLETCHER, Andrew, a Scottish political writer, was the son of Sir Robert Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland. He was bred up under the care of Dr. Burnet, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and Lothian in the Scotch parliament, in which he so strongly opposed the court measures, that he found it necessary to withdraw to Holland. In 1685 he landed in the west of England with the duke of Monmouth, but was dismissed for shooting a gentleman who had remonstrated with him for stealing his horse. One of Fletcher's biographers says, that "he was a man of breeding and nice honour, in whose constitution anger was extremely predominant." After this he was engaged in the Hungarian service against the Turks. At the Revolution he returned to his own country, and was a member of the convention for settling the government of Scotland. b. at Saltoun, 1653; d. in London, 1716. His publications, which are wholly political, are filled with the boldest and most honest denunciations of the oppressive measures beneath which his country, in his time, groaned. His character is thus given by a contemporary: "A gentleman, steady in his principles, of nice honour, with abundance of learning; brave as the sword he wears, and bold as a lion,—a sure friend and an irreconcilable enemy,—would lose his life readily to serve his country, and would not do a base thing to save it." It is in his tract to the marquess of Montrose, entitled "An Argument of a Conversation," that occurs the famous saying erroneously attributed to the duke of Chatham: "I knew a very wise man that believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he did not care who should make all the laws of a nation."

FLETCHER, Abraham, an ingenious English mathematician, was bred to the business of a tobacco-pipe maker. He learned to read and write by his own application, and also taught himself arithmetic, mathematics, and botany. At the age of thirty he became a schoolmaster, to which he added the professions of astrologer and doctor, and acquired a fortune of £3000. b. in Cumberland, 1714; d. 1783. He published a compendium of practical mathematics, under the title of the "Universal Measurer," 1 vol. 8vo; a book of merit.

chaplain to Louis XIV., then became, in 1698, bishop of Fréjus, and was nominated by the old king, when near his death, as tutor to his successor, Louis XV. Fleury gained great influence over the mind of his pupil, and in 1726 succeeded the duke of Bourbon as prime minister, being in the same year also made cardinal. He showed his wisdom in the internal administration of the kingdom, diminishing the taxes, and systematizing the finance department, but was not successful in maintaining the influence of France abroad. Stanislas, king of Poland, whose claims ought to have been supported, was abandoned in the war which he undertook to recover his crown. By the treaty of Vienna, 1736, Fleury, however, obtained from Austria the cession to Stanislas of the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, stipulating that these should, at the death of Stanislas, revert to France. In the War of Succession, 1741, the cardinal was not destined to see the arms of his country successful; but he did not live till the end of the conflict. B. at Lodève, Languedoc, 1653; D. 1743.

FLINDERS, Captain Matthew, flin'-ders, a distinguished English navigator, who early entered into the merchant service, but quitted it soon for the navy, which he joined as a midshipman in 1795. Having distinguished himself in an exploring expedition through Bass's Straits (see Bass), he was, on his return to England, promoted, and in 1801 sailed, as captain of the Investigator, for Australia, and, commencing at Cape Leeuwin, surveyed the eastern coast, as far as Encounter Bay. He next sailed for Port Jackson, where, having refitted, he explored Northumberland and Cumberland islands, and the great Barrier Reef of coral rocks. Thence he proceeded to Torres Straits, examined the Gulf of Carpentaria, thence to the island of Timor, and thence to Port Jackson, where he arrived in 1803. From the rotten state of his ship, he was no longer able to continue his survey; accordingly, he embarked for England in the Porpoise, for the purpose of laying the results of his investigations before the lords commissioners of the admiralty. In this ship, however, he was wrecked on a coral reef, in sailing for Torres Straits; but, through his own intelligence and enterprise, not only saved the crew, but eventually was the means of rescuing them, when, in a vessel called the Cumberland, no larger than 29 tons, he set out for England. He crossed the Indian Ocean, and reached the Isle of France, where he and his people were made prisoners of war, notwithstanding that he held a French pass, enjoining that his ship should be respected wherever it should be found, on account of the scientific objects in which its captain was engaged. Here he was detained a prisoner for six years. At length he was restored to his liberty and his country, with all his plans and charts, excepting one of his log-books, which had been either lost, kept, or destroyed. By this time the French had issued a volume and an atlas, marking a vast number of the parts surveyed by Flinders as those which had been visited by a navigator of their nation. Flinders, however, was enabled to assert his own rights; but, broken in health, lived only to revise the last sheet of his work, having died on the very day that his book was published. B. at Donington, Lincolnshire, 1780; D. 1814. The work of Flinders is entitled "A Voyage to Terra Australis, in the years 1801, 1802, and 1803, in His Majesty's ship Investigator, and subsequently in the armed vessel Porpoise and Cumberland schooner," 2 vols. with atlas: London, 1814. (See BROWN, Dr. Robert.)

FLOOD, Henry, flud, an Irish orator, was the son of the Right Hon. Warden Flood, chief justice of the King's Bench, in Ireland. He received his education at Dublin and Oxford, and was, in 1752, created M.A. at the latter university. He entered the Irish parliament for the county of Kilkenny, and afterwards for the borough of Callan, where his eloquence acquired for him an uncommon popularity in his native country, which he lost when he obtained a seat in the British parliament. B. 1732; D. 1791. Mr. Flood published an ode to Fame; and several of his speeches have been also printed. He bequeathed the bulk of his property, after the death of his wife, to the university of Dublin, for the purpose of founding a professorship, purchasing manuscripts and books, and for granting premiums.

FLORIAN, John Peter Claris de, flor'-s-an, a French writer, educated under Voltaire, who procured him the place of page to the duke de Penthièvre, whose friendship he obtained, and who gave him a captain's commission in his regiment of dragoons. He devoted himself, however, principally to letters, and produced a number of works, chiefly of the romantic kind. His first was "Galathée," published in 1732, which was followed by his "Théâtre," containing "Les Deux Bilets," "Le Bon Ménage," "Le Bon Père," "La Bonne Mère," and "Le Bon Fils." His "Voltaire et le Serf du Mont Jura" gained him the prize given by the French Academy, of which society he became a member. His "Estelle" is reckoned equal to "Galathée," and his "Numa Pompilius," "Gonsalvo de Cordova," and his "Fables," which rank next to those of La Fontaine, are also highly esteemed. For his "Numa" he was sent to prison during the reign of Robespierre. In his confinement he began a poem on the story of "William Tell," and finished another, entitled "Ebrahim." He gained his liberty after the fall of Robespierre, and died at Sceaux, 1794. B. in Languedoc, 1755.

FLORIAN, Marcus Antonius, half-brother of the emperor Tacitus, assumed the purple after the death of the latter, and caused himself to be acknowledged by the senate. Probus, however, having been proclaimed by the legions of the East, Florian marched against him; but experiencing a check in one of his first encounters, his soldiers killed him. He reigned but two months. D. 276.

FLORIO, John, flor'-ro, who styled himself "The Resolute," was descended from a family of Italian refugees which had settled in London, where he was born in the reign of Henry VIII. He taught French and Italian at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was appointed tutor to Prince Henry on the accession of James I. to the English throne, and likewise held the office of clerk of the closet to the queen. He wrote a variety of works with somewhat fanciful titles, the best of which are, "First Fruits," "Second Fruits," "Garden of Recreation," and an English and Italian Dictionary. D. 1625.

FLORIS, Francis, flor'-ez, a Flemish historical painter, surnamed the "Flemish Raphael." He was held in high estimation by Charles V. and Philip II. of Spain, and amassed a very large fortune. Amongst his best works are the "Twelve Labours of Hercules," and a "Last Judgment." b. at Antwerp, 1520; p. 1570.

FLORUS, Lucius Annaeus, flor-us, a Latin historian, of the same family as Seneca and Lucan. He wrote an "Abridgment of the Roman History," in four books, which is concise and elegant, although incorrect in many points. He lived between the years 70 and 140, reaching the summit of his fame in the reigns of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian.

FOURENS, Marie Jean Pierre, flod-rai, a distinguished French physiologist, universally known as one of the most distinguished savans of his day, and as the author of many learned works on physiological science, was professor of comparative physiology in the Museum of Natural History in Paris; professor in the College of France; peer of the Empire; perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences in the same city, a member of the Royal Society of England, and of the Academies of Edinburgh, Stockholm, Munich, Madrid, Turin, and of almost every other capital in Christendom. The best and most remarkable of all the works by M. Flourens is his book on the "Duration of Human Life, and the quantity of Life on the Globe," in which he maintains that one hundred years is the natural duration of human life, and that by living a sober—that is, a well-ordered, well-conducted, reasonable life—men may secure that degree of longevity; but that it is impossible to prolong existence beyond that period, use whatever means they may. b. at Maurelhan, Hérault, 1794.

FO, or FOE, fo, the founder of a religious sect, which, in the empire of China, reckons a great number of followers, whose tenets appear to be much the same as those of Buddha. He reformed the religion of the Brahmins, denied the distinction of castes, and the superiority of any one class of men, and taught a doctrine, of which the fundamental precepts are, not to lie, to do to others as we would be done by, to kill no living creature, to abstain from wine, to avoid all impurity, and to believe in future rewards and punishments. His doctrines only began to be prevalent in China 200 years b.c. His priests are called bonzes, and live in monasteries, travelling also considerably about the empire, and living, for the most part, on alms. b. at Benares, or in Cashmere, about 1027 b.c.

FOH, fo'-he, the first Chinese emperor and legislator. He is said to have founded that kingdom 2953 years b.c. Nothing certain is known of his reign; but there are attributed to him the institution of marriage, the invention of fishing, hunting, music, and writing. He acknowledged and worshipped a supreme deity. Lived about 3000 b.c.

FOIX, Gaston III., Count de, Viscount de Béarn, foix, succeeded his father, Gaston II., at the age of twelve, and rendered himself remarkable for his valour and magnificence. He is accused, however, of possessing a violent temper, and having caused the death of his own son. This young prince, unjustly suspected of having attempted to poison his father, was imprisoned by the orders of Gaston, at the instigation of Charles the Bad, and left to perish, in his dungeon, of hunger. The life of Gaston was passed in continual wars. In 1345 he was fighting against the English; in 1356 in Prussia; two years afterwards on the side of the court against the revolt of the Jacquerie; in 1372 against the count of Armagnac; and, 1375, against the duke de Berri. b. 1331; p. 1391.

FOIX, Gaston de, duke of Nemours, a Frenchman who, in 1512, succeeded the duke of Longueville in command of the army in Italy, and on account of his daring exploits, was called the "Thunderbolt of Italy." He raised the siege of Bologna, relieved Breseia, and laid siege to Ravenna, where, on the 11th of April, 1512, he fell in the arms of victory. Byron, in the "Childe Harold," calls him the "gallant young De Foix," and draws a moral as to the evanescent character of human fame, from the state of the monument raised to his memory on the spot where he fell, and which, the poet says, he found with—

"Weeds and ordure ranking round the base."
De Foix was the son of John de Foix, Viscount Narbonne, by his wife, Mary of Orleans, sister of Louis XII., and was born in 1459, and was thus only twenty-three years of age at his death.

FOIX, Odet de, lord of Lautrec, a famous French general, was likewise present at the battle of Ravenna, where he was wounded, and was appointed governor of Milan by Francis I. He was opposed to the famous general Colonna, who drove him out of Italy. He returned in 1523, however, and took Pavia, and besieged Naples, where he died. His body was conveyed to Spain, and was buried, twenty years after, in the tomb of the great Gonsalvo of Cordova.

FOLARD, Jean Charles de, fo-lar, a French officer, who, in 1702, became aide-de-camp to M. de Vendôme, who undertook nothing without consulting him. For his services, he was rewarded with a pension and the cross of St. Louis. He was wounded at the battle of Cassano, and taken prisoner by Prince Eugene some time after the battle of Blenheim. Being exchanged, he was sent to Malta, to assist in its defence against the Turks. He afterwards served under Charles XII. of Sweden, and was present at the siege of Frederickskhal when that prince was killed, December 11, 1718. He then returned to France, and served under the duke of Berwick. b. at Avignon, 1609; p. 1752. He wrote "Commentaries upon Polybins," 6 vols. 4to; "A Book of New Discoveries in War," and "A Treatise on the Defence of Places."

FOLCZ, Johann, folte, a famous German poet belonging to the class of authors called master-singers, who, in the 14th century, succeeded to the position previously occupied by the minn-singers, or Suanbian bards. These master-singers, who belonged generally to the class of master-craftsmen, usually met in taverns, and their merit was to invent new species of measures, subject to certain rules and laws. Folcz was especially eminent in this line, having originated several of these styles of versification. He occupied the position of a barber in Nuremberg, and was born at Ulm in the 15th century. A collection of his pieces was printed at Nuremberg in 1474.

FOLZGO, Theofilo, fo-len'-go, an Italian poet of the macaronic and burlesque schools, whose poetical cognomen was Merlino Coccia, by which name he is best known. He was of a roving disposition, which he indulged for several years, during which he chiefly occupied himself with the composition of macaronic verses, a kind of poetry deriving its name from the Italian dish macaroni, and which consisted in interweaving with a staple of Latin verse words and phrases of the vernacular tongue, and made to fit into the construction and metre by Latin terminations. In this species of composition Folengo was very successful. He likewise wrote a burlesque called "Orlandino," published at Venice in 1526; and, returning to a settled and so-called religious life, he in 1627 printed a piece entitled "Chaos del Triperano," in prose and verse, a whimsical and licentious work, descriptive of the various incidents of his life, and ending with the record of his conversion. He subsequently, while living in a monastery in the Neapolitan dominions, composed a poem in ottava rima, called "La Umanità del Figlio di Dio," which appeared in 1533. n. 1591; p. 1614.

FOLEY, Sir Thomas, fo'-le, a distinguished naval officer, and the friend of Nelson, was descended from an ancient family of Pembroke-shire. He was a Lieutenant in the Prince George when Prince William Henry, afterwards William IV., was a midshipman on board. He was made post-captain in 1790; was appointed to the St. George, flag-ship of Admiral Gell, in 1794, at the commencement of the war with France and Spain. On the passage to the Mediterranean, immediately after, he assisted at the recapture of the St. Jago, a large Spanish ship, with upwards of two millions of dollars on board. Foley afterwards served under Admiral Hotham, and distinguished himself in an action with the French Toulon fleet and in capturing the Censeur and Ca Ira ships of the line. He was captain of the Britannia in the famous battle off Cape St. Vincent, on the 11th of February, 1797, where he displayed signal bravery. In 1798 he was transferred to the Goliath, which was sent to reinforce Nelson in the Mediterranean; and in the battle of the Nile, August 1, 1798, led the British line into action. Within two minutes after the first shot was fired by the French, Foley opened upon them from the Goliath, which he steered alongside of the Conquerant, the second ship in the enemy's van, in fifteen minutes dismantled his opponent, and then aided in subduing the vessels in the rear. After assisting in the blockade of Malta, Foley was in 1800 in command of the Elephant, 74, belonging to the fleet under Sir Hyde Parker, and on board of his ship Nelson hoisted his flag when about to make his celebrated attack on the Danish fleet and fortifications at Copenhagen. Foley accompanied the Admiral through the whole of the desperate action which followed. It was to Captain Foley that Nelson made the famous remark, when the signal to cease action was made by Sir Hyde: "Leave off the action! Foley, you know I have only one eye, and am entitled to be blind sometimes. I really do not see the signal," added he, putting the glass to his blind eye; and continued the battle, with what result is well known. Captain Foley was made a colonel of marines in 1807, was promoted to rear-admiral's rank in 1808; in 1811 was appointed commander-in-chief in the Downs, which position he continued to hold during the remainder of the war. In 1812 he was made vice-admiral; in 1815 was nominated knight commander of the Bath; and obtained the grand cross of the same order in 1820. On May 1, 1830, Sir Thomas was appointed to the command of Portsmouth, and died there on January 3, 1831; p. 1757.

FOLEY, John Henry, R.A., an eminent sculptor, who, from Dublin, went to London, in 1834, and became a student in the Royal Academy. His first exhibitions were "Innocence" and "The Death of Abel;" both of which in 1830, appeared on the walls of the Academy, and attracted much attention. Next year appeared his "Ino and the Infant Bacchus," which further increased his fame; and from that time he may be said to have taken his place amongst the best sculptors of the day. Besides those works already named, he produced "Lear and Cordelia," "Venus rescuing Æneas," "Prospero narrating his Adventures to Miranda," and several others, displaying a rich faculty of invention, and truly classic taste in execution. He also produced many portraits and monumental memorials, which greatly helped to extend his reputation. In 1858 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy. n. at Dublin, 1813.

FOLKES, Martin, fo'-kes, an English philosopher and antiquary, who, after receiving a private education, was sent to Clare Hall, Cambridge. At the age of twenty-three he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1723 was nominated one of the vice-presidents. In 1741 he succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as president of that learned body, and was, about the same time, elected a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. He was also created doctor of laws by both universities. n. at Westminster, 1690; n. in London, 1754. Mr. Folkes wrote, besides a number of papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," "A Table of English Silver Coins, from the Norman Conquest to 1745." A second edition of this work appeared in 1763.

FONTBLANQUE, John de Grenier, fon'-blu-ang, a distinguished English barrister, was descended from a noble family in the south of France, some members of which had emigrated to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In 1793 he published a "Treatise on Equity," which was enlarged and reprinted with notes in 1799, and again in 1805. n. 1769; p. 1837.

FONTBLANQUE, Albany W., fon'-blank, son of the above, was brought up to the law, but was never called to the bar. He early began to direct his attention to political questions, and, on Leigh Hunt and his brother paring with the "Examiner" newspaper, it passed into the proprietorship of Mr. Fontblanque. In the columns of this journal his talents were fully displayed. In 1837 he published a selection of his papers from the "Examiner," and entitled them "England under Seven Administrations," which were much admired. In 1852 he was appointed director of the statistical department of the Board of Trade, when his superintendence of the "Examiner" may be considered to have virtually ceased. n. 1797.

FONTAINE, John de la, fon'-tain, a French poet, was educated first at Rheims, and afterwards under the fathers of the Oratory. He was a man of great simplicity of manners, credulous, fearful, and uncommonly absent-minded. He lived for some time with the superintendent Fouquet, who allowed him a pension. Afterwards he resided in turn with the duchesses of Bouillon and Orleans, and Mesdames d'Hervart and de Sablière. As an illustration of the laziness of his disposition, that lady on one occasion, having parted with her servants, said, "I have got rid of all my animals except three—my cat, my dog, and La Fontaine." He was married, but his wife had as little knowledge of the management of a household as himself. He wrote some licentious tales, which are little read; but his fables are very generally put into the hands of young people. They are natural, poetical, and entertaining. He also wrote "Les Amours de Psyche," a romance, some comedies, letters, &c., to be found in his miscellanies. b. at Château Thierry, 1621; d. 1695. In his later years, La Fontaine inclined seriously towards religion, and many of his more unworthy works he, at the instance of his confessor, suppressed. As a fable-writer he is unsurpassed, his compositions in this path being remarkable for their great simplicity and exquisite beauty.

FONTAINE, Nicholas, a voluminous French author, connected with the Jansenists, was the son of a scrivener at Paris, where he was born in 1625. His principal works are, "Lives of the Saints," "History of the Bible," in short chapters, which has often been reprinted under the title of the "Bible de Royaumont," "Memoirs of the Solitaires of Port Royal," and a "Translation of the Homilies of St. Chrysostom on Paul's Epistles," which latter was condemned by de Harlai, archbishop of Paris, as teaching the Nestorian heresy. d. at Meun, 1700.

FONTAINE, Pierre François Leonard, an architect, who has been called the Father of the modern French school, early began the study of his art, and, in 1735, carried away the second prize for architecture. He now became a pensioner of the Academy, to be maintained at Rome, and having presented drawings of the "imperial city," as it was in the time of the Cæsars, he received an extraordinary prize of 3000 francs. After the Revolution, and the elevation of Napoleon I. to the consulate, he and Percier, a brother architect, were employed to restore Malmaison. Under the imperial rule, he was further employed to restore all the palaces and complete the Louvre and the Tuileries, which, with numerous other works, occupied him and Percier throughout the whole of the rule of Napoleon I. On the fall of the empire, he was named architect to Louis XVIII., which place he held till 1843. He next became president of the Council of the Civil Buildings, and by his vast experience was thus enabled still to direct some of the most important public works in France. b. at Pontoise, in the department of the Seine-et-Oise, 1762; d. in Paris, 1853.

FONTANA, Domenico, fon-ta'-na, an eminent architect and mechanic, who raised the Roman obelisk from the dust in the front of St. Peter's, a work deemed impracticable, and which many others had attempted in vain. b. at Mili, on the Lake of Como, 1543; d. at Naples, 1607.

FONTANA, Prospero, an historical painter, who was preceptor to Ludovico and Hannibal Caracci. b. at Bologna, 1512; d. at Rome, 1597.—His daughter Lavinia was also an excellent painter of portraits, and was patronized by Pope Gregory XIII. b. 1553; d. 1614.—There were several others of this name, among whom may be mentioned—1. Felix Fontana, an eminent naturalist and physical philosopher. b. at Pomarolo, in the Tyrol, 1730; d. 1805. 2. Gregory Fontana, the brother of Felix, a mathematician. b. 1735; d. 1803. 3. Francis Fontana, an astronomer of Naples, to whom the invention of the telescope was for some time erroneously ascribed, but who made improvements in various instruments. b. 1590; d. 1658. 4. Carlo Fontana, an Italian architect of some distinction. b. 1634; d. 1714. 5. Gaetano Fontana, a Modenese astronomer, with whom Cassini corresponded, and by whom he was regarded as always to be depended on in his observations and calculations. b. 1645; d. 1710.

Fontenelle, Moderata, fon-tai, a Venetian lady, who wrote two poems; one entitled "Il Floridoro," the other on the "Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ." She also produced a work in prose, in which she asserts that women are not inferior in understanding to men. b. at Venice, 1555; d. 1592.

Fontenay, Therèse de Cabarrus, Marquise de, fon-te-nai, a Spanish lady, who became first the wife of M. Devin, marquis of Fontenay, a counsellor in Paris, and afterwards the wife of Tal-live. The Church, however, refused to ratify her marriage, and she continued to struggle against the feelings of society, in a vain endeavour to be received into it, until 1816, when she retired to a private retreat, where she passed the remainder of her days in tranquillity. She was very beautiful, and extremely ungraciously her great wit. b. at Saragossa, Spain, 1773; d. at Chima, 1835.

Fontenelle, Bernard le Bovier de, fon-ta-nel, a celebrated French writer, whose father was a counsellor of Rouen. Young Fontenelle was also bred to the legal profession, which, however, he abandoned for literature. His first efforts were directed to the stage, and although they were superintended by his uncle Thomas Corneille, he did not succeed. In 1653 he published his "Dialogues of the Dead," which were well received. His conversations on the "Plurality of Worlds," which appeared in 1656, further added to his reputation; and the year following he published the "History of Oracles," which is a translation, or very nearly so, of a work on the same subject by Van Dale. He was admitted a member of the French Academy in 1691, and, in 1697, of the Academy of Sciences. He subsequently became secretary of the latter, and filled that office with honour from 1690 to 1741. In this capacity he wrote a history of the Academy, and distinguished himself by the excellent eulogies which he composed upon his deceased members. b. at Rouen, 1657; d. at Paris, 1757. Besides the above works, he wrote a "History of the French Theatre," "Elements of the Geometry of Infinites," "Moral Discourses," &c. Fontenelle is said by some critics to have been especially distinguished for the clearness and simplicity of his style, and to have possessed, in an eminent degree, the power of making scientific matters intelligible to all readers. As a man of the world, he shone by the sharpness of his wit and the smartness of his repartees; although he was also remarkable for his moderation and reserve in an age when there was not much of these qualities. He would say, "If I had my hands full of truths, I should take care how I opened them." He has been severely criticised, however, by some writers. Arsène Houssaye, in his sparkling work on the "Men and Women of the Eighteenth Century," says of him that "he always wanted a compliment; a slave to his vanity, he made himself the slave of the first comer. The roof which sheltered him in this world was never other than the roof of hospitality; he passed his days here and there; with Thomas Corneille, with M. le Haguais, with M. Aube (you know him—that M. Aube celebrated by Rulhières). Again, he always dined out—with Madame de Tencin, with Madame d'Epinau, with Madame de Lambert, with Madame d'Argenton; in fine, everywhere except at home. This style of living could not fail of being economical. He, therefore, although a poet without patrimony, died with an income of 35,000 livres (he belonged to all the paying Academies), without speaking of 75,000 livres in ringing coins, which, when about 87, he had concealed in his mattress, doubtless to repose upon in the other world. Let no one say now, that all poets are imprudent—but Fontenelle was not a poet. Now I repeat, that whilst he was thus hiding away his money, his cousin, the nephew of the great Corneille—the nephew of his mother—was basking at a neighbouring door. Besides, were there not twenty other unfortunates to succour at that time in the great family of men of letters, whence he had issued so rich and glorious? Malditère dying of hunger! And so many other hidden miseries, which the eye of charity always discovers; so many other souls that were breaking their wings against the corners of some confined room or the rafters of a garret. Ch! Monsieur de Fontenelle, you would have been pardoned for much prose; and many a verse, for some open-handed charity." On seeing his hearer pass, Piron exclaimed, "This is the first time that M. de Fontenelle has left home not to go and dine in the city."

FOOTE, Samuel, foot, an English dramatic writer and actor, whose father was justice of peace for the county of Cornwall, and whose mother was sister to Sir John Dinely Goodere, of Herefordshire. Foote was educated at Worcester College, Oxford, whence he removed to the Temple for the purpose of studying the law; but this he quitted for the attractions of the stage. His first performance was in the character of Othello. In 1747 he opened the "little theatre in the Haymarket" with a dramatic piece of his own, called "The Diversions of the Morning," which had a great success, and which was a representation of real characters, whose very voice, gait, and gestures were strikingly imitated. His next piece was called "An Auction of Pictures" in which he represented some of the most noted individuals of the day. He still continued to play at one or other of the theatres, and frequently produced new pieces. In 1760 he brought out the "Minot" at his own house in the Haymarket; but, in 1766, had the misfortune to break his leg, which he was obliged to have amputated. The duke of York, out of compassion, now procured for him a patent for life for the theatre in the Haymarket. In 1776 he attacked the duehess of Kingston in a piece which was suppressed by authority. Soon after this, a charge was brought against him which broke his heart, although he was honourably acquitted by the jury. n. at Truro, Cornwall, 1729; n. at Dover, on his way to France, 1777. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Foote had an infinite fund of comic humour, both in writing and conversation; but he took unwarrantable liberties in mimicking persons merely on account of natural failings and peculiarities of manner. His farces have procured him the title of the English Aristophanes. Dr. Johnson said, that for loud, obstreperous, broad-faced mirth, he had no equal.

FOOTE, Sir Edward James, an English naval officer, who entered the service of his country early in life, and obtained post rank in 1794, and was at the battle of Cape St. Vincent in 1797. In 1799 Nelson committed the blockade of Naples to his charge, and in that capacity he, in concert with Cardinal Ruffo, made a treaty with the insurgents, which Nelson afterwards annulled. Foote became rear-admiral in 1812, vice-admiral in 1821, and died in 1833. n. in Kent, in 1767.

FORBES, William, forbs, the first bishop of Edinburgh, after studying at several universities, went to England, where he was offered the Hebrew professorship at Oxford, which he declined. When Charles I., in 1634, erected Edinburgh into an episcopal see, he appointed Dr. Forbes to fill it; but the bishop enjoyed this dignity only three months. n. at Aberdeen, 1585; n. 1634. He wrote "Considerationes modestæ et pacificæ Controversiarum de Justificatione," &c., 8vo, reprinted by Fabricius, at Frankfort, in 1707.

FORBES, Patrick, bishop of Aberdeen, and a munificent patron of the university of that city, which owes to him the reinstitution of the professorships of theology, civil law, and medicine, which had become dormant. He was descended from a noble family, took orders in 1592, and was raised to the episcopal bench in 1613 by James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. n. 1564; n. 1635.—His second son, John Forbes of Corse, was professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in King's College, Aberdeen; but in consequence of supporting the introduction of episcopacy into Scotland, and his refusal to subscribe the "Solemn League and Covenant," was ejected from his chair, in 1640, and went to Holland, where he remained a few years, and afterwards returned to Scotland, and lived in retirement at his estate of Corse. He wrote "Historico-Religious Institutions;" a work generally admired, even by those who opposed his views of church government; "Irenicum," published at Aberdeen in 1629; and in 1646 he printed at Amsterdam a "Commentary on the Apocalypse," which had been written by his father. n. 1593; n. 1643.

FORBES, Alexander (Lord Forbes of Pitsligo), is said to have been the original of Sir Walter Scott's Baron of Bradwardine in "Waverley." He adhered to the Stuarts, led a troop of horse in the rebellion of 1745, retired to France after the battle of Culloden, but returned to his country in 1749. He was the author of "Moral and Philosophical Essays." n. 1678; n. 1762.

FORBES, Duncan, an eminent Scotch judge, and an excellent writer, who was educated first at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Utrecht, Leyden, and Paris. In 1709 he began to practise as an advocate at the Scotch bar, and gained considerable reputation. In 1717 he was appointed solicitor-general of Scotland, in 1725 lord advocate, and in 1737, president of the Court of Session. In the rebellion of 1745 he zealously opposed the Pretender; but the ingratitude with which he was treated by the government, who even refused to reimburse some expenses which he had incurred, preyed upon his mind and brought on a fever, of which he died, 1747. n. at Culloden, 1635. His lordship was a man of great piety and learning, and well versed in the Hebrew Scriptures, as appears from his "Letter to a Bishop on Hutchinson's Writings and Discoveries," in 1732; "Thoughts concerning Religion, Natural and Revealed," 1735; and "Reflections on Incredulity;" the whole collected into one volume, 12mo, 1759. As a man, Forbes is highly spoken of. "I knew and venerated him," says Bishop Warburton, "one of the greatest men that ever Scotland bred, both as a judge, a patriot, and a Christian."

FORBES, Sir William, of Pitsligo, was the founder, in conjunction with Sir James Hunter Blair, of the first banking establishment in Scotland, and long known and implicitly trusted under the title of Sir William Forbes and Co.'s Bank. He was a member of the Literary Club frequented by Johnson, Garrick, and Burke, and printed an account of the life and writings of Dr. Beattie. b. 1739; d. 1806.

FORBES, James, an Englishman engaged in the civil service of the East India Company, is noticed here on account of his work entitled "Oriental Memoirs, selected and abridged from a series of Familiar Letters, written during seventeen years' residence in India," published in 1813. This work is illustrated by coloured plates of animals and plants, executed with great spirit and beauty. Mr. Forbes was made a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. b. in London, 1749; d. 1819.

FORBES, Edward, an eminent naturalist, who from a child was a collector; so that by the time he was seven years of age, he was possessed of a museum of natural curiosities. For some time he was connected with the studio of the late Mr. Sass, in London, but, in 1832, went to the university of Edinburgh, where, under the instructions of Professors Jamieson and Graham, he first became acquainted with the true principles of natural science. After being there some time, he made an excursion into Norway, and afterwards published his observations on the plants, rocks, and mollusca of that country, in a volume entitled "Notes of a Natural-History Tour in Norway." He now became a contributor to the "Magazine of Natural History," whilst pursuing his studies both in zoology and botany. In 1836 he was chiefly instrumental in establishing the Edinburgh Botanical Society, to which he became the foreign secretary. In 1837 he visited the shores of Algiers and the Mediterranean, and the next year published his "Mollusca of the Isle of Man;" in 1839, a paper on the "Mollusca of Algiers," and another on the "Distribution of the Pulmonifera of Europe." In 1841 appeared his "History of Star Fishes," and in the same year he was appointed naturalist to her Majesty's ship Beacon, commissioned to transport from Lycia the marbles discovered by Sir Charles Fellows. In this voyage he discovered the great law, that among marine animals zones of depth correspond to parallels of latitude. He subsequently became professor of botany in King's College, London, and, in 1844, became assistant-secretary to the Zoological Society. He was next appointed palæontologist to the Geological Society of Britain, and professor of natural history in the School of Sciences, in Jermyn Street. In 1854 he was elected president of the Geological Society, and also professor of natural history in the university of Edinburgh. This was the highest object of his ambition, which, however, he seemed only to have attained to die. b. in the Isle of Man, 1815; d. at Edinburgh, 1854.

FORBES, Sir John, a distinguished Scotch physician, who graduated at Edinburgh in 1817. After practising some time as a physician at Penzance and Chichester, he settled in London, where his translation of the works of Avenbrugger and Laennec, on the use of the stethoscope, first brought him prominently into notice among the medical profession. In 1829 he published a work on the "Climate of Penzance," and was one of the original founders of the present British Medical Association. It is to be regretted that this association, which had for its principal object the obtaining of authentic information regarding the medical topography of England, has not been so successful in its object as might have been expected. Subsequently, Sir John became one of the editors of the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine," to which he contributed largely himself. He also became the editor of the "British and Foreign Medical Review," afterwards designated the "British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review." In this capacity he laboured to spread sound views upon all medical subjects; and by exercising an independent judgment himself, he endeavoured to induce others to do the same; so that, by the accumulation of many different views upon any speculative point, a sound opinion might be arrived at. Whilst thus actively engaged, he was appointed physician in ordinary to her Majesty's household, and physician extraordinary to his late royal highness Prince Albert. For his labours in medical science, the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of laws, and he was a fellow of the Royal Society. In every enterprise which has had for its object the education of the people, or the dissemination of sound knowledge of every kind, he took an active part, and was one of the members of the committee of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. In 1849 he published "A Physician's Holiday; or, a Month in Switzerland," in 1852, "Memoranda of a Tour in Ireland," and in 1856, "Sight-Seeing in Germany and the Tyrol." All these works are marked by shrewd sense, coupled with a fine taste for the descriptive and picturesque. b. 1787.

FORDIN, Claude, Chevalier de, for-bā, a French naval commander, who served in the East Indies, and was with Duquesne, in 1683, at the bombardment of Algiers. He was also admiral to the king of Siam for two years, and greatly distinguished himself afterwards in Europe, in connexion with Jean Bart, rising into favour with Louis XIV. b. 1656; d. 1733. His "Memoirs" were published in 1730, in 2 vols, 12mo.

FORCE, Jacques, Duke de la force, son of François, lord de la Force, was a child, in bed with his father and elder brother, when these latter were murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew; but being unperceived by the assassins, he escaped. He signalized himself under Henry IV., and afterwards joined the Protestants against Louis XIII. Subsequently, he made his submission to the king, and was appointed marshal of France, lieutenant-general of the army, and created a duke. He took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carrignan, in 1630. d. 1652, aged 89.

FORD, John, ford, an eminent English dramatic poet, of whom very little is known, but that, in 1602, he became a member of the Middle Temple, and adhered to his profession of the law. In his 20th year, he published a poem entitled "Fame's Memorial;" but there is little in the effusion to indicate the high talent which he afterwards displayed in dramatic poetry. Subsequently, he commenced writing for the stage, for which he produced, either wholly or in conjunction with others, upwards of sixteen plays. In Charles Lamb's "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets," the following excellent criticism appears, relative to this author: "Ford was of the first order of poets. He sought for sublimity, not by parcels, in metaphors or visible images, but directly where she has her full residence,—in the heart of man, in the actions and sufferings of the greatest minds. There is a grandeur of the soul, above mountains, seas, and the elements." Gifford also says, "I know few things more difficult to account for than the deep and lasting impression made by the more tragic portions of Ford's poetry." Others, however, are not so lavish of their praises upon his works. B. at Illeington, Devonshire, 1586. Of his death nothing is known. It is supposed, however, that, about 1640, he retired to his native place, and there ended his days.

FORD, Sir John, the son of Sir John Ford, knight, served the office of high sheriff of Sussex, and displayed his loyalty to Charles I., who knighted him at Oxford, in 1643. He commanded a troop of horse in the civil wars, and was imprisoned on suspicion of aiding the king's escape from Hampton Court, but obtained his release through the interest of general Ireton, whose sister he had married. He possessed much mechanical ingenuity, and invented a system of machines for raising the water of the Thames to the higher streets of London, which was afterwards applied to the draining of marshes, mines, &c. He projected a scheme for constructing a river from Rickmansworth to London to supply the city with water, besides other beneficial improvements. B. in Sussex, 1605; D. 1670, in Ireland, where he had gone to work a patent he had obtained to coin copper money in that part of the kingdom.

FORD, Richard, an English writer and traveller, who, having graduated at Trinity College, Oxford, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but did not practise. In 1830 he visited Spain, where he resided for some time at the Alhambra, and, on his return, took up his residence in Devonshire, and became a contributor to the "Quarterly Review." In 1845 he published "The Handbook of Spain," which was highly commended. In 1848 appeared his "Gatherings from Spain," which was, on its publication, pronounced "the best English book, beyond comparison, that has ever appeared for the illustration, not merely of the general topography and local curiosities, but of the national character and manners of Spain." In 1852 "Tauromachia; the Bull-fights of Spain;" 26 superb drawings by Luke Price, with descriptions by R. Ford, were given to the public; but the work is rather pictorial than literary, and is certainly splendid of its kind. B. in London, 1796; D. 1858.

FORDUN, John de, for'-dun, a Scotch historian, and priest in the church of Fordun, who wrote a history of Scotland, which was printed by Hearne at Oxford, in 5 vols. 8vo, and by Goodall at Edinburgh, in 1 vol. folio. Camden, speaking of Fordun's history, says that "all the Scots historians who have wrote since Fordun's time have been very much beheldened to his diligence; and yet there are very material differences betwixt his account of several things and theirs." Lived in the 14th century.

FORDYCE, David, for'-dice, an ingenious Scottish writer, who was educated at the University of Aberdeen, and became professor of moral philosophy in the Marischal College there. Though licensed as a preacher, he never became a stated minister. In 1750 he made a tour to Italy, and on his return, the following year, was drowned on the coast of Holland. B. at Aberdeen 1711. He wrote "Dialogues concerning Education," 2 vols. 8vo; the "Elements of Moral Philosophy," which first appeared in education," which have considerable merit, are written in some degree after the style of Shaftesbury, but without being tainted with the sophistries of that author.

FORDYCE, James, an eminent Scotch divine, brother of the above, was educated at the University of Aberdeen, and was first settled as a minister at Brechin, and afterwards at Alloa. While here, he distinguished himself by some elegant pulpit compositions, particularly one preached before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on the folly, infamy, and misery of unlawful pleasures, for which the University of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D. About 1762 he removed to London, where he became assistant to Dr. Lawrence, of Monkwell Street, and afterwards his successor. Here he drew crowded audiences by his eloquence and the beauty of his sermons. In 1782 he resigned his situation, and went to live first in Hampshire, and next at Bath, where he died in 1796. B. at Aberdeen, 1720. He published a "Sermon on the Eloquence of the Pulpit," printed with his brother's "Theodorus;" "Sermons to Young Women," 2 vols. 12mo; "Addresses to Young Men," 2 vols.; "Addresses to the Deity;" a volume of poems, and single sermons.

FORDYCE, Sir William, brother of James Fordyce, was an eminent surgeon, which profession he practised for many years, with much success, in London. He was the author of several medical works, including one on "Fever," a second on "Ulcerated Sore Throat," and a third on "The Cultivation of Rhubarb for Medicinal Purposes." B. 1724; D. 1792.

FORDYCE, George, an eminent Scotch physician, was educated at the University of Aberdeen, where he obtained the degree of M.A. at the age of 14. In 1759 he settled in London, commencing lecturing on the materia medica and practice of physic, in which he acquired an unrivalled reputation. In 1770 he was chosen physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and, in 1776, a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1787 he was elected, speciali gratia, a fellow of the College of Physicians, a very unusual distinction. B. near Aberdeen, 1736; D. 1802. Dr. Fordyce is known by his "Essays on Fever," an "Essay on Digestion," "Elements of the Practice of Physic," and miscellaneous papers. He was also an excellent experimental chemist, and published "Elements of Agriculture and Vegetation." This work has always been esteemed as a very scientific treatise.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Formey

FORMEY, John Henry Samuel, for'-me, a Prussian writer, who was for some years pastor of a French church in Berlin, where he became professor of philosophy in the French college. On the restoration of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, he was appointed secretary to the philosophical department, and afterwards sole secretary. He was also made a privy councillor. b. at Berlin, 1711; d. there 1797. Formey conducted, in conjunction with Beausobre, the "Bibliothèque Germanique." He also wrote "Le Philosophe Chrétien," "Pensées Raisonnables," "Anti-Émile," against Rousseau; the "History of Philosophy Abridged," an "Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History" (these two have been translated into English), "Researches on the Elements of Matter," "Considerations on the Tusculans of Cicero," &c.

FORMAN, Simon, for'-man, a notorious astrologer, with which profession he combined that of physician, and was connected with the infamous countess of Essex in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury. Although it does not quite appear that he directly assisted in the perpetration of the crime, it is clear, from the records of the trial, that he was consulted by the countess and Mrs. Anne Turner, as to the means of accomplishing it. b. at Quiddham, Wiltshire, 1553; d. suddenly in a boat on the Thames, 1611. He left several MSS., some of which are in the Ashmolean Museum, and others in the British Museum.

FORMOSUS, for'-mō'-sus, bishop of Porto, in Italy, succeeded Pope Stephen V. in 891. He condemned Photius, excommunicated Lambert, emperor of Italy, and then nominated in his place, Arnoul, emperor of Germany. d. 896. The fiery Stephen VI., his successor, had his body disinterred, in order to put him on his trial. He was restored to his grave in 898, under John IX.

FORSKAL, Peter, for'-skal, a Swedish naturalist, who studied at Göttingen, and afterwards at Upsal, where he became a pupil of Linnæus. In 1761 he went at the request of the king of Denmark, with Niebuhr and others, to Arabia, to make discoveries, but died at Jerim, in that country, in 1763. b. 1736. He printed a tract, entitled "Thoughts on Civil Liberty;" and from his papers, Niebuhr published "Descriptiones Animalium in itinere orientali," 4to; "Flora Egyptiaco-Arabica," 4to; "Icones Herum Naturalium quas in itinere orientali depingi curavit Forskal," 4to.

FORSTER, John Reinhold, for'-ter, a celebrated German naturalist, who, in 1748, entered the University of Halle, where he studied divinity, and thence went to Russia, in expectation of considerable preferment; but being disappointed, proceeded to England, where, for some time, he taught the French and German languages at Warrington. In 1772 he accompanied captain Cook on his voyage round the world. On his return to England, in 1775, he was honoured by the University of Oxford with the degree of LL.D. His son having published, contrary to the engagement entered into with government, an account of plants discovered in this voyage, he was treated with such coolness, that he quitted England and went to Halle, where he was made professor of natural history. b. in Prussia, 1729; d. at Halle, 1798. He was the author of "Observations made in a Voyage Round the World," "History of Voyages and Discoveries in the North," "On the Dædalus of the Ancients," several Papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c.

FORSTER, John George Adam, son of the above, accompanied his father in his voyage in 1772-5. After his return, he became professor of natural history at Cassel, whence he removed to Wilna, in Poland, and next to Mentz, where he was appointed president of the university. He was nominated by the people of Mentz their representative at Paris, in the beginning of the Revolution. b. at Dantzic, 1751; d. 1790. He wrote, "A Voyage Round the World," 2 vols. 4to; a Defence of the same; against Mr. Walker, 4to; "A Philosophical and Picturesque Journey along the Banks of the Rhine," 2 vols. 8vo; and "A Journey through England."

FORSTER, John, a Protestant divine, who assisted Luther in the translation of the Bible, and accompanied Melancthon to the council of Trent. He was a teacher of Hebrew at Wittenberg, and left behind him an excellent dictionary of that language, which was published at Halle in 1581. b. at Augsburg, 1491; d. 1559.

FORSTER, Nathaniel, an eminent divine and author, received his education at Oxford, and was successively made preacher of Bristol, vicar of Rochdale, fellow of the Royal Society, and one of the royal chaplains. He wrote "Reflections on the Antiquity, Government, Arts and Sciences of Egypt," "A Dissertation on Josephus's Account of Canaan," and edited a "Hebrew Bible without Points." b. 1717; d. 1757.

FORSTER, John, a modern English writer, was bred to the bar, but, by his devotion to literature, became an eminent author and journalist. For twenty-four years he was a constant contributor to the columns of the "Examiner," and for twelve of that period he had the sole charge of its editorial department. He was also a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," the "Foreign Quarterly," and other serials, and for a short time acted as editor of the "Daily News," after the retirement of Mr. Dickens. He is, however, best known by his works, entitled "The Statesman of the Commonwealth of England," and "The Life and Adventures of Oliver Goldsmith." The former was republished in the "Cabinet Cyclopædia" of Dr. Lardner, and the latter has been much admired. He also wrote the lives of Daniel De Foe and Churchill, and in 1838 published "Historical and Biographical Essays;" "The Arrest of the Five Members by Charles I.," in 1840; and "Sir John Eliot, a Biography," in 1861. b. at Newcastle, 1512.

FOET, LE. (See LEROY, Francis.)

FORTESCUE, the Rt. Hon. Chichester Samuel Parkinson, took first-class honours at Oxford in 1811, and the Chancellor's prize for the English essay in 1816. Since 1817 he has represented the county of Louth, Ireland. From 1851 to 1855 he was an Irish Lord of the Treasury; under-secretary of state for the colonies from 1857 to 1858, and from 1859 to 1865 under Lord Palmerston; and chief secretary for Ireland from 1865 to 1868 under Earl Russell. In 1853 he resumed the duties of the last-named post in the administration formed by Mr. Gladstone. b. 1833.

FORTESCUE, Sir John, for'-tes-ku, an English judge, who was, in 1442, made chief justice of the King's Bench. He was zealously attached to Henry VI., and accompanied him in his exile to Scotland. Henry made him chancellor, but he never exercised the office. He subsequently went to Flanders, and while abroad wrote his famous book entitled "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," which, however, was not published till the reign of Henry VIII. This admirable treatise, according to Henry, excels every work on the subject. He returned to England with Queen Margaret, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Tewkesbury, in 1471. Edward IV. granted him a pardon, on which he retired to his seat at Ebrington, in Gloucestershire. Æ. in Devonshire, 1395; p. 1495.

FORBUNE, Robert, for'-tune, a Scotch naturalist, born of humble parents, and who was sent to China for the purpose of obtaining new plants, with instructions to pay all possible attention to the horticulture and agriculture of the people of that country. This he accordingly did, and, in 1847, published the result in "Three Years' Wanderings in the Northern Provinces of China." He also published "Two Visits to the Tea Countries of China," and "A Residence among the Chinese;" all excellent works of their kind. Æ. at Berwick, Scotland, 1813.

FOSBROOKE, Thomas Dudley, fos'-brook, was educated at St. Paul's School and Pembroke College, Oxford, where he became a M.A. in 1792. In 1794 he was appointed to the living of Horsley, and in 1810 was made curate of Walford, and in 1830, vicar. His works are, a poem on the "Monastic Life, as it existed in England;" "British Monachism; or, Manners and Customs of the Monks and Nuns of England;" to which are added "Manners and Customs of Ancient Pilgrims, Anchorites and Hermits, and Women who had made Vows of Chastity." These are his principal works, which give a comprehensive view of the manners and customs of monastic life. His book on "British Monachism" is called by Sir Walter Scott "a learned work;" and Southey, in the "Quarterly Review," after noticing some of its errors, states, "that it would be highly unjust were we not to state that it contains a great deal of curious and recondite information; and that, wherever the subject permits, the author gives proof, in the liveliness of his expressions, of a vigorous and original mind." He also wrote several other works; among which we may notice his "Cyclopædia of Antiquity and Elements of Archaeology," which, at the time of its publication, was pronounced a work as original as it is important, elegantly written, and full of interesting information, with which every person of liberal education ought to be acquainted. Æ. in London, 1770; p. at Walford, 1842.

FOSCARI, Francesco, fos'-kaw'-re, doge of Venice, to which office he was elected in 1423, was, perhaps, the greatest and the most unhappy of all those who held the office of chief magistrate in the Venetian republic. He occupied the position of doge for thirty-four years, led the armies of the state in many hard-fought fields, added Brescia, Bergamo, Crema, Ravenna, and other places to the territory of the republic, besides wisely and honestly administering the government at home. He greatly improved the city, and made the name of Venice a potent one in the community of nations; and yet was called upon to endure the utmost ingratitude from his countrymen, and to make sacrifices of personal feeling more trying than it is possible to conceive. He twice wished to resign the dogeship, on each occasion being compelled to retain the office, and at last having an oath exacted from him that he would continue doge as long as he lived. He had had four sons, one only of whom, Giacompo, remained to him, and he, with high hopes and much public rejoicing, was married to a daughter of the house of Contarini, one of the noblest in Venice. A short time only had elapsed, however, when troubles began. Giacompo was denounced to the Council of Ten as having taken bribes from foreign powers; was tried before his own father, and, there being no evidence against him, the torture was applied in order to extort a confession, the doge being compelled not only to order its application, but to stand by and see it administered. Under excruciating agony, a confession of guilt was obtained, and Giacompo was banished, first to Napoli di Romania, in Greece, but afterwards allowed to remain nearer home, but beyond the boundaries of the state. While quietly living at his appointed place of exile, a Venetian senator was murdered by unknown hands. Giacompo Foscari was suspected of complicity in the crime, was again tried, again tortured by order and in presence of his father, and again banished, besides being condemned to a year's imprisonment. Unable, however, to resist the desire to return to his country, he determined to do so under any circumstances. He accordingly wrote a letter to Sforza, duke of Milan, imploring his intercession with the council on his behalf, and took care that this letter should be conveyed, not to Duke Sforza, but to the Council of Ten. Once more was he brought before that terrible tribunal, over which his father presided; but on this occasion he did not deny the charge made against him—that of soliciting the interference of foreigners in the affairs of the state; but boldly declared that he had written the letter, and had contrived that it should be conveyed to the Council in order that he might be brought back to Venice, even if as a malefactor. This was disbelieved, and the torture was applied to him for the third time. All attempts to shake his firmness were unavailing; he adhered to his statement, and a fresh sentence of banishment and imprisonment was passed upon him. Before being conveyed to his foreign gaol, however, he was allowed to see his family; and his father, now an old man of 84, hobbled upon crutches into the dungeon where his unhappy son was confined. On Giacompo making a last appeal to him to obtain at least a commutation of the sentence to imprisonment within the walls of Venice, "Go," replied the stern magistrate, but wretched father, "go, Giacompo; submit yourself to the will of your country, and ask no more of me." The effort, however, was too great; on being carried from the room the old man swooned, never recovered, and in two days breathed his last, in 1457, in his 84th year. The son was sent to a prison at Candia, where he, too, shortly afterwards died. The charges against Giacompo are believed to have been all false, at least no real proof was ever adduced against him; and it is most likely they had their origin in private malice, the desire of the Council of Ten to curb the power of the doge, whom it was not convenient altogether to dispense with, making that body willing to entertain the accusations against his son, in order that they might, through him, strike at the father. These incidents have furnished Lord Byron with the subject of his drama entitled "The Two Foscari."

FOSCOLO, Ugo, fos'-ko-lo, an eminent Ionian

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Fosse

who received his education at Padua, and before he was twenty, produced a tragedy called "Il Tieste." Soon afterwards he obtained employment as secretary to Bonato Battaglio, who was sent as ambassador to Bonaparte, to induce him to favour the independence of the republic of Venice. The ambassador was unsuccessful in his mission, and Foscolo went to Lombardy, where he devoted himself to the cultivation of literature, and produced his celebrated "Letters of Ortis," which established his fame. He now enrolled his name in the list of the first Italian legion that was formed, and was in Genoa during the siege of 1799. He continued with the Italian army till 1805, when he was sent to Calais with the troops professedly designed for the invasion of England; but he soon afterwards quitted the army, and in 1809 became professor of literature in Pavia. The language of his introductory lecture, however, offended Bonaparte, and the professorship was suppressed. In 1812 he produced his "Ajax," which being supposed to convey a satire on Napoleon I., he deemed it prudent to withdraw to Florence. Afterwards, it is asserted, he engaged in a conspiracy to eject the Austrians from Italy, and was forced to take refuge in Switzerland, whence he went to England, where he was received among the literary and fashionable circles. He continued to apply himself to literature, and published—"Essays on Petrarch," "Disputations and Notes on Dante," and was a contributor to the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other reviews. b. at Zante, about 1777; d. at Turnham Green, near London, 1827.

FOSSE, Charles de la. foss, a French painter, and pupil of Le Brun, who, after studying in Italy, returned to Paris, and gained a great reputation by several public works. A pension was granted him, and he became rector of the Academy of Painting, in Paris. The duke of Montague invited him to England, and employed him in ornamenting his house, now the British Museum. b. at Paris, 1640; d. 1716.

FOSSE, Antoine de la, nephew of the above, was Lord of Aubigné, from having bought the estate of that name. He was secretary to the Marquis de Crequi, and, when his patron was slain at the battle of Luzzara, he brought his heart back to Paris, and celebrated his fall in verses. He afterwards was connected with the duc d'Aumont, but is chiefly known from the tragedies he wrote. One of these, "Manlius Capitolinus," is considered by the French as not altogether unworthy of Corneille; but, as a rule, the versification of La Fosse is exceedingly laboured; indeed, he himself owned that in writing he had far more trouble in finding expressions than thoughts. He was a great master of Italian, and for an ode written in that language he was received into the Academy degli Apatisti, at Florence. He executed a translation of Anacreon, which, with some miscellaneous poems, was published in 1704. b. 1658; d. 1708.

FOSTER, John, fos'-ter, an English architect, who, after studying abroad for a number of years, returned, and erected several works of considerable merit. The principal of these are St. John's Market, in Liverpool, several churches in that city, and the Custom-house. He was made a fellow of the Royal Society, and was considered to have a vast amount of architectural knowledge, although it was questioned whether he had the capacity to turn it to proper account. b. in Liverpool, 1787; d. 1846.

FOSTER, James, D.D., an eminent dissenting divine, who was at first minister of an independent congregation at Exeter, where he began preaching in 1718. He subsequently became a Baptist, and had the charge of a chapel in that connexion at Trowbridge, Wilts., and was elected successor to Dr. John Gale, in a chapel in Barbican, London, where he officiated for about twenty years, lecturing at the same time in a chapel in the Old Jewry. When Lord Kilmarnock was executed for his share in the rebellion of 1745, Foster attended him to the scaffold, and it is said that this melancholy scene made such an impression upon him as to partially derange his faculties, from which he never altogether recovered. He was the author of several works, among which are, "A Defence of Revelation," in answer to Tindal; "Tracts on Heresy," "Discourses on Natural Religion and Social Virtue," &c. b. at Exeter, 1697; d. 1753.

FOSTER, Sir Michael, an eminent English lawyer, was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, and in 1735 was elected recorder of Bristol. He was appointed one of the judges of the King's Bench in 1745, when he was knighted. He printed a tract on the power of the church, in reply to Bishop Gibson's Codex, and a report of the trial of the Jacobite rebels in 1746. b. at Marlborough, Wilts., 1689; d. 1763. Sir Michael Foster is entitled to remembrance for the independence and fearlessness with which he asserted the liberties of the subject.

FOSTER, Reverend John, an English divine, who was bred a manufacturer; but disliking that line of life, he devoted himself to study, and in 1792 commenced preaching among the Baptists in various parts of the country. Forced to discontinue preaching, from a glandular affection of the neck, he retired to Stapleton, near Bristol, where he devoted himself to literature, and became one of the principal contributors to the "Eclectic Review." He is best known to the world, however, by his "Essays on Decision of Character;" "On the Application of the Epithet Romantic;" and "On the Evils of Popular Ignorance." These works have received well-merited praise, not only for the admirable precision of the style in which they are written, but for the depth and originality of the thoughts with which they abound. "I have read with the greatest admiration," says Sir James Mackintosh, "the essays of Mr. Foster. He is one of the most profound and eloquent writers that England has produced." b. near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1770; d. at Stapleton, 1843.

FOSTER, Birket, a modern English artist, who ably illustrated "Christmas with the Poets," "Cowper's Task," Longfellow's works, and many other volumes. As a simple, truthful, and poetical delineator of landscape, he stands deservedly high. b. 1812.

FOOTHERGILL, John, foth'-er-gill, an eminent English physician, who, having served his time to an apothecary, went to Edinburgh, where, in 1736, he took his doctor's degree. In the same year he became a pupil in St. Thomas's Hospital, London, and, in 1740, went abroad. On his return, he settled in the metropolis, and, in 1743, acquired a great reputation by a tract entitled "An Account of Sore Throat attended with Ulcers." This disease was at that time very prevalent and fatal. In 1754 he became a member of the Edinburgh College of Physicians, and, in 1763, a fellow of the Royal Society. When the differences broke out between England and her American colonies, he laboured to prevent hostilities, and had conferences with Dr. Franklin for that purpose, but without effect. B. in Yorkshire, 1712; D. 1780. His works, consisting chiefly of medical pieces, have been printed in 3 vols. 8vo, with his life prefixed. He was at the expense of printing Furver's translation of the Bible, and of an edition of Percy's "Key to the New Testament," for a seminary of Quakers in Yorkshire.—His brother Samuel was a prominent preacher among the Quakers, and died in 1773.

FOUCAULT, John Bernard Leon, fou-kol'te, a French philosopher, who showed how an ocular proof of the rotation of the earth may be given by setting a pendulum in motion across a graduated circle, the earth moving under the plane of the pendulum's motion. He also invented the gyroscope. B. at Paris, 1819; D. 1868.

FOUCHÉ, Joseph, duke of Otranto, foo'-shai, French minister of police under Napoleon I., was settled as an advocate at Nantes when the revolution of 1789 broke out. He threw himself with ardour into the struggle against the king, and was, in 1792, elected a member of the National Convention. In November of the next year, he accompanied Collet d'Herbois (see that name) to Lyons, and was overwhelmed with accusations in regard to the frightful cruelties practised there by his colleague and himself. After the fall of the Convention, he was protected by Barras, and, on the 13th Thermidor, year 7, he was made police minister. In this post he displayed great activity and acuteness, and rendered important services to Bonaparte on the 18th Brumaire. The latter, however, had not much confidence in his minister's integrity, and dismissed him from office in 1802, restoring him, however, his portfolio in 1805, which he preserved till 1810. In this year he was superseded, although the reasons for his fall have never been clearly understood. After the Russian campaign, he was appointed by the emperor to the government of the Illyrian provinces—a very difficult task. He there showed great moderation, and was successful in his mission. During the "hundred days" he again administered the police, and subsequently was appointed, after Waterloo, president of the provisional government, and, in that capacity, treated with the allied powers. Louis XVIII. retained him for a short period at the head of the police, but afterwards deputed him ambassador at Dresden. He was afterwards exiled, and died at Trieste, 1820; B. at Nantes, 1763. The general opinion of Fouché is, that he was an able, but unscrupulous minister. His "Mémoires" appeared in Paris in 1824, but were declared not to be trustworthy by his family.

FOUQUET, Charles Louis Augustus, foo'-kai, count of Belleisle, secured, by his gallant conduct at the siege of Lisle, where he commanded a regiment of dragoons, the favour of Louis XIV., after whose death he was disgraced, and confined in the Bastille. In the war of 1733 he was appointed to command in Germany, and became the confidant of Cardinal Fleury. In 1741 he was created marshal of France, and, the year following, attended the diet of Frankfort, as plenipotentiary from the court of Versailles. In 1743 he was taken prisoner near Hanover, but soon obtained his liberty. B. 1684; D. 1761.

FOULIS, Robert and Andrew, foo'-lis, two learned printers of Glasgow, of which they are believed to have been natives. Robert began printing about 1740; and in 1744 completed his "immaculate" edition of Horace, and was shortly afterwards joined in partnership by his brother Andrew. They continued to carry on business with great success for about thirty years, the works produced by them being remarkable for the beauty and accuracy of their execution. They printed editions of nearly all the Greek and Latin classics, besides one of the New Testament in Greek; and it is said, so confident were they of the correctness of their typography, that they hung up final proof sheets of one of their classic works—perhaps the "immaculate" Horace already mentioned—in the public hall of the university, and offered a reward to any one who could point out an error. They ultimately ruined themselves in an attempt to establish an academy for the instruction of youth in painting and sculpture, the immense expense incurred in sending pupils to Italy to study the works of the ancients being more than their means could support. Andrew died in 1775; and Robert in 1776.

FOUNTAIN, Sir Andrew, foun'-tain, an eminent English antiquary, was educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he specially studied the Anglo-Saxon language, and was author of a piece inserted in Dr. Hickes's "Thesaurus," entitled, "Numismata Anglo-Saxonica et Anglo-Danica." He had also a taste for the fine arts, and made a noble collection of antiquities and curiosities. He drew the designs for the original illustrations to the "Tale of a Tub," by Swift, with whom he was very intimate, as he was with other wits of the age, and is commended by Montfaucon for his antiquarian knowledge. William III. conferred the honour of knighthood upon him, and in 1727 he was appointed warden of the Mint. B. at Narford, Norfolk; D. 1753.

FOUQUIERES, James, foo'-ke-air, a Flemish painter, the disciple of Velvet Breughel, and so excellent in painting landscapes, as to be ranked with Titian. B. at Antwerp, 1680; D. 1659.

FOUQUIER-TINVILLE, Antoine Quentin, foo'-ke-air-tin-veel, one of the most infamous of the French revolutionists, was a native of Herouelles, near St. Quentin. He became an associate of Robespierre, by whom he was appointed public accuser during the Reign of Terror, and in that office displayed the most sanguinary nature. He spared none. The young, the aged, the rich, the poor, without regard to guilt or innocence, were hurried by him to the scaffold with perfect indifference, on one occasion no less than eighty persons being devoted by him to death within four hours. His hand was not stayed by the fall of Robespierre, and on the day of the latter's arrest, he coolly remarked, as he affixed his signature to the condemnation of about forty-two individuals, "Ah! Robespierre arrested! What does it matter? Justice must have its course." At length, however, his iniquitous career was stopped, he had himself to appear before the tribunal where he had condemned so many others, and was guillotined on the 7th of May, 1795.

FOURCROY, Antoine François de, four'-kroi, a distinguished French chemist and natural philosopher, who, having chosen the medical profession for his occupation, devoted himself to the study of those sciences which are more immediately connected with it, especially chemistry. In 1784 he was appointed professor of this science at the Jardin du Roi, and became associated with Berthollet, Lavoisier, and others, in researches which led to vast improvements, whilst they suggested a new chemical nomenclature, entitled "Méthode de Nomenclature Chimique." On the breaking out of the Revolution, he became entangled in the politics of the period, and was elected a deputy from Paris to the National Convention. In 1794 he became a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and next year was received as one of the Council of the Ancients. In 1799 Bonaparte gave him a place in the Council of State, when the affairs relating to public instruction were placed under his management. In this important trust he ably acquitted himself. In the various departments of chemical science and natural philosophy, he produced many valuable works. Dr. Thomson, however, says that "the prodigious reputation which he enjoyed during his lifetime, was more owing to his eloquence than to his eminence as a chemist; though even as a chemist he was far above mediocrity." n. at Paris, 1785; p. 1809.

FOURCROY, Charles René de, a distinguished French military engineer, who served with honour in various campaigns, and attained the rank of maréchal de camp, and was the author of "A Treatise on Perpendicular Fortification," "Observations Microscopiques," "Reflections sur la Merée," and planned a scheme for connecting the rivers Scheldt, Moselle, Sambre, Meuse, Oise, and the Rhine by means of canals. n. at Paris, 1715; p. 1791. Many of the principles laid down by Fourcroy were afterwards adopted by Lalande.

FOURIER, François Marie Charles, four'-e-ai, was the founder of the system of communism known as Fourierism, which is also called Phalansterianism, and is said to have many secret adherents. The doctrine is nothing more than a kind of socialism, which, in England at least, possesses very little vitality amongst the educated classes. n. at Besançon, in the department Doubs, 1772; p. 1837.

FOURIER, Jean Baptist Joseph, was educated at Auxerre, in a college of the Benedictines, and, in 1789, was appointed professor of mathematics in the school where he had studied. At the breaking out of the Revolution, he became a member of the Committee of Public Safety at Auxerre, and was twice delivered from imprisonment by his fellow-townsmen. In 1794 he became one of the subordinate professors in the Polytechnic school, and subsequently accompanied the French expedition to Egypt. On his return, he was appointed prefect of the department of Isère. He afterwards became prefect of the Rhone, which post he resigned in 1815. He was subsequently appointed secretary to the Academy, and president of the council of the Polytechnic school. n. at Auxerre, 1768; p. at Paris, 1830. He was the first who imparted a taste for Egyptian antiquities to the Champollions.

FOURIER, Pierre Simon, four'-ne-ai, an emi-gent French engraver and type-founder, who published, in 1737, a "Table of Proportions," to determine the height and relation of letters. His chief work, however, is entitled "Manuel Typographique," 2 vols. 8vo. n. at Paris, 1712; p. 1763.

FOWLER, Edward, four'-ler, an eminent English prelate, who was, for his zeal in promoting the Revolution, advanced to the see of Gloucester in 1691. n. at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire, 1632; p. 1714. Besides several sermons and tracts, he wrote the "Principles and Practices of certain Moderate Divines of the Church of England, abusively called Latitudinarians," 8vo, 1670; "The Design of Christianity," 8vo, 1671 (this is an excellent book, and has been several times printed); "Libertas Evangelica, or a Discourse of Christian Liberty," 8vo.

FOWLER, Charles, an English architect, who, after having been employed in an office at Exeter, went to London, where he entered the office of Mr. Laing, whilst the Custom-house was building. His first public work was the Courts of Bankruptcy, which were succeeded by other works, the principal of which were markets. Amongst these may be specially named Covent Garden market, in London, and the Corn market at Tavistock. He also erected the bridge over the Dart at Totnes, the Devon Lunatic Asylum, and several other works, but not of very great public importance. n. at Colmington, Devonshire, 1782.

FOX, Edward, foke, an English bishop and statesman, was educated first at Eton and next at King's College, Cambridge, of which, in 1523, he was elected provost. Cardinal Wolsey took him into his service, and obtained for him the appointment of ambassador to Rome, in conjunction with Gardiner, to promote the divorce of Henry VIII. He was afterwards sent in the same capacity to France and Germany; and in 1535 was promoted to the see of Hereford. n. at Dursley; p. 1533. This bishop was a great friend to the Reformation. He wrote "De Verâ Differentiâ Regiæ Protestantis et Ecclesiasticæ, et quæ sit ipsa Veritas et Virtus utriusque."

FOX, Richard, an English prelate, who was educated first at Boston school, and afterwards at Magdalen College, Oxford, whence, on account of the plague, he removed to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He next went to Paris, where he gained the friendship of Dr. Morton, bishop of Ely, who recommended him to the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. On the accession of that monarch, Dr. Fox was made privy counsellor, and preferred to the see of Exeter. He was also sent on several embassies, and, after obtaining different church preferments, was advanced to the see of Durham, whence he was removed to Winchester. n. of poor parents, near Grantham; p. at Winchester, 1528. He founded Corpus Christi College, in Oxford, and the free schools of Grantham, and Taunton in Somersetshire.

FOX, or FOXE, John, an English divine, who was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, whence he removed to a fellowship in Magdalen College. In 1545 he was expelled on a charge of heresy, which reduced him to great distress. At length, Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire, took him into his house, as tutor to his children. Afterwards, he removed to London, and was employed by the duchess of Richmond as tutor to the earl of Surrey's children; but his life being in danger on account of his principles, he withdrew, with his wife and other Protestants, to the continent. Mr. Fox settled at Bâle, and earned his subsistence as a corrector of the press for Oporinus, a printer, whilst, at the same time, meditating his great work, entitled "The Acts and Monuments of the Church; or, Book of Martyrs." On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he returned to England, and, by means of secretary Cecil, obtained a prebend of Salisbury. In 1563 he published his "Acts and Monuments of the Church," in one large volume folio. In the edition of 1584 it made two volumes; and, in the subsequent issues, three. This book was highly esteemed by Protestants, though stigmatized by the Roman Catholics as "Fox's Golden Legend." b. at Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; p. in London, 1587, and was buried in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, of which he was some time vicar. Besides his "Acts and Monuments," he wrote several books, and a play in Latin called "De Christo Triumphante." Bishop Burnet, a most painstaking searcher into original documents, says of the "Book of Martyrs," that he had compared these "Acts and Monuments" with the records; and that he had never been able to discover any errors or prevarications in them, but the utmost fidelity and exactness.

Fox, George, the founder of the sect of Friends, or Quakers, was at first placed with a shepherd, and afterwards bound an apprentice to a shoemaker. In 1643 he became a religious itinerant, and, about 1647, commenced publicly to preach, inveighing not only against the prevailing vices, but the officiating ministers and religious services; affirming that the light within, or Christ in the heart, is alone the means of salvation, and the true qualification for the ministry. He suffered frequent imprisonments and other rough treatment, which he generally seems to have brought upon himself, by his indiscretions in opposing the clergy, and passing strictures on them in their public ministry. The name of Quakers was given to him and his followers first at Derby, on account of the strange contortions and shakings which accompanied their preaching. In 1669 he married the widow of a Welsh judge, but still continued his course of itinerant preaching, and visited Holland, Germany, and America. b. at Drayton, Leicestershire, 1624; p. in London, 1690. His "Journal" was printed at London in 1694, his "Epistles" in 1698, and his "Tracts" in 1706, all in folio.

Fox, Sir Stephen, an English statesman, who began his political career in the service of the Northumberland family, and then attached himself to the fortunes of Charles II. when in exile. At the Restoration, he was made clerk of the Green Cloth, and paymaster of the Forces, and received the honour of knighthood. After the death of Charles, Fox was dismissed by James, but received into favour by William III., whom he subsequently displeased by opposing the formation of a standing army; but was again reinstated in his offices by Queen Anne. He founded several alms-houses, and was the first who proposed the establishment of Chelsea Hospital as a military asylum. b. 1627; p. 1716.

Fox, Henry, the first Lord Holland, was the second son of the preceding, and also became eminent as a statesman. He was educated at Eton, and in 1735 was elected a member of Parliament for Hendon, Wiltshire. After filling sundry subordinate offices, he was, in 1746, appointed secretary at war, which he continued to hold till 1756, when he gave way to Mr. Pitt, afterwards the great earl of Chatham. In 1757 Fox became paymaster of the forces, and, having acquired a considerable fortune by the perquisites of office and applying the interest of money in hand to his own use, he incurred a large share of obloquy, and was denounced in an address from the citizens of London, as the "defaulter of unaccounted millions." He was in 1763 created a peer, by the title of Baron Holland, of Foxley, in Wilts; and in the latter part of his life built a fantastic villa at Kingsgate, near Margate, Kent. He left three sons—namely, Stephen, his successor in the title and estates; Charles James, the celebrated orator and statesman; and Henry Edward, a general in the army. b. 1705; p. at Holland House, Kensington, July 1, 1774.

Fox, Charles James, a distinguished English statesman and orator, the third son of the first Lord Holland, received his education at Westminster, Eton, and Oxford, where his devotion to classical literature laid the groundwork of his future eminence as an orator. He was designed by his father to occupy a high place in the political arena of his country, and with that view he procured for him a seat in parliament for the borough of Midhurst, when he was no more than nineteen years of age. He made his first speech in 1769, in which he supported Colonel Luttrell against Mr. Wilks, in the Middlesex election. In 1770 he became junior lord of the Admiralty in the administration of Lord North; but he resigned this post in two years, and in 1773 was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury. In the following year he was dismissed from his post, and in a short time appeared in the ranks of opposition to the ministry. His powerful oratorical talents were now exercised in denouncing the measures which led to the American war, and which finally resulted in the separation of the transatlantic colonies from England. In 1782 the administration of Lord North fell, when Fox became one of the secretaries of state, which office, however, he resigned on the death of the marquis of Rockingham. A new administration was formed under the earl of Shelburne, which, however, had but a brief tenure of existence. When the Coalition ministry was formed, Fox resumed his former office. He now brought in his India Bill, which, having passed the House of Commons, was thrown out by the Lords, and was the proximate cause of the resignation of the ministry of which he was a member. Mr. Pitt now entered upon office, when Fox arrayed himself at the head of the opposition, and a long contest commenced between these two illustrious individuals. Worn out with the excitement of debate, he, in 1789, repaired to the continent for the purpose of renewing his health, or perhaps of restoring the tone of wounded spirits constantly engaged in the harassing conflict of opinion; and, after passing a few days with Gibbon at Lausanne, he entered the classic land of Italy. George III., however, having been suddenly taken ill, he was soon recalled from whatever repose and enjoyment he had promised himself in that region where tion of Warren Hastings came on, in which, from its commencement to its close, he took an active part. Next came the question of the regency, which, Fox argued, belonged by right to the prince of Wales; and then the French revolution, the principles of which he also discussed with his usual feeling, fervour, and vehemence. It was upon this question that the memorable quarrel took place between him and Burke. "I know the price of my conduct," exclaimed the latter; "I have done my duty at the price of my friend. Our friendship is at an end." In vain did Fox appeal, with tears in his eyes, to the memory of twenty-five years of uninterrupted intercourse. The words were publicly spoken, and the breach was never healed. Notwithstanding this separation, however, Burke shortly afterwards declared that Fox "was a man made to be loved." Between 1797 and 1802 Fox lived chiefly in retirement, when he formed the plan of his "History of the Reign of James II." In 1802 a dissolution of parliament took place, when Fox, who had before sat for Westminster, was again returned for the same "ancient city." Shortly afterwards he visited Paris, with the view of collecting materials for his historical work, when he was introduced to Napoleon I., who paid him marked attention. On the death of his great rival, Pitt, in 1806, Fox became secretary of state for foreign affairs under Lord Grenville; but his days were now numbered. Brief, however, as these were destined to be, he exerted himself for the abolition of the slave-trade, which was one of the many benevolent objects which lay near to his heart. He also endeavoured to negotiate a peace with France; but being afflicted with water in the chest, he did not live to accomplish his plans. b. 1749; d. 1806. It is upon his speeches and his statesmanship that the fame of Fox rests; and the former of these have been highly praised, and commended to students of oratory as models for study. This has especially been the case with the first part of his speech on "the Westminster Scrutiny," which Brougham recommends to Macaulay "to pore over till he has it by heart." The criticism of Coleridge on the eloquence of Fox, is, "that his feeling was all intellect, and his intellect all feeling." Sir James Mackintosh calls him a "Demosthenian speaker;" but Brougham says, "there never was a greater mistake than the fancying a close resemblance between his eloquence and that of Demosthenes." The mother of this celebrated man was Lady Georgina Caroline, eldest daughter of Charles, second duke of Richmond, of the Lennox family.

Fox, William Johnson, an eloquent English Unitarian preacher, who becoming popular as an advocate of the repeal of the corn-laws, and other liberal opinions in politics, was elected member of parliament for Oldham in 1847 and in 1852. He is best known, however, as a periodical writer, and from his connexion with the "Westminster Review," for which he wrote the opening article of the first number. He also wrote for the "Monthly Repository" and the "Weekly Dispatch" newspaper. His separate works are, "Lectures to the Working Classes," 4 vols. of which were published between 1845 and 1851. He likewise produced a volume on "The Religious Ideas," and several other smaller performances. Mr. Fox resigned his seat in parliament, and retired from public life, in 1863. As a member of the House of Commons, he frequently brought forward motions with a view to the promotion of secular education throughout the country. b. near Wrentham, Suffolk, 1786; d. 1864.

Fox, Maximilien Sebastian, foi, a famous French general, who began his career at the age of fifteen, after having studied at the college of Soissons and the military school of La Fere. He made his first campaign as second-lieutenant of artillery under Dumouriez in 1792; made two campaigns under Moreau; and served under Bonaparte in Italy. The peace of Campo Formio suspended his military career, and he then studied law at Strasburg. In 1798 he again joined the army, and continued in active service in Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, till the peace of Amiens. He was sent to Turkey in 1807, and assisted the Porte in making preparations for the defence of the Dardanelles. He next went to Portugal, where he took part in many battles, always distinguishing himself for courage and military skill, rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, succeeded Marmont as commander-in-chief after the battle of Salamanca, and accomplished an able retreat to the Douro. He was wounded in the battle of Orthez, and on the retirement of Bonaparte to Elba, was employed by the Bourbons. On the return of the emperor, however, he again joined him, fought bravely at Waterloo, where he received his fifteenth wound, notwithstanding which he continued at his post till the close of the engagement. Fox afterwards devoted himself to the study of history and of political and military science; and in 1819 was elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies, in which assembly he distinguished himself as an orator, especially in defence of his old companions in arms, and became a great public favourite. On his death, it was found that his widow and family were left in indigent circumstances, when a liberal subscription was made for their relief and for the erection of a statue to his memory. He left two volumes of speeches, and from his MSS. his widow afterwards published an able and impartial "History of the Peninsular War." b. at Ham, in Picardy, 1775; d. 1825.

FRA DIAVOLO, fra de-a'-vo-lo, a Neapolitan robber, whose real name was Michael Pozzo, began life as a stocking-maker, after which he became a friar, and in this capacity was the leader of a gang of banditti in Calabria. In 1799 he assisted cardinal Ruffo, who headed the counter-revolutionists in favour of the Bourbons of Naples. For this he received a pardon for his crimes, and a pension of 3600 ducats, with which he was enabled to purchase an estate. He now lived in peace till 1806, when he rose again in favour of the expelled Bourbons. He entered Sperlonga, and threw open the prisons, when he was joined by large numbers of lazzaroni; but, after a severe engagement with the Bonapartists, he was taken prisoner, condemned, and summarily executed in the same year. b. 1709. Auber, the French musical composer, has written an opera founded on the adventures of this bandit.

FRANCIA, Francesco, fran'-che-a, a distinguished Italian painter, who, from being a goldsmith and engraver on metals, rose to eminence as an artist. Having been employed by Raphael to place a picture of his in a church at Bologna, he was so struck with its beauty, and so disheartened at his own inferiority, that he sank into despair and died, 1513. b. at Bologna, 1450. His real name was Francesco Raibolini.

FRANCIA, JOSE GASPAR RODRIGUEZ, fran'-she-a, the famous dictator of Paraguay, was the son of a small French proprietor in that country, his mother being a creole. He was originally intended for the church, but, after taking his degree as doctor of laws at the University of Cordova, he devoted himself to law, and became an eminent and successful pleader. He continued his legal avocations for thirty years, having won a high reputation for learning, honesty, and independence, occupying his leisure with philosophical and mathematical studies, to which he continued addicted all his life. Soon after the Spanish South American colonies threw off their allegiance to the parent state, Dr. Francia was, in 1811, appointed secretary to the independent junta of Paraguay; and in 1813, on the formation of the new congress, was named consul of the republic, with Yegros for a colleague. From that time he devoted himself to the welfare of his country, the affairs of which he administered with singular ability. He repaired the state of the finances, and maintained peace and order in Paraguay, while the other colonies were torn with dissensions and desolated with war. In 1817, the people, in gratitude for the services he had rendered them, placed in his hands unlimited power, under the title of dictator, which he continued to exercise till his death, in 1840. b. at Assuncion, 1767; d. 1840.

FRANCIS I., fran'-sis, king of France, succeeded to the throne in 1515, on the death of Louis XII., who died without male issue. Scarcely had he ascended, when he, as grandson of Valentine of Milan, put himself at the head of an army to assert his rights over the Milanese. The Swiss, who opposed him in his entry into the duchy, were defeated at Marignano (or Melegnano) September 13, 1515, and Milan fell immediately after this victory. After a short war with England, the famous interview between Henry VIII. and Francis took place, in 1520, in Flanders, and which, for the magnificence displayed on the occasion, was called "the Field of the Cloth of Gold." In the same year, Charles V. of Spain having inherited the empire after the death of Maximilian, Francis laid claim to the imperial dignity, and declared war against his rival. In this struggle, however, he met with nothing but reverses. After the defeat of Marshal Lautrec at Bicocca, in 1522, and Bayard's death, Francis was himself, in 1525, beaten at Pavia, and taken prisoner. The fight had been a stout one, and the king wrote to his mother, "All is lost, except honour." Led captive into Spain, he only recovered his liberty at the cost of an onerous treaty, signed at Madrid in 1529; but which was not entirely carried out. He immediately recommenced the war in Italy, met with fresh defeats, and concluded a second treaty at Cambrai, in 1529. He once more invaded Italy, in 1536, and, after various success, consented to a definite arrangement at Crespì, in 1544, by which the French were excluded from Italy, though Milan was given to the duke of Orleans, the second son of Francis. b. at Cognac, 1494; d. at the Chateau de Rambouillet, 1547, and was succeeded by his son, Henry II. Francis was a friend to arts and literature, which flourished during his reign; and he was called the Father of Letters. Justice, also, began to be better administered in his reign in France, although the Calvinists suffered great persecutions. He founded the Royal College of France, the Royal Library, and built several palaces.

FRANCIS II., king of France, was the eldest son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medicis, and succeeded his father in 1559. The year previous he had married Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, and in 1560 he died, leaving no issue. Francis, duke of Guise, and Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, held the principal authority in this reign, and, by the abuses of which they were guilty, had a principal share in causing the religious wars to which France now became a prey. Francis was succeeded by his brother, Charles IX. b. 1544.

FRANCIS I., emperor of Germany, was the son of Leopold, duke of Lorraine. He inherited this duchy from his father, in 1729, and six years afterwards exchanged it for that of Tuscany, which the death of the last of the Medicis had rendered vacant. In 1736 he married Maria Theresa, the daughter of the emperor Charles VI. On the death of the latter, he disputed the imperial dignity with the elector of Bavaria, whom France supported, and who took the name of Charles VII.; he was, however, defeated, and Francis reigned peaceably for twenty years. b. 1703; d. 1765. His character was tarnished by avarice. He had sixteen children, amongst whom was Joseph II., who succeeded him, and the unfortunate Marie Antoinette.

FRANCIS II., emperor of Germany, and I. of Austria, succeeded his father, Leopold II., in 1792, as emperor of Germany, king of Bohemia, Hungary, &c. At the very commencement of his reign he had to sustain a war against France, in which he was defeated, and was, in 1797, obliged to sign the treaty of Campo Formio, which deprived him of the Netherlands and Lombardy. Another war taking place with the same power, he was not more fortunate than in the first, and was beaten at Marengo, and lost, by the treaty of Lunéville, in 1801, all his possessions on the Rhine. In a third campaign, undertaken in 1805, the French were victorious over his armies at Elefingen, Ulm, and Austerlitz; and the treaty of Presburg still further diminished his territory. Renouncing, now, the title of emperor of Germany, he took that of Austria, under the name of Francis I. He tried again the fate of battles in 1809; but the defeats of Eckmühl and Wagram led to the peace of Schönbrunn; to cement which more strongly, his daughter Maria Louisa was in 1810, given to Napoleon I. Notwithstanding this alliance, however, he, in 1813, joined the coalition against his son-in-law, and contributed considerably to his overthrow. The treaties of 1815 put him again in possession of the greater portion of his territory, and he reigned peaceably till his death in 1835. b. 1768. He was succeeded by his son Ferdinand, who, in his turn, abdicated in favour of his nephew, Francis Joseph, in 1848.

FRANCIS I., king of the Two Sicilies, was the son of Ferdinand I., and twice, during the lifetime of his father, carried on the government of the kingdom under the name of viceroy; first, in 1812, when a constitution was granted to Sicily; and afterwards, in 1820, during the troubles which broke out in Naples and Palermo. He mounted the throne in 1825, and died 1830, without having achieved anything remarkable. He was succeeded by Ferdinand II. (Bomba), who, dying in 1859, was followed by Francis II., who was expelled from Naples by general Garibaldi in 1860, and after taking refuge in Gaeta, which was captured by general Cialdini, the people of Naples and Sicily united themselves to the kingdom of Italy under Victor Emmanuel. Francis retired to Rome, where he continued to foster and encourage partisan expeditions into his old states, which generally resolved themselves into sanguinary brigand raids, the most atrocious murders and robberies being committed in his name.

FRANCIS, Sr., an Italian, the founder of the order of Franciscan friars, was the son of a rich merchant, named Bernardino. He was at first intended by his father for commercial pursuits, and, with that view, studied the French language, which he acquired so perfectly, that he was surnamed Francis. At the age of 24, however, he gave himself up entirely to the religious life, and gained a number of followers, to whom he prescribed that they should possess nothing of their own, should live on alms, and spread themselves over the face of the globe to convert sinners and unbelievers. He himself, in 1219, departed, with this end, for Egypt and Syria. It is said that he had a remarkable vision, in which he saw an angel descend from heaven, with the marks of crucifixion on his body, and that he himself felt the pains of crucifixion at the same moment, and preserved the same marks in his flesh. b. at Assisi, Umbria, 1182; d. 1226.—There are other saints, in the Roman Catholic calendar, of this name.

FRANCIS, Sir Philip, the supposed author of the celebrated "Letters of Junius," was the son of a clergyman, and educated at St. Paul's School, London. When he was but sixteen, he was placed in the office of Mr. Fox, then minister, and subsequently was fortunate enough to be retained by Mr. Pitt, when this statesman came into power. Afterwards, he was private secretary to general Bligh, then to the earl of Kinnoul, and, in 1763, received an appointment in the War Office, which he held nearly ten years. In 1773 he was named one of the civil members in council for the government of Bengal, and remained in India till 1780, when, having had a duel with Warren Hastings, he returned to England. Here he, in 1784, was returned to the House of Commons, and remained a member till 1807, when he retired from parliament, evincing his interest in public affairs by his pamphlets and newspaper contributions. In 1816, great attention was drawn to him as being the author of the "Letters of Junius," Mr. John Taylor having published an ingenious pamphlet, in which strong evidence was given in support of this opinion. b. at Dublin, 1740; d. in London, 1818. It may be added, in connexion with Sir Philip's supposed authorship of these celebrated letters, that Lords Brougham, Campbell, Mahon, and Macaulay, have not hesitated to declare their conviction that he was that "great unknown," and to these high names may be added other legal and literary authorities, who entertained the same belief.

FRANCK, or FRANKEN, frank. There were several Dutch and Flemish artists of this name, among whom may be mentioned—1. Jerome, Ambrose, and Sebastian, of the Flemish school, who flourished in the 16th century, and obtained considerable reputation.—2. John Baptist, a native of Antwerp, who painted historical subjects and saloon interiors with great spirit and exquisite colouring. b. 1600.—3. Francis, two eminent Dutch painters, father and son, who were famous for their scripture subjects, executed with great beauty and fine colour. The father died in 1616 and the son in 1642.

FRANCKE, Augustus Herman, frank, a German divine, who became professor of the Oriental languages, and afterwards of divinity, in the University of Halle. Here he laid the foundation of an orphan-house, which, in 1727, contained upwards of 2000 children and more than 130 preceptors. He also carried into effect a mission for propagating the gospel in Malabar. a. at Lubeck, 1663; d. 1727. His works are, Sermons and Books of Devotion; "Methodus Studii Theologici;" "Introductio ad Lectionem Prophetarum;" "Commentaria de Scopo Librorum Veteris et Novi Testamenti;" "Manductio ad Lectionem Scripturæ Sacre;" "Observationes Biblicæ." Some of his practical books have been translated into English.

FRANKLIN, Thomas, frank-lin, an English divine, who was educated at Westminster School, whence he was removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the degree of D.D. He was also chosen professor of Greek in that university. In 1758 he was appointed to the vicarage of Ware, to which was afterwards added the rectory of Brasted, in Kent. He subsequently became chaplain in ordinary to King George III. b. in London, 1721; d. 1784. Dr. Franklin translated Phalaris, Sophocles, and Lucian into English, and wrote three plays: "The Earl of Warwick," and "Matilda," tragedies; and the "Contract," a comedy. He also published a volume of sermons on the relative duties, and permitted his name to be prefixed to a translation of Voltaire's works.

FRANÇOIS DE NEUFCHATEAU, fran-keaw dai neu-cha-to, a French poet, dramatic writer, and politician, was a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1792, and in 1797 was minister of the interior, and member of the directory. Under the rule of Napoleon he became a count, a senator, and grand officer of the Legion of Honour. After the restoration of the Bourbons, he gave himself up entirely to literary pursuits. François, who was bred a lawyer, was a man of eminent ability, as well in statesmanship as in the character of author, and left a variety of works behind him which are still popular in France. b. at Neufchâteau, Lorraine, 1750; d. 1823.

FRANK, Johann Peter, frank, a distinguished German physician, who was professor at Göttingen, Pavia, director-general of hospitals in Lombardy, and clinical professor at Vienna. Bonaparte invited him to France, but this he refused. He wrote a number of works on medical subjects, the most important of which are his "System of Medical Police," "Choix d'Opuscules appartenant à la Médecine," and "De l'Art de Traiter les Maladies." These three works, making 32 vols. 8vo, are only a portion of the fruits of Professor Frank's industry. b. in the Duchy of Baden, 1745; d. 1821.

FRANKLIN, Benjamin, frank-lin, an American patriot, and one of the most distinguished of modern philosophers, was the son of a soap-boiler and tallow-chandler in the city of Boston. He was designed for the ministry; but his father requiring his assistance at home, took him from school, when only ten years old, and set the future philosopher to "the cutting of wicks for the candles, filling moulds," and other duties necessary to his business. Disliking this occupation, however, he was placed under his elder brother, who was a printer in Boston, but with whom he disagreed. He then removed to New York, whence he went to Philadelphia, where, after serving as a journeyman some time, he attracted the notice of Sir William Keith, the governor, who persuaded him to commence business on his own account. With this view he proceeded, in 1725, to England, to procure printing materials; but on his arrival he found that the governor had deceived him by false promises; on which he worked as a journeyman in London. He now produced his "Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain," which was the means of introducing him to Mandeville, the author of "The Fable of the Bees." In 1726 he returned to America, and entered into partnership with a person named Meredith in the printing trade, which he afterwards conducted alone in the city of Philadelphia. In 1730 he was united to a lady, whom he had courted before going to England; and, about the same time, contributed to the forming of the public library at Philadelphia, and subsequently established an insurance office and other useful institutions in the same town. In 1732 he published his "Poor Richard's Almanac," which became noted for the pithiness of its proverbs, and wherein were inserted those maxims so generally known by the title of "The Way to Wealth." In 1736 he was appointed clerk to the General Assembly at Pennsylvania, and, in the year following, postmaster of Philadelphia. He was now a prominent member of the community. In 1742 he established the first public library in Philadelphia, and, two years later, proposed and carried into effect a plan of association for the defence of Pennsylvania. About this time he commenced his electrical experiments, of which he published an account, and had the honour of making several discoveries in this branch of philosophy, the principal of which was the identity of lightning with the electric fluid. Hence he invented the lightning-conductor. In 1747 he was chosen a representative in the General Assembly, in which he distinguished himself by several acts of public utility. By his means a militia bill was passed, and he was elected colonel of the Philadelphia regiment, but the honour of this appointment he declined. In 1757 he was sent to England as agent for Pennsylvania. Whilst in that country he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and honoured with the degree of doctor of laws by the universities of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, and Oxford. In 1762 he returned to America, but two years afterwards revisited England in his former capacity, when he underwent his examination at the bar of the House of Commons concerning the Stamp Act. In 1775 he returned to America, and was elected a delegate to the Congress. In the contest between Great Britain and her transatlantic colonies, he took an active part in the declaration of independence. In 1778 he arrived in France as minister plenipotentiary from America, and signed a treaty offensive and defensive with that power, and which produced a war between France and England. In 1783 he signed the definitive treaty of peace recognising the independence of the United States, and in 1785 returned to America, where he was triumphantly received, and chosen president of the supreme council. It was on this occasion that he received the following tribute of admiration from an American even still more distinguished than himself in the annals of his country:—"Mount Vernon, September 25, 1785. —DEAR SIR,—Amid the public congratulations on your safe return to America after a long absence, and the many eminent services you had rendered it,—for which, as a benefited person, I feel the obligation,—permit an individual to join the public voice in expressing his sense of them, and to assure you that, as no one entertains more respect for your character, so none can salute you with more sincerity or with greater pleasure than I do on the occasion.—GEORGE WASHINGTON." From 1785 to 1789, he sat with Washington and Hamilton in the federal Convention which framed the constitution of the United States. B. in Boston, January 6, 1706; D. April 17, 1790. His death was sincerely mourned both in Europe and America. Besides his political, miscellaneous, and philosophical pieces, published in 4to and 8vo, he contributed several papers to the "American Transactions," and published two volumes of essays, with his life prefixed, written by himself.

FRANKLIN, Sir John, a distinguished English navigator, who, in 1803, entered the royal navy as a midshipman. In 1806 he was present at the battle of Trafalgar, in 1814 at that of New Orleans, and in 1819 was appointed to head an overland expedition from Hudson's Bay to the Arctic Ocean. After suffering many hardships, and being frequently on the verge of death from hunger and fatigue, he reached home in 1822, when, in the following year, he married a Miss Porden, the daughter of an architect, and the authoress of several poetical effusions. In 1825 he submitted to Lord Bathurst a plan "for an expedition overland to the mouth of the Mackenzie River, and thence by sea to the N.W. extremity of America, with the combined object also of surveying the coast between the Mackenzie and Coppermine Rivers." This proposition was accepted, and, six days after he left Liverpool; in the same year, his wife died. In 1827 Captain Franklin arrived at Liverpool, where he was married a second time, and in 1829 had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. In 1845 Sir John set out on a third expedition with two ships, called the Erebus and Terror , and spent his first winter in a cove between Cape Riley and Beechy Island. After that period many expeditions were despatched, both from England and America, in search of Sir John, of whom there were no tidings, and not until 1854 did the intelligence reach England that the brave navigator and his heroic companions had, in all probability, perished in the winter of 1850-51. This intelligence, however, wanted confirmation, and Lady Franklin, who deserves all praise for the intelligent persistency of her efforts, resolved to have the mystery cleared up as to whether her gallant husband had really met the fate which it was generally believed he had done. Accordingly, a last expedition was fitted out, and the melancholy news was, in 1857, at length confirmed by the return of Captain McClintock, in the yacht Fox , after a persevering search for the lost adventurers. This officer brought with him indisputable proofs of the death of Sir John and the loss of his crew. Several articles belonging to the unfortunate explorers were found at Ross Cairn and Point Victory. At the latter place a record was discovered, wherein it was stated that Sir John Franklin had died on the 11th of June, 1847. Other traces were found on the west coast of King William's Island, as the various survivors of the expedition had strayed from each other, perhaps in search of food, or the means of escaping from their dreary and desolate situation. To Sir John Franklin, however, belongs the merit of having discovered the north-west passage, the first expedition in quest of which was sent out in 1553, the last being said to have terminated only with the discovery of his remains. B. at Spilsbury, Lincolnshire, 1788.

FRANCE, Abraham, france, an English poet, educated at Cambridge, at the expense of Sir Philip Sidney, afterwards studied law at Gray's Inn, London, and was called to the bar of the Court of Marches in Wales. He is better known, however, as an author than as a lawyer. His principal writings are—"Lamentations of Amintas for the Death of Phillis," "The Countess of Pembroke's Ivy Church and Emanuel," and a translation of Heliodorus's "Ethiopes." The dates of his birth and death are unascertained.

FRAUNHOFER, Joseph, froun'-ho'-fer, an eminent Bavarian optician, who, in his 20th year, was received into the great manufactory for the construction of mathematical and philosophical instruments, near Munich. Here he distinguished himself by making many experiments on light, and, by his reputation, increased the resources of the establishment, which ultimately became his property. He was a member of several learned societies, and had conferred upon him by the king of Bavaria the order of Civil Merit, and by the king of Denmark, that of the Dannebrog. B. at Straubing, 1787; D. 1826.

FREDGONDA, fred'-gon'-da, a peasant girl in the service of Andowera, the queen of Chilperic I., who fell in love with her and eventually married her in 555. Chilperic had previously divorced Andowera, and married Galwintha, whom, it is said, Fredgonda poisoned to attain her end. D. 597.

FREDERICK, fred'-er-ik, the name borne by a vast number of sovereigns and rulers of different countries, the most eminent of whom were—

FREDERICK I., surnamed Barbarossa, emperor of Germany, the son of Frederick, duke of Swabia, succeeded to the imperial throne on the demise of his uncle, Conrad III., in 1152. He was an energetic and warlike prince, and, in the second year of his reign, settled the disputes between Canute and Sweyn, competitors for the Danish crown, the former of whom he held as his vassal. He next marched into Italy to settle the tumults which distracted that country, and was crowned at Rome by Adrian IV., who, dying in 1159, no less than three antipopes were chosen, who were all opposed by the emperor. The Milanese, profiting by these divisions, endeavoured to shake off the imperial yoke, on which Frederick again entered Italy, took Milan, and entering Rome, set Calixtus on the papal throne instead of Alexander. The Venetians, however, maintained the cause of the latter with so much vigour, that Frederick was obliged to make his submission to Alexander. He next embarked against the infidels, obtained some victories, took Iconium, and penetrated into Syria, where he was drowned in 1190. B. 1121.

FREDERICK II., the grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI., was elected king of the Romans in 1196, and emperor in 1210, in opposition to Otho. In 1220 he was crowned by Pope Honorius III. at Rome. He afterwards went to the Holy Land, and concluded a truce with the sultan of Babylon, which so provoked Pope Gregory IX., that he anathematized him. In the city of Jerusalem he put the crown on his own head, because no priest would even say the mass. On this Frederick returned to Europe and laid siege to Rome, which originated the famous parties of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, the former being on the side of the pope, and the latter on that of the emperor. Gregory was obliged to make peace, but, in 1238, he again excommunicated Frederick, and the war was renewed, which proved unsuccessful to the emperor, whose German subjects revolted against him. He lost Parma by an insurrection, and was defeated before it; but he afterwards was victorious in Lombardy. B. 1194; D. at Florin-tino, 1250.

FREDERICK III., called Le Beau, son of Albert I., duke of Austria, was chosen emperor in 1314 by some of the electors, but the majority elected Louis of Bavaria, who defeated and took prisoner Frederick at Muhl-dorf, in 1322. The latter then renounced his claim, and D. 1330. Some historians do not reckon Frederick as one of the emperors, but others set him down as the third Frederick.

FREDERICK IV., called "the Pacific," ascended the throne in 1440, and was crowned at Rome in 1452. His reign was passed in forming plans for the pacification of the empire. He is said to have died of a surfeit of melons, or in consequence of an amputation of his leg. He left it to his son Maximilian to carry out the device inscribed upon his palaces and books, A, E, I, O, U; which characters are sometimes supposed to represent the motto, Austria est Imperare Orbi Universo. B. at Innspruck, 1415; D. 1493.

KINGS OF DENMARK, SWEDEN, AND POLAND.

FREDERICK I., king of Denmark and Norway, succeeded his nephew Christiern, or Christian II., on the deposition of the latter, in 1523, and entered into an alliance with Gustavus I., king of Sweden. After taking Copenhagen, he gained over all the nobility, and introduced Lutheranism into his dominions. B. 1471; D. 1533.

FREDERICK II., the son and successor of Christiern or Christian III., was a great friend of learning, and the patron of Tycho Brahe, and other men of science. He waged a long war with Sweden, which ended in 1570, and received the order of the Garter from Elizabeth, queen of England, and gave his daughter in marriage to James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. B. 1534; D. 1589.

FREDERICK III. succeeded his father Christiern IV., in 1643. The most remarkable event of his reign was his changing the constitution from an elective to an hereditary monarchy. B. 1609; D. 1670.

FREDERICK IV. ascended the throne on the death of Christiern V., in 1699. He learned against Charles XII. of Sweden, who forced him to make peace; but when Charles fled to Turkey, Frederick drove the Swedes out of Norway, and concluded a favourable peace, retaining possession of the duchy of Schleswig. B. 1671; D. 1730.

FREDERICK V., grandson of the preceding, came to the throne in 1746. The character of his reign may be inferred from the following remark, which, on his deathbed, he made to his successor, CHRISTIAN VII.: "It is a great consolation to me, my son, that I have not injured any person, and that my hands are not stained with one drop of blood." He was twice married: first to Louisa, daughter of George II. of England, and then to Juliana, daughter of the duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbützel. B. 1723; D. 1766.

FREDERICK VI., king of Denmark, ascended the throne in 1838, although, from 1784, he was associated in the government with his father, who had lost his reason. On his accession, he had to repair the damages done by the English in their bombardment of Copenhagen in 1807, and to wage a war with the Swedes, who attempted to possess themselves of Norway. He succeeded in defeating them, and peace was signed at Jönköping, in 1809. Allying himself with Napoleon, Norway was, in 1814, given to Sweden, under Bernadotte; Pomerania and the isle of Rugen falling to Denmark. B. 1763; D. 1839.

FREDERICK VII., king of Denmark, succeeded Christian VIII. in 1848. In his reign an unsuccessful attempt was made, in 1849, to wrest the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein from Denmark. B. 1808; D. 1863.

FREDERICK, king of Sweden, was the eldest son of Charles, landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. He married the sister of Charles XII., on whose death in 1718, the states of Sweden elected her queen, and, in the year 1720, consented to her resigning the crown to her husband. He had a long and unsuccessful war with Russia, which ended in a peace disadvantageous to Sweden. D. without issue, 1761.

SOVEREIGNS OF PRUSSIA.

FREDERICK WILLIAM, generally called the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg, succeeded his father, the elector George William, in 1640, and, in 1648, freed Prussia from feudal subjection to the king of Poland. He is considered as the founder of the Prussian power, and from his example much of the military spirit which characterizes that nation is believed to have sprung. In 1643 he made peace with Sweden, and subsequently entered into a league with that power in 1655 against Poland. In 1672 he joined the imperialists in opposition to Louis XIV.; but, in 1673, he made a separate treaty with France, and, in the following year, again joined the allies; on which the French prevailed upon the Swedes to attack his dominions. Frederick, however, defeated the invaders, drove them out of Prussia, and took several places from them, which, however, by the treaty of St. Germain, in 1679, he was obliged to restore. He now turned his attention to the improvement of his states, and, by affording protection to the French Protestant refugees, added to the industrial power of his dominions 20,000 manufacturers, and laboured to extend the agricultural arts in every direction. He founded the library at Berlin, and a university at Duisburg; and, at his death, bequeathed to his son not only a country enlarged beyond the boundaries in which he found it, but a treasury well supplied. B. 1620; D. 1688. In order to avoid the possibility of being entrapped by an immoral society, this prince fled from the Hague to the camp of the prince of Orange, then at Breda. The Dutch prince was surprised at this signal instance of self-command, and received him with these words: "Cousin, your flight is a greater proof of heroism than would be the taking of Breda. He who so early knows how to command himself, will always succeed in great deeds." These words remained for ever deeply impressed on Frederick's mind.

FREDERICK I., king of Prussia after 1701, but as elector of Brandenburg Frederick III., succeeded to his father's dominions in 1688. The great object of his ambition was to be recognized as king of Prussia, and in 1701 he attained his object. On that occasion he put the crown on his own head, and on that of his royal consort. He also founded the order of the Black Eagle, and augmented his dominions partly by purchase, and partly by negotiations with various powers. B. 1657; D. 1713. This prince founded the University of Halle, the Royal Society of Berlin, and the Academy of Painting. His second queen, Sophia Charlotte of Hanover, was the sister of George I., and a woman possessed of a fine understanding.

FREDERICK WILLIAM I., son of the above, and father of Frederick the Great, commenced his reign in 1713, after having married a daughter of the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England. In 1715 he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, and in conjunction with Denmark took Stralsund; but on the death of Charles, in 1718, he made peace. B. 1688; D. 1740. The habits of this sovereign were entirely military, and he laboured unweariedly to promote the discipline of his troops. One of his strongest peculiarities was an extraordinary love for tall soldiers; and in order to procure these sons of Anak, he had agents employed in all parts of Europe. He held science and literature in profound contempt; but money he worshipped, and men of a military character after his own ideal, he respected and encouraged. The consequence was, that he left an abundant treasury and a well-appointed army of 66,000 men.

FREDERICK II., king of Prussia, commonly called "The Great," was the son of the preceding, and received but an indifferent education, owing to his father's contempt of letters and predilection for military discipline. On attaining the years of manhood, he evinced so strong an inclination for literature and music, that he incurred the displeasure of his parent, whose treatment induced him, in 1730, to make the attempt of escaping from Prussia. The scheme, however, being discovered, he was confined in the castle of Custrin, his younger companion, Katte, being executed before his face. After a confinement of several months, he obtained his pardon, although it seems well authenticated that his father had resolved to take away his life, which was only saved by the intercession of Charles VI., emperor of Germany. In 1733 he married the princess Elizabeth of Brunswick, in obedience to his father's command, when he employed himself in literary pursuits, and also with the study of music, until his accession to the throne. In 1740 he succeeded to the crown, and taking advantage of the defenceless state of Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, he marched into Silesia, which was added to his dominions by the treaty of Breslau. In 1744 the war was renewed against the queen of Hungary, and the same year Frederick took

Prague, which, however, he was forced to evacuate on the approach of a Saxon army under the prince of Lorraine. In 1745 he defeated that prince at Friedburg, and then marched into Bohemia, where, at Sorr, he defeated an Austrian army superior to his own. Shortly after, he took Dresden, where, after laying it under heavy exactions, a treaty of peace was concluded, which enabled Frederick to retain possession of Silesia, and end the second Silesian war. The eleven years of peace which succeeded this event were devoted by Frederick to the internal administration of his dominions, the composition of some literary works, and the framing of the "Frederician code of laws." In 1750 Voltaire visited Prussia, and was received with the most flattering marks of attention by the king; but the friendship which subsisted between them was at last broken, and the French philosopher quitted Prussia abruptly, and in disgrace. In 1756 a treaty was concluded between England and Prussia, which produced another between France, Austria, and Russia. "The Seven Years' War," as it is called, began by Frederick marching into Saxony, and taking the camp of Pirna. The following year he gained a great battle at Prague over the Austrians, on which he laid siege to that city, and after reducing it to great straits, he was compelled by Marshal Daun, who defeated him at Kolin, to retire into Saxony. Frederick was now surrounded by enemies: the French entered Hanover, the Russians and Swedes advanced towards Prussia, and the Imperialists pursued him into Saxony. Still undaunted, he attacked and defeated the French and Austrians at Rossbach; then marching into Silesia, beat another army at Lissa, and recovered Breslau. The Russians and Swedes retreated precipitately from Prussia; and the Hanoverians took the field under the prince of Brunswick. In 1758 he received a large subsidy from England; and the same year entered Moravia, where he laid siege to Olmutz, which was relieved by Marshal Daun. He then marched against the Russians, who had laid siege to Custring, and defeated them, after a bloody battle, at Zorndorf. Not long after this, however, he was surprised and beaten by Daun, at Hochkirchen. The next year the king was defeated, after a very obstinate and doubtful engagement, at Kunnersdorf, by the Russians; and in 1760, the confederates entered Brandenburg, and took Berlin. Frederick, however, by defeating Daun at Torgau, put a new face upon the campaign, and the Russians and Swedes were compelled to quit his territories. In 1763 peace was restored between him and Russia and Sweden, and in 1763 a treaty, much in his favour, was concluded with the empress-queen, by which Silesia was confirmed to Prussia, and which concluded the "Seven Years' War." Still ambitious of extending his dominions, in 1772 the partition of Poland was planned, and he obtained for his share all Polish Prussia, and a large portion of Great Poland. From this period the kingdom of Prussia was divided into East and West Prussia. In 1778 he opposed the design of the Emperor Joseph to dismember Bavaria, and marched in person against that monarch; but no action took place, and by the treaty of Teschen, in 1779, the Austrian court renounced its design. In 1786 he concluded a treaty of amity and commerce with the United States of America; but his days were fast drawing to a close, for the same year he died, at his favourite palace of Sans Souci, in the forty-seventh year of his reign. b. 1712. Frederick was courteous in his manners, and an acute politician. His works, published in his lifetime, are in four vols. 8vo; and since his death, fifteen more have been printed. The principal are, the "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg," a poem on the "Art of War," the "History of his Own Time," and the "History of the Seven Years' War." (For full details connected with this king and his father, see Carlyle's "Life and Times of Frederick the Great," a work which gives an interesting account of the eventful times in which this monarch lived.)

FREDERICK WILLIAM II., king of Prussia, was the nephew of the great Frederick, and succeeded him in 1786. He gave himself up to pleasure, sacrificing his ministers and generals to the caprices of his mistresses. He also allowed himself to be cajoled by the mystical vagaries of the society of the "Illuminati," and under his feeble rule, Prussia soon lost her place amongst nations. After having played a scarcely honourable part in the war which broke out in 1787 between Turkey and Russia, he proposed, in 1793, a coalition against the French republic. Advancing, at the head of 80,000 men, as far as the plains of Champagne, the world was expecting to see him march on Paris, when he suddenly retired, falling back on the Rhine. The following year he effected, with the aid of Russia, the second division of Poland; made peace with France in 1795, and d. 1797, a. 1744.

FREDERICK WILLIAM III., king of Prussia, son of the above, commenced his reign in 1797 by maintaining a strict neutrality in the various alliances with and against France which resulted from the ambitious designs of Napoleon I. In 1805, however, he yielded to the solicitations of Russia, allying himself with the czar against the French emperor. The rapid campaign of 1806, and the defeat of the Prussians at Jena, opened the gates of Berlin to the enemy, in whose hands it remained till 1809. In 1807 the battle of Friedland led to the humiliating peace of Tilsit, by which Frederick lost half his dominions. Restored to his capital, the king diligently endeavoured to repair the evils of war; but new disasters overtook him, and his kingdom suffered greatly during the struggle from 1812 to 1814. Forced, in the former year, to contribute a force of 30,000 men to Napoleon's army, he subsequently joined his troops with those of Russia. The allies having triumphed over the French at Leipsic, Frederick William, in 1814, entered Paris with the czar Alexander. He also accompanied the latter to England in the same year. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he once more joined the allies. After the victory of Waterloo, in which the Russians under Blücher (which see), played an important part, Prussia, once more at peace, gradually recovered the losses she had sustained, under the wise and paternal sway of Frederick, whose constant efforts and moderation contributed greatly to the maintenance of peace. Throughout his life, he was a warm defender of the Protestant religion, and a patron of education. He never redeemed his promise, however, to bestow a representative institution on his people. The establishment of the provincial estates only affected very slightly the absolute power, which, it is true, he wielded with ability, and with a kind of paternal affection for his people. It may finally be said of him, that, a waverer between the absolutist party and the liberal party, he secured, as is the lot with most undecided men, the respect and adherence of neither. B. 1770; D. 1840.

FREDERICK WILLIAM IV., king of Prussia, on the death of his father, succeeded to the throne in 1840. He served, as a simple officer, in the campaigns of 1813 and 1814, and evinced, at an early period of his life, a very great love for the arts, which he preserved throughout his career. During the first years of his reign, his subjects anxiously demanded the reform of the government, requiring the liberal constitution which had been promised them in 1815, in return for the great sacrifices they had made during the continental war. In 1847, at a general diet of the Prussian states, many of these reforms were granted, and it was thought that the kingdom might escape the troubles of the next year's revolution. In March, 1848, however, the people and the troops came into collision, the king was obliged to change the ministry, to issue a general amnesty, and to commence a war in favour of Schleswig against Denmark, and to salute from his balcony the corpses of the insurgents who had been killed in the streets of Berlin. These humiliations were somewhat softened by his hopes of becoming the head of a united Germany, and by the success of his army in putting down an insurrection of the Poles in Posen. The mingled irresolution and absolutism of Frederick William, however, led subsequently to other conflicts in June and August of the same year; and it was not until two coup-d'état that the king, assisted by his army, succeeded in retaining his authority almost unimpaired by the concessions he had made. In the war between the Western powers and Russia, Frederick William preserved a strict neutrality, although earnestly solicited by each party to espouse its side in the conflict. In his reply to the demands of the czar, he said: "There is hardly anything. I will not do for the emperor Nicholas, whom I love; but if I remember that he is my father-in-law, neither do I forget that Prussia is not the sister-in-law of Russia." In 1856, in consequence of an attack on Neufchâtel by some Prussian partisans, war was in danger of breaking out between Switzerland and Prussia; but this was avoided, and a treaty concluded, in May, 1857, in reference to the king's claims on that place. In the complications relative to the Danubian principalities, Prussia followed the lead of France and Russia as opposed to England and Austria. Towards the end of 1857, a severe illness, resulting in the loss of some of his faculties, caused the nomination as regent of his brother William, who, on the king's death in 1861, succeeded him as William I. B. 1795.

FREDERICK WILLIAM NICHOLAS CHARLES, prince of Prussia, the nephew of Frederick William IV., and son of William I., heir to the Prussian throne, married, in 1858, Victoria, the Princess Royal of England. B. 1831.

FREDERICK, Colonel, son of the unfortunate Theodore, commonly called king of Corsica, was bred to the military profession, and obtained the rank of colonel, with the cross of the Order of Merit, from the duke of Wurttemberg, for whom he acted as agent in England. Being greatly reduced in circumstances, he shot himself in the portal of Westminster Abbey, in 1796.

Fremont

He wrote—1. "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Corse," 1763, 8vo; 2. "The Description of Corsica, with an Account of its Union to the Crown of Great Britain," &c., 1793, 8vo.

FREGOSO, Baptist, fray-go'-so, a doge of Venice, in 1478, who was deposed and banished for his arbitrary and oppressive conduct. He wrote on Memorable Actions, the "Life of Pope Martin V.," on Learned Women, &c.—There are others of this family who have played various parts in Italian history.

FREIND, John, frinde, an English physician, who, having distinguished himself by some able works, was, in 1704, appointed chemical professor at Oxford, and, in the following year, accompanied the earl of Peterborough in his expedition to Spain, as physician to the army. On his return, in 1707, he published a vindication of the earl's conduct in Spain, which gained him considerable reputation. The same year he took his doctor's degree, and published his chemical lectures. In 1711 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and, the same year, accompanied the duke of Ormond to Flanders. In 1716 he was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians; and, in 1722, sat in Parliament for Llanneeston. The year following he was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in Atterbury's plot, but was soon released on bail. At the accession of George II., he was appointed physician to the queen. B. at Crofton, Northamptonshire, 1675; D. 1728. Amongst other works, he wrote "The History of Physic," 2 vols. 8vo; and all his writings were collected and published in Latin by Dr. Wigan, 1 vol. folio.

FREIND, Dr. Robert, brother of the above, was master of Westminster school, and wrote some excellent Latin and English poetry, besides having taken a part in the celebrated controversy regarding the epistles of Phalaris. He also published an edition of "Cicero de Oratore." B. 1671; D. 1754.

FREMONT, John Charles, fre-mont', a modern American politician and traveller, called "the Pathfinder of the Rocky Mountains," greatly distinguished himself by his courage and perseverance in extensive explorations, which opened to America "the gates of the Pacific empire." An account of these explorations was published in 1856, and upwards of 50,000 copies of the work were sold as soon as they were issued. In 1859 the whole of his expeditions were published, superbly illustrated with woodcuts and steel plates. This work was superintended by the author, and contains a résumé of the first and second expeditions, which he made in the years 1842-43 and 1844, as well as his other four, which embrace a period of ten years, passed amid the wilds of America, and describing his adventures in Oregon, California, the Rocky Mountains, Mexico, and other parts of that distant country. In 1857 he contested the presidency with Buchanan; but the latter was elected by a considerable majority. Fremont was always associated with that party in America which is opposed to negro slavery. In the early part of the war consequent on the secession of the Southern States from the Union, in 1861-62, he held several commands in the Federal army, but his achievements did not add to his fame; and it will principally be by his merits as an explorer, which are undoubtedly great, that John Charles Fremont will be remembered. B. at Savannah, 1813.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Frere

FRERE, Right Honourable John Hookham, freeer, an English diplomatist, who filled several important posts, the most noted of which was his ministry in Spain during the Peninsular war. It is by his writings that he is best known. When a boy he produced, in imitation of a Saxon war-song, a poem on the victory of Athelstan at Brunenburgh, which was written during the controversy occasioned by the poems attributed to Rowley. This poem is a work of very high merit, and, at the time of its appearance, elicited warm commendation. Frere also wrote and published what is called "The Whistlercraft Poem," which is supposed to have suggested the "Don Juan" of Byron. He was considered by Sir Walter Scott a perfect master of the ancient style of composition, and was one of the founders of the "London Quarterly Review," as well as a contributor to the "Etonian" and "Anti-Jacobin." b. in Norfolk, 1769; d. 1816, at his residence in the Pieta, Malta, where he lived for a number of years.

FRÉRET, Nicholas, frei-rai, a learned Frenchman, who was chosen a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and afterwards its perpetual secretary. Presenting to this body a dissertation on the origin of the Franks, his opinions were not pleasing to those in authority, and he was sent to the Bastille. On his release, Fréret occupied himself with antiquarian researches, and prepared a very large number of works on the chronology of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Indians, the old Greeks, and even the Chinese. Some of these have been published in Paris. b. in Paris, 1688; d. 1749.

FRÉRON, Elie Catherine, frei-raung, a French critic, educated among the Jesuits, was, at first, a professor at the college of Louis le Grand, but subsequently allied himself with Desfontaines, whom he assisted in his literary undertakings, and against the philosophers of the 18th century. In 1749 he commenced his "Letters on certain Writings of the Times," which extended to 13 volumes. He then began his "Année Littéraire," which he continued to produce, year after year, from 1754, until his death, in 1776. b. at Quimper, 1719. Fréron's critical works were much read; but owing to some strictures which he passed on Voltaire's writings, that author attacked him with great asperity, and ridiculed him in his satire of the "Pauvre Diable," and in his comedy of "L'Ecosse." Besides the above works, Fréron wrote—"Miscellanées," "Les Vrais Plaisirs," and part of a translation of Lucretius.

FRÉRON, Louis Stanislaus, son of the above, noted for having produced, in 1759, in conjunction with Marat and others, a violent revolutionary journal, which bore the name of the "Orateur du Peuple." He became prominent at the Revolution, was a member of the Convention, voted for the death of the king, and, after making himself notorious during the Reign of Terror, became a bitter opponent of Robespierre. Bonaparte appointed him subprefect of St. Domingo, where he went along with general Leclerc, but died in 1803, soon after his arrival. b. 1765.

FRÉSNEZ, Augustin Jean, freez-nel, a French scientific writer, who was at first an engineer, connected with the roads and bridges in the department of Drôme, where he remained till 1815. At this period he quitted active employment, and ardently followed scientific studies. Subsequently, he published "Mémoires on the Polarization and Double Refraction of Light," and in 1821 was appointed examiner of the Polytechnic School at Paris. To him are due many improvements in lighthouses, and he was one of the first to introduce lenticular lights. b. at Broglie, Eure, 1783; d. at Ville d'Array, 1827, just after the Royal Society had sent him the Rumford medal for his discoveries on light.

Frischlin

FRESNOY, Charles Alphonse du, fres'-noi, a painter and poet, who visited Rome for the purposes of study. Here he copied the works of the best masters, and planned his Latin poem on the "Art of Painting." b. at Paris, 1611; d. there, 1665. His poem was printed after his death, with a French translation by De Piles. There are three English translations of it; one by Dryden, another by Graham, and another by Mason.

FREWEN, Accepted, froo'-en, an English prelate, who, in 1622, accompanied Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I., to Spain, as chaplain. In 1631 he obtained the deanery of Gloucester, and, in 1643, the bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry. At the Restoration he was translated to York, and died at Thorne Castle in 1664. b. in Kent, 1589.

FREE, John Cecil, fri, a German physician, who boasted of being the first who defended theses in philosophy in the Greek language in Europe. His "Opuscula" was printed after his death by Balearens. b. 1580; d. 1631.

FRÉTAG, Friedrich Gottlieb, fri'-tag, was a burgo-master of Nuremberg, and wrote "Rhino-ceros Veterum Scriptorum Monumentis descriptus," 1747; "Analecta Literaria, de Libris rarioribus," 1751; "Oratorum et Rhetorum Græcorum quibus Statue honoris causa posite fuerunt," 1752; and "An Account of Scæree and Valuable Books," 1776. b. 1723; d. 1776.

FRÉTAG, Gustav, a modern German author, who, in 1847, in conjunction with Julian Schmidt, founded a literary journal, which soon attained to a large circulation. He subsequently published a small collection of poems, and an historic comedy, "Kuntz der Rosen," which was followed by two dramas and another comedy. All these are remarkable for their well-drawn characters, and the lively and natural tone of the dialogue. He is best known, however, in England, by his "Soll und Haben," a novel which was translated into English, in 1853, under the title of "Debit and Credit," and which attained a high degree of popularity. b. at Kreuzburg, Silesia, 1816.

FRÉZIER, Amedée François, frez'-e-ai, a French engineer, who was employed in making a survey of the Spanish colonies of Peru and Chili, in 1711, of which he published an account in 1716. He was afterwards employed in fortifying St. Malo and other places, for which he was rewarded with the cross of St. Louis. b. at Chambéry, 1682; d. 1773. He wrote, "Traité des Feux d'Artillerie," "Elémens de Stéréotomie," &c.

FRISCH, John Leonard, freech, a German naturalist and divine, who was the founder of the silk-manufactory at Brandenburg, and the first who cultivated mulberry-trees in Germany. b. at Sulzbach, 1668; d. at Berlin, 1743. He was the author of "A German and Latin Dictionary," "A Description of German Insects," "Dictionnaire Nouveau des Passages Français-Allemand et Allemand-Français," 8vo, &c.

FRISCHLIN, Nicodemus, freech'-len, a distinguished German critic and poet, especially famous for his satirical effusions, was educated by his father, who was a clergyman, at Tübingen, and made such progress, that at the age of thirteen he could write Greek and Latin poetry with elegance. When twenty, he was appointed a professor at Tübingen; and, in 1530, published an oration in praise of country life, together with a paraphrase of Virgil's "Georgics" and "Eclogues." Having in this work inveighed against courtiers, the satire was felt and resented, and, his life being in danger, he fled to Laybach, in Carniola, where he opened a school, but was compelled to return home in consequence of the insalubrity of the climate. He subsequently lived at Frankfort, and in Saxony and Brunswick; but after making an unsuccessful application to the Prince of Wurtemberg for assistance, he was confined in Wurtemberg castle, in making an attempt to escape from which, he fell down a steep precipice, the ropes he used having broken, and was dashed to pieces, Nov. 29, 1590. n. in Suabia, 1547. His works, of which he left a great many, consisting of tragedies, comedies, orations, criticisms, translations of Greek and Latin authors with notes, grammars, &c. were published in 4 vols. 8vo, between 1593 and 1607.

FRISI, Paul, fré-se, a Milanese mathematician and philosopher, who obtained the professorial chair of several colleges, and, in 1757, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of London. He was also a member of several continental learned societies, and published many useful treatises on astronomy, electricity, hydraulics, and other scientific subjects. n. at Milan, 1723; d. there, 1784.

FRITH, or FRITH, John, frith, a Protestant Martyr, who was educated at King's College, Cambridge. Through his acquaintance with Tyndale, he embraced the principles of the Reformation, for which he was imprisoned. In 1528 he obtained his liberty, and went abroad. On his return, he zealously promoted the Reformed doctrines, for which he was burned in Smithfield, in 1533. n. at Sevenoaks, Kent. He wrote several books against popery, collected into 1 vol. folio.

FRITH, William Powell, R.A., an eminent modern English painter, studied in the schools of the Royal Academy, and, in 1839, began to exhibit on its walls. Until 1844, his efforts were generally confined to representations from Shakspeare, Sterne, Goldsmith, and Scott; but in that year he produced his "Interview between John Knox and Mary Queen of Scots, respecting the marriage with Darnley." In this effort he was not considered so successful as he had been in the subjects to which he had previously mostly confined himself. He therefore returned to his former walk, and, in 1845, produced his "Village Pastor," which obtained his election as an associate of the academy. His next greatest painting was "An English Merry-making One Hundred Years ago," which is esteemed a superior work. This was first exhibited in 1846. From that time he kept himself continually before the eye of the public; and, in 1853, exhibited his "Life at the Seaside," which had the honour of being bought by her Majesty. In this year he was elected an R.A. In 1855 appeared "Maria tricks Malvolio," and, in 1856, "Many Happy Returns of the Day." His most successful picture, however, was that of "The Derby Day," which may be said to have been the most popular painting in the exhibition of 1858. This was followed by the "Railway Station," and other works illustrative of modern life and manners in England. The style of Mr. Frith is equal, whilst his touch is light and graceful. All his performances are finished with the greatest care. n. in Yorkshire, 1819.

FRONTENUS or FRONTEN, John, fron-té-ne-us, a German printer, who lived at Bâle, and was greatly esteemed by Erasmus, whose works he printed, as he also did those of Augustino and Jerome. d. 1527.

FRONISHER, Sir Martin, fron-bish-er, an enterprising English navigator and naval hero, bred early to the sea. The discovery of a north-west passage to India was an object which constantly exercised his thoughts; and after applying to several merchants to engage in the enterprise, he obtained the patronage of the earl of Warwick and other noblemen, who enabled him to fit out three small vessels, with which, in 1576, he sailed from Deptford. After exploring different parts of the Arctic coast, he entered the strait which bears his name, and then returned to England, bringing with him some black ore, which is said to have contained gold. In consequence of this, he was, in 1577, sent out again to search for ore, with a quantity of which he returned. A third voyage was undertaken the following year, with a number of ships to bring home the riches supposed to exist in the newly-discovered countries; but, on the return of the expedition, it was discovered that the precious metals had no existence where they had been sought. Between that year and 1585, we have no intelligence as to the employment of Fronisher; but in this year we find that he served under Drake in the West Indies, and in 1583 had a share in the defeat of the Spanish armada. The same year he was knighted. n. at Duneaster, Yorkshire; killed in assaulting a fort near Brest, in 1594. An account of his voyage was printed in Hakluyt's collection. Some articles left by him in the Arctic regions were discovered by an exploring party in 1862, in tolerable preservation, the traditions of the natives clearly indicating Sir Martin as the navigator who had left them.

FROLA I., or FRUELA, fró-e-la, king of Spain, son of Alphonso I., began his reign in 757. In 780 he obtained a victory over the Saracens in Galiela, but he sullied his character by the murder of his brother Samaran. This was avenged by another brother, Aurelius, who slew Froila in 768.

FROLA II. succeeded his brother Ordono in 923. He was a cruel prince, and his tyranny caused the province of Castile to revolt against him, when he was deposed. d. of a leprosy in 925.

FRONSART, John, fron-vois-sart, a celebrated French historian and poet, who wrote a work which he called a "Chronicle," and wherein are narrated the transactions of France, Spain, and England, from 1326 to 1410. The best edition, as it is the latest, is that of M. Buchon, published in Paris, 1824. It is esteemed an authority on the subject of which it treats. n. at Valenciennes about 1337; d. about 1410. Fronsart, though an ecclesiastic, was given to gaiety. His Chronicle was translated into old English by Lord Berners, and afterwards by Mr. Thomas Johnes.

FRONTINUS, Sextus Julius, fron-ti-nus, a celebrated geometrician, who made himself known by the books he wrote on aqueducts and stratagems of war, dedicated to Trajan. Lived in the 1st century A.D.

FRONTO, Marcus Cornelius, fron'-to, a Roman orator, who was preceptor to Lucius Verus and M. Aurelius. The latter appointed him consul, and erected a statue in his honour.

FROST, William Edward, A.R.A., frost, commenced his studies as an artist at Sass's academy, Bloomsbury, London, and thence entered the Royal Academy, where he completed them. In 1839 he carried off the gold medal by his picture of "Prometheus bound by Force and Strength." In 1843 he entered the lists of the cartoon competition, and exhibited his "Una alarmed by the Fauns and Satyrs," and obtained by it one of the premiums of £100. In 1843 he also exhibited his "Christ Crowned with Thorns," which attracted marked attention. From this period he continued to produce many beautiful pictures, when, in 1846, he painted his "Diana surprised by Actæon," which procured him the dignity of A.R.A. In the course of the following year his "Una and the Wood-Nymphs" appeared, and was purchased by Queen Victoria. His merits had now become well known, when, year after year, he continued to issue some fine conception, which eminently displayed the many graces of his pencil. p. at Wandsworth, Surrey, 1810.

FROWDE, Philip, frowd, an English poet, whose Latin effusions in the "Muscæ Anglicanæ" are elegant. He also wrote two tragedies, the "Fall of Saguntum," and "Philotas." p. 1733.

FRUMENTIS, St., frum-men'-tis, the first who preached the gospel in Æthiopia, of which country he was ordained bishop by St. Athanasius in 331. p. at Tyre; p. about 360.

FRY, Mrs. Elizabeth, fri, was the third daughter of John Gurney, Esq., of Earham Hall, near Norwich, and belonged to the Society of Friends. In 1800 she became the wife of Mr. Joseph Fry, a London merchant, and in 1810 a preacher among the Friends. In 1813 she visited the prisoners in Newgate, and by her active beneficence and judicious conduct effected great improvements in the condition of the miserable objects who there came under her notice. In 1817 she was so far successful in her philanthropical projects as to succeed in establishing a ladies' committee for the improvement of the condition of the female prisoners in Newgate, and by energy and perseverance had the gratification of converting a sink of iniquity into an abode of order and sobriety. A school and a manufactory were instituted within the walls of that dreary abode of sorrow, and comparative happiness took the place of misery. She was examined before the House of Commons on her plans of prison discipline; and, proceeding from one step to another, next turned her attention to the reformation of the characters of convicts. From 1833 to 1836 she occupied herself with visiting Jersey and Guernsey, and between 1837 and 1842 visited many of the principal towns of the continent, with the view of improving the system of prison discipline. p. near Norwich, 1750; p. at Rams-gate, 1845.

FRYXELL, Anders, frux-el, a distinguished Swedish historian, who was reared for the church, but devoted much of his time to the cultivation of literature. After producing an opera, he commenced his career, in 1823, as an historian, by the publication of a work entitled "Narratives from Swedish History," upon a plan similar to that seen in "Tales of a Grandfather," by Sir Walter Scott. From that period he continued to occupy a high place in the literature of Sweden, and greatly extended the plan of the above work. His views of the position of the aristocracy of his country, however, led him into controversy, although it did not withdraw him from his historical studies. He is known to English readers by a translation, made by Mrs. Mary Howitt, of two volumes of his extended "Narratives," published in 1844. p. at Hesselkog, in Daland, 1795.

FUCHS, Leonard, fooks, a German physician and botanist, who received the honour of knighthood from Charles V. of Spain. His greatest work is "Historia Plantarum," printed at Bâle in 1542. He also wrote several medical books. p. in Bavaria, 1501; p. 1566.

FÜRSSEL, John Caspar, foos'-se-le, an ingenious Swiss artist and author, who wrote a "History of the Artists of Switzerland, or Lives of the Helvetic Painters," which is considered an excellent work. p. at Zurich, 1706; p. 1781.—His son, John Caspar, an eminent entomologist, resided at Leipsic, where he published some valuable works on entomology. p. at Zurich, 1745; p. 1786.

FUGER, Frederick Henry, foo'-ger, an eminent German painter, who first studied his art in the Dresden Academy; but, proceeding to Vienna, discovered such talents as to induce his patrons to send him as an imperial pensioner to Rome. Here he studied eight years, when he visited Naples, and painted a series of frescoes in the library of Queen Caroline at Coserta. In 1734 he was recalled to Vienna, where he became professor in, and vice-director of, the academy. He was distinguished, not only as a fresco, but also as an oil and miniature painter. Some of his pictures consisted of subjects taken from the mythology of Homer; others from Roman history; and he made twenty illustrations of the "Messiah" of Klopstock. Many of his works have been engraved by German artists. p. at Heilbron, Wurtemberg, 1731; p. at Vienna, 1818.

FUGGER, foof'-ger, the name of a rich and illustrious family of Suabia, descended from a weaver, who originally lived in the environs of Augsburg, about 1300. They were at first successful in selling cloths, but afterwards extended their dealings, and became merchants, accumulating an immense fortune. Reaching the height of their affluence, at the commencement of the 16th century, they rendered considerable services to the emperors Charles V. and Maximilian, by making them large advances. These princes bestowed titles of nobility on the Fugger family, and they soon became connected with the best blood of Germany. Promoted to the highest dignities of the empire, they did not any the more neglect the pursuit of commerce. Their riches were always forthcoming for the improvement of their birthplace, Augsburg, where they erected some handsome monuments, and founded some philanthropical institutions. The best known of them are the three brothers, Ulric, James, and George; and, afterwards, Raymond and Antony, both sons of George. Antony received, for his loans to Charles V., the countship of Kirchberg and the seignory of Weissenhorn, which afterwards remained in the possession of his family. He was a great encourager of learning.—Antony and Raymond bore, to a great extent, the expenses of the expedition of Charles V. against Algeria, obtaining from him the permission to coin money. One day, at an interview with the emperor, Antony, as a mark of his regard and esteem, threw into the fire all the title-deeds and securities which Charles had deposited with him. Several of this family still exist, and Augsburg owes its position on the continent, as a financial centre, to the energy and talent of the Fuggers.

FULBERT, fool-bair, a French bishop, but a native of Italy, and a pupil of Pope Sylvester II. On going to France as a public lecturer, he gained a great reputation, and, in 1007, was presented with the bishopric of Chartres. He was zealous against Berengarius on the Eucharist, and introduced the worship of the Virgin into France. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and his works are extant. n. 1023.—(For FULBERT, a canon at Paris, see ABELARD.)

FULDA, Charles Frederick, ful-dū, an ingenious Lutheran divine, who wrote a "Dictionary of German Roots," "An Inquiry into Language," "On the Origin of the Goths," "On the Cimbric," "On the Deities of the Germans," and "A Chart of History." He was also an excellent mechanic. n. at Wimpfen, Swabia, 1724; d. 1788.

FULKE, William, fool-k, an English divine, who was made master of Pembroke Hall, and, subsequently, Margaret professor of divinity. n. in London; d. 1559. Of his works the most noted is his "Commentary upon the Rhemish Translation of the New Testament," printed in 1580.

FULLER, Nicholas, fool'-ler, a learned divine, who obtained a prebend in the church of Salisbury, and the living of Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire. n. at Southampton, 1557; d. 1622. His "Miscellanea Theologica," printed at Oxford in 1610, is a valuable body of sacred criticism.

FULLER, Thomas, an eminent English historian and divine, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. In 1631 he was chosen fellow of Sidney College, and, after fulfilling his clerical duties in several places, obtained a prebend of Salisbury. He was also presented to the rectory of Broad Windsor, in Dorsetshire, thence removed to London, and became lecturer at the Savoy. During the civil war he adhered to the royal cause, and became chaplain to Lord Hopton, who left him at Basing House, which was shortly after besieged by Sir William Waller; but the garrison, being sustained by the courage of Fuller, made so vigorous a resistance, that Waller was obliged to retire. On the ruin of the king's affairs, he was chosen lecturer of St. Bride's, Fleet-street. About 1648 he obtained the rectory of Waltham, in Essex; and between that time and the Restoration, published a number of books, the principal of which is "The Church History of Britain," folio. At the Restoration he was made chaplain-extraordinary to the king, restored to his prebend, and created D.D. n. at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, 1608; d. 1681. Besides the above, he wrote the quaint but valuable work, "The Worthies of England," in folio; "The History of the Holy War," folio; "The Holy State," folio; "Pisgah-sight of Palestine," folio; "Abel Redivivus, or Lives of Eminent Divines," 4to; sermons and tracts. He is said to have had so strong a memory as to have been able to tell, in their exact order, the names of the signs then placed over every tradesman's door, after one walk between Temple Bar and the Royal Exchange.

FULLER, Sarah Margaret, countess of Ossoli. (See OSSOLI.)

FULLER, Isaac, an English painter in the reign of Charles II. He painted the "Resurrection" at All Souls' College, Oxford; another at Magdalen College, and a picture at Wadham College, which is the best. He studied in France under Perier. n. in 1672.

FULTON, Robert, fool'-lon, an American mechanician and engineer, whose name is intimately associated with the improvement of steam navigation. In his eighteenth year he entered, in Philadelphia, upon the duties of life as a painter of landscapes and portraits for subsistence; but in 1786 he visited England, where West, the historical painter, took him by the hand, and for some years kept him in his house. His genius, however, seems to have been less directed to the beautiful in art than the mechanical in science. Accordingly, on quitting the house of Mr. West, he sought the acquaintance of the duke of Devonshire, then engaged with his canals, and in 1791 took out a patent for an inclined plane, designed to set aside the use of locks. He also invented an excavating-machine, a mill for sawing marble, and took out patents for making ropes and spinning flax. With all these projects, however, he seems to have met with little success, when he went to Paris, where he resided seven years under the roof of Mr. Barlow, the representative of the United States government. Here he directed his attention to other pursuits, but still of a mechanical kind, when, after some experiments made with small steamboats on the Seine, and another visit to England, he proceeded to America, where, in 1807, he commenced the construction of a steam-vessel, with which he succeeded in navigating the Hudson river. His fame was now established; but he did not live to reap the reward which his perseverance deserved. n. at Little Britain, Pennsylvania, 1765; d. at New York, 1815.

FULVIA, ful'-ve-a, an ambitious woman of Rome, who, after being twice married, became the wife of Mark Antony. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, she ordered it to be brought to her, and, with the greatest barbarity, bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra; upon which she attempted to persuade Augustus to take up arms against her husband. When this scheme did not succeed, she retired into the East, where Antony received her with great coldness. This totally broke her heart, and she soon after died, about 40 B.C. (See ANTONY).—A woman who discovered to Cicero the designs of Catiline and his brother conspirators.

FULVIUS, ful'-ve-us, a name common to some eminent Romans, the most remarkable of whom was a senator, intimate with Augustus. He disclosed the emperor's secrets to his wife, who made them public to all the Roman matrons; and for this he received so severe a reprimand from Augustus, that he and his wife hanged themselves in despair.—Serrus Fulvius Nobilior, a Roman consul, who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. He was successful in several conflicts with the Carthaginians, but was FURETIERRE, Anthony, foo-ret'-e-air, a learned Frenchman, who deserted the legal profession, and became abbot of Chailvoy and prior of Chûnes. In 1622 he was admitted to the French Academy, but twenty-three years afterwards was expelled, upon the charge of having unfairly profited by the common labour of the Encyclopedists to compile the dictionary which bears his name. This was printed in 1690, in 2 vols. folio. b. at Paris, 1620; d. 1638.

FURIUS, Bibaculus M., fu'-re-us, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in iambic verse, and was universally celebrated for the wit and humour of his expressions. It is said that Virgil imitated his poetry, and even borrowed some of his lines. Horace, however, has ridiculed his verses. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

FURNIUS, fur'-ne-us, a friend of Horace, who was consul, and distinguished himself by his elegant historical writings.

FÜRST, Walter, foorst, one of the founders of Swiss freedom and independence. Heading some brave men, he took and destroyed several forts belonging to the Austrians; which was the first step, in 1307, to the restoration of Switzerland as an independent nation. (See TELL and MURCHYAL.)

FUSELLI, OF FESSLEI, Henry, foos'-se-le, the second son of John Caspar Fuesli, author of "Lives of the Helvetic Painters," was educated for the church, and, in 1761, entered into holy orders. Having written, in conjunction with Lavater, a pamphlet reflecting on the conduct of a magistrate, it was deemed politic that he should leave his country; when, being furnished with letters of introduction from the British minister in Prussia, he visited England, where, for some time, he supported himself by translating works from the German, French, and Italian, into English. Gaining the acquaintance of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he showed some of his drawings to that distinguished artist, who recommended him to devote himself entirely to painting. This recommendation was not lost upon him, and, in 1770, he visited Italy and changed his name into Fuseli, which he ever afterwards retained. After an absence of eight years, he returned, and, with other artists, was engaged by Alderman Boydell to assist in forming his Shakspeare Gallery. He also employed himself in editing the work of Lavater on Physiognomy, and assisted Cowper, who was then translating Homer, with some remarks and corrections. He subsequently became an associate of the Royal Academy, and, in 1790, was chosen a royal academician. In 1790 he supplied some pictures towards the formation of a Milton Gallery; but the idea did not take with the public. In the same year he became professor of painting to the Royal Academy, and, in 1803, keeper. Meanwhile, he did not neglect his literary pursuits. In 1805 he edited Pilkington's "Lives of the Painters," and subsequently was elected a member of the first class in the academy of St. Luke's at Rome. b. at Zurich, 1741; d. in London, 1825, and was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's.

GABBIANI, Antony Dominic, gab'-le-aw'-ne, an Italian painter of considerable merit, was patronized by Cosmo III., Duke of Florence, who sent him to study at Rome. After his return to Florence he executed several pictures for the churches and palaces of that city, his finest works being the "Assumption," and the celebrated picture of "St. Filippo," in the church of the Oratorio. He was killed by a fall from a scaffold, while engaged in painting the cupola of Castello in 1726. b. at Florence in 1632.

GABINIUS, gi-bin'-e-us, a Roman consul, who made war in Judæa, and re-established tranquillity there. He suffered himself to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Auletes on the throne of Egypt. On his return, he was accused of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the request of Pompey, ably defended him. He was banished, however, and d. at Salona, about 48 B.C.

GABRIEL SIONITA, ga'-bre-el, a learned Maronite, and professor of the oriental languages at Rome and Paris, at which last place he died in 1643. He assisted Le Jay in his Polyglot Bible, and published a translation of the Arabic geography, with the title of "Geographia Nubiensis," 1619, 4to. b. 1577; d. 1613.

GABRIELLI, Caterina, gab'-re-ail-le, a celebrated vocalist, who, after acquiring great fame in Italy, went to Russia in 1773, and ranked high in court favour. She visited England in 1775, and Dr. Burney says that when "she was on the stage she filled the attention of the spectators so much that they could look at nothing else while she was in view." She subsequently went to Venice, and in 1780 to Milan, where she shared the public favour with Marchesi. b. at Rome, 1730; d. 1798.

GACON, Francis, ga'-koon, a French satirist, who attacked, in his writings, Bossuet, Rousseau, and Lamotte. He became a priest of the Oratory, and gained the prize of the academy for poetry in 1717. b. at Lyons, 1667; d. at his priory of Bailion, in 1725.

GADBNRY, John, gad'-bur-ee, an astrologer, who attracted much attention towards the end of the 17th century. He had originally been a tailor, was afterwards assistant to Lally, the fortune-teller, and, like his master, published almanacks and prognostications. He was apprehended on suspicion of being an accomplice of Titus Oates, but was afterwards liberated. He died on his way to Barbadoes; but the date is uncertain. b. 1627; d. 1692.

GAERTNER, Joseph, gaert'-ner, an eminent German naturalist, who, though destined for the church, applied himself to the study of medicine. He travelled through several parts of Europe, and in 1759 went to Leyden, where he attended the botanical lectures, and applied himself to vegetable anatomy. He subsequently visited England, and communicated some interesting papers to the "Philosophical Transactions," the principal of which is a "Memoir on the Fructification and Propagation of Conserve" &c. Here he gained the friendship of some of the most eminent men of the age, and was made F.R.S. In 1763 he went to St. Petersburg, and was there appointed professor of botany and natural history. After filling that position with great credit, and exploring the Ukraine, making botanical discoveries, he returned to his native land in 1770. In 1778 he went again to London, to make drawings and descriptions of fruits, to illustrate his "Carpology," the first volume of which he dedicated to Sir Joseph Banks. b. at Cah, Wurtemberg, 1732; d. in London, 1791. He left a number of valuable MSS.

GAGE, General Thomas, gaij, the commander-in-chief of the British troops in North America, and the last governor of Massachusetts for the English crown. Shut up in Boston after the battle of Lexington, Gage, whom Congress had declared a public enemy, caused martial law to be proclaimed. After the affair at Bunker's Hill, he was forced to embark for England, where he died in 1787.

GAGNIER, John, gai-ne-ai, a learned French orientalist, who, bred a Roman Catholic, embraced Protestantism, and settled in England. He was patronized by many eminent persons, and received the degree of M.A. at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1706 he published an edition of Ben Gorion's "History of the Jews," in Hebrew, with a Latin translation and notes. In 1723 he edited Abulfeda's "Life of Mohammed," in Arabic, with a Latin translation and notes, folio. He succeeded Dr. Wallis in the Arabic professorship at Oxford. b. at Paris, about 1670; d. 1740.

GAILLARD DE LONGUEAU, gail-lar, bishop of Apt, in Provence, employed his almoner, Moreri, to execute a Universal Historical Dictionary, the plan of such a work having been first conceived by him. d. 1695.

GAILLARD, John Ernest, a musical composer of some merit, who accompanied Prince George of Denmark to England, and became chapel master to the queen dowager Catharine, the relict of Charles II. at Somerset House. He studied English with considerable success, and composed a jubilate, three anthems, and a Te Deum, which were performed at the chapel-royal and at St. Paul's on thanksgivings for victories. He also wrote music, operas, and pantomimes for the theatre in Lincoln's-inn-fields, one of his latest works in this line being the music to the "Royal Chace, or Merlin's Cave," in which occurs the famous song, "With early horns." b. at Zell, 1657; d. 1743.

GAINAS, gai-i-na, a Goth, who became a general in the Roman army under Arcadius. He put Eutropius, the favourite of that emperor, to death, also the prefect Rufinus. Cansing himself to be named commander of the cavalry and Roman infantry, he governed the weak Arcadius. At length declared an enemy of the state, he took up arms, was defeated, and perished by the hands of the Huns, with whom he had sought an asylum, A.D. 400.

GAINSBOROUGH, Thomas, an eminent self-taught English landscape-painter, whose early studies were pursued in the woods and fields of Suffolk, rather than in the schools of art. There, from his earliest years, he began to copy a stile, a rock, a tree, or any object which struck his fancy; so that by the time he had attained the age of fourteen, he had ventured upon the art of colouring, and was sent to London. Here he commenced portrait-painting; a path in which he acquired such eminence as to enable him, in his nineteenth year, to marry a young lady who had a fortune of £200 per annum. About 1745 he went to Ipswich, thence to Bath in 1760; and, in 1774, to London again. He painted some of the portraits of the royal family, and was one of the thirty-six members chosen at the foundation of the Royal Academy. But however he may have excelled in portraits, it has long ago been decided that it is upon his landscapes that his fame rests. In these he is said to have united the brilliancy of Claude with the simplicity of Ruysdael. In both portrait and landscape he has been ranked with Rubens, Vandyck, and Claude; but, however this may be, the great originality of his genius is indisputable. "If ever this nation," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "should produce genius sufficient to acquire to us the honourable distinction of an English school, the name of Gainsborough will be transmitted to posterity as one of the very first of that rising name." b. at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727; d. 1788.—His eldest brother was also a good artist; and another, who was a dissenting minister at Henley, in Oxfordshire, was an ingenious mechanic.

GALBA, Servius Sulpicius, gail-ba, a Roman, who, by unremitting diligence, rose gradually to the highest offices of the state. He dedicated the greatest part of his time to solitary pursuits, chiefly to avoid the suspicions of Nero, who, however, because Galba expressed disapprobation of his conduct, ordered him to be put to death. He however escaped the executioner, and was publicly saluted emperor. His conduct now greatly displeased the people; and when, after being raised to the throne, he refused to pay the soldiers the money which he had promised them, they assassinated him, in 68. The popularity which had been lavished upon Galba when a private man, totally disappeared when he ascended the throne. This, however, it is not difficult to understand. The simplicity of his habits, the incorruptibility of his character, and the austerity of his life, had engendered frugal tastes which degenerated into avarice and parsimoniousness—characteristics little suited to luxurions voluptuaries such as the Romans in Galba's time had become.—There are many others of this name mentioned by ancient writers, but of inferior celebrity.

GALE, Thomas, gail, an English divine, who, in 1668, was chosen Greek professor at Cambridge, and in 1673 master of St. Paul's school. He was a member of the Royal Society, of which he became one of the honorary secretaries, and in 1697 was promoted to the deanery of York. He published a collection of the Greek mythologists, "Historia Poetica Antiqui Scriptores Græcæ et Latine," "Jamblichus de Mysteriis," "Herodoti Halicarnassensis Historiarum," an edition of Cicero, "Historia Anglicanae Scriptores," "Historia Britannica, Saxonica, Anglo-Danica," a volume of sermons, "Antonini Iter Britanniarum," &c. b. at Scruton, Yorkshire, 1636; d. at York, 1702.

GALE, Roger, the eldest son of the above, sat in Parliament for Northallerton, and became the first vice-president of the Society of Antiquaries, and treasurer to the Royal Society. b. 1672; d. 1744. He published some valuable books, the principal of which was an edition of his father's "Commentary on Antoninus."—Samuel, his brother, was also eminent for his knowledge of antiquities. b. 1682; d. 1754.

GALLEN, Bernard van, gal-len, a warlike bishop of Munster, who was originally in the service of the elector of Cologne, and then took orders and became prince-bishop of Munster. The pope having refused to confirm his elevation, Galen resolved to secure his power by keeping up a garrison of soldiers devoted to his interests. It was in vain that the citizens protested against this measure—the bishop adhered to his resolution, and hostilities were about to commence when the attention of the warlike churchman was directed to a war against the Turks, in which he held an important command. In 1665 he attacked Holland, and although pacified on that occasion by the interference of France, he again, in 1672, formed a league against the Dutch, in concert with France and England; and subsequently, in conjunction with Denmark, engaged in a war against Sweden. B. 1605; D. 1678.

GALENUS CLAUDIUS (Galen), ga-le'-nus, a celebrated Greek physician, who visited the most learned seminaries of Greece and Egypt, and at last went to Rome, where he rendered himself famous by his profession. Many, astonished at his cures, attributed them to magic. He was very intimate with Marcus Aurelius, the emperor, who entrusted him with the care of his son Commodus. B. at Pergamos about 180; D. about 200. It is said that he wrote 300 volumes, the greatest number of which were burnt in the Temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been deposited. Galen was second only in merit as a physician to Hippocrates; and to these two medical philosophers of the ancients the moderns are indebted for many useful discoveries.

GALERIUS, C. Valerius Maximianus, gä-le'-re-us, a Roman emperor, was a herdsman of Dacia, and entering the army as a private soldier, became, by his valour, a general. Diocletian gave him his daughter in marriage, and in 292 adopted him and Chlorus as his successors. In 296 he commanded in Mesopotamia, where he was, at first, defeated by Narses, king of Persia, but soon retrieved his reputation by a great victory. He instigated Diocletian to persecute the Christians, and on his abdication, in 305, Galerius rose to supreme power. At the close of his life he desisted from persecuting the Christians, and requested their prayers. D. 311.

GALGAEUS, gäl'-gä'-na, chief of the Caledonians, who resisted with uncommon valour the Romans under the command of Agricola. After several skirmishes, the two armies, in 84, came to a pitched battle, in which Galgæus was defeated with prodigious loss, dying on the field. Tacitus puts in his mouth a noble speech made to his troops previous to the battle.

GALIANI, Ferdinando, gal'-e-an'-ne, an Italian antiquary and writer, whose principal work, on money, "Della Moneta," was published in 1750. He was one of the first to discover the archaeological riches of Herculaneum. In 1759 he was appointed by the king of Naples secretary to the French embassy; and, during his residence at Paris, his company was universally courted. He wrote there "Dialogues on the Corn-trade," which, from the strength of their argument and pleasant style, excited considerable notice, though anonymous. In 1779 he returned to Naples, where he filled many high offices of state. Besides the above works, he wrote a "Commentary on Horace," a treatise on the "Natural Duties of Princes to Belligerent Powers," &c. B. at Chieti, Abruzzo, 1728; D. at Naples, 1787. It is said of Galiani, that he presented to Pope Benedict XIV. a collection of stones found about Vesuvius: and accompanied them with the inscription,—"Beatissime pater, fac ut lapides isti panes fiant." (Most blessed father, cause these stones to be turned into bread.) This piece of wit had the desired effect, and the holy father presented him with a valuable church preferment.

GALILEI, Galileo, ga-leel'-ai-e, commonly called gal'-i-le'-o, a distinguished Italian astronomer, who may be said to have been the founder of experimental science. He was intended for the medical profession; but, having a strong predilection for the exact sciences, at the age of 25 he became mathematical professor at Pisa, whence, in 1592, he removed to Padua. His first discovery was the equality of the periods of vibration of a pendulum held by a fixed point; and, subsequently, he invented an imperfect kind of thermometer, which seems to have answered his purposes. In 1609, having heard that Jansen had invented a glass by which objects at a distance were rendered as visible as if near, he directed his attention to the subject, and constructed the Galilean telescope, by which the science of astronomy has been brought to the utmost perfection. His first instrument was presented to the doge of Venice, who confirmed his professorship for life in the university of Padua, with the largest salary which had ever been there given to a mathematical professor. By this noble instrument he found that the Via Lactea is an assemblage of fixed stars; and, by assiduous application of his invention, made many other important discoveries in the heavens. His assertion, however, of the earth's motion gave such offence to the inquisitors, that, in 1615, he was cited to Rome, and required to deny what he had before asserted,—that the sun is the centre of our system, and that the earth is merely a planet having a diurnal revolution upon its own axis, and an annual revolution round the sun. In 1632 he published at Florence his "Dialogues on the Ptolemaic and Copernican Systems of the World," for which he was cited to Rome; his book ordered to be publicly burnt; the author sentenced to be imprisoned, to make a recantation of his errors, and, by way of penance, to recite the seven penitential psalms once a week. A portion of the abjuration of this great man we here transcribe, to show to what extent he was forced by inquisitorial power to deny the truth of the great principles which, through the comprehensive grasp of his own mind, had brought conviction to himself. "With a sincere heart and unfeigned faith, I abjure, curse, and detest the said errors and heresies [namely, that the earth moves round the sun, &c.]. I swear that, for the future, I will never say or assert anything, verbally or in writing, which may give rise to a similar suspicion against me." Rising from his knees after this solemn act, he is said to have whispered to a friend, "It moves, for all that." Galileo now obtained his liberty, and retired to his house near Florence, where he continued his observations till he became blind by intense application. B. at Pisa, 1564; D. near Florence, 1642. His principal works are, "The operations of the Compass," "On the Swimming of Bodies," "Mechanics," "Nuncius Sideræus," "On the Trepidation of the Moon," "Discourse of the Solar Spots," "Mathematical Discourses and Demonstrations," "Treatise on the Mundane System."—His son, Vincenzo Galilei, was the first who applied his father's discovery about the pendulum to clockwork. The father of Galilei wrote some esteemed works on music.

to dignities by merit. He was in great favour with the regent, Princess Sophia, sister of the czars Peter I. and Ivan, and, during her regency, possessed supreme power. The intrigues of the regent, however, against her brother Peter being discovered, she was confined in a monastery, and Galitzin exiled. b. 1633; d. 1713.

GALITZIN, Michael Michaelovich, of the same family as the above, served under Peter the Great, both by land and sea. In 1725 he was made field-marshal, and afterwards president of the College of War. b. 1674; d. 1730.

GALL, Francis Joseph, quail, a distinguished German physician, who founded the science of phrenology, by which the talents and tendencies of the mind are affirmed to be manifested by certain external developments evinced on the surface of the cranium. He settled in Vienna, and afterwards travelled through the north of Germany, Sweden, and Denmark, lecturing upon his system. In 1807 he established himself in Paris, as being the best centre for the dissemination of his opinions, and became physician to Prince Metternich. In 1810 that nobleman guaranteed the expense of publishing the phrenological work of Gall and Spurzheim, n. at Leifenbrunn, Wurtemberg, 1758; d. at Paris, 1828.

GALLAND, Anthony, gal'-la, a learned French writer, who was sent by the French minister Colbert to the East, and on his return to France was made a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and professor of Arabic in the Royal College of Paris. He wrote several dissertations on Greek and Roman medals, and other archaeological matters; but the work by which he is best known is the translation from the Arabic of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," n. in Pierard, 1616; d. at Paris, 1715.

GALLIENUS, Publius Lucinius, gal'-li-e'-nus, a son of the emperor Valerian, reigned conjointly with his father for seven years, and ascended the throne as sole emperor 260 A.D. In his youth, he evinced military genius in an expedition against the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the throne, resigned himself to pleasure and indolence. His time was spent in the greatest debauchery; and two of his officers at length revolted, and assumed the imperial purple. This roused him, and he marched against them, without showing the least favour either to rank, sex, or age, putting all to the sword. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; thirty of his generals, known as the Thirty Tyrants, assuming the purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations was assassinated at Milan by some of his officers, 268 A.D.

GALLUS, gal'-lus, a name common to many celebrated Romans, the most distinguished of whom are the following:—Caius, a friend of Scipio Africanus, was famous for his knowledge of astronomy, and his exact calculations of eclipses.—Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical as well as military talents. He was passionately fond of the slave Lyeoris, or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forsook him, which gave occasion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus was a favourite with Augustus, by whom he was appointed governor of Egypt; but he forgot the benefits he had received, pillaged the province, and even conspired against his benefactor, for which he was banished by the emperor. This disgrace operated so powerfully upon him, that he killed himself in despair, A.D. 26. Some few fragments remain of his poetry. He particularly excelled in elegiac composition.—Caius Vibius Trebonianus, who succeeded Metius Decius, slain by the Goths, 251. He became indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, 253.—Flavius Claudius Constantius, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantine, his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was condemned to be beheaded, 354.

GALT, John, gaul', a Scotchman, who began life as a tradesman in London, but commenced the study of the law, which he forsook for the literary profession. For some time he acted in the capacity of agent to a company for establishing emigrants in Canada, but quarrelled with the government, and was suspended by the Canada company. On his return to England, he devoted himself to literature, and supported himself by the labours of a most prolific pen. The bare enumeration of his works would occupy a considerable space; but the following criticism from the "Gentleman's Magazine" of 1839 will give an idea of his style, and the fields in which he worked:—"There is a thorough quaintness of phrase and dialogue in Mr. Galt's best works, which places him apart from all other Scotch novelists; much knowledge of life, variety of character, liveliness and humour, are displayed in his novels, and render them justly popular. The public will not soon forget his 'Ayrshire Legatees,' his 'Annals of the Parish,' or his 'Entail.' His biographies, and many of his later works manufactured for the booksellers, are of a very different character." n. in Ayrshire, Scotland, 1770; d. 1839.

GALVANI, Aloysio, gal'-raw'-ne, the discoverer of galvanism, was a celebrated Italian physiologist, and, in 1763, became lecturer on anatomy at Bologna, obtaining a considerable reputation. By experiments on frogs, he discovered that all animals are endued with a peculiar kind of electricity; and he followed up this discovery with so much perseverance and success, as to give his name to certain electrical properties, which have excited universal attention. His

The famous Volta followed Galvani in his researches, and discovered further wonders in this branch of science. Galvani, on the death of his wife, in 1790, fell into a state of melancholy, and d. 1798; b. at Bologna, 1737. Besides the above work, he wrote several memoirs upon professional subjects.

GAM, David, gim, a brave Welsh officer in the army of Henry V., whom he accompanied to France. Having returned from reconnoitring the enemy on the eve of the battle of Agincourt, he reported that there were enough of the enemy to be killed, enough to be taken prisoners, and enough to run away. He was knighted by Henry on the field, but was killed defending his sovereign when exposed to imminent danger, 1415.

GAMA, Vasco or Vasquez de, ga'-ma, an illustrious Portuguese navigator, to whom belongs the merit of having discovered the route to the East Indies by sea. In 1497 Emanuel, king of Portugal, sent him to endeavour to double the Cape of Good Hope, which he accomplished, and then sailed along the eastern coast of Africa, having proceeded as far as Calicut, where he arrived in May, 1498, and was received by the prince of that place with great pomp and ceremony. After an absence of two years, he returned to Lisbon, where he arrived in September, 1499. In 1502 he went out with twenty ships, and returned, the following year, with thirteen, which he had captured in the Indian seas. On this occasion he was created count of Vidigueyra. In 1524 he was appointed, by John III., viceroy of Portuguese India, after the death of Albuquerque, and he sailed and took possession of his government, but did not long survive his honours after his arrival at his destination. b. at Sines, Portugal; d. at Cochin, 1525. Camoens celebrated his adventures in the "Lusiad."

GAMBIER, James, Lord, gám'-beer, a British admiral, who went to sea at an early age, and, in 1788, was appointed to the command of the Raleigh, 32. In this frigate he was engaged against the French in 1791, and assisted in the reduction of Charleston, S. Carolina. He was present at Lord Howe's memorable victory on the 1st of June, 1794, commanding the Defence, 74; and after filling various posts, was intrusted, in July, 1807, with the command of the fleet despatched to Copenhagen. This city was bombarded for three days, when the enemy capitulated, and 19 sail of the line, 23 frigates and sloops, and 25 gunboats, were taken and conveyed to England. He was now created a baron, and, in 1808, had the command of the Channel fleet. In 1809, Lord Cochrane (afterwards the earl of Dundonald), who was under Lord Gambier's orders, attacked and destroyed, with his fire-ships, several French vessels in the Basque Roads by the Isle d'Aix, and Lord Cochrane was desirous of completing the destruction of the remainder of the enemy's fleet, but the commander-in-chief did not consider the attempt practicable. A court-martial sat on the conduct of the latter, but he was acquitted. In 1814 he negotiated a peace with the United States of America, at Ghent; and, on the accession of William IV., was advanced to the rank of admiral of the fleet. b. at the Bahama Isles, of which his father was lieutenant-governor, 1756; d. at Iwer, near Uxbridge, 1833. (See "Autobiography of Lord Dundonald," and "Life of Lord Gambier," by his daughter.)

GANS, Edward, gans, an eminent German jurist, who, besides being a voluminous writer on legal questions, especially the historical features of the Roman code, enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best lecturers in Germany. He was appointed extraordinary professor at the university of Berlin in 1825, and some years afterwards attained to the position of ordinary professor in the same university. He visited France and England after the revolution in the former country in 1830, and becoming imbued with liberal ideas, lectured to immense audiences on themes connected with modern history, which drew upon him the displeasure of the Prussian government, which subjected him to a good deal of annoyance, without, however, being able to silence him. He was the friend of Hegel, Thibaut, and other celebrated men of the time, and was regarded as one of the most learned, most witty, and most eloquent men of Germany. No one could match him in controversy; he confounded the most skilful of his opponents by his sarcasms, and was most ready to satirize those who held the highest positions; and hence, probably, the bitterness with which he was persecuted. He was of Jewish extraction, but embraced Christianity. His principal works are—"Scholia on Gaius's Roman Law;" "System of the Roman Civil Law;" "The Law of Succession, its Historical Development, and its importance for the History of the World." He also edited the works of Hegel. b. at Berlin, 1798; d. suddenly, from an attack of apoplexy, 1839.

GANDON, James, gan'-don, a distinguished English architect, who was a pupil of Sir William Chambers, and was the first to receive the architectural gold medal of the Royal Academy. He edited the "Vitruvius Britannicus," and afterwards went to Ireland, where he remained during the rest of his life. The Four Courts, the Royal Exchange, the Custom-house, the portico of the House of Lords, and other elegant structures in Dublin, were designed by him. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries and of the Irish Royal Academy. b. 1740; d. 1824.

GANDY, James, gan'-de, an English painter, the pupil of Vandeyck, whose style he so successfully imitated that his pictures are considered little inferior to those of his master. The great duke of Ormond took him to Ireland under his patronage, and Gandy there executed a variety of pieces which are in the Ormond collection. b. at Exeter, 1619; d. 1689.—His son, William Gandy, attained to considerable eminence as a portrait painter.

GARAMOND, Claude, gar'-a-mawng, a French engraver and letter-founder, was the first who superseded Gothic or black-letter printing, substituting in its place the Roman character. b. at Paris; d. 1561.

GARASSE, Francis, ga-rass', a French Jesuit of considerable talents, but very scurrilous in his writings against many of his contemporaries. In 1625 he published "A Summary of the Principal Truths of the Christian Religion," which was condemned by the Sorbonne. He was also the author of Latin poems, and some controversial works. d. of the plague, which he caught at Poitiers, while visiting the sick in the hospitals, 1631; b. at Angoulême, 1585.

GARCAM, Pedro Antonio Correa, gar'-kam, a Portuguese lyric poet, who is held in the highest estimation by his countrymen. He clothed his odes in the language of the 16th century, and many of them breathe the finest spirit of poetry. His epistles and satires are considered among the best in modern literature, and several plays which he wrote are conceived in excellent taste. He laboured to improve the taste of his countrymen; but an early death prevented the accomplishment of what an earnest ambition might have achieved. b. at Lisbon, 1724; d. 1772.

GARCILASSO, or GARCILASSO DE LA VEGA, gar'-the-las'-so, a poet, native of Peru, who accompanied the emperor Charles V. in his military expeditions, and died of a wound which he received in Provence in 1536. It is a strange circumstance, that this poet, whose verses told only of the delights of peace and the pleasures of repose, should have lived the life and died the death he did. His poems were translated into English by Wiffen. b. at Cuzco, Peru, 1603. His works were printed at Naples in 1604, 8vo.

GARDINER, Stephen, gar'-di-ner, a distinguished English prelate and statesman, the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, and brother to Elizabeth, queen of Edward IV. He was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, whence he went into the family of the duke of Norfolk, and afterwards into that of Cardinal Wolsey, who made him his secretary. In 1527, in company with Edward Fox, he went to Rome for the purpose of persuading the pope to consent to the divorce of Queen Catharine by Henry VIII. Though unsuccessful in his mission, he greatly assisted Henry in the prosecution of his design, and became secretary of state, and in 1531 bishop of Winchester. He wrote "De Verâ Obedientia," in defence of the king's supremacy, and drew up articles accusing Henry's last queen, Catharine Parr, of heresy; but the queen avoided the storm, and he fell into disgrace. At the accession of Edward VI. he opposed the Reformation, and was committed first to the Fleet, and afterwards to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner during the remainder of the reign: he was also deprived of his bishopric; but, on the accession of Mary, he was restored to his see, and, in 1553, appointed lord chancellor and prime minister. He had a deep knowledge of human nature; but his conduct towards the Protestants was cruel and sanguinary. b. at Bury St. Edmund's, 1493; d. 1555. He was a learned man, but of little principle, crafty, and ambitious. Lloyd, in his "State Worthies," says that he was to be traced like the fox, and like Hebrew, was to be read backwards.

GARDINER, James, a British military officer, equally distinguished for his piety and for his bravery, entered the Dutch service at the age of 14 as an ensign, after which he obtained rank in the English army, and was present at the battle of Ramillies, where he was wounded. In 1780, he had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and at the head of a regiment of dragoons, of which he was the commander, he was attached to the army of Sir John Cope which fought, and was defeated by, the Highlanders under the Chevalier, Prince Charles Edward Stuart, at Prestonpans, near Edinburgh, on the 21st of September, 1745. Colonel Gardiner endeavoured to stop the panic which seized the royal troops, and was killed. He is said in early life to have been somewhat licentious in his habits, and to have been converted to religious views by reading a Calvinistic treatise entitled "Heaven taken by Storm." It is also asserted that he had received a supernatural intimation of his approaching death. Three of his nearest relatives, including his father, like himself, fell in battle. Dr. Doddridge has written a Life of Colonel Gardiner. b. at Carriden, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 1683.

GARDNER, Alan, Lord, gard'-ner, a British admiral, son of a military officer resident in the north of England. Alan entered the navy as a midshipman at the age of 13, and after passing through the various subordinate grades, obtained post-captain's rank in 1766, when he hoisted his pennant on board the Preston of 50 guns, in which he served some time on the Jamaica station. He commanded the Maidstone frigate in the American war, and afterwards the Sultan, 74, in which last-named ship he served under Admiral Byron. He was then transferred to the Duke, 98, in which he was the first to break the enemy's line on the 12th of April, 1782, for his conduct on which occasion he was highly applauded by his chief, Admiral Rodney. Gardner hoisted his flag as rear-admiral on board the Queen in 1793, and, as commander on the Leeward Islands station, made an unsuccessful attempt on Martinique. His next important service was under Lord Howe, and on the memorable 1st of June, 1794, displayed signal bravery, and was shortly afterwards made a baronet and major-general of marines. A mutiny having broken out in the fleet at Portsmouth early in 1797, Gardner went there with the view of suppressing it, but losing his temper, and having recourse to severe measures, the mutineers became exasperated, and he had difficulty in escaping with his life. He was created an Irish peer in 1800, and in 1807 took the command of the Channel fleet as the successor of Earl St. Vincent. Gardner was a member of three successive parliaments: first for Plymouth, in 1790, and in 1796 and 1802 for Westminster, with Fox for his colleague. He was created a British peer by the title of baron Uttoxeter, and died at Bath in 1809; b. 1742.

GARIBALDI, Joseph, ga'-re-bal'-di, a modern Italian patriot and general, was brought up at Nice among sailors and fishermen, and, at an early age, in his father's coasting vessel, distinguished himself by his courage and coolness. Implicated, in 1834, in the Italian insurrectional movement, he was compelled to fly, and take refuge in Marseilles. After passing two years here, chiefly in the pursuit of mathematical studies, he embarked in an Egyptian corvette, to serve as a naval officer in the fleet of the Bey of Tunis. Disappointed in his expectations, however, he set out for Rio Janeiro, and fought, with great bravery and success, in the service of the government of Uruguay against Buenos Ayres. His influence over his troops was something wonderful; and for the bravery he and his Italian followers displayed at Salto, the government of Montevideo decreed that the Italian legion should take the right, the post of honour, even when with native troops, in every engagement. The war in Italy, in 1848, brought Garibaldi back to Nice. A portion of his legion accompanied him, and took a prominent part in the campaign against the Austrians in the Southern Tyrol. At Rome he was the soul of the resistance; and Marshal Vaillant, the French commander, in his report of the operations during the siege of that city, did justice to the energy and skill of his adversary. On May 9, at Palermo, he defeated the Neapolitan army, though vastly superior in numbers to his own. A few days later, at Velletri, where he was severely wounded, he again won the honours of the day. Finally he sustained, by his courage and resources, for a whole month, the attacks of the French army. In the last council of war held at Rome, Garibaldi proposed the employment of extreme measures, but they were not approved. He then left the sacred city with the remnant of his little army, traversed the enemy's lines, and withdrew to the neighbourhood of San Marino. There his troops disbanded; his wife, who was with him, died; and he himself escaped with difficulty to Genoa. After a few months he returned to America, where he engaged energetically in trade and industry, becoming a manufacturer of soap and candles in Staten Island, New York. In 1854 he returned to his native land, and for five years he now lived in retirement with his sons on the isle of Caprera, off the coast of Sardinia, where he farmed on a small scale. In the Italian war of 1859, he played a conspicuous part against the Austrians, and seemed to be ubiquitous, by the marvellous rapidity of his operations. After the peace, the preliminaries of which were signed at Villafranca, he had the command of the army of Central Italy, but subsequently retired from the field, and laid down his arms. He was, however, soon recalled from his retirement, having been elected a member of the Parliament at Turin. In May, 1860, Garibaldi landed at Marsala, in Sicily, at the head of 1000 volunteers, was speedily joined by a large number of the inhabitants of the island, and after defeating the Neapolitan troops at Calatafimi, took Palermo. He then passed over to the mainland, landing near Reggio, and in a few days entered Naples almost alone, his approach having been sufficient to induce Francis II. to quit the city. The king took refuge in Gaëta, Garibaldi was proclaimed dictator; the people soon voted themselves subjects of Victor Emmanuel, and the latter having been met by Garibaldi on his way to attack the fortress of the deposed monarch, was saluted by him as "King of Italy"—a title afterwards confirmed by the Italian Parliament, and acknowledged by the European Powers. After this, Garibaldi again retired to Caprera, whence he issued in 1862, and proceeding from Sicily, made an attempt to reach the frontier through Naples, in order to march upon Rome; but this was in opposition to the wish of the government, and Garibaldi was attacked at Aspromonte by a party of Italian troops, wounded, taken prisoner, his followers dispersed, and himself conveyed a prisoner to the fortress of Varignano, near Spezzia. This event produced a profound sensation throughout Europe; the warmest sympathy was expressed for the illustrious captive, and some of the most eminent surgeons in the world—English, French, German, Russian, and Italian—attended him. An amnesty was shortly after granted to Garibaldi and his followers, who were set at liberty. In 1864 he visited England, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. In 1866 he took part in the brief war between Italy and Austria, and, in 1867, engaged in an ill-advised and unsuccessful attempt to free Rome from the Papal government. b. at Nice, 1807.

GARNET, Henry, gar'-net, an English Jesuit, memorable for being concerned in the Gunpowder plot, was educated at Winchester school. He took the Jesuit's habit at Rome in 1575, and returned to England in 1586, as provincial of his order. He was executed for high treason in 1606. He confessed the crime for which he suffered, but was placed by the Jesuits among their martyrs.

GARRICK, David, gar'-rik, a celebrated English actor, descended from a French family of the name of Garric or Garique, who fled to England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His father, Peter Garrick, was a captain in the army, and generally resided at Lichfield. David received his education partly at the grammar-school at Lichfield, and partly under Dr. Johnson, with whom, in 1737, he went to London to seek his fortune. He was for some time under Mr. Colson, an eminent mathematician, and afterwards entered into partnership with an elder brother in the wine trade. This business he soon quitted for the stage. His first appearance was at Ipswich, in 1741, where, under the assumed name of Lyddal, he appeared as Aboan, in the tragedy of "Oroonoko." The applause he met with induced him to make his appearance in London, at the theatre in Goodman's Fields, where, in the character of Richard III., he appeared in 1741, and achieved a decided success. The other theatres were quickly deserted, and Goodman's Fields became the resort of the people of fashion, even from the west-end, till that theatre was shut up. He next formed an engagement with Fleetwood, the patentee of Drury-lane, and, in 1742, appeared for three nights as Bayes, Lear, and Richard III. In the summer of 1743 he played in Dublin, with Mrs. Woffington, to such full houses, that the heat of the weather and the crowds occasioned a fever, which was called the Garrick fever. In 1747 he became joint-patentee of Drury-lane Theatre, and, in 1749, married Mademoiselle Violetti, an Italian stage-dancer. In 1763 he and Mrs. Garrick made a visit to Italy, and at Paris he saw the celebrated Mademoiselle Clairon, whose future eminence he predicted. He returned to England in 1765, and, in 1768, brought out the "Clandestine Marriage," a comedy written by him in conjunction with the elder Colman. In 1769 he celebrated a fête in honour of Shakspeare, called "The Jubilee," at Stratford-upon-Avon, and afterwards made an entertainment of it at Drury-lane, under the same title, where it had a prodigious run. In 1776 he sold his interest in the theatre for £35,000. The last character he performed was Don Felix in the "Wonder," which he acted in 1776 for the benefit of decayed actors. b. at Hereford, 1716; d. in London, January 20, 1779, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a handsome monument was erected to his memory by private friendship. Mr. Garrick was hospitable and generous, but vain and fond of flattery. He wrote several dramatic pieces, prologues, epilogues, songs, and epigrams. In the last he excelled. It is, however, upon his skill in histrionic representation that his fame rests. In this he has never been equalled. "That young man," said Pope, after seeing his Richard III., "never had his equal as an actor, and will never have a rival." In tragedy and comedy he was alike at home, and Dramatic Art and Literature," "forms an epoch in the history of the English theatre, as he chiefly dedicated his talents to the great characters of Shakspeare, and built his own fame on the growing admiration for the poet. Before his time, Shakspeare had only been brought on the stage in mutilated and disfigured alterations. Garrick returned, on the whole, to the true originals, though he still allowed himself to make some very unfortunate changes. . . . Whether he always conceived the parts of Shakspeare in the sense of the poet, I, from the very circumstances stated in the eulogies on his acting, should be inclined to doubt. He excited, however, a noble emulation to represent worthily the great national poet. This has ever since been the highest aim of actors, and even at present the stage can boast of men whose histrionic talents are deservedly famous." Mrs. Garrick survived her husband forty-three years, and died at her house in the Adelphi, 1822, in the 98th year of her age.

GARTH, Sir Samuel, garth, an English poet and physician, who greatly contributed to the establishment of dispensaries; but was opposed by the apothecaries, whom he severely lashed in his poem of the "Dispensary," for their venal spirit. In 1697 he spoke the Harveian oration before the college. On the accession of George I. he was knighted, and appointed king's physician in ordinary, and physician-general to the army. b. in Yorkshire, 1671; d. 1719. His poems do not possess any extraordinary merit.

GASCOIGNE, Sir William, gäs'-koin, an eminent English judge, who rose to be chief justice of the King's Bench in the reign of Henry IV. He was a man of integrity and independence, refusing to pass sentence on Archbishop Scroope, as a traitor, and sentencing the prince of Wales, afterwards Henry V., to be imprisoned for indecorous conduct before him on the bench. b. at Gawthorpe, Yorkshire, 1350; d. 1413.

GASCOIGNE, George, an old English poet, who served under the prince of Orange in the wars of the Low Countries. He wrote masques of the progresses of Queen Elizabeth, and some of his poems are not without merit. d. at Stamford, 1577.

GASKELL, Mary Elizabeth, gäs'-kel, the wife of the Rev. William Gaskell, a Unitarian minister, resident at Manchester, at once made herself popular by her first novel, entitled "Mary Barton," which appeared in 1848. This fiction forcibly depicted the struggles of the working cotton-spinner with the evils of poverty, and contrasted the splendid condition of the mill-owner with that of the worker. It also illustrated the evil of strikes, and presented such a vivid image of real life in one particular phase of society, that the authoress was at once raised into fame. After this Mrs. Gaskell became a contributor to "Household Words" and other periodicals, and in 1850 published her Christmas story of "The Moorland Cottage." In 1853 appeared "Ruth," her second novel, and in 1855, "North and South," an almost verbatim reprint from "Household Words." She also published other collections of her writings, all of which have enjoyed great popularity, and given her a prominent place among the writers of fiction of the 19th century. She likewise wrote a memoir of her friend Miss Brontë (Currer Bell), the author of "Jane Eyre," and contributed to the columns of the "Daily News." Her maiden name was Stromkin. b. about 1822; d. 1865.

GASSICOURT, Charles Louis, Cadet de, gäs'-se-koo', a French writer on chemistry, natural history, and other subjects, was educated for the bar, and in early life wrote several political treatises, one of which was on the "Theory of Elections," and another on "The Private Life of Mirabeau." He subsequently occupied himself principally in the study of chemistry and physics, and in 1803, published a "New Dictionary of Chemistry," which became a text-book in the Polytechnic school. He accompanied the French army into Austria in 1809, and wrote an account of the campaign; and also some "Letters on the English Nation," and a treatise on the application of physical sciences to military purposes. He was reporting secretary to the Board of Health, of which he was the principal organizer, and likewise assisted in instituting the Lyceum, afterwards the Athénæum, at Paris. b. 1769; d. 1823.

GASSENDI, Peter, gäs-sen'-de, a celebrated French philosopher and mathematician, who, at a very early age, discovered an acute and inquisitive mind, and made such progress in learning, as to be appointed teacher of rhetoric at Digne before he was 18. Two years afterwards, he became professor of divinity and philosophy at Aix, when he ventured to oppose the system of Aristotle, and his lectures were published under the title of "Exercitationes Paradoxicæ adversus Aristotelem." This work procured him the friendship of the celebrated Peirese, president of the university of Aix, by whose interest he was preferred to a canonry in the cathedral of Digne. In 1628 he visited Holland, with the avowed object of cultivating the friendship of the philosophers of that country; and, on his return, applied himself ardently to astronomical studies. In 1631 he was the first to observe a transit of the planet Mercury over the disc of the sun, which had previously been calculated by Kepler. In 1645 he was appointed royal professor of mathematics at Paris, where he applied so intensely to his studies and to astronomical observations, that an illness was the consequence, and he was forced to retire to Digne for the restoration of his health. In 1647 he published his principal work, entitled "De Vitâ et Moribus Epicuri." This was, in 1649, followed by his "Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuræ," which was an attempt to reconstruct the Epicurean system of philosophy out of the remains left by its masters. In 1653 he went back to Paris; but his labours brought a return of his disease, of which he died, in 1655. b. at Chautersier, near Digne, 1592. Gassendi is deservedly ranked among the first mathematicians of his age. He opposed the philosophy of Descartes with success, and obtained a number of followers, who were called after his name. His other works are, the Lives of Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, Purbachius, and Regiomontanus; a "Commentary on Diogenes Laertius;" and astronomical and philosophical pieces, the whole collected into 6 vols. folio, 1658.

GASTRELL, Francis, gäs'-trei, an English prelate and able polemical writer, was a native of Northamptonshire, and was educated at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford. He was Boyle lecturer, and preacher at Lincoln's Inn; took his degree of D.D. in 1700; was chaplain to Harley, speaker of the House of Commons, and became canon of Christ Church in 1702. He was chaplain to the queen in 1711, and was raised to the episcopal bench, in 1714, as bishop of Chester. His Boyle's lectures he published, in 1699, as one discourse, as a defence of Christianity against the Deists; and was also the author of a useful religious manual called the "Christian Institutes," and of a work entitled "Conversations concerning the Trinity," and several others. b. 1662; d. 1725.

GATES, Horatio, an American general, who received his military tuition in England, and served in the West Indies, and also in Ohio, under General Braddock. Being wounded, he retired for some time from the army, and settled on an estate which he purchased in Virginia. When the war of American independence commenced, he espoused the cause of the revolutionists, and received the appointment of adjutant-general in the army. In 1776 he was appointed to the command of the army operating on Lake Champlain; but, in the following year, he was superseded, although, in a few months afterwards, he was again appointed to oppose General Burgoyne, whom he defeated, and, at Saratoga, forced to capitulate with his whole army. This success surrounded Gate with a halo of popularity, and attempts were made to place him above Washington. These, however, were frustrated, and, in 1780, he was appointed to the command of the southern army. He met Cornwallis at Camden, in South Carolina, and suffered a complete defeat. For this he was superseded, and his conduct subjected to a court of inquiry; he was, however, honourably acquitted. After this he retired to his estate in Virginia, where he resided till 1800, when he removed to New York, where the freedom of the city was conferred on him. He now became a member of the legislature; but, before he quitted Virginia, he emancipated his slaves, and conferred upon the necessitous and infirm a provision for life. This was a noble act, and redounds more to his glory than the capturing of Burgoyne at Saratoga. b. in England, 1728; d. 1806.

GATTAKER, Thomas, gat'-tak-er, a learned divine, received his education at St. John's College, Cambridge, was preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1611 was appointed to the rectory of Rotherhithe. He published in 1619 a singular treatise on the "Nature and Use of Lots," which excited a great deal of controversy, and which he had to defend by another work, published in 1623. He was offered the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, but his infirm health made it impossible for him to accept the post. He travelled in the Low Countries, and zealously defended the reformed doctrines against the Catholics, especially in his treatise entitled "Transubstantiation declared by the Confession of Popish Writers to have no Foundation in God's Word." He wrote a great many works on Biblical subjects; and though a popular and eloquent preacher, was forced to abandon the pulpit from a spitting of blood to which he was liable. He was one of the famous assembly of divines at Westminster; but disapproved of the introduction of the Covenant, and declared for episcopacy. He likewise strenuously opposed the execution of Charles I. b. in London, 1574; d. at Rotherhithe, 1654. His son, Charles Gattaker, was also an eminent divine, held the rectory of Hoggeston, Bucks, and wrote a variety of polemical works especially directed against the Papists, the titles of most of which are distinguished by the prolix and quaint phraseology so much in vogue at the time. b. 1614; d. 1680.

GAUBIL, Antoine, go'-beel, a learned French missionary, who, in 1723, was sent to China, and there acquired the Chinese and Manthoo languages, becoming interpreter at the court of Peking. He held this position thirty years, and gained the respect and esteem of the emperor. b. at Gaillac, near Alby, 1689; d. at Peking, 1759. No European, perhaps, was better acquainted with Chinese literature than Gaubil. He wrote an "Historical and Critical Treatise on Chinese Astronomy," and a "History of Genghis Khan." He also translated the "Chou King," which comprises the historical traditions of China and its sovereigns, and produced other works.

GAUBIUS, Jerome David, gou'-be-os, a celebrated German physician, who contracted an intimate friendship with Boerhaave, and succeeded him as lecturer on botany and chemistry at Leyden, in 1731, and in 1734 obtained the medical professorship. His principal works are a treatise on the "Method of Prescribing, or of Writing Recipes;" "Principles of Nosology;" and "Institutiones Pathologiae Medicinalis;" b. at Heidelberg, 1705; d. at Leyden, 1780.

GAUDEN, John, gaw'-den, an English bishop, who, being appointed chaplain to Robert, earl of Warwick, preached before the House of Commons in 1640, and gave so much satisfaction to the members, that they presented him with a silver tankard, and added to it, in the following year, the rich living of Bocking, in Essex. In 1643 he was nominated one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, but did not sit among them. He wrote against the Covenant, but complied with it to keep his preferment. In 1619 he published a pamphlet against bringing the king to trial. He had also committed to his care the collating and publishing of the king's meditations, to which he gave the name of "Εὐκων Βασιλική, or the Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings." This book had a wonderful effect upon the public mind; but it has been doubted, and still whether it was the production of Gauden or of the monarch himself. Macanlay, however, says:—"In that year (1692) an honest old clergyman, named Walker, who had, in the time of the Commonwealth, been Gauden's curate, wrote a book which convinced all sensible and dispassionate readers that Gauden, and not Charles I., was the author of the 'Icon Basilike.'" In 1639 he became preacher at the Temple; and when Charles II. was restored, he was preferred to the see of Exeter, and in 1662, to that of Worcester, where he passed the remainder of his days. b. at Mayland, Essex, 1605; d. at Worcester, 1662. Besides the above, Gauden wrote several other works on the literature of the Church of England, and sermons.

GAULTIER, Aloisius Edouard Camille, gole'-te-ai, a French abbé and educational writer, who was ordained a priest at Rome, and went, in 1780, to Paris, where he occupied himself entirely with the instruction of the young. In order to diminish, to those of tender age, the difficulty of learning scientific subjects, he reduced the elementary studies to a kind of game, and afterwards adopted the plan of mutual instruction, the same as that used by Lancaster and Bell. During the Revolution he took refuge in England, and his system was very successful there. He returned to France in 1803, where he continued the application of his principles. b. in Italy, of French parents, 746; d. at Paris, 1818. He is the author of a complete course of elementary education; amongst which are, "Geographical Lessons by Means of a Game," "A Reasonable and Moral Game for Children," "A Complete Course of Instructive Games for Children."

GAUTIER, Théophile, go'-te-ai, a modern French poet and littérateur, who in 1830 produced his first volume of verses. He afterwards became connected with some of the foremost publications in Paris—"Figaro," "Revue de Paris," "Presse," "Revue des deux Mondes," and the "Musée des Familles." Many poems also have been written by him, and he was also engaged on the "History of the Painters." He subsequently became the editor of the literary feuilleton of the "Moniteur." b. at Tarbes, 808.

GAVARNI, ga-var'-ne, the name by which one of the most popular of French caricatu-rists known. His real name was Paul Chevalier, and he began life as a mechanical draughtsman, but in 1835 discovered his genius for burlesque, in hitting off the peculiarities of manners and persons. He at once rose into fame, and taking the passing and ever-varying modes of Parisian life for his subjects, produced an endless variety of caricatures, unequalled for the originality and tone they display. He visited England for the purpose of sketching the lower classes in London, and depicting the strange and unsightly scenes in which they too often form the most prominent part of the picture; but he altogether failed in his object. Besides illustrating the universally-known pages of "Charivari," and other periodicals, he lent the aid of his pencil to the works of popular authors. The most successful of these were the designs for the "Wandering Jew" of Eugène Sue, and the "Diable à Paris" of Balzac. A selection from his "Sketches of Parisian Life" was made and published in Paris in 1846. They are comprised in 4 vols. 8vo, to which notes were appended by Théophile Gautier and others. n. at Paris, 1801; p. 1806.

GAVESTON, Piers, gav'-ston, a favourite of Edward II., whose pride and prodigality raised the ire of the English nobility. The king was forced to send him into exile, but recalled him. He was the son of a gentleman of Gascony, and the fact of his being a foreigner embittered the hatred raised by his own misconduct. Beheaded in 1312.

GAY, John, gai, an English poet, who received his education under a Mr. Luck, a man of wit and a poet, in the town of Barnstaple. He was afterwards apprenticed to a silk-mercer in London, but disliking the occupation in a few years, he bought the remainder of his time. His first poem, entitled "Rural Sports," appeared in 1711, was dedicated to Mr. Pope, and gained him the friendship of that poet, which lasted till death. In the following year he was appointed secretary to the duchess of Monmouth, and, two years later, produced "The Fair," a poem. About the same time he printed his mock heroic, entitled "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London," in the composition of which he was assisted by Swift. In 1714 appeared his "Shepherd's Week," a series of pastorals, intended to ridicule Philips, but which possess more merit as a genuine picture of rustic life than as a satire. The same year he became secretary to the earl of Clarendon, and accompanied that nobleman on his embassy to Hanover. On the death of Queen Anne, he returned to England, but his expectations of preferment from the new court were doomed to disappointment. In 1720 he published his poems by subscription, which produced him £1000; but embarking in the famous South-Sea bubble, he lost the whole, and was reduced to such a state of despondency as to prove nearly fatal to his health. He next produced the tragedy of the "Captive," which met with a favourable reception, and occasioned to it, under the title of "Polly," it was prohibited by the lord-chamberlain. Of the bad effect of the "Beggars Opera" upon the public morals of the period, there can be no doubt. Indeed, the following fact is one of the strongest attestations of the truth of this that could be given. "In the year 1773 Sir John Fielding told the bench of justices that he had written to Mr. Garrick concerning the impropriety of performing the 'Beggars Opera,' which never was represented without creating an additional number of thieves; and they particularly requested that he would desist from performing that opera on Saturday evening. Such also were the fears of the church as to the effect of this play, that Dr. Herring, then archbishop of Canterbury, preached a sermon against it." Whilst these fears were at work, however, Dean Swift was writing in favour of it in the "Intelligencer." Although the "Polly" was prohibited, Gay was no loser by it; on the contrary, by its publication he put into his pocket about £1200, and was adopted as a member of the family of the duke and duchess of Queensberry. n. at Barnstaple, Devonshire, 1688; p. Dec. 11, 1732, and was interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory by his patrons, with an epitaph written by Pope. Besides the works already mentioned, Gay wrote some lesser dramatic pieces, ballads, and poems, making 2 vols. 12mo. Hazlitt thus sums up the merits of Gay, as displayed in his principal productions:—"His fables are certainly a work of great merit, both as to the quantity of invention employed, and as to the elegance and facility of the execution. They are, however, spun out too long. The description and narrative are too diffusive and desultory, and the moral is sometimes without point. They are more like tales than fables. His pastorals are pleasing and poetical, but his capital work is his 'Beggars Opera.'" Dr. Johnson says, "he had not in any degree the mens divinus, the divinity of genius." Gay, however, was the originator of a new species of composition; for we owe to him the ballad opera.

GAYANGOS, Pasquale de, ga-yan'-gos, a distinguished modern Spaniard, who early began to devote himself to the study of Oriental literature, and with a view to realize a complete acquaintance with the mediæval history of his country, applied himself ardently to the Arabic. During a visit to Algiers, he married an English lady, a circumstance which doubtless led him to make himself well acquainted with the English language, in which the most important of his works were composed. In 1834 he became a contributor to the "Westminster Review," and subsequently to the Edinburgh and other reviews. He also lent his aid to the "Penny Cyclopædia," and wrote some of the articles for the Biographical Dictionary of the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge Society. For several years he resided in England, and there published his "History of the Mohammedan Dynasties in Spain," &c., which was a translation of a native work from copies in the British Museum. On his leaving England, he proceeded to Spain, where he became professor of Arabic at the Athenæum of Madrid. p. 1809.

GAY-LUSSAC, Nicholas François, gai-loos'-sak, a celebrated French philosopher, who, in conjunction with M. Diot, ascended in a balloon, lent by the government of France for the pur-which had a success considered by many infinitely beyond what it deserved both in a dramatic and moral point of view. It ran for sixty-three nights, and threw the author and his friends into ecstasies. Though it was a favourite with the town, however, it was not so at court; and when he produced his sequel pose, to the height of 13,000 feet above the Seine, and ascertained that the influence of terrestrial magnetism there is nearly as great as it is on the earth; that the electricity of the atmosphere increased as they rose, and was always negative; that the hygrometer discovered increased dryness, and that the thermometer sank from 64° Fahrenheit on the earth, to 51°. He made another ascent alone, and attained an elevation of 4½ miles, where he had great difficulty in breathing, and the thermometer fell to 20° Fahrenheit. After sailing six hours through the atmosphere, he descended at a village twenty miles from Rouen. The result of this aerial flight was the discovery that air obtained at the highest point, was composed of the same elements as that found on the surface of the earth. These experiments brought Gay-Lussac greatly into notice, and he rose both in fame and position. In 1804 he became a member of the society of Arcueil, and was introduced to Humboldt, with whom he prosecuted an investigation of the polarization of light and other subjects. He also devoted much of his time to the study of chemistry, and to him we are indebted for the discovery of the hydro-sulphuric and oxychloride acids. In 1830 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and, in 1839, was created a peer of France. He enjoyed several official appointments, and was professor of chemistry at the Jardin du Roi. b. at St. Leonard, Haute Vienne, 1778; d. at Paris, 1850.

GAYTON, Edmund, gai'-ton, a humorous writer, was a native of London, and educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. He wrote a variety of works, among which were "Pleasant Notes on Don Quixote," which have often been reprinted, and possess considerable humour; "The Art of Longevity, or a Dietetical Institution," "Wit Revised, or New Excellent Way of Divertissement," arranged in questions and answers, and originally published under the name of Asdrasdust Tosoffacan. b. 1000; d. at Oxford, 1668.

GAZA, Theodore, ga'-za, a Greek grammarian, who, when his native place was taken by the Turks, in 1430, escaped to Italy, where he studied the Latin language with so much assiduity, that he became an elegant writer and speaker of it. He was, for several years, a professor at Ferrara, and became rector of that university. Thence he went to Rome, under the patronage of Pope Nicholas V. and Cardinal Bessarion. b. at Thessalonica, about 1405; d. at Rome, 1478. He wrote a Greek grammar, a treatise on the Grecian months; translated Aristotle on Animals, Hippocrates' Aphorisms, and other works into Latin; and some of Cicero's into Greek.

GEBER, ge'-ber, an Arabian, or according to other writers a Greek, physician and astronomer, who wrote a commentary on the "Syntaxis Megale" of Ptolemy, and other works which were chiefly on alchemy. Dr. Johnson supposes that the word "gibberish" is derived from the cant of Geber and his followers. Lived about the 8th century.

GED, William, ged, a goldsmith of Edinburgh, who, in 1725, endeavoured to introduce a method of printing with blocks and plates, containing letters for a whole page or sheet, now known as stereotype plates. He entered into an engagement with the university of Cambridge, to print

Bibles and Prayer-books by this means; but the project failed. On his return to Scotland, however, he printed an edition of Salust with his plates. The plan was subsequently successfully adopted by M. Didot of Paris, and is now in universal use amongst printers in England. b. 1749.

GEDES, Alexander, ged'-dez, a Roman Catholic divine, who was educated at an obscure school in the Highlands of Scotland, and, in 1753, removed to the Scottish college at Paris. In 1764 he returned to his native country, and officiated to a congregation in the county of Angus, but, the year following, became chaplain in the family of the earl of Traquair. In 1769 he undertook the charge of a congregation at Auchinhalrig, in Banffshire; and, after various changes, went to London, where, in 1786, he published proposals for a new Translation of the Bible. In 1790 he gave a general answer to the queries, counsels, and criticisms communicated to him since the publication of his proposals. In this undertaking he was liberally supported by Lord Petre. The first volume of this work appeared in 1792, comprising the Pentateuch and the book of Joshua; but the translator had taken such unwarrantable liberties with the text, and treated many important subjects with so much indecency, that he was suspended from his ecclesiastical functions. To these he replied in pamphlets written with coarseness and illiberality. In 1797 appeared the second volume of his version. In 1800 he published which is now forgotten. b. in Ruthven, Banffshire, 1737; d. 1802.

GEERS, William, geef's, a distinguished modern Belgian sculptor, who studied at Paris, and in 1830 exhibited his first work, entitled "A Young Herdsman of the Early Christian Times strewing Flowers upon a Tomb." The performance gave high promise, and he did not disappoint the expectations which had been formed of his genius. He obtained commissions from the Belgian government for several monuments to those who fell in the struggle for Belgian independence, and, by his admirable execution of the works intrusted to him, added to his fame. These are his greatest performances; but he also employed his chisel in imaginative paths, and executed a "Group of Sleeping Children," purchased by Queen Victoria; the "Infant St. John;" "Melancholy;" "The Lion in Love," which was greatly admired in the Great Exhibition of 1851; "Paul and Virginia," and several other works. b. at Antwerp, 1805.

GEFFRARD, Fabre, gef'-far', a negro, son of Nicholas Geffrard, one of the founders of the independence of Hayti. He joined the rebellion against Boyer in 1843, and two years later was made general of division. During the whole of his career he showed great military talent. This drew on him the enmity of Faustin Solouque, emperor of Hayti, 1852-1859, and Geffrard, fearing arrest, conspired against him, drove him from the throne, and was made president in 1859. b. 1806.

GEJER, Erik Gustaf, gi'-jer, a Swedish historian, who for many years was the principal ornament of the university of Upsal. In 1810 he visited England with strong prejudices against the people of that country; but, in a letter printed in 1855, he says:—"I came to England with strong prejudices against the people but there is no honest man in the world than the selfish, industrious Englishman, from the merchant to the day-labourer." He edited several periodicals, in one of which, the "Iduna," appeared his poems of "The Viking" and "The Last Champion," which still hold their place among the best selections of Swedish poetry. In 1817 he became professor of history at the university of Upsal, which situation he held till 1846, when he resigned it. b. in the province of Wermeland, 1783; d. at Stockholm, 1847. The most important work of Geijer is his "Svenska Folkets Historia," which has been translated into English by Mr. J. H. Turner, and published in London.

GELASIUS I., Pope, je-lui-se-us, succeeded Felix III. in 492. He had an acrimonious contest with the patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned the practice of communicating only with bread, as was the custom of the Manichaean sect, and made it imperative on the laity to use both bread and wine in the Lord's Supper. d. 496.

GELASIUS II. succeeded Pascal II. as pope in 1118. Cencio, marquis di Frangipani, consul of Rome, aided by the emperor Henry V., drove him from Rome, and Maurice Bourdin, as Gregory VIII., was elected in his stead. Gelasius, after an unsuccessful attempt to regain the pontificate, retired to France. d. at the abbey of Cluny, 1119.

GELL, Sir William, jel, a learned classical antiquary, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he afterwards became a fellow. He was knighted in 1803, on his return from a mission to the Ionian Islands; in 1820 he was appointed chamberlain to Queen Caroline, and shortly afterwards went to Italy, where he remained during the rest of his life, residing partly at Rome and partly at Naples. He was the author of "Topography of Troy and its Vicinity," illustrated and explained by drawings; "The Geography and Antiquities of Ithaca;" "Itinerary of Greece;" "Itinerary of the Morea;" "Pompeiana, or Observations upon the Topography, Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii;" "The Topography of Rome," &c. b. 1777; d. 1836.

GELLERT, Christian Furehtegott, gel'-lert, a German divine and poet, who supported himself for many years as tutor in private families, but afterwards became professor of philosophy at Leipsic. He is best known by his fables and tales, which are very pleasing. His works have been collected in 10 vols. 8vo. b. at Haynichen, Saxony, 1715; d. 1769.

GELLIBRAND, Henry, jel'-le-brand, an eminent mathematician, was born in London, educated at Trinity College, Oxford; took orders, but devoting himself to mathematical studies, was, in 1627, elected professor of astronomy at Gresham college. In 1631 he was brought before the court of High Commission for publishing an almanac in which he had substituted the names of Protestant martyrs for those of the saints; but the information was dismissed, similar almanacs having been printed before. He was the author of some valuable works on longitude, on the variations of the magnetic needle, on navigation, and on trigonometry. b. 1597; d. 1636.

GELLIUS, Aulus, jel'-le-us, a Roman grammarian, who published a work which he called

Genghis Khan

"Noctes Atticæ," because written at Athens during the winter nights. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. Lived in the 2nd century, a.p.

GEO, or GELOX, je'-lo, the most celebrated of this name was a son of Dimonenes, who made himself absolute at Syracuse, 485 years before the Christian era. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and became very popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse. His brother Hiero succeeded him.

GEMELLI CARRERI, Francesco, jai-mail'-lekar-rair'-e, an Italian traveller, who, from 1680 to 1698, made long and difficult voyages to all parts of the world. He visited Europe, Asia, and Africa, advancing as far as the great wall of China, and travelled through Mexico. In 1699 he published an account of his travels, under the title of "Giro del Mondo," (a Tour of the World) b. at Naples, 1691; d. 1725.

GEMINIANI, Francesco, jem'-in-e-a'-ne, a distinguished musical composer and finished performer on the violin, was the pupil of Scarlatti and Corelli, and went to London in 1714, where he received the patronage of George I., before whom he performed several of his own compositions, with Handel accompanying him on the harpsichord. He composed a great variety of musical pieces, all of them distinguished for their excellence and for the skill required in their execution. He had a great passion for buying pictures, but, being poor, he had often to part with his purchases at a loss—which of course still further increased his difficulties. He was an author as well as a composer, and published, among other works, "A Sure Guide to Harmony and Modulation," "A Treatise on Good Taste," "Rules for Playing in Good Taste," "The Art of Playing on the Violin," &c. b. at Lucca, about 1690; d. at Dublin, 1762.

GEMINUS, jem'-i-nus, an astronomer and mathematician of Rhodes, who flourished about 70 b.c.

GEMISTHUS, George, je-mis'-thus, surnamed Pletho, a learned Greek philosopher, who ably defended the followers of Plato against those of Aristotle, and the Greek Church against the Latin. He wrote various controversial and theological works, and d. 1491. b. 1390.

GEMMA, Reinier, commonly called FALSUS, gem'-ma, a Dutch physician and mathematician, who became medical professor at Louvain. He wrote a number of works on mathematics, geometry, and medicine. b. at Dockum, Friesland, 1508; d. at Louvain, 1555.—His son Cornelius also wrote on the same subjects.

GENGHIS KHAN, jen'-gis kun, the son of a petty Mongolian prince, who, after some years of desultory warfare with various Tartar tribes, in 1210 invaded the Chinese empire, and took its capital by storm. In 1218 he led his army into Turkestan, and succeeded in capturing the cities of Samarcand and Bokhara, which he pillaged and burned, and destroyed upwards of 200,000 individuals. Continuing his career of savage devastation for several years, in 1225 he went against the sovereign of Tangut, to whom he gave battle on a plain of ice, formed by a frozen lake, defeated him, and slew 300,000 of his men. Conquering wherever he went, Genghis extended his territory until it not only comprised within its boundaries Northern China, but Eastern Persia, and the whole of Tartary. In achieving the conquest of these "barren acres," it is computed that this warrior destroyed upwards of 5,000,000 of the human race. B. in Tartary, 1163; p. 1237.

GENLIS, Félicité Stéphanie, Countess de, chen'-le, celebrated for her literary talents, became, at four years of age, a canoness in the noble chapter of Aix. From this time she was called la Comtesse de Laney. At the age of seventeen, a letter which she had written accidentally came into the hands of Count de Genlis, who was so charmed with the beauty of its composition, that he made her an offer of his hand and fortune, which she accepted. Through this union she became niece to Madame de Montesson, who was privately married to the duke of Orleans, whoseson, the duke of Chartres, in 1782, chose Madame de Genlis to superintend the education of his children. About this period she produced "Adela and Theodore," "The Evenings of the Castle," "Annals of Virtue," and "The Theatre of Education," all of which were well received. In 1791 she paid a visit to England with her pupil, Mademoiselle d'Orléans, but on their return to France, they were ordered immediately to quit the territory. After a short time they went to Switzerland; but, driven from thence, they at length found an asylum in the convent of St. Clair. In 1800 Madame de Genlis returned to her own country, and, in 1805, Napoleon I. gave her apartments in the arsenal at Paris, with a pension. On the fall of the empire and the return of the Bourbons, her affection for her former friends returned; and when Louis Philippe ascended the throne, every attention was paid to her wants and comforts. She employed herself almost continually in writing, and her works are very numerous, embracing nearly every style of literature. B. near Autun, 1743; p. 1830.

GENNARO, Joseph Aurelius, jen-na'-ro, an eminent Neapolitan lawyer, who, after practising at the bar, became the chief magistrate of his native city. He wrote on legal subjects, and his works are remarkable for their purity of style and depth of erudition. His principal production is "Respublica Jurisconsultorum," which ingeniously teaches, in the form of a novel, the dry and intricate system of civil law. B. at Naples, 1701; p. 1703. Gennaro was one of the commission appointed by the minister Tanucci to prepare a uniform code, called the "Carolin Code," for the whole kingdom.

GENOVESI, Antonio, jen'-o-vai-se, an Italian philosopher, who for some time read lectures in philosophy at Naples, with great reputation. He was attacked, however, by numerous enemies for publishing his "Metaphysics," in which he expressed his admiration of the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. Galliani, archbishop of Tarento, protected him; and Bartolomeo Intieri, a wealthy Italian, established for him a professorship of political philosophy. B. at Castiglione, 1713; p. 1769.

GENSERIC, jen'-se-rik, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa, where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation, in Africa, of the Vandal kingdom, which was composed of Numidia, Mauritania, Carthage, Corsica, Sardinia, and the Balearic Isles. In the course of his military expeditions, he invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in 455. B. at Seville about 406; p. 477.

George I.

INE, Armand, chen-son'-ne, an advocate of Bourdeaux, who, at the Revolution, assailed the government with great vehemence, and was the first to enunciate the vile doctrine that suspicion was a sufficient ground on which to condemn a person to death. Having, however, voted for referring the sentence of the king to the primary assemblies, and had the courage to demand punishment for the assassins of September, Gensonné incurred the hatred of Robespierre, and was included in the destruction which overtook the whole Girondist party, having been guillotined, with twenty-one of his colleagues, on October 31, 1793. B. 1758.

GENTILESCHI, Horatio, jen'-te-les-ke, an Italian artist, who painted the ceilings in Greenwich Hospital. B. at Pisa, 1563; p. in England, 1647.—His daughter Artemisia was also a good artist. She lived chiefly at Naples.

GENTIUS, jen'-te-us, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassadors at the request of Perseus, king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Genti was conquered by Anicius, and led in triumph with his family.

GENTLEMAN, Francis, jen'-tel-man, an actor and dramatic writer, was a native of Ireland, who played first in Dublin, and afterwards at Bath, Edinburgh, Manchester, Liverpool, and Chester successively. Foote engaged him at the Haymarket, London, where he appeared during three seasons, when he was dismissed, and returned to Dublin. He wrote a variety of dramatic pieces, besides "The Dramatic Censor," "Character: an Epistle," "Royal Fables," in imitation of Gay, and other poetical effusions of considerable merit. B. 1728; p. 1784.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, jeff'-fye, author of the "Chronicon, sive Historia Britonum," a singular work, but full of legendary tales about the early kings of Britain. Geoffrey was archdeacon of Monmouth, and was made bishop of St. Asaph in 1152; but afterwards retired to Abingdon monastery, of which he was abbot. The first edition of his History was published at Paris in 1503, in quarto, and reprinted there in 1517, and at Heidelberg in 1537; an English translation, by Aaron Thompson, of Queen's College, Oxford, was published in London in 1718. Geoffrey died in 1154.

GEOFFREY, Madame, zhof'-frä, a French lady, who married, when fifteen years of age, a wealthy plate-glass manufacturer, who in a short time left her a widow. Endowed with high graces of person and mind, her house became the rendezvous of all the most celebrated persons of the age, and to many literary men she rendered important services. Stanislas Poniatowski, who saluted her as his mother, caused her to go to Warsaw, after his accession to the Polish throne. She expended large sums of money to support the "Encyclopædia," and many acts of delicate generosity are recorded of her. B. at Paris, 1699; p. 1777.

GEORGE I., (Lewis) king of Great Britain, was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, by Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and grand-daughter of James I. of England. He was created duke of Cambridge in 1706, and succeeded Queen Anne in 1714. In the following year a rebellion broke out in Scotland in favour of the Pretender, which was soon suppressed, and several of its leaders forfeited their lives upon the scaffold. In 1718 a war was threatened with Charles XII. of Sweden, on account of the king of England having purchased from the Dukes the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which had been taken from Sweden in 1712. The death of Charles, however, prevented the rupture taking place. In the previous year parliaments were made septennial. In 1720 the failure of the famous South-Sea scheme occurred, and thousands of families were ruined. This caused disturbances among the people, and the king, who was then on a visit to his Hanoverian possessions, had to be hastily recalled. In 1723 a conspiracy against the government was discovered. It had been planned for the purpose of bringing in the Pretender; and Atterbury, the bishop of Rochester, was involved in it. In 1725 war was rekindled between the king of Spain and the emperor on one side, and England, France, Prussia, and afterwards Sweden, on the other. In 1726 the siege of Gibraltar was commenced; but the dispute was soon terminated by negotiation, when George proceeded on a journey to the continent. He was on his way to his Hanoverian dominions, but had only reached Osnaburg when he was struck down with apoplexy, n. 1600; p. at Osnaburg, 1727. George I. was a person of plain and simple tastes, of a grave carriage in public, but sufficiently gay and familiar in his private intercourse. His marriage was unhappy, and his unfortunate queen, Sophia Dorothea, a daughter of the duke of Zell, was immured in the castle of Ahlen, in Hanover, from 1694 till 1720, when she died, on a charge never proved, and generally disbelieved, of an intrigue with Count Königsmark. He left by her one son, George, by whom he was succeeded, and one daughter, Sophia Dorothea, who, in 1706, was married to Frederic II. of Prussia.

GEORGE II., (Augustus) son of George I., married, in 1705, Princess Caroline, of Brandenburg-Anspach, who died in 1737. In 1714 he came to England with his father, and was, previous to his accession to the throne in 1727, created Prince of Wales. At this period, the country was in a state of great prosperity; and peace being restored in 1729, the administration of the internal affairs of the kingdom occupied a large share of attention. In 1739, however, war was declared against Spain, when Admiral Vernon was sent with a squadron to the West Indies, where he demolished Porto Bello, but failed in his attempt on Cartagena. In 1743 the king headed his army on the continent, and gained the battle of Dettingen. In 1745 the Pretender's eldest son, Prince Charles-Edward Stuart, landed in the Highlands of Scotland, and was joined by several of the clans; but, after obtaining various successes, his followers were defeated by the duke of Cumberland at Culloden, in 1746. This episode in British history has been a prolific theme with Jacobite lyrists. Whilst it continued, however, the people of England testified their attachment to the Hanoverian dynasty by numerous public demonstrations of loyalty. In 1749 the war with Spain was ended by a treaty of peace, concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1751 died Frederick, prince of Wales, between whom and his father there never existed any cordiality. In 1755 war broke out between England and France, which was at first very unpromising; Braddock was defeated and killed in North America, and Minorca was taken, in the Mediterranean, for allowing which Admiral Byng, who was sent to relieve it, was shot. About this time, Mr. Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, became prime minister, and public affairs began to assume a much more promising aspect. In 1758 a treaty was entered into between England and Prussia, and the French power was nearly destroyed in the East Indies. In America Louisburg was taken, and the capture of Quebec, where Wolfe fell, was followed by the conquest of Canada. Cape Breton had already been recovered; in the East, Clive had captured Calcutta, won the battle of Plassy, and was driving the French from every possession which they held in that quarter. The island of Guadaloupe and the settlement of the Senegal were taken. Admiral Hawke defeated the French fleet under Conflans, and the British flag waved triumphant in every part of the world. In the midst of this blaze of glory, George II. died suddenly, at Kensington, by the bursting of the right ventricle of the heart, 1760. n. at Hanover, 1683.

GEORGE III. (William Frederick), king of Great Britain, was the grandson of George II. and the eldest son of Frederick, prince of Wales. He was the first sovereign of the Hanoverian dynasty born in England, and ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, in 1760. At an extraordinary council in the following year, he stated that, "ever since his accession to the throne he had turned his thoughts towards a princess for his consort; and that, after mature deliberation, he had come to a resolution to demand in marriage the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz." He was accordingly married in the same year, and the joint coronation of the king and queen took place on the 8th of September. From this period till 1783, when Lord Bute retired from the administration of the country, the public mind was kept in a constant state of agitation by political squibs, pamphlets, and libels, which, on the whole, may be considered to have been favourable to religious liberty. In that year, however, Mr. Grenville was appointed premier, when he brought in those measures relative to the American colonies which finally resulted in their independence and the formation of the federal government of the United States. At this time the king had his first attack of that illness which ultimately obscured his latter days, and led to a legislative enactment, which, by sign manual, empowered the queen, or some other member of the royal family, to assume the guardianship of the heir-apparent, and be regent of the kingdom. This measure caused a change in the administration, when the marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the Treasury. His cabinet, however, was dissolved in 1766, and the duke of Grafton succeeded to the head of affairs. In 1770 the duke of Grafton was succeeded by Lord North, and, in 1772, on account of the duke of Cumberland marrying Mrs. Horton, the Royal Marriage Act was passed. This act prevented the members of the royal family from marrying before the age of twenty-five, without the approval of the king, and, even after that age, without the approbation of both houses of Parliament. In 1782 Lord North resigned, and the Rockingham party again took office; but this administration enjoyed but a short tenure of power, when Lord Shelburne was placed at the head of affairs, with Mr. Pitt, the son of the earl of Chatham, as chancellor of the Exchequer. In the following year the Coalition ministry, respectively headed by Mr. Fox and Lord North, pushed themselves into office; but the king was so averse to them, that when the famous India bill of Mr. Fox was thrown out by the Lords, he commanded Mr. Fox and Lord North, by messenger, as a personal interview with them would be offensive to him, at once to deliver up their seals of office. This bold act of the king, along with the energy and firmness he displayed, obtained for him considerable popularity. In 1786 a woman named Margaret Nicholson made an attempt with a knife to assassinate his majesty at the garden entrance of St. James's palace. The coolness of the king on this occasion was a subject of general admiration. The woman was found to be insane, and was sent to Bedlam. In 1789 he had a return of his mental malady, which lasted for three months, and when the cloud had passed off, the king, with his family, and amid the acclamations of the people, proceeded to St. Paul's, to return solemn thanks for his recovery. In 1795 another attempt was made to assassinate him whilst proceeding to the House of Lords to open Parliament in person; a small bullet passed through the window of his carriage, but he sustained no injury from it. In 1793 the Irish rebellion broke out, and the distress of the people had reached its height. The dissatisfaction of that country was very great, and another attempt was made upon the life of the king. This occurred in the theatre of Drury-lane. He had just entered his box, and was in the act of bowing to the audience, when a man who sat in the middle of the pit, near the orchestra, fired a pistol at him, and the bullet entered the roof of the royal box. On this occasion the loyalty of the audience rose to the acme of enthusiasm. Amid repeated cheers, "God save the King," was three times sung by the whole house, with the following additional impromptu stanza made by Sheridan:—

From every latent foe,
From the assassin's blow,
God save the king!
O'er him Thine arm extend,
For Britain's sake defend
Our father, prince, and friend,—
God save the king!

The man who perpetrated this act was called Hatfield, had been in the army, had received eight sabre-wounds in the head, was proved to be insane, and was discharged, and admitted an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital. He was subsequently, however, transferred to Bethlehem Hospital. In 1800 the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland was passed; but the sovereign strenuously opposed the admission of Roman Catholics to political power. This caused the retirement of Mr. Pitt from office, when the Addington ministry assumed the government of the country. In 1804 Mr. Pitt again came into power, but in 1806 he died, when the Grenville party, with Mr. Fox, once more entered into office. In the following year this administration endeavoured to effect a change in the sentiments of the king regarding Catholic emancipation; but his majesty remained immovable. "Although I have firmness," said he, "sufficient to quit my throne and retire to a cottage, or place my neck on a block if my people desired it, yet I have not resolution to break the oath I have taken, in the most solemn manner, at my coronation." This led to the downfall of the Grenville and Fox administration, and the accession of Perceval to power. In 1810 the king commenced the 50th year of his reign, when a jubilee of great splendour took place. His faculties now rapidly began to decay. In the following year he lost the Princess Amelia, his favourite daughter, an event which seriously affected his spirits, whilst his former malady returned with greatly increased severity. In 1811 a regency bill was passed; and, from that time, the life of the king may be regarded as little more than mere existence. In 1818 his queen died; but with this event he was never made acquainted, and the duke of York was appointed to the office of custos to his person. At the close of 1819 his appetite became weak, and every symptom of a coming dissolution began to exhibit itself. He had, however, already been dead to the world, having, for some years, been deprived of intellectual consciousness. B. 1783; D. 1820, in the 60th year of his reign. George III. was religious and sincere, temperate in his habits, and inflexible in his will. His tastes were of patriarchal simplicity. He loved music, and patronized its professors; he appreciated art, and knighted Sir Joshua Reynolds; he assisted science, and afforded encouragement to Byron and Cook, the navigators. He was a good king, a considerate husband, and a kind father; whilst the morality of his court produced the happiest effects upon the manners and customs of the people over whose destinies he so long swayed the sceptre.

George IV.

GEORGE IV. (Augustus Frederick), was the eldest son of the preceding monarch, by Queen Charlotte. Notwithstanding the excellent example of his father, and the strictness with which his education had been conducted, George IV., when prince of Wales, fell early into habits of dissipation, which debased the better parts of his nature and greatly marred the intellectual endowments with which he was gifted. In his eighteenth year he began to associate with the Whig nobility, and formed political connexions with Fox, Sheridan, and others, who led him into scenes of gallantry, which soon made his name notorious in the mouths of the people. His first attachment was to a Mrs. Robinson, an actress, with whom he fell in love when she was performing Perdita in the "Winter's Tale." Of this scandalous connexion the public prints were full, when, on a sudden, he abandoned this lady for another, and this for another, until he met with Mrs. Fitzherbert, a Catholic widow lady of good family, with whom he formed a more permanent connexion. She, however, was seven years older than himself, and is said to have been privately married to him. (See FITZHERBERT.) His dissipation, and the building of Carlton House, had now steeped him to the lips in debt, when he was driven into mean expedients for the purpose of putting off, or meeting the pressing demands of his creditors. Those, however, were insufficient for his purposes, when he determined to apply to his father, who, however, was so exasperated at his conduct, that he refused to render him the smallest assistance. He, therefore, curtailed his expenditure, and for nearly twelve months persevered in his virtuous resolution. He sold off his racing stud, and lived in retirement till 1787, when his circumstances were brought under the notice of Parliament. On this occasion the house voted £161,000 to satisfy his creditors, £20,000 to finish Carlton House, and the king added, from the civil list, £10,000 per annum to his son's income. Relieved, for a time, from his pecuniary embarrassments, he once more assumed his habits of extravagance. For Mrs. Fitzherbert he had built a splendid mansion at Brighton, which place he raised from obscurity into a fashionable watering-place, and surrounded himself with many notorious characters; among whom the most prominent was the countess of Jersey. Under these circumstances the king and his ministers were desirous that the prince should marry; and as he was again weighed down by debt, he consented to an alliance with his cousin, the Princess Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, daughter of the duke of Brunswick. The marriage occurred in the April of 1795, and a place was provided in the household for Lady Jersey. The princess soon discovered the nature of her husband's connexions, not only with the countess of Jersey, but also with Mrs. Fitzherbert, which naturally excited her resentment, when scenes of discord, and mutual recrimination and dislike, were the result. In 1796 the princess of Wales gave birth to a daughter; and, shortly afterwards, the prince sent her proposals for a separation. These were at once acceded to, and George III. undertook the guardianship of the young princess, whilst her unhappy mother retired to a private residence at Blackheath. The conduct of the prince had now so effectually estranged the affections of his father from him, that, when Napoleon I. threatened the invasion of England, he allowed him only the colonelcy of a regiment of dragoons; but, when the incapacity of George III. occurred, he was permitted to assume all the rights of royalty. In 1814 the prince received a visit from the emperor of Russia, the king of Prussia, and other foreign potentates, and treated them with truly royal hospitality. In 1816 his daughter, the princess Charlotte, was married to prince Leopold, of Saxe-Coburg, afterwards king of the Belgians; but she died in the following year. In 1817 an unsuccessful attempt was made upon the life of the prince-regent, when on his way to open the session of Parliament; and in 1820 the Cat-street conspirators were tried and executed for plotting against his life and the lives of the leading members of the administration. On the death of his father, in 1820, he ascended the throne as George IV., and, in the following year, was crowned, with great magnificence, in Westminster Abbey. Previous to this, a process had been instituted in the House of Lords for the purpose of depriving his wife of her rights and privileges as queen of England. This circumstance, for a time, brought him into great unpopularity. In the same year of his coronation, he paid a visit to Ireland and Hanover; and, in the following year, similarly visited Scotland. The great public event of his reign, however, was the passing of the bill for abolishing the political disabilities of the Roman Catholics, which took place in 1829. During the latter part of the king's life, he lived much in retirement, and ultimately held his courts entirely at Windsor. As old age came upon him, he suffered much from gout and other infirmities, always exhibiting an excessive abhorrence if in the least exposed to the public gaze. b. August 12, 1762; d. at Windsor Castle, June 26, 1830. On the same day proclamation was made of the succession of William IV.

Gerard

GEORGE OF DENMARK, PRINCE, was the husband of Queen Anne of England, and was married to her in 1683. There is little to be said of him. Lord Dartmouth observes, in his notes to "Burnet's History," "that his behaviour at the Revolution showed he could be made a tool of upon occasions, but King William treated him with the utmost contempt. When Queen Anne came to the throne, she showed him little respect, but expected everybody else should give him more than his due." Again—"After thirty years living in England, he died of eating and drinking, without any man's thinking himself obliged to him; but I have been told that he would sometimes do ill offices, though he never did a good one." Anne bore him nineteen children, of whom only five lived to be baptized, b. in Denmark, 1683; d. at Kensington Palace, 1708.

GEORGE, ST., was, according to tradition, a young and handsome prince of Cappadocia, who suffered martyrdom under Diocletian. He has been made a kind of Christian Perseus, and a thousand prodigies are reported of him. He slew an immense and powerful dragon, and saved a king's daughter, as the monster was about to devour her. It is in the performance of this deed that he is represented, on horseback, armed with a lance, and piercing a dragon. He was famous in the East, and it was thence that his fame came to the West. This legendary saint is more particularly honoured in England, Russia, and Genoa. The English and Genoese take him as their patron, whilst the Russians adopt St. George and the Dragon as the principal figure in their arsenals and armories, and have given his name to the first of their military orders.

GERARD, Thom, jai'-rard, the founder and first grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, or the Knights of Malta. b. at Amalfi, Naples, or, according to others, at Martigues, Provence, about 1040; d. about 1121.

GERARD, Bathazar, zhai'-rard, the assassin of William I., prince of Orange. He meditated this design seven years, and at last shot the prince with a pistol at Delft. He declared he committed the murder "to expiate his sins," the prince being at the head of the Protestants. b. at Villefrans, Burgundy, 1555; executed 1581. The reward of Gérard's crime was paid to his heirs by Philip II. of Spain, the duke of Parma informing that sovereign, that though the "poor man" was dead, his parents deserved the payment of that "merced, the laudable and generous deed had so well deserved." The sentence pronounced upon Gérard was that his right hand should be burned off, that his flesh should be torn from his bones in six different places, that he should be disembowelled alive, that his heart should be torn from his bosom and flung in his face, and his head chopped off. This sentence was executed to the letter.

GERARD, François Pascal Simon, a celebrated modern painter, who went from Italy to Paris, where he became a pupil of M. David. From 1795 to 1810, appeared his "Belisarius," "Psyche receiving the first Kiss of Love," "The Three Ages," the "Battle of Austerlitz," and "Ossian." All the first men and women of the French empire were painted by him; and, in the space of thirty years, he executed more than a hundred full-length portraits, besides an immense number of less size. Amongst others who sat to him were Moreau, Murat, Letitia Bonaparte, Mesdames Tallien and Récamier, the emperors Napoleon I. and Alexander of Russia, Prince Talleyrand, Louis Bonaparte, and the empress Josephine. He left behind him several unfinished works. b. at Rome, 1770; p. at Paris, 1837.

GERARD, John, jer'-ard, an English botanist, who, bred a surgeon, settled in London, and became gardener to Lord Burleigh. He compiled a "Catalogus Arborum, Fruticum, et Plantarum, tam indigenarum quam exoticarum, in horto Joh. Gerardi," and is the author of the "Herbal, or 'General History of Plants,'" published first in 1597, and afterwards several times reprinted. b. at Nantwich, Cheshire, 1545; p. 1607.

GERBES, Sir Balthasar, jer'-be-ai, a painter who excelled in miniature, was a native of Antwerp, but, being patronised by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, came to England, was employed by the royal family, and was knighted by Charles I., who entrusted him with a mission to Brussels. He retired to Holland during the civil war, but returned to England at the Restoration, and died in 1607. b. 1592.

GERBILLOX, Jean François, zhair-bee'-yawng, one of the most celebrated of the French Jesuit missionaries in China. He wrote "Historical Observations on Great Tartary;" and accounts of some of his travels are inserted in Du Halde's "History of China." He was in great favour with the Chinese emperor, to whom he was appointed mathematical instructor, and wrote two books on geometry, which were printed at Pekin in the Chinese and Tartar languages. b. at Verdun, 1654; p. at Pekin, 1707, superior-general of the French missions in China.

GERMANICUS, Cæsar, jer-mân-i-kus, son of Drusus and Antonia, niece of the emperor Augustus, was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and was married to Agrippina, daughter of Agrippa and grand-daughter of Augustus. He was raised to the most important offices of the state, and when Augustus died, having the command of the army in Germany, the affection of the soldiers led them to unanimously salute him emperor. He refused this honour, continued his wars, defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return to Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the East, and sent him to appease the seditious of the Arminians. But the success of Germanicus here was soon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius; and he was secretly poisoned at Daphne, by Piso, a.d. 19, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest grief. He had had nine children by Agrippina, a woman of eminent virtue. One of these, Caligula, disgraced the name of his illustrious father. Germanicus has been commended, not only for his military accomplishments, but also for his learning, humanity, and extensive benevolence.

GERRARD, of Haarlem, jer'-ard, one of the early Dutch painters, and one of the first, after John van Eyck, who worked in oil. He was accurate in design, and an excellent colourist. b. at Haarlem, 1460; p. 1483, when only 23 years of age.

GERSON, John Charlier de, zhair-sawng, an eminent French divine, who was educated in the college of Navarre, and became chancellor and canon of the church of Paris. He was deputed to go to the council of Pisa, where he largely contributed to the election of Pope Alexander V.

Gesner

He energetically denounced the murder of the duke of Orleans by the powerful duke of Burgundy, and distinguished himself at the council of Constance. b. at Gerson, Champagne, 1365; p. 1429. His works, amongst which are "Consolations of Theology," and "Mystical Theology," are highly and deservedly valued. They were published in 1708, in 5 vols. folio.

GERSTACKER, Friedrich, ger'-stek-er, a modern German writer, the son of an actor, was apprenticed to a merchant at Cassel. Having been used, however, to a more exciting life, he resolved to emigrate to America, and having studied agriculture for two years, embarked at Bremen for New York. After some months' stay in that city, he found it necessary to put his hand to anything that offered, and was by turns a stoker in a steamboat, sailor, farmer, silversmith, woodcutter, and innkeeper. Returning to Germany, after an absence of six years, he published several books recounting his experience in the United States, many of which were translated both into English and French. In 1849 he undertook a new voyage, with the twofold object of collecting information for emigrants, and new materials for his writings. This time he visited Rio Janeiro, Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, and California, and went back to his "Vaterland" in 1852, after having touched at the Sandwich and Society Islands, and seen a great deal of Australia. These new travels were published, first in the journals, and afterwards in a collected form, under the title of "Voyages." Gerstacker is one of the closest observers and most interesting writers of Germany; his tales and travels have met with universal favour, and translations of his best productions have appeared, from time to time, in the "Boy's Own Magazine," and other popular periodicals. b. at Hamburg, 1816.

GERVAISE, Nicholas, zhair'-vaise, a French missionary, who went to Siam, and, on his return, published the natural and political history of that country. About 1724 he visited Rome, and was appointed bishop of Horren. He then set out for Guiana, where, with all the other members of the mission, he was murdered by the natives, 1729. b. at Paris, 1662.—His brother, Armand François, was abbot of La Trappe, and wrote, amongst other biographical and theological works, the "Lives of Abélard and Heloise." b. at Paris, 1680; p. 1755.

GERVAS, of Canterbury, jer'-vas, an historian of the thirteenth century, was a monk, and wrote a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," from 1120 to 1200, and a "History of the Archbishops of Canterbury," from St. Augustine to Archbishop Hubert, who died 1205.

GERVASE, of Tilbury, jer'-vaise, an historian of the thirteenth century, was a native of Tilbury, in Essex, and is supposed to have been the nephew of Henry II. He composed a commentary on Geoffrey of Monmouth's chronicle; a tripartite "History of England;" a "History of the Holy Land;" "Origines Burgundiorum;" "Mirabilia," and a chronicle with the title "Ostis Imperialibus." He was marshal of the kingdom of Arles, which office he obtained through the interest of Otto IV.

GESNER, Conrad, ges'-ner, an eminent German physician and naturalist, whose parents were too poor to give him an education, which he acquired by the liberality of some of his fellow-citizens. After studying at Stutgart, he went to Paris, and supported himself by teaching grammar. He subsequently became Greek professor at Lausanne, and at Bale took his doctor's degree in physic, and then returned to Zurich, where he practised as a physician, and gave lectures in philosophy. His fame as a naturalist circulated over Europe, and he maintained a correspondence with learned men of all countries. He wrote "On the Collection of Plants," a work of great merit; "Historia Animalium," which is considered his greatest performance, and procured him the name of the "Modern Pliny;" "Bibliotheca Universalis," which has gone through several editions; and produced other works on botany and medicine. B. at Zurich, Switzerland, 1516; D. 1565.

GESNER, Solomon, a Swiss poet and painter, whose father was a bookseller and printer, and brought him up to the same business. In 1753 he published a short piece, in poetic prose, entitled "Night," which was followed by the pastoral of "Daphnis." His next work was the "Idylls;" and his reputation was increased and extended by his poem of the "Death of Abel," which has been translated into several languages. Besides his great merit in poetry, he was a good painter and engraver, and, in 1765, published ten landscapes, engraved by himself from his own designs. These were followed by others. He was also the author of a "Letter on Landscape-Painting," poems, &c. B. at Zurich, 1730; D. 1788.

GESNER, John Matthias, a profound German scholar and critic, who, on the recommendation of , was appointed rector of the school at Weimar, which situation he filled eleven years. Thence he removed to Leipsic, and lastly to Göttingen, where, on the foundation of its university, he was made professor of rhetoric, librarian, and inspector of public schools. His most esteemed works are editions of some of the classics, and an excellent Latin "Thesaurus," 4 vols. folio. B. at Roth, Anspach, 1691; D. 1761.

GETA, ge'-ta, a son of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. After his father's death, in 211, he reigned at Rome, conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, envious of his virtues, murdered him in the arms of their mother Julia, in the same year.

GETHIN, Grace, ge'-thin, an ingenious English lady, was early married to Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin Grotto, Ireland. Soon after her marriage she died, in 1697, and her remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, where a beautiful monument was erected to her memory. After her death appeared a work entitled "Reliquiæ Gethinianæ; or, some Remains of the most ingenious and excellent Lady Grace Gethin, lately deceased," &c. 1700, 4to. Provision was made for a sermon to be preached in the abbey, annually, on Ash-Wednesday, to commemorate her memory, and Mr. Congreve wrote a poem to her honour. She was the daughter of Sir George Norton, of Abbotsleigh, Somerset. B. 1676; D. 1697.

GETLANDATO, Domenico, geer'-lan-da'-jo, a Florentine painter, was intended for a goldsmith, but, having a strong passion for painting, cultivated that art with success. At Florence, in the church of Santa Maria Novello, is his picture of the "Massacre of the Innocents," and in the gallery of the Louvre at Paris, "The Visitation of St. Ann to the Virgin;" but, perhaps, he deserves most to be celebrated for being the tutor of Michael Angelo. B. 1419; D. 1498.—His two brothers, Benedetto and David, and his son Rinaldo, equally distinguished themselves as painters.

GIBBON, Edward, gi'-bon, one of the most distinguished of English historians, was descended from an ancient family of Kent. He was first placed at a private school at Kingston, and next at Westminster school, whence he was removed to Magdalen College, Oxford. While there, he read books of controversial divinity, particularly those between the Papists and Protestants, and conceived that the truth lay on the side of the Romanists. Accordingly, in 1753, he renounced heresy at the feet of a Roman Catholic priest in London. His father was greatly concerned at this, and to reclaim him sent him to Lausanne, in Switzerland, under the care of Mr. Paviliard, a Calvinist minister, by whose instructions he was convinced of the errors of the Romish church, and on the Christmas-day of 1754, just eighteen months after his conversion to Romanism, received the sacrament according to the Reformed communion. While at Lausanne he pursued his classical studies with ardour, labouring to acquire, at least, a creditable acquaintance with the Greek, Latin, and French languages. He here fell in love with the daughter of a minister, a charming creature, called Susan Curchod, but was dissuaded from entering into the married state by the force of paternal remonstrance; and he lived single the remainder of his life. The lady afterwards became the wife of the famous Necker and the mother of Madame de Staël. In 1758 he returned to England, where he began to collect a noble library; and in 1761 he published, in French, a small volume entitled "Essai sur l'Etude de la Littérature." This production was not much noticed in England at the time; but he says in his "Autobiography"—"The publication of my history, fifteen years afterwards, revived the memory of my first production, and the essay was eagerly sought for in the shops; but I refused the permission of reprinting it, and when a copy has been discovered at a sale, the primitive value of 2s. 6d. has risen to the fanciful price of 20 or 30 shillings." He was, at this time, a captain in the Hampshire militia, which he resigned at the peace of 1763, when he visited Paris, and thence went again to Lausanne. He next travelled into Italy; and in 1767 assisted M. Deyverdun in writing the "Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne." Of these memoirs he says, "I will presume to say that their merit was superior to their reputation; but it is not less true that they were productive of more reputation than emolument." In 1770, he published in English a pamphlet, entitled "Critical Observations on the Sixth Book of the Æneid;" the design of which was to refute Bishop Warburton's hypothesis as to the descent of Æneas. The same year, by the death of his father, he came into the possession of the family estate; but it was much involved. In 1774 he was returned to Parliament for Liskeard; but though he sat eight years, he never distinguished himself as a speaker, always giving a silent vote for the minister. In 1778 appeared the first volume of his great work, the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," which was afterwards extended to six volumes 4to. "It was at Rome," he tells us, "on the 15th October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind." Splendid, however, as is this history, it must be observed that its author opened a masked battery against Christianity in several places, but especially in two chapters of the first volume, on the growth and progress of that religion. Several writers attacked the historian, to one of whom only, Mr. Davis, who had charged the author with want of fidelity, Mr. Gibbon vouchsafed a reply. He was employed by ministers in writing a memoir in justification of this country's going to war with France, for the part taken by that court in the American contest. This piece was written in French, and was greatly admired. For this he obtained a seat at the Board of Trade, which he lost on the abolition of that board by Mr. Burke's bill. In 1783 he returned once more to Lausanne, where he employed himself in completing his history. When he had concluded a work so grand in its subject, and so majestic in its treatment, he thus beautifully describes his emotions:—"It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th of June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a bureau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy on the recovery of my freedom, and, perhaps, the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that, whatsoever might be the future fate of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious." The French revolution now began to disturb the neighbouring states, and Mr. Gibbon returned to England, and died in London, 1794. n. at Putney, 1797. After his death appeared his posthumous works, with his memoirs, written by himself, and finished by his friend Lord Sheffield, 2 vols. 4to.

GIBBONS, Grinling, an eminent English carver in wood, was the son of a Dutchman who settled in England. Grinling was appointed by Charles II. to a place under the Board of Works, and he was employed in ornamenting several of the royal palaces. He carved the foliage in the chapel of Windsor, the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, and the admirable font in St. James's Church, Westminster. There is some of his carving in St. James's Church, Piccadilly; but his principal performance is said to be at Petworth. n. 1721.

GIBBONS, Orlando, an eminent English musician, who became organist of the Chapel Royal at the age of 21; and, in 1622, was created doctor of music by the university of Oxford. n. at Cambridge, 1583; n. at Canterbury, 1625. He was the best church music composer of his time, and also published madrigals.—His two brothers and son were likewise good musicians.

GIBBS, James, gibbs, a Scotch architect, who designed the churches of St. Martin's and St. Mary le Strand, London; the senate-house, and the improvements of King's College, Cambridge, and other works. n. at Aberdeen, 1783; n. 1764.

GIBBS, Sir Vicary, was educated at Eton, and at King's College, Cambridge, studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and, through the friendship of Dunning, afterwards Lord Ashburton, became a leading counsel on the Western circuit, and was elected recorder of Bristol. He was engaged in the trial of Horne Tooke, Hardy, and others, for high treason, in 1794, and made himself conspicuous for his talents. He was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales in 1795; soon after became king's counsel; in 1807, was elected to Parliament for Cambridge; was made chief justice of Chester, solicitor and attorney-general, and obtained the honour of knighthood. He was made a puisne judge of the Common Pleas in 1812, and chief justice next year. In 1818 he resigned from increasing infirmities. n. at Exeter, 1752; n. 1820.

GIBSON, Edmund, gib'-son, a learned prelate, who, being sent to Queen's College, Oxford, applied himself particularly to the study of the northern languages. In 1691 he published a new edition of Drummond's "Polemio-Midiana," and James V. of Scotland's "Canitena Rustica," with curious notes. The next year he published a Latin version of the "Chronicon Saxonieum," with notes. These works were followed by another volume, entitled "Librorum Manuscriptorum in duabus Insignibus Bibliothecis, altera Dugdaliana Oxoniæ, Catalogus," dedicated to Bishop Tenison, which procured him the patronage of that prelate, who appointed him his chaplain. Three years afterwards, his edition of Camden's "Britannia" appeared, with considerable additions; and in 1713 he published his "Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani," in folio, which procured him the applause of the friends of the church, and much censure from those opposed to it. In 1715, Dr. Gibson was made bishop of Lincoln, and in 1723 translated to London. n. at Brampton, Westmoreland, 1669; n. at Bath, 1748.

GIBSON, Richard, known by the name of the "dwarf," an English painter, who studied the manner of Sir Peter Lely. In his youth he was servant to a lady at Mortlake, who, perceiving his taste for painting, put him under De Cleyn for instruction. He subsequently became page to Charles I., and when he married Mrs. Anne Shepherd, who was also a dwarf, the king honoured the wedding with his presence, and gave away the bride. The bride and bridegroom were of equal stature, each measuring three feet ten inches. They had nine children, five of whom arrived at years of maturity, and were of ordinary stature. Gibson died in 1690, in his 75th year, and his wife in 1709, at the age of 80.

GIBSON, John, B.A., an eminent English sculptor, who, at the age of 14, was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, but afterwards became a wood-carver. At the age of 16, however, he quitted this employment, for the marble works of Messrs. Francis, in Liverpool, who purchased the remaining portion of his time at the wood-carving for £70. He was now in a congenial atmosphere, and commenced modelling, and working with the chisel. His genius soon began to develop itself, when he was sent, by means of a private subscription, to Rome, for the purpose of studying the works of the great masters. In 1817 he arrived at the "ancient Capitol," with letters of introduction to Canova, who gave him a kind reception. He entered the studio of this great artist, and, in 1821, took a studio for himself. From that period he resided in Rome, making few visits to his native country. His first work was a group of "Mars and Cupid," which brought him a commission for it to be executed in marble for the duke of Devonshire. It now forms one of the principal features in the Chatsworth collection. From this time his fame rose: but, to render it the more certain and lasting, he took lessons from Thorwaldsen, the great Danish sculptor. Having, by close application, completely mastered his art, Gibson worked most in the poetical field of sculpture, Robert Peel for Westminster Abbey, another of George Stephenson, and another of her Majesty Queen Victoria for Buckingham Palace. He was the first modern sculptor to introduce the practice of colouring his statues, an innovation which has occasioned much discussion, but which he defends by instancing Grecian precedents. His tinted Venus, shown at the International Exhibition of 1862, was the subject of much criticism, but was, on the whole, approved. In 1833 he was elected an A.R.A., and in 1836 a R.A. Liverpool is especially rich in his works, which are too numerous to admit of recapitulation here. n. at Conway, North Wales, 1791; d. at Rome, 1886.

GIBSON, the Right Honourable Thomas Milner, M.P., a modern English statesman, who, in 1837, entered the House of Commons for Ipswich, as a supporter of the government of Sir Robert Peel. In 1839 he became a convert to liberal opinions, and resigned his seat. He then devoted himself to the cause of free trade, and in 1841 was returned for Manchester. In 1846 he became a member of the Privy Council, and vice-president of the Board of Trade. In 1848 he quitted office, and once more became an effective independent member of the House of Commons; and in 1859 again entered the cabinet as president of the Board of Trade in Lord Palmerston's administration. It was to his persevering efforts that the country is chiefly indebted for the remission of three great duties, which considerably tended to circumscribe the dissemination of knowledge throughout the country. These were the stamp on newspapers, the tax on advertisements, and the paper duty, the remission of which Mr. Gladstone announced in his budget of 1860; and although he failed in that year, the repeal was effected in 1861. n. 1807.

GIFFORD, William, giff'ord, a modern English writer, was the son of poor parents, and was left an orphan before he had reached his 13th year. He was apprenticed to the sea; but, disliking that occupation, was put to shoemaking, at which employment he continued till he was 20 years of age. By that time he had displayed some indications of genius, when a Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon of Ashburton, sent him to Oxford. After leaving college, he made the tour of Europe, as the travelling companion of Lord Bolgrave; and, on his return to England, settled in London as a literary man. In 1794 he published his "Baviad," a poetical satire, which annihilated the Della Crusca school of poets, of which Mrs. Piozzi formed a leading member. In the following year his "Mæviad" appeared, and exposed the low state to which dramatic authorship had then fallen.

Gilbert

In 1797 he became the editor of the "Anti-Jacobin," established by Mr. Canning and other gentlemen, and got entangled in a quarrel with Dr. Wolcot, to whom, as "Peter Pindar," he wrote a poetical epistle. In 1802 he published his translation of Juvenal, which Sir Walter Scott says "is the best version ever made of a classical author." In 1805 his edition of Massinger appeared, and, in 1816, that of Ben Jonson. Subsequently, editions both of Ford and Shirley were published, but not entirely edited by him, his death having taken place before he had completed them. In 1809 he became the editor of the London "Quarterly Review;" and it is in this capacity that he is best known. As a critic, he has been much censured for his severity, with which he mingled no inconsiderable degree of injustice. "He was a man with whom I had no literary sympathies," says Southey; "perhaps there was nothing upon which we agreed, except great political questions. . . . He had a heart full of kindness for all living creatures except authors; then he regarded as a fishmonger regards eels, or as Isaac Walton did worms, slugs, and frogs. I always protested against the indulgence of that temper in his Review." Scott says he was good "as a commentator;" but, as a critic, the "fault of extreme severity went through his critical labours; and, in general, he flagellated with so little pity, that people lost their sense of the criminal's guilt in dislike of the savage pleasure which the executioner seemed to take in inflicting punishment." He held the editorship of the Review till 1824. n. at Ashburton, Devonshire, 1756; d. 1826.

GIFFORD, Andrew, an English dissenting minister and learned antiquary, who was assistant librarian of the British Museum many years. He formed a good library, and bequeathed it to the Baptist academy at Bristol. n. 1700; d. 1784.

GILBERT, Sir Humphrey, gil'bert, an English navigator, whose mother becoming a widow, married a Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the celebrated Sir Walter. Humphrey served with reputation in Ireland, and for his services there was knighted. In 1576 he published a discourse to prove the existence of a passage by the N.W. to Cathay and the East Indies. Two years afterwards, he obtained a patent for establishing settlements in North America, and, in 1583, took possession of Newfoundland, where he thought to find silver-mines. On his return from a second voyage thither, the vessel foundered, and all on board perished, September 9, 1584. n. at Dartmouth, 1539.

GILBERT, William, a physician, who discovered several of the properties of the loadstone. He was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians, and became physician to Queen Elizabeth. In 1600 he published a work, entitled "De Magnete, Magneticisque Corporibus, et de Magno Magnete Tellure, Physiologia Nova," in which are many important suggestions for the improvement of navigation. Indeed, this work contains the history of all that had been written on the subject of the magnet before his time, and forms the first regular system upon it. It may be viewed as the parent of all the improvements that have been therein since made. Lord Bacon, in his "Advancement of Learning," calls it "a painful and experimental work." n. at Colchester, 1540; d. 1603.

and man of science, who was president of the Royal Society, and the early and liberal patron of Sir Humphry Davy. His paternal name was Giddy, but he took the name of Gilbert in 1817, on his marriage with the only daughter of Thomas Gilbert, Esq., of Eastbourne, Sussex. He was a man of considerable wealth, which he freely expended on the promotion of science and the encouragement of learning. He was elected member of parliament for Helston in 1804, and subsequently sat for Bodmin from 1806 till 1832. He wrote a tract entitled "A Plain Statement of the Bullion Question," which appeared in 1811. He was chosen treasurer of the Royal Society in 1820, and succeeded Sir Humphry Davy, at his death in 1829, as president, which office he held till 1831, when he resigned. He contributed to the Antiquarian Society, of which he was a fellow, several curious and interesting papers, particularly in reference to the topography of Cornwall. B. 1767; D. 1839.

GILDAS, gil'-dás, a British monk, of whose works there is nothing extant but a treatise on the early history of Britain, the best edition of which is that by Gale, in 1687. Lived in the 6th century; but his history is involved in doubt and obscurity.—Bishop Bale mentions another Gildas, who was a native of Wales, and flourished about 820. He was a monk, and wrote a calendar of saints, yet extant in MS.; and Leland notices a poet of the same name, who drew up the prophecies of Merlin in Latin verse.

GILFILLAN, George, gil'-fil'-lan, a modern English critic and author, was the son of a minister of the Secession Church in Scotland, and being educated for the ministry, was, about 1837, appointed to the charge of a congregation in Dundee. In 1851 he published, under the title of "A Gallery of Literary Portraits," a series of critical sketches, which had formerly appeared in the "Dumfries Herald." Besides this, he produced a volume of "Poems and Songs," "The Bards of the Bible," "Martyrs and Heroes of the Scottish Covenant," "The History of a Man," &c. B. at Comrie, Perthshire, 1813.

GILMER, or GELIMER, gil'-i-mer, last king of the Vandals in Africa, and a descendant of Genseric, took possession of the throne in 531, having deposed his cousin, the feeble Hilderic. Justinian, the emperor of the East, wishing to avenge his ally, or make use of this pretext to attack the Vandals, sent Belisarius against the usurper. This general took possession of Carthage, defeated Gilmer in 534, at the battle of Tricameron, and captured the king, who was conducted in triumph to Constantinople, repeatedly exclaiming, as he was led along, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." Justinian made of the kingdom of the Vandals a province of his empire, but gave Gilmer a large domain in Galatia. Lived in the 6th century.

GILL, Alexander, gil, a famous English schoolmaster, who, in 1608, became master of St. Paul's school, where he educated many eminent persons, and, among the rest, the celebrated Milton. He was the author of several religious treatises and commentaries. B. in Lincolnshire, 1564; D. 1635.

GILL, Alexander, son of the preceding, whom he first assisted as usher at St. Paul's school, and ultimately succeeded. He retained the position only five years, having been dismissed, it is said, for excessive severity. He then established a private school in Aldersgate Street, which he lived to conduct for two years only. He was eminent for the composition of Latin poetry, and published a volume of his pieces in 1632, under the title of "Poetici Conatus." He contracted a friendship with Milton, and three letters from the great poet to him are extant, and express sentiments of much esteem. B. 1597; D. 1642.

GILL, John, a Baptist divine, who was sprung from parents in humble circumstances, received a very limited education, but by close application to study, made himself a good rabbinical and classical scholar. He was first established as a preacher at Higham-Ferrars, and then removed to a congregation at Horselydown, Southwark. He wrote a variety of works on divinity, the principal of which are—"Exposition of the Song of Solomon," "The Cause of God and Truth," and an "Exposition of the Bible," in 10 vols. 4to, the last-named being his great work. B. at Kettering, Northamptonshire, 1697; D. 1771.

GILLES, Peter, sheels, a French naturalist, one of the first who made useful researches into the natural sciences. He visited the shores of the Adriatic and Mediterranean, was sent to the Levant by order of Francis I., explored the ruins of Chalcedon, and returned from Constantinople with the French ambassador in 1550. B. at Albi, 1490; D. at Rome, 1555. He wrote "De Vi et Naturâ Animalium," "De Bosphoro Thracio," and "De Topographiâ Constantino-

GILLIES, John, LL.D., gil'-les, was educated at the university of Glasgow, and was for some time a travelling tutor to the sons of the earl of Hopetoun. On the death of Dr. Robertson, however, he was appointed historiographer for Scotland, and distinguished himself by his literary labours. His principal work is a "History of Greece," which, in point of style, has been pronounced superior to that of Mr. Mitford. His other works are a translation of the "Ethics and Politics of Aristotle," "A View of the Reign of Frederick II. of Prussia," and the "Orations of Isocrates and Lysias." B. at Brechin, Scotland, 1747; D. 1836.

GILPIN, Bernard, gil'-pin, an English divine, who, from perusing the works of Erasmus, was one of the first who embraced the principles of the Reformation. Having travelled on the continent for some time, he returned to England in 1556, and was presented by his uncle, bishop Tonstal, to the archdeaconry of Durham and the rectory of Easington. Being next presented to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, his labours there, in promoting the reformed religion, became so notorious, that bishop Bonner gave orders for him to be arrested and sent to London. Gilpin prepared himself for the stake, but before he reached London, news came of Mary's death; on which he returned to his parish, to the great joy of his people. Queen Elizabeth subsequently offered him the bishopric of Carlisle, which he refused. B. in Westmoreland, 1517; D. 1583.

GILPIN, William, an English divine and writer, who was the master, for many years, of a school at Cheam, in Surrey, and afterwards became vicar of Boldre, in Hampshire, and prebendary of Salisbury. Amongst other works, he wrote "The Life of Bernard Gilpin," his ancestor, above mentioned; "The Lives of Latimer, Wickliffe, Huss, and Archbishop Cranmer," "Exposition of the New Testament," "A Tour to the Lakes," "Remarks on Forest Scenery," "Observations on the River Wye," and "Picturesque Remarks on the Western Parts of England." B. in Cumberland, 1724; D. 1804.

GILPIN, Sawry, an English painter, brother of the preceding, began life as a ship painter, but afterwards took to sketching animals, and finally became famous as a delineator of horses. B. at Carlisle, 1733; D. in London, 1807.

GILLRAY, James, giŭ'-rai, a famous caricaturist and political satirist of the reign of George III. The keen humour and spirit of his works, together with his facility of invention, have given him a foremost place in the ranks of caricaturists. B. about 1757; D. 1815.

GINGUÉNÉ, Pierre Louis, zhin'-goo-ai-nai, a French author, who took an active part in the Revolution on the moderate side, and narrowly escaped the guillotine during the domination of the Jacobins. He was sent to Turin as ambassador by the Directory, and was made a senator by Napoleon, but not conforming his opinions to those of Bonaparte, he was dismissed, and then devoted himself to literature. He contributed to the "Histoire Littéraire de la France," which had been begun by the Benedictines; but his great work is the "Literary History of Italy," which was published in nine volumes after his death. Salfi assisted him in the composition of the last two volumes. B. 1748; D. 1818.

GIOCONDO, Fra Giovanni, jo-kon'-do, an Italian architect and writer, constructed several buildings at Verona, where he had formerly kept a school, and had Julius Cæsar Scaliger for a pupil. In 1490 he was invited to Paris by Louis XII., and built the bridge of Notre Dame, Chamber of Accounts, &c. He also assisted Michael Angelo in the works of St. Peter's, at Rome, and published an edition of Vitruvius, and another of "Cæsar's Commentaries." B. at Verona about 1435; D. about 1521.

GIOIA, Flavio, djo'-ya, an Italian pilot or sea-captain, to whom is ascribed the invention of the compass, which he first used, it is said, in 1302 or 1303. He marked the north with a fleur-de-lis, in honour of the sovereigns of Naples, who were a branch of the royal family of France. B. at Pasitano, near Amalfi, in the 13th century.

GIORDANO, Luca, djor-da'-no, an Italian painter, who was in high favour with Charles II. of Spain, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. B. at Naples, 1632; D. 1705.

GIORGIONE, or GEORGIO BARBARELLI, djor-djo'-nai, one of the earliest painters of the Venetian school, who executed a great number of frescoes, which time has destroyed. It is said that Titian worked under him to obtain his manner of colouring, but Giorgione perceiving his design, dismissed him. His finest work is a painting of "Christ carrying his Cross," at Venice. B. at Castel Franco, 1477; D. 1511.

GIOTTO, or ANGILOARTO, djoŭ'-to, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was in his youth a keeper of sheep, but Cimabue (see CIMABUE) discovered his talent, and took him as a pupil. Giotto, following his master in the study of nature, clothed her in more noble forms than he, and was thus the precursor of Raffæle. Amongst the numerous works of this painter may be mentioned a mosaic representing "Peter walking on the Water," in St. Peter's at Rome, and a "St. Francis," in the

Girardin

Louvre at Paris. In 1334 he superintended the erection of the fortifications at Florence. B. at Vespignano, 1276; D. 1336. Giotto was the friend of Dante, and has transmitted the features of the poet in a little picture. In return, the author dedicated to the painter some verses in his "Divina Commedia." One of the Medici family erected a tomb to his memory in a church at Florence, and at the foot of his bust placed this line of Poliziano:—

"Ille ego sum per quem pictura extincta re-vixit."

(I am he through whom the extinct art of painting revived.)

GIRALDI, Lilio Gregorio, je-raŭ'-de, an eminent Italian writer, the most esteemed of whose works are, "Syntagma de Diis Gentium," which is the first treatise on Mythology ever written, and "A History of the Greek and Latin Poets." B. at Ferrara, 1479; D. 1552.

GIRALDI, John Baptist Cintio, an Italian poet and physician, who became secretary to the duke of Ferrara, and professor of rhetoric at Pavia. He wrote tragedies, poems, and histories; but his principal work is entitled "Ecatomiti; or, A Hundred Novels." B. at Ferrara, 1504; D. 1573.

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS, jir-ŭl'-aus kām-bren'-s, an old English writer, whose real name was Gerald Barri. He was appointed to several rich benefices under Henry II. and Richard I., and administered the bishopric of St. David, which he vainly endeavoured to obtain for himself. When Richard Cœur de Lion was setting out on his crusade, Giraldus was named governor of the kingdom in his absence. His principal works are, "Topographia Hiberniæ," "Itinerarium Cambriæ," "De Rebus a se gestis," which is a journal of his life, and displays no inconsiderable amount of vanity; "Ecclesiæ Speculum," in which he censures the manners of the monks. B. near Pembroke, about 1146; D. at St. David's, about 1220.

GIRAUD, Gabriel, zhe-raŭd, a French abbé, author of a "Dictionary of French Synonyms," a work which has been reprinted, with additions, many times. He was amonier to the duchess de Berri, and the king's interpreter for the Russian and Slavonian languages. Besides the above, he wrote other works; among which the best known is "Principes de la Langue Française." B. at Clermont, Auvergne, 1677; D. 1748.

GIRAUD, Stephen, an American millionaire, who came of poor French parents, and being driven from his home, embarked as a cabin-boy at Bordeaux, and landed at New York. Thence he went to Philadelphia, where he got into business, and by his industry and intelligence, combined with his penurious habits, amassed an immense fortune. He left behind him nearly £3,000,000 sterling; and, by his will, did not leave his fortune to his family, but to found a college at Philadelphia, from which all ministers of religion were to be excluded. B. at Périgueux, 1750; D. at Philadelphia, 1831.

GIRARDIN, Émile de, zhe'-rar-ān, a celebrated modern French publicist, who was, up to his 25th year, known as Émile Delamothé. In 1827, however, he claimed the name by which he was afterwards to be known, and, in the same year, produced his first essay in literature, under the title of "Émile." This was followed, in the next year, by "Au Hasard, Fragmens sans Suite d'une Histoire sans Fin." This is the romance of his birth and his early years. Soon after, he founded two journals—"Le Voleur," and "La Mode." After 1830, M. de Girardin published successively the "Journal des Connaissances Utiles," which attained, in a few months, a circulation of 120,000; the "Journal des Instituteurs Primaires," of which more than a million copies were sold; an "Atlas de France," and a "Universal Atlas," at a halfpenny a map. All these were published as emanating from "A National Society for Intellectual Freedom," and had considerable influence on the progress of popular education. All this, however, did not suffice for his restless activity; and, in 1836, "La Presse" was started, as an organ of conservative policy. The appearance of this paper caused a complete change in Parisian journalism, and, attacked on all sides, M. de Girardin fought a duel with Armand Carrel (see that name), the editor of the "National," which ended fatally for the latter. In 1834 he was elected deputy by the college of Bouganouf (Creuze), and was accused of electoral corruption. In 1839 he supported the minister Molé against the coalition, and, during the greater part of his career, Guizot had the support of the "Presse." In 1846 this great journalist was excluded from the French chamber, under the pretext that he was not a Frenchman. In February, 1849, he aided the revolution, and penetrating into the Tuileries, presented to Louis Philippe a notice demanding his abdication and the regency of the duchess of Orleans. After the revolution, M. de Girardin was returned to the Assembly for the Lower Rhine, and voted with the "Mountain" party. To him is due, it is said, the gaining over of Victor Hugo to the republican cause; the poet being, with him, the principal editor of "L'Avenirment." After Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of December 2, 1851, M. de Girardin was banished from France; but, two months after, was allowed to return. He again undertook the management of his journal, which he retained till the end of 1856, when he parted with his portion of the property for a sum which amounted to nearly £33,000 sterling. In 1828 he married Mlle. Delphine Gay (see MADAME DE GIRARDIN), who died in 1855. M. de Girardin has left no trace behind him in chamber or assembly; for he is neither the leader of a party, and still less is he an orator; he is a publicist, a journalist, a great mover of ideas, and his place was in the journal which he created and rendered formidable to every party. There, in "La Presse," one saw M. Guizot, as well as the provisional government, each in their turn, supported and opposed. So, too, were the reactionists' movements and the republicans'. General Cavaignac was savagely treated in its columns; Louis Napoleon's candidature for the presidency was there proposed, and supported by every means that could be brought to bear; and once more there was a change in the journal's tone, and it fought hard in the ranks of the socialists and revolutionists. Thus did Girardin raise against himself violent animosities in every party, which he repaid, it is said, by a great contempt for men. In spite, however, of all these changes of opinion, the "Presse" was no less read; and it remained, with all its varying shades, during the twenty years of his direction, one of the best-edited journals of Paris, and, so to speak, a field of battle open to all comers. B. in Paris, June 23, 1806.

Gladstone

GIRARDIN, Delphine Gay, Madame Émile de, a French poetess, the wife of the above, received a literary education, and at 17 produced some poems, the patriotic character of which procured her the surname of the "Muse of the country." In 1822 she obtained a prize from the French Academy for her "Sœurs de Saint Camille;" and, during the three or four following years, she published many pieces on the Greeks, Romans, Franks, General Foy, Napoleon, and Charles X.; the latter allowing her from his privy purse a pension of 1500 francs. After several other effusions, she went, in 1827, with her mother, Sophie Gay, to Italy, where quite an ovation attended her. In 1831 she married M. de Girardin, and, after this, wrote several fugitive pieces, elegies, and satires. But what, above all, contributed to the reputation of this lady, and to the success of her husband's journal, were her "Lettres Parisiennes," a series of sparkling, gossiping letters, published in "La Presse," with the signature of the Vicomte de Launay. Madame de Girardin was also the author of several tragedies, comedies, and farces, many of which were eminently successful. B. at Aix-la-Chapelle, 1804; d. 1855.

GIAUDON, François, she'-ro-daw'-n, a French sculptor and architect, who, after being aided by Séguier, was sent to Rome by Louis XIV., to perfect himself in his art. He succeeded Le Brun, on the death of that artist, as inspector-general of sculpture. His chief works are the mausoleum of Richelieu, in the church of the Sorbonne; the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., which formerly stood in the Place Vendôme, but was destroyed in the Revolution; and the "Rape of Proserpine," standing in the gardens of Versailles. B. at Troyes, 1629; d. at Paris, 1715.

GIRODET, Anne Louis, she'-ro-dai, better known as Girodet-Trioson, a famous French painter, was a pupil of David, and at the age of twenty-one gained high academical honours. He afterwards went to Rome, and there produced his "Endymion," and "Hippocrates refusing the presents of Artaxerxes," which are esteemed his finest productions. He also painted a "Scene from the Deluge," which is in the Louvre, and which bore away the prize, although Girodet's old master, David, was one of the exhibitors. Besides these, he painted "The Burial of Attila," a full-length portrait of Napoleon I., and a variety of other excellent pieces. B. at Montargis, 1767; d. 1824.

GLADSTONE, the Right Honourable William Ewart, glad'-stone, the fourth son of a wealthy Liverpool merchant, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and, in 1832, was returned to the House of Commons as member for Newark, in the Conservative interest. In 1834 he was appointed by Sir Robert Peel to a seat in the Treasury, and, in the following year, became under-secretary for colonial affairs. In the same year he retired, with his great leader, from office, and, till 1841, continued with Sir Robert Peel in opposition, when, on the return of that statesman to power, Mr. Gladstone became a privy-councillor, and was appointed vice-president of the Board of Trade and master of the Mint. In this position he greatly distinguished himself by his masterly defence of the commercial policy of the government he represented, and which it was his duty to explain. In 1513 he became president of the Board of Trade, which office he resigned in 1845. In the following year he became secretary of state for the colonies, and adhered to Sir Robert Peel's measure, which proposed a modification of the corn-laws. In 1847 he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford, in which position he found himself so frequently at variance with his friends on the bill for repealing the last of the Jewish disabilities, that, in 1852, he seceded from the Conservative party, and refused to take office under the administration of the earl of Derby. In the same year he was again returned for the university of Oxford, and chiefly contributed to the overthrow of the short-lived Derby government by his masterly speech on the budget introduced by Mr. Disraeli. On the accession of the Aberdeen ministry, he became chancellor of the Exchequer; and under the Palmerston administration, which succeeded it, held the same post; but resigned it in a few days, in consequence of Mr. Roebuck's determination to persevere in his resolution of having a committee of inquiry into the state of the British army before Sebastopol. In 1853 he undertook a mission to the Ionian Islands, and in 1859 was again appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, under the Palmerston ministry. In the early part of 1860 he brought in his budget, which carried out the principles of free trade in the path of Sir Robert Peel; and, in the following year, he may be said to have completed the work of free-trade legislation by repealing the duty on paper, and removing almost every protective impost which had been left on the statute-book. The commercial treaty with France found in Mr. Gladstone an eloquent defender, and it was mainly owing to his efforts that the bill sanctioning the treaty passed the House of Commons. In 1865 Mr. Gladstone's advanced opinions caused him to be rejected by the University of Oxford, and he was returned for South Lancashire. After the death of Lord Palmerston, he was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Earl Russell's cabinet, which went out of office in 1866, having suffered defeat on Mr. Gladstone's Reform Bill. In 1863 he brought forward his "Suspensory Bill," intended to pave the way to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. Mr. Disraeli, who was then premier, appealed to the country, and Mr. Gladstone's policy being endorsed by the result of the general election, he became premier, and, in 1869, carried his bill against the Irish Church. Mr. Gladstone has gained great reputation as a classical scholar. In 1839 he published the first edition of "The State in its Relations with the Church"; in 1853, his "Homeric Studies"; and in 1869, "Juventus Mundi." n. at Liverpool, 1869.

GLANVILLE, Ranulph de, glan'-vil, chief justice of all England, was the grandson of a judge of the same name who came in with the Conqueror. After presiding in the court of Henry II., he resigned, and was sent to prison, at the accession of Richard I., in order to compel him to contribute to the expenses of the Crusade. He, nevertheless, accompanied Cœur de Lion to the Holy Land, and was killed at the siege of Acre, at a very advanced age, in 1190. He wrote "Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ," and to him is attributed the famous Writ of Assize, on "de novel disseisin."

GLANVILLE, Joseph, an English divine, who, at the Restoration, became a member of the Royal Society, being a zealous advocate for the new philosophy. In 1686 he was presented to the rectory of the abbey church at Bath, at which time he published his "Considerations on the Being of Witches and Witchcraft," in which he certainly betrays a puerile credulity. In 1673 he obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Worcester. b. at Plymouth, 1636; d. at Bath, 1690. Besides the above, Glanvil wrote several pieces in defence of revealed religion and experimental philosophy. After his death, his discourses and remains were published.

GLASS, John, glass, a Scotch Presbyterian divine, who founded a sect, called in Scotland Glassites, and in England Sandemanians. In 1727 he published a work to prove that the civil establishment of religion is inconsistent with Christianity, for which he was deposed. He subsequently became the founder of his sect, and wrote several controversial tracts in 4 vols. vo. b. at Dundee, 1693; d. 1773.

GLAUBER, John Rodolph, glau'-ber, a German chemist, who, after considerable travelling, settled in Holland. He was a great follower of alchemy, and expended much of his time in the search after the philosopher's stone. His researches were not altogether valueless, for he made some useful discoveries; amongst others, that of Glauber's salts, or sulphate of soda, a neutral purgative. His works are in one volume, an English translation of which was published in 1693. d. at Amsterdam, 1663.

GLERM, Johann Wilhelm Louis, gleam, a famous German lyric poet, received his education at Halle, and in 1747 was appointed secretary to the Chapter at Halberstadt, and soon after canon of Walbeck. He composed a number of war-songs for the Prussian army, which were very popular, and his lighter compositions obtained for him the designation of the "Anacreon of Germany." He also wrote tales, epigrams, fables, and songs for children, which were greatly in vogue, and have been several times reprinted. A complete edition of his works was published at Halberstadt in 1811-12, in 7 vols. 8vo. n. 1719; d. 1803.

GLENDOWER, or GLENDWR, Owen, glen'-door, a celebrated Welshman, lineally descended from Llewellyn, the last prince of Wales. For fourteen years he opposed Henry IV., declaring him a usurper of the English throne. n. 1319; d. 1415. In the opening scene of the third act of the First Part of Shakspeare's "Henry IV." occurs an interesting interview between Hotspur and this fiery Welshman, who there describes himself as—

"Not in the roll of common men;"

and further tells us that—

"Three times hath Henry Bolingbroke made head Against my power; thrice from the banks of Wye,
And sandy-bottom'd Severn have I sent him
Bootless home and weather-beaten back."

GLENIE, James, glen'-e, a mathematician, was a native of Scotland, and was educated at St. Andrews, from whence he removed to a cadetship at Woolwich. He was a member of the Royal Society, and was an active opponent of Sir Joseph Banks, in 1784; and in 1785, of the duke of Richmond's fortification scheme; for the part he took in regard to which he lost his situation. He next went to America, and after being employed for some time on the works at Halifax, again got into disputes, and had to return to England. He was subsequently appointed preceptor of the Military Academy of the East India Company, which place he likewise lost through indiscretion. He published a "History of Germany," "The Doctrine of Universal Comparison and General Proportion," "The Antecedental Calculus," "Observations on Construction," &c., besides papers in the "Philosophical Transactions." s. 1750; p. 1817.

GLISSON, Francis, glis-son, an eminent English anatomist and physician, who, after studying at Caius College, Cambridge, was appointed Regius professor of physic, which chair he filled for forty years. He went to Colchester on the breaking out of the civil war, from whence he removed to London, and became president of the College of Physicians. He devoted special attention to the disease called rickets, on which he wrote a treatise, and therein described the prolongation of the cellular tissue since called "the capsule of Glisson." He pointed out the peculiarity of muscular fibre to which Haller afterwards gave the name of irritability; and besides various works on physiology and medicine, wrote a metaphysical treatise of much profundity entitled "De Natura Substantia Energetica, seu de Vita Naturæ." s. in Dorsetshire, 1598; p. 1677.

GLOVER, Richard, glu-er, an poet and dramatist, the son of a London merchant, was educated at Cheam School, where, at sixteen, he wrote some verses to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, which obtained considerable applause. On leaving school, he embraced commercial pursuits, under his father, who was engaged in the Hamburg trade. In 1737 he married a lady of fortune; soon after which he published his "Leonidas," an epic poem. His poem entitled "London, or the Progress of Commerce," appeared in 1739. The same year he published a popular ballad, called "Hosier's Ghost," intended to rouse the national spirit against the Spaniards. About this time he distinguished himself as a city politician; and his oratorical talents and knowledge of public affairs were so great, that he was appointed to manage an application to Parliament in behalf of the London merchants; on which occasion his speech at the bar of the House of Commons was printed, and much applauded. In 1753 his tragedy of "Boadicea" was brought out at Drury Lane, but, though supported by Garrick, Mossop, Mrs. Cibber, &c., it did not succeed, having been performed only nine nights; his "Medea," some years after, met with greater attention. At the accession of George III. he was chosen M.P. for Weymouth. s. 1712; p. 1785.

GLOVER, Mrs. a distinguished actress, who, under the tuition of her father, Mr. Betterton, commenced her theatrical career at the age of six; and after a highly successful appearance in the provinces, was engaged by Mr. Harris, of Covent Garden, where she made her debut as Elvina in Hannah More's "Percy," in 1797. She afterwards made the parts of "Dame Heidelberg" and "Mrs. Malaprop" peculiarly her own, her performance of which will long be remembered. Mrs. Glover appeared chiefly at the Haymarket in her later years, and had few equals in her theatrical walk; her Shakspearian readings also ranked very high. s. at Newry, Ireland, 1781; p. 1850.

GLOUCESTER, Robert of, glos-ter, the oldest of the English poets, lived in the time of Henry III. Camden quotes many of his rhymes, and speaks highly of him. His chief work was a metrical chronicle of English history to the year 1271.

GLOUCESTER, William Frederic, duke of, son of prince William Henry, duke of Gloucester (brother to George III.), received the completion of his education at the university of Cambridge. He entered the army, served under the Duke of York in Holland, and subsequently attained the rank of field-marshal. He married his cousin, the Princess Mary, fourth daughter of George III., in 1805, but had no issue by her. The duke usually acted with the Whigs, and was distinguished for his support of popular philanthropic measures, especially of the Anti-slavery Society. He, however, opposed the reform bill, introduced by his former political friends. He was of an open disposition and affable manners, and utterly devoid of ostentation. He was chancellor of the university of Cambridge; in which office he was succeeded by the marquis Camden. s. at Rome, 1776; p. 1834.

GLUCK, Christopher, glook, an eminent musician, who, after studying in Italy, visited England, and composed for the opera-house. He next went to Vienna, where he acquired great eminence; in 1774 he went to Paris, and his pieces were performed with such applause that he obtained a pension. His principal operas are, "The Fall of the Giants," "Orfeo," "Alceste," "Iphigénie en Aulide," "Echo et Narcisse," and "Armide." s. on the borders of Bohemia, in the Upper Palatinate, 1714; p. at Vienna, 1787. Besides his operas, he wrote "Letters on Music."

GMELIN, John George, me-lin, a German botanist and physician, who became member of the academy at Petersburg, and was employed by the Russian government to explore, with others, the boundaries of Siberia. The result of his labours was his "Flora Siberica, seu Historia Plantarum Siberiæ," 4 vols. 4to. s. at Tubingen, 1709; p. 1755.

GMELIN, Samuel Gottlieb, nephew of the preceding, took his degree in medicine at his native place, and after travelling in France and Holland, went to Petersburg. The empress of Russia appointed him to travel in Astrakhan, in 1768. He next explored the coast of the Caspian Sea; but, on his journey to Russia, was seized by the Tartars, and died in confinement in 1774. s. at Tubingen, 1743. He wrote "Historia Fucorum," and "Travels through Russia."

GMELIN, John Frederick, an eminent physician and chemist, who became professor of chemistry and natural history at Göttingen. He published numerous pieces on the Materia Medica, chemistry, mineralogy, and every part of natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturæ" of Linnaeus. He was also the author of a "History of Chemistry;" and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes from mineral and vegetable substances. s. at Tubingen, 1743; p. at Göttingen, in 1804.

GNEISENAU, Augustus Neidhardt, Count, nee-ain-oo, an able Prussian general, who, at the age of 20, entered into the service of the margrave of Anspach. His first employment was in America, whither he was sent with the auxiliary troops of the margrave in British pay. He became attached to the Prussian army as a rabakern, in 1742; and in 1807 had attained the rank of a lieutenant-colonel, and defended the fortress of Colberg against the forces of Bonaparte. For his skill and bravery on that occasion he was promoted; and was afterwards employed in a secret mission to England. In 1813 he was made lieutenant-general, and greatly distinguished himself on the Katzbach, at the passage of the Elbe, and at Leipsic; and subsequently, under Blücher, he contributed to the victories over the French at Brienne, Laon, &c. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, Gneisenau became chief of Blücher's staff, and greatly contributed to bringing up the Prussians at the battle of Waterloo, and in carrying on the subsequent pursuit. In reward of his numerous services the king of Prussia raised him to the dignity of a count, made him a field-marshal and governor of Berlin, and granted him an estate in Silesia. b. 1769; d. 1829.

GODELIN, Gilles, gobé-lîn, a French dyer, who is famous for having invented the fine scarlet which goes by his name. He resided in the Faubourg of St. Marcel, in Paris, where his house still bears his name. Lived in the 16th century.

GODDARD, Jonathan, god'-dard, an English physician and chemist, who was educated at Oxford, but took his degrees in physic at Cambridge. He was one of the first members of the society afterwards called the Royal, fellow of the College of Physicians, and physician to Cromwell, by whom he was appointed warden of Merton College, Oxford. At the Restoration he lost that situation, on which he removed to Gresham College, of which he was medical professor. Bishop Ward says he was the first Englishman who made a telescope. b. at Greenwich, 1617; d. 1674. He wrote on the abuses of the apothecaries, and several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions."

GODEFROI, Denys, god'-froye, an eminent jurist, and a counsellor in the parliament of Paris. Being a Protestant, he was obliged to quit France, on which he settled first at Geneva, and afterwards at Strasburg, where he died in 1621. b. 1540. His works are—"Corpus Juris civilis, cum Notis," 4to; "Notæ in IV. Libris Institutionum," "Opuscula Varia Juris," &c.—His eldest son, Theodore, became a Catholic, and counsellor of state in France. b. at Strasburg, in 1642. He wrote on the genealogical history of France.—James, another son of Denys, adhered to the religion of his father, and became professor of law at Geneva, and a member of the council. b. 1659. He wrote several learned works, and edited Cicero and other ancient writers.—Denys, son of Theodore, wrote "Mémoires et Instructions pour servir dans les Négociations des Affaires concernant les Droits du Roi," folio. b. 1681.—John, son of the last-mentioned, d. in 1732. He edited Philip de Comines' Memoirs, 5 vols. 8vo; and wrote the Memoirs of Queen Margaret, &c.

GODFREY of Viterbo, god'-fre, an historian who lived in the 12th century, was chaplain and secretary to Conrad III. and the emperors Frederick and Henry VI. He laboured 40 years in compiling a chronicle from the creation of the world to the year 1186. It is written in a mixture of prose and verse, and was first printed at Bale in 1559.

GODFREY, Sir Edmundbury, a magistrate, who was active in the discovery of the popish plot in 1678, and was made remarkable by the manner of his death. His body was found pierced by his own sword, and with many marks of violence; on which account his death was imputed to the papists, and his funeral was performed with great pomp. b. 1621; d. 1678.

GODFREY OF BOUVILLON. (See BOUVILLON, GODFREY DE.)

GODIVA, go-di'-va, a lady celebrated for an uncommon instance of generosity, the wife of Leofric, earl of Mercia.

GODOLPHIN, Sidney, go-dol'-phin, a poet, born of an ancient family in Cornwall, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1610 he was elected member of parliament for Heston, where he took the part of the earl of Stafford. He afterwards joined the king's army, but was slain in an action with the rebels at Chagford, in Devonshire, in 1643. b. 1610. He wrote several poems, and translated "The Passion of Bido for Æneas," from Virgil, printed in 1653, 8vo. He was very intimate with Hobbes, who, in his "Leviathan," thus speaks of him: "I have known clearness of judgment and largeness of fancy, strength of reason and graceful eloquence, a courage for the war, and a fear for the laws, and all eminently in one man, and that was my most noble and honoured friend, Mr. Sidney Godolphin." Lord Clarendon says, that great as this eulogy is, it was deserved—

"Thou'rt dead, Godolphin, who lov'dst reason true, Justice and peace;—soldier beloved, adieu!"

GODOLPHIN, Sidney, earl of, a native of Cornwall, and educated at Oxford, was employed in the public service in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. In the convention parliament he voted for a regency; notwithstanding which he was made first commissioner of the Treasury; honoured with the order of the Garter; and, two years after, was raised to an earldom. b. 1712.

the public

GODWIN, god'-win, a powerful Saxon lord and earl of Kent, who, in 1017, accompanied Canute in an expedition against Sweden, where he behaved with such valour as to receive the daughter of that monarch in marriage, and large grants of land. On the death of Canute, he sided with Hardicanute against Harold, but afterwards espoused the cause of the latter. He was charged with murdering Alfred, one of the sons of Ethelred II., from which he vindicated himself by oath. On the death of Hardicanute, he joined Edward, who married his daughter; but afterwards he rebelled against his sovereign, and being unsuccessful, fled to Flanders. Having gathered fresh forces, he sailed up the Thames, and appeared before London, which threw the country into such confusion, that the king was obliged to negotiate peace with Godwin, who was restored to his estates. b. suddenly, while dining with the king at Winchester, in 1053.

GODWIN, William, was the son of a dissenting minister, and was himself educated in a dissenting college, and in 1778 became minister of a congregation in London; but soon afterwards took charge of a meeting-house at Stowmarket, Suffolk. In 1782 he determined to quit the ministry, and, in order to pursue literature as a profession, he removed to London as a permanent residence. His first work appeared in 1793, and was entitled "Political Justice," which brought to its author much public notoriety and £700. "Whatever may be its mistakes," says Sir James Mackintosh, in noticing the work in the "Edinburgh Review," "it is certain that works in which errors equally dangerous are maintained with far less ingenuity, have obtained for their authors a conspicuous place in the philosophical history of the 18th century." In the following year appeared his novel of "Caleb Williams," which, whatever may be its merits as a novel, has certainly a political tendency: "a general review of the modes of domestic despotism, by which man becomes the destroyer of man." For this production he received only £34, although there is hardly another fiction in the English language so intensely interesting. His next work worthy of notice was his "St. Leon," which appeared in 1799, and for the copyright of which he received 400 guineas. It is a supernatural tale, and has none of the merits of his "Caleb Williams," unless it be where he describes Bethlem Gabor. In 1801 he produced "Antonio; or, the Soldier's Return," a tragedy, which Judge Talfourd pronounced "a miracle of dulness," a judgment which was amply proved at its representation; for it was hooted from the stage in the presence of its unhappy author. He next published a "Life of Chaucer," which can claim no pretensions to merit of any kind, except it be the dreariness of prolixity, if such be merit. In 1805 appeared his "Fleetwood; or, the New Man of Feeling," which, in 1807, was succeeded by his "Faulkner; a Tragedy." This met a similar fate to that which befell his "Antonio." Several other works continued to flow from the prolific pen of Godwin; such as his "Essay on Sepulchres," a "Life of Chatham," the "Lives of the Nephews of John Milton," and one or two others of a passing kind, till 1817, when his novel of "Mandeville" appeared. This effort was generally pronounced inferior to his former productions in the same path. In 1820 his "Essay on Population" was brought out, in answer to the theory propounded by Malthus, and this, in 1824, was succeeded by his "History of the Commonwealth of England," &c., which was well received. In 1830, when 74 years old, he produced his novel of "Cloudesley;" in 1831 his "Thoughts on Man;" and in 1834 his last work, the "Lives of the Neomaneers." He had now filled up the measure of his existence, and laid down his pen to look around him and to die. b. at Wisbeach, Cambridgeshire, 1756; d. 1836.

GODWIN, Mary, wife of the above, better known by her maiden name of Wollstonecraft, was the daughter of a small farmer. She wrote "Thoughts on the Education of Daughters," a "Moral and Historical View of the French Revolution," and several other works which enjoyed considerable popularity in their day. Her character, however, is pronounced by the "Gentleman's Magazine" to have been "grossly irreligious, indelicate, and dissolute." Her only daughter became the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley, the poet. b. either in Norfolk or Yorkshire, 1759; d. 1797.

Peuples," 3 vols. 4to, which has been translated into English. b. at Paris, 1716; d. 1758.

GOLDOONI, Charles, gol'-do'-ne, an Italian writer, who, at an early age, discovered a propensity to the drama, when his father caused a theatre to be built for him in his house. The Italian stage was reformed by him; and his comedies, which are numerous, are exceedingly humorous and natural. About 1701 he went to Paris, and became composer to the Italian theatre, besides which he had an appointment at court. b. at Venice, 1707; d. 1783. A complete edition of his works were printed at Venice, in 44 vols. 8vo.

GOLDSCHMIDT, Madame Jenny, gold'-schmit, an eminent vocalist, better known by her maiden name of Jenny Lind, a Swedish lady, who showed a great talent for music when but a child of three years of age. After a brilliant career as an operatic singer in Europe and America from 1844 to 1851, she retired from the stage, and married M. Otto Goldschmidt, a pianist. b. at Stockholm, 1821.

GOLDSMITH, Oliver, gold'-smith, one of the most distinguished ornaments of English literature, was the son of a clergyman of the Established Church, who held the living of Kilkenny West, in Ireland. Oliver, at an early age, was consigned to the charge of the village schoolmaster, one Thomas Byrne, a retired quartermaster of an Irish regiment, whose peculiarities are commemorated in the poem of "The Deserted Village," and form one of the finest poetical portraits in the language. Subsequently, he was sent to Trinity College, Dublin, and thence to Edinburgh, to study physic, where he entered freely into all the social convivialities of the inhabitants. Having become security for the debt of a fellow-student, he was obliged to flee to England; but was arrested at Sunderland, and released by two college friends whom he there accidentally met. He was next sent to Leyden, in Holland, through the generosity of an uncle, Contarine, whose exhaustless goodness and kindness to the wayward and thoughtless Oliver do honour to his species. Leaving Leyden, poor but adventurous, Goldsmith, in February, 1755, set out to travel over Europe on foot. On this occasion, and for this enterprise, he was furnished with exactly "one guinea in his pocket, a shirt on his back, and a flute in his hand." He partly "disputed his way," by accepting university challenges; and when weary of this, he betook himself to his flute; and "whenever I approached a peasant's house towards night-fall," he beautifully says, "I played one of my most merry tunes, and that procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day." The remembrance of the festive joy which his merry pipe produced at such times is finely recalled in his poem of "The Traveller." At Louvain he took the degree of bachelor of physic, the highest degree he ever attained. He returned to England in 1756. Being reduced to a low state pecuniarily, he became usher in a school at Peckham, where, however, he did not long remain, but settled in London, and subsisted by writing for periodical publications. One of his first performances was an "Inquiry into the State of Polite Learning in Europe." He next commenced a weekly periodical called "The Bee," but it failed; and, in 1760, he contributed to the "Public Ledger" of Mr. Newberry, his celebrated "Chinese Letters." He, at the same time, became a contributor to various other publications; but he emerged from obscurity in 1764, by the publication of his poem entitled "The Traveller; or, a Prospect of Society;" of which Dr. Johnson said "that there had not been so fine a poem since Pope's time." The year following appeared his beautiful novel of "The Vicar of Wakefield." His circumstances were now respectable, and he took chambers in the Temple; but the liberality of his disposition, and a propensity to gaming, involved him in frequent difficulties. In 1768 he brought out his comedy of "The Good-Natured Man" at Covent Garden; but its reception was not equal to its merits. In 1770 he published "The Deserted Village," a poem which, in point of description and pathos, is beyond all praise. As a dramatic and comic poet, he appeared to great advantage in the play of "She Stoops to Conquer; or, the Mistakes of a Night," which was produced in 1773, and which is still a favourite with the public. Besides these performances, he produced a number of others; as, a "History of England, in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son," 2 vols. 12mo. This useful and pleasing work was, for a long time, attributed to Lord Lyttleton. "A History of England," 4 vols. 8vo; "A Roman History," 2 vols. 8vo; "A Grecian History," 2 vols.; "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature," 8 vols. 8vo; and other works, all bearing the impress of an original and truly gentle and beautiful genius. B. at Pallas, near Longford, Ireland, 1728; D. in London, 1774, and was buried in the Temple churchyard. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, with a Latin epitaph by Dr. Johnson.

GOLIVS, James, go'-le-oos, a learned Orientalist, who was educated at Leyden, after which he went to France, and taught the Greek language at Rochelle. In 1822 he accompanied the Dutch ambassador to the emperor of Morocco, who was highly pleased with his conversation. After his return, he succeeded to the Arabic professorship. In 1825 he went to the Levant, and made excursions into Arabia, and, in 1829, returned to Leyden, where he was chosen professor of mathematics, which station he filled with great honour till his death, in 1867. B. at the Hague, 1596. He published an "Arabic Lexicon," a "Persian Dictionary," the "Saraeen History of Elmacin," the "Life of Tamerlane," the "Astronomical Elements of GOLVUS, Peter, an elder brother of the preceding, was the author of several works, both in Greek and Latin, and founded a monastery of the Barefooted Carmelites on Mount Libanus. He was afterwards employed on a mission to the East Indies, and died at Surat, about 1673. B. at Leyden. He had a considerable share in editing the grand Arabic Bible printed at Rome in 1671. He also translated some religious manuals into that language.

GOLYDAN, go'-lid'-dan, the bard of Cadwallader, the last nominal king of the Britons. Flourished in the latter part of the 7th and beginning of the 8th century.

GOMAR, Francis, go'-mar, a zealous defender of the Calvinistic doctrines, who studied at both the English universities, and, in 1594, became professor of divinity at Leyden. When Arminius was chosen as his colleague, in 1603, a difference arose between them on the subjects of grace and predestination, and Gomar conducted himself in the controversy with great bitterness. In 1611 he resigned his professorship, and went to Middleburg, whence, in 1614, he removed to Saumur, and afterwards to Groningen. He distinguished himself by his ardour against the Arminians at the synod of Dort. His works are almost wholly polemical. B. at Bruges, 1583; D. at Groningen, 1641.

GOMBAULD, John Ogier de, gom'-bolt, a French poet, and one of the first members of the French Academy. His works are tragedies, pastorals, romances, sonnets, and epigrams. D. in 1666.

GOMM, Field-marshal Sir William Maynard, G.C.B., gom, a British officer, entered the army as ensign of the 9th Regiment, in 1798; soon after which, when only sixteen years of age, he carried the colours of his regiment into action in Holland. He served in the operations in the Helder in 1799, including the action of the 19th September at Bergen. He accompanied the expeditions on the coast of France and Spain, under Sir James Pulteney, in 1801; that to Hanover, in 1805; and that to Stralsund and Copenhagen in 1807. He was on active service throughout the campaign of 1809, including the battles of Roleia, Vimiera, and Corunna. He was present with the expedition at Walcheren, and at the siege of Flushing, in 1809. In 1810 he was ordered once more to the Peninsula, where he served during the remainder of the war: the chief part of the time as assistant-quarter-master-general. He assisted at the battles of Busaco and Fuentes d'Onor; at the assault and capture of Badajoz; at the battle of Salamanca; at the action at Villa Muriel; and at the battles of St. Sebastian, Vittoria, and Nive. He also took part in the campaign of 1815, including the battle of Waterloo. Sir William Gomm received the gold cross and one clasp for Badajoz, Salamanca, Vittoria, St. Sebastian, and Nive, and the silver war-medal with six clasps for Roleia, Vimiera, Corunna, Busaco, Fuentes d'Onor, and Nivelle. At Waterloo he was quarter-master-general to Picton's "Fighting Division;" and in 1815 was created a knight commander of the Bath. He long commanded the Coldstream Guards, and was at the head of the brigade, consisting of two battalions, when he attained the rank of major-general. He was shortly afterwards, in 1839 or 1840, appointed to the command of the troops in Jamaica. On his return to England he was appointed to the northern district; and whilst he was holding that command in 1845 he was nominated civil governor and commander of the forces in the Mauritius. He attained the rank of general in the army in 1854. He succeeded Sir Charles Napier as commander-in-chief in India in 1851, but resigned in 1855. He is now (1869) one of the four field-marshal of England. B. 1734.

GONDEBAUD, or GUNDOBALD, gon'-de-bo, third king of Burgundy, who ascended the throne on the death of his brother Chilperic in 491. He ravaged Italy, and in 499 called a council at Lyons to reconcile the Catholics and Arians, but without success. Soon after this he was defeated by Clovis, king of the Franks, and his brother Godesil; but on becoming tributary to the former, he recovered his dominions. Gondebaud then put his brother to death. He afterwards reigned in peace, civilized his country, and introduced a system of laws still extant by the title of "La Loi Goubrette." D. in 516.

GONGORA. Louis, gon'-gor-a, a celebrated

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Gonsalvo

Spanish poet, was called by his countrymen the prince of lyric poets. His style, however, is often difficult to comprehend, even to the Spaniards themselves, among whom he has had almost as many censurers as admirers. b. 1562 d. 1627.

GONSALVO, Hernandez de Cordova, gon-sal'-ve, surnamed the Great Captain, a Spanish commander, was descended from a noble family, and distinguished himself in the conquest of Granada, under Ferdinand and Isabella. Afterwards he was sent to Naples, which he recovered almost entirely from the French. He next conquered Apulia and Calabria, and captured Tarento in 1501. Two years afterwards he entered Naples in triumph, and, for his services, was made a constable of that kingdom and duke of Terranova. Ferdinand, however, being jealous of the Great Captain, recalled him, and banished him to his estate in Granada, where he died in 1515. b. 1453.

GOOD, John Mason, good, a physician, poet, and philologist, was the son of a dissenting minister, and having been apprenticed to a surgeon, first practised at Coggeshall; but in 1793 he settled in London, as a surgeon and apothecary; and having obtained a diploma from the university of Aberdeen, commenced practice as a physician in 1800. Dr. Good exercised the most indefatigable perseverance in the attainment of knowledge, without allowing his literary studies to interfere with the duties of his profession. It is stated of him, that so incessant and multifarious were his labours in 1803, that he was finishing a translation of "Solomon's Song," carrying on his "Life of Dr. Geddes," walking from twelve to fourteen miles a day to see his patients (his business as a surgeon then producing upwards of £1400 per annum), editing the "Critical Review," and supplying a column of matter, weekly, for the "Sunday Review;" added to which he had, for a short period, the management of the "British Press" newspaper. In the winter of 1810, Dr. Good commenced his lectures at the Surrey Institution, which were published in 1826, in 3 vols., entitled "The Book of Nature." He produced many other valuable works, among which is "The Study of Medicine," 4 vols. b. at Epping, in Essex, 1764; d. 1827.

GOOD, Sir Daniel, goodch, an eminent engineer, for many years chief locomotive engineer to the Great Western Railway Company, and afterwards chairman of that company's board of directors. He was one of the purchasers of the Great Eastern, for the purpose of using her for laying the Atlantic Telegraph cable, which was successfully submerged in 1866. For this and other services he was created a baronet. b. at Bedlington, Northumberland.

GORDIANUS, M. Antonius Africanus, gor-di-an'-nus, a son of Metius Marcellus, descended from Trajan by his mother's side, was an example of piety and virtue. He composed a poem in thirty books, upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus and M. Aurelius. Having been promoted to the pretorship, and subsequently elected consul, he took the government of Africa in the capacity of pro-consul. After he had attained his 80th year, he was roused from a tranquil rule by the tyranny of the Maximini, and was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple; but the threats of immediate death forced his compliance. Maximinus marched against him with the greatest indignation; and Gordian sent his son with whom he shared the imperial dignity to oppose the enemy. Young Gordian was killed in battle the 25th of June, 237 A.D., and the father strangled himself at Carthage before he had been six weeks at the head of the empire, 237 A.D. He was universally lamented by the army and people.—M. Antoninus Pius, grandson of the first Gordian, was but twelve years old when he was honoured with the title of Cæsar. He was proclaimed emperor in his sixteenth year, and his election was attended with universal approbation. In his eighteenth year he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Mithæus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Gordian conquered Sapor, king of Persia, who had invaded the Roman provinces, and took many flourishing cities in the East. For this success the senate decreed him a triumph, and saluted Mithæus, his father-in-law, as the guardian of the republic. Assassinated in the East, 244 A.D.

GORDIUS, gor-de-us, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peasant, was raised to the throne in consequence of an oracle having told the Phrygians to give the crown to the first man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. The famous Gordian knot took its origin from this chariot. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught-tree was made in such an artful manner that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumstance a report was spread that the empire of Asia was promised, by the oracle, to him who could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conquest of Asia, passed by Gordium, and as he wished to inspire his soldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Asia, he cut the knot with his sword, and asserted that the oracle was then fulfilled, and that his claims to universal empire were fully justified.

GORDON, George, gor-don, commonly called Lord George Gordon, was the son of Cosmo George, duke of Gordon. At an early age he entered the navy, but subsequently quitted it in account of some dispute with Lord Sandwich. He afterwards sat in parliament for Luggershall, and brought himself into notice by his opposition to the bill for granting further toleration to Roman Catholics. His intemperance on this occasion proved the cause of the riots in 1780, for which he was tried and acquitted. In 1786 he was excommunicated for not appearing as a witness in a cause. In 1788 he was found guilty of publishing a libel against the queen of France, on which he fled to Holland. A little after this he returned to England, and was here he died in 1806. b. 1704.

GORDON, Sir John Watson, a distinguished portrait painter, who acquired his first acquaintance with the art of painting at the Academy of the Trustees for the Encouragement of Manufacturers in Scotland, then under the direction of John Graham, the master of Wilkie, afterwards succeeded in his office by Sir William Allan. During the four years that young Gordon studied under Graham, he had the natural desire to become an historical painter, but was finally induced to devote his talents to portraiture. During the entire progress of the Scottish Academy, John Watson Gordon exerted himself with commendable zeal to make it what it is. It was not until 1827 that Gordon first exhibited in the Royal Academy; continuing his contributions at infrequent intervals until 1835, when he became a regular and important exhibitor. In 1841 he was elected associate of the London Royal Academy. On the death of Sir William Allan in 1850, Mr. Watson Gordon was unanimously elected to the presidential chair of the Scottish Academy, and was soon afterwards knighted by Her Majesty, and elected Royal Academician. Sir John exercised his pencil in delineating the features of some of the most distinguished men of his time, among whom may be mentioned Sir Walter Scott, Dr. Chalmers, Mr. De Quincey, the late earl of Hopetoun, the late earl of Dalhousie, the Lord Justice-general Hope, the duke of Buccleugh, Principal Lee, the right hon. C. Shaw Lefevre, the late earl of Aberdeen, Lord Cockburn, &c. n. about 1790; p. 1804.

GORE, Mrs. Catherine Frances, gore, a distinguished English novelist, who, by her works, did more to familiarize the public mind with the tone of fashionable manners and conversation than any other writer of her day. Her novels and other works extend to upwards of 150 volumes. p. in Nottinghamshire, 1800; p. 1861.

GORGEI, Arthur, gor'-ge, a Hungarian, who, in 1837, entered the Hungarian life-guards, and, in 1843, was attached to the hussars of the Palatinate; but, in 1845, quitted the army and retired to his own estates, where he lived a quiet life, devoting himself principally to the study of the sciences. In 1848 he appeared as a volunteer in the field, in defence of his country against the Croats and Slavonians, and was invested with the rank of captain. His time was, at first, chiefly occupied in organizing the Hungarian forces; and, having been sent to operate in the neighbourhood of Pesth, on the Danube, he obtained full powers from the Hungarian prime-minister, Count Batthyani, to adjudicate upon cases of treason and other crimes in a court-martial. This power was first exercised upon Count Eugene Zichy, who had been found guilty of communicating with Jellachich, and upon whom the sentence of death was passed and carried into execution. Gorgei was subsequently called upon to act against General Roth, and was so far successful as to cause that general to lay down his arms. For this Gorgei obtained the rank of colonel. Subsequently he was defeated at the battle of Schwechat, notwithstanding which, he was appointed by Kossuth as commander-in-chief of the Hungarian armies. Fortune, however, did not smile upon him in the field, and he was shortly afterwards superseded in the command, but had it again conferred upon him. He then won the battle of Nagy-saró, and relieved the garrison of Komorn. Hungary was now declared an independent state, with Kossuth for its governor, and Gorgei for its minister-at-war. He next took Buda, but was subsequently forced to retreat before General Haynau. He next rose to be dictator of Hungary; but disaster attended the arms of the patriots, and he submitted to the emperor of Austria, and retired to Klagenfurt. n. at Toporez, 1818.

GORGAS, of Leontinum, gor'-je-as, a celebrated orator of the school of Empedocles, was a native of Leontinum, in Sicily. A golden statue was erected to his honour at Delphi. Plato has given his name to one of his dialogues. Lived 400 b.c.

GORTO, Antony Francesco, go'-re-o, a learned Italian antiquary, the author of "Museum Florentinum," or a description of the cabinet of the grand duke of Florence, 11 vols. fol.; "Museum Etruseum," 8 vols. folio; "Museum Cortesense," folio; "Ancient Inscriptions in the Towns of Tuscany," 3 vols. folio. n. in Florence; p. 1757.

GORTSCHAKOFF, gor'-sha-kef, the name of a noble Russian family, several members of which have played prominent parts in the history of that country. Of late years, three brothers of this house have figured conspicuously before the world, of whom the following particulars may be given:—

GORTSCHAKOFF, Prince Peter, a military commander, took part in the Russian wars against Turkey, and, in 1839, was made governor of Eastern Siberia. In 1843 he became general of infantry, and, in 1851, retired from service. n. 1790.

GORTSCHAKOFF, Prince Michael, played a prominent part in many of the Russian wars, and, in 1855, succeeded Prince Menschikoff in the command of the Russian forces in the Crimea. He superintended the defence of Sebastopol, which, however, he was at last forced to evacuate, making a masterly retreat. n. 1795; p. 1861.

GORTSCHAKOFF, Prince Alexander, a diplomatist, represented Russia at various European courts, and, in 1855, negotiated the peace between Russia and the Western Powers. He succeeded Count Nesselrode as head of the chancellerie for foreign affairs. n. 1798.

GOSSEC, François Joseph, gos'-sai-k, a distinguished French musical composer, the character of whose music is light, pleasing, and spirited. He founded the Concert of Amateurs, in 1770, at which the Chevalier de St. George played the first violin. He composed the apotheoses of Voltaire and J. J. Rousseau, and the funeral hymn for Mirabeau. n. 1753; p. 1829.

GOSSEX, Stephen, gos'-son, an English divine and poet, was educated at Christchurch, Oxford; and held the living of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate. He wrote three dramatic pieces; notwithstanding which, he published "Play confuted in Five several Actions," and "The School of Abuse," against poets and actors. n. 1554; p. 1623.

GÖTHE, John Wolfgang von, ge'(r)te(r), the most distinguished name in the modern literature of Germany, was in his fifteenth year sent to the university of Leipsic, where, however, he rather indulged in a desultory than a regular course of study. In 1768 he left the university of Leipsic, and went to that of Strasburg, with a view to the legal profession; but chemistry, anatomy, and other kindred sciences commanded more of his attention than the law. In 1771, however, he took the degree of doctor of jurisprudence, and went to Wetzlar, where love for a betrothed lady, and the suicide of a young man named Jerusalem, supplied him with subjects for speculation, which resulted in the production of "Werther." This work appeared in 1774, and immediately fixed public attention upon its author. In 1779 he entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, to whom he had been introduced, and who loaded him with honours. He was made president of the council-chamber, and ennobled. He took up his residence at Weimar, where he was surrounded by some of the first minds of Germany, and where the direction of the theatre was confided to his care. Here he brought out the chef-d'œuvre of Schiller, with splendid effect, and also produced several of his own dramatic poems. Of these we may mention his "Faust,"—his greatest work; "Goetz von Berlichingen," "Tasso," "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Stella," and "Count Egmont." In 1786 he left Weimar for Italy, and was absent two years, visiting Sicily, and remaining a considerable time in Rome. In 1792 he accompanied his prince in the campaign in Champagne, and was afterwards created minister. In 1807 he received from the emperor Alexander of Russia the order of Alexander Nevsky, and from Napoleon I. the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. His writings are too voluminous to be enumerated here; but we must not forget to mention his "Wilhelm Meister," a moral fiction; and his "Herman and Dorothea." The lyrics of Göthe are especially beautiful; but his "Faust" is a poem pre-eminently philosophical. b. at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, 1740; d. at Weimar, 1832.

GOTTSCHED, John Christopher, gof-sched, a German poet and philosophical writer, who became professor of philosophy, logic, and metaphysics, at Leipsic. He greatly improved the German language by his works, the principal of which are, "Essay towards a Critical History of Poetry for the Germans;" the "Death of Cato," a tragedy; "Collections towards a Critical History of the German Language, Poetry, and Eloquence;" "The First Principles of General Philosophy;" "The German Theatre;" "The Principles of the German Language;" "Poems," &c. b. at Königsberg, 1700; d. at Leipsic, 1769.—Madame Gottsched was also a good dramatic writer. b. in 1703.

GOUDALL, or GOUDOLI, Peter, god-de-lee, a Gascon poet, whose verses have great sprightliness and a delicate simplicity. His works, which are much admired by his countrymen, have gone through numerous editions. b. at Toulouse, 1679; d. there, 1620.

GOUFFIER, Marie Gabriel Auguste Laurent, count de Choiseul, god-fe-ai, at the age of twenty-two travelled through Greece and the neighbouring islands; and on his return to France published a beautiful work, entitled "Voyage Pittoresque de la Grèce," splendidly illustrated. In 1784 he was appointed ambassador to Constantinople; but the French revolution having disarranged his projects for the continuation of his great work, he went to Russia, where he was made a privy councillor, director of the Academy of Arts, and superintendent of the imperial libraries. In 1802 he returned to France, and the year following was chosen a member of the National Institute. He now gave to the world a continuation of his work upon Greece; but became involved in disputes with Le Chevalier and Las Casas, who had, as he conceived, injured him by publishing their works on the same subject, after having been employed under his auspices. He was made a peer of France by Louis XVIII. b. 1753; d. 1817.

GOUGH, Richard, gof, an eminent antiquary and topographer, the son of a London merchant, at the age of eleven years translated from the French a "History of the Bible," of which twenty-five copies were printed at the expense of his mother, who made presents of them to her friends. This was followed by a translation of Fleury's treatise on "The Customs of the Israelites," when he was only fifteen. He afterwards studied at Cambridge, and, besides papers in the "Archæologia," the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other publications, he wrote "Anecdotes of British Topography," 2 vols. 4to; "The Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain," 2 vols. folio; an enlarged edition of Camden's "Britannia," &c. b. 1735; d. 1809.

GOUGH, Hugh, Viscount, G.C.B., entered the army in 1794, and, in the following year, was sent with his regiment to the Cape of Good Hope, which he assisted to capture, and subsequently served in the West Indies. In 1809, as major of the 87th regiment, he was despatched to the Peninsula, where he commanded his corps at the battles of Talavera, Barossa, Vittoria, Nivelle, Cadiz, and Tarifa. For his bravery in these engagements, his armorial bearings were augmented by an additional heraldic device. At Talavera, he was wounded, and had a horse shot under him; but his gallantry was so conspicuous that, on the recommendation of the duke of Wellington, he received brevet rank for services performed in the field, and became lieutenant-colonel. In 1830 he was made a major-general, and, in 1837, took command of a division of the Indian army. He had not been long at his post, however, when he was ordered to China, where he took the command of the British troops, when his conduct in the attack on Canton caused him to be made a G.C.B. On the close of the Chinese war, in 1842, he was created a baronet, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. Returning to India, he became commander-in-chief of the British forces, and entered on the last Mahratta war. After gaining the battle of Maharrapoor, and terminating the war, he in 1845 encountered the Sikhs, whom, with the assistance of the governor-general, Lord Hardinge, he successively defeated at Moodkee, Ferozshah, and Soobraon. For his services in this war he again received a vote of thanks from both Houses of Parliament, and, in 1846, was raised to the peerage as Baron Gough. In 1848-49 he was once more engaged against the same enemy, and finally defeated them at Gujerat, though at a great sacrifice of life. For this victory he was again thanked by both Houses of Parliament, created a viscount, with a pension of £2000 per annum from the legislature, and a like sum from the East India Company. In 1849 he returned to England, and retired from active service. In 1854, on the death of the marquis of Anglesey, he became colonel of the Royal Horse-guards; and in 1862 received the baton of a field-marshal on the occasion of the Prince of Wales coming of age. b. near Limerick, Ireland, 1779; d. 1869.

GOUGH, John B., a celebrated lecturer upon temperance, who, in his twelfth year, emigrated to America, and became a bookbinder. Having fallen into habits of intemperance, however, he sank to the lowest state of degradation, from which he was ultimately rescued by taking the total-abstinence pledge. He now devoted himself to the dissemination of those principles by which he had felt himself benefited; and acquired a wide-spread fame, both in America and Great Britain, by the dramatic style of advocacy which he adopted in setting forth, upon the platform, the principles he had espoused. b. at Sandgate, Kent, 1817.

GOUGON, Jean, god-zhawng, a French sculptor and architect, who designed the fine façade of the old Louvre, and other works, which procured him the title of the French Phidias. He was a Protestant, and was murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572.

GOURNAY, Mary de Jars, goor'-nai, a French lady, famous for her wit and talents. She was adopted by the celebrated Montaigne, for whose works, which she edited, she had an enthusiastic admiration. b. at Paris, 1566; d. there, 1645. Her writings were published in one volume 4to.

GOWER, John, gour, an early English poet, became eminent as a professor of law in the Inner Temple, and is supposed to have been chief justice of the Common Pleas. He was a liberal benefactor to the church of St. Saviour, Southwark, where his monument still remains. b. in Yorkshire, 1325; d. in London, 1402. His works are of the grave kind; whence his friend Chaucer styles him the "Moral Gower." They consist of three parts—"Speculum Meditantis," "Vox Clamantis," "Confessio Amantis." They were printed first by Caxton in 1483. The "Confessio Amantis" is said to have been written by command of Richard II., who, "meeting our poet Gower rowing in the Thames, near London, invited him into the royal barge, and, after much conversation, requested him to 'book some new thing.'" Gower, although hardly a poet by nature, had some effect in exciting a taste for verse. According to himself, Chaucer was his disciple, but far excelled him in the true spirit of poetry.

GOWX, John van, go'-yain, a painter of landscapes, cattle, and sea-pieces, was a pupil of Vandervelde, and possessed great facility and freedom. His works are in consequence more general throughout Europe than those of almost any other master, and such of them as are finished and remain undamaged are highly valued. b. at Leyden, 1596; d. 1656.

GROYX, Charles Marie Auguste, go'-yauvng, was educated at the Military College of St. Cyr, and in 1821 obtained the commission of sous-lieutenant in a regiment of chasseurs, from which he was transferred to a regiment of cuirassiers. He gained no promotion under the government of the restoration, but, after the establishment of the Orleans dynasty, Louis Philippe gave Goyon a captain's commission in a regiment of cavalry; and in 1846 he became colonel of the 2nd Regiment of Dragoons. Goyon was thus practically acquainted with the duties of every branch of the cavalry service, but he had never yet been called into the field. It was not till the revolution of 1848 that he first faced an enemy's fire. He ably defended the streets of the Faubourg du Temple, and prevented various parties of the insurgents from effecting a junction at that point. From the time when Louis Napoleon was elected President of the French Republic, Goyon became his most confidential friend, and it may fairly be inferred that the high consideration in which Goyon was held enabled him to obtain for the President many personal adherents among the superior officers of the French army. In 1850 Goyon was made a general of brigade, and in 1853 was raised to the rank of a general of division. He was appointed adjutant to Napoleon III., in which capacity his duties brought him into frequent personal communication with the Emperor. In November, 1856, General Goyon was appointed commander-in-chief of the French forces in Rome, which he continued to hold till 1862, notwithstanding considerable dissatisfaction with his conduct both on the part of the Pope and cardinals and the populace of Rome. In the year mentioned he was recalled, and raised to the dignity of senator, n. 1802.

GRACCHUS, T. Sempronius, gräk'-kus, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, was twice consul and once censor. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Cornelia, of the family of the Scipios, a woman of great virtue. Their sons, Tiberius and Caius, under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous by their attachment to the interests of the populace, which course at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to agitate for the agrarian law, which, by means of violence, was enacted. Being himself appointed one of the commissioners for carrying the law into execution, he was assassinated in the office by Publius Nasica; and Caius, after his death, with more vehemence but less moderation, endeavoured to carry out what his brother had left unaccomplished. This, in the end, increased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Optimus, 121 b.c., about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber. Caius has been accused of having murdered Scipio Africanus the younger.—Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate.—There were others of this name, but they are of inferior note.

GRAFTON, Augustus Henry Fitzroy, duke of, graf'-ton, succeeded his grandfather in the family honours in 1757; and in 1765 was appointed secretary of state; but the year following relinquished that station, and soon after became first lord of the Treasury, which he held till 1770. During his administration, he was virulently attacked by "Junius." In 1771 the duke was nominated lord privy seal, which office he resigned in 1775, and acted in opposition to the court till 1782, when he was again in office for a short time. After this, he was uniformly an opponent of ministers, till his death. He was the author of a volume of theological essays, &c. b. 1736; d. 1811.

GRAFTON, Richard, an English historian, who greatly assisted in the compilation of Hall's "Chronicle," and also produced another, entitled "A Chronicle at large of the Affayres of England from the Creation of the Worlde unto Queene Elizabeth," the latter of which was republished, in 2 vols. 4to, in 1809. Grafton was a printer, and carried on that business on an extensive scale, for the time, in London, in the 16th century.

GRAGGINI, Antonio Francesco, gradj-ne, an Italian poet, who was the originator of the Della Crusca Academy; and the author of poems and tales, the latter rivalling, in purity of style, those of Boccaccio. b. at Florence, 1503; d. 1583.

GRAHAM, Sir J., gras'-ham, the faithful companion and fellow-patriot of Sir W. Wallace. He fell at the battle of Falkirk, July 23, 1298.

GRAHAM, George, an eminent mechanic, who was journeyman and successor to Tompion, the celebrated clockmaker. He distinguished himself not only by the accuracy of his timepieces, but by the invention of several valuable instruments for astronomical observations. The great mural arch in the observatory of Greenwich was made under his inspection, and divided by his own hand. He invented the sector, with which Dr. Bradley discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. He furnished the members of the French Academy, who were sent to the north to measure a degree of the meridian, with the instruments for that purpose, and was a member of the Royal Society, to which he communicated several useful discoveries. B. in Cumberland, 1875; D. in London, 1751, and was interred in Westminster Abbey.

GRAHAM, Right Honourable Sir James Robert George, bart., was the eldest son of Thomas Graham, Esq., of Netherby, who, in 1782, was created a baronet. Sir James received his education at Westminster, and at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he displayed considerable ability, and, at an early age, especially distinguished himself by that kind of practical business capacity for which he was afterwards celebrated. He entered public life as secretary to Lord Montgomerie, in Sicily, which situation he continued to hold under Lord William Bentinck, and was the principal in negotiating an armistice with Murat at Naples. In 1818 he was returned member of Parliament for Hull, upon extreme liberal principles, but did not long retain his seat. In 1823 he succeeded to his father's baronetcy, and in 1826 was returned member for Carlisle. In 1830 he took office under Earl Grey, as first lord of the Admiralty; in 1831 he assisted in framing the Reform Bill of Earl Grey; and, in 1834, resigned, on account of disagreeing with his colleagues on the appropriation clause in the Irish Church Temporalities Bill. For some years he now held an independent position; but, when Sir Robert Peel, in 1841, came into power, he accepted the home secretaryship. In 1844 he suffered greatly in public opinion, by ordering letters addressed to M. Mazzini to be opened and copied at the General Post-office. His popularity, however, soon rose again by the active and firm part he took with Sir Robert Peel in carrying the repeal of the corn-laws. Shortly afterwards, the government were driven from office on the Irish Coercion Bill. Sir James continued out of place till 1853, when he became again, under the administration of Lord Aberdeen, first lord of the Admiralty, which he retained till the close of the following year. In 1855 he held the same office for a few days under Lord Palmerston, but finally resigned. B. in Cumberland, 1792; D. 1861.

GRAHAME, John, of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, was "a soldier of distinguished courage and professional skill, but rapacious and profane, of violent temper, and obdurate heart," whose name, "wherever the Scottish race is settled on the face of the globe, is mentioned with a peculiar energy of hatred." He commenced his career in arms as a soldier of fortune in France; subsequently entered the Dutch service; and on his return to Scotland in 1677, was nominated to the command of a regiment of horse that had been raised against the Covenanters, whom he hunted with the utmost energy and vindictiveness. Among other cruel instruments of a tyrannous sovereign, Grahame made himself conspicuous by his barbarity, and has obtained an unenviable notoriety in history, romance, and local tradition. The services which he rendered to his sovereign were rewarded from time to time by various high offices; and he was finally raised to the peerage by the title of viscount Dundee. B. 1650; killed at Killierankie, in the hour of victory, in 1689.

GRAHAME, James, was educated at the university of Glasgow, and became curate of Ship-ton, in Gloucestershire, and also of Sedgfield, in Durham. He wrote "The Sabbath," a poem variously criticised; but, however heavy it may be to some, none can dispute the excellent spirit in which it is composed. He also wrote "Biblical Pictures," "British Georgics," and several other poems. Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review," treated his effusions with considerable severity, and Lord Byron calls him "sepulchral Grahame;" but equal judges of true poetry have pronounced different verdicts upon his Muse. Thus Professor Wilson:—

"Such glory, Grahame! thou . . .
With loftier aspirations and an aim
More worthy man's immortal nature, thou,
That holiest spirit, that still loves to dwell
In the upright heart and pure, at noon of night
Didst fervently invoke; and, led by her
Above the Aonian mount, send from the stars
Of heaven such soul-subduing melody
As Bethlehem shepherds heard when Christ was born."

B. in Glasgow, 1765; D. 1811.

GRAINGER, James, grain'-jer, a poet and physician, who served his apprenticeship to a surgeon at Edinburgh. He afterwards acted in that capacity in the army, and, in 1748, took his doctor's degree, and settled in London. His practice, however, was not considerable, and he engaged as tutor to a young gentleman, whom he accompanied to the island of St. Kitt's, in the West Indies, where he died in 1767. B. at Dunse, Scotland, 1723. He wrote—an "Ode on Solitude," "Bryan and Pereene," a ballad, the "Sugar-cane," in blank verse, and translated the "Elegies" of Tibullus into English verse. His medical works are—"Historia Febris Anomale Batavæ, an. 1764," and a treatise on the West India diseases, 8vo.

GRAMONT, Anthony, duke of, gra'-mawng, marshal of France, an illustrious warrior and courtier of the reign of Louis XIV., was descended from the noble family of Gramont of Navarre, and related to Cardinal Richelieu by marriage. D. 1678.—His son Philibert, Count de Gramont, wrote two vols. of "Memoirs,"—still popular.

GRANBY, John Manners, Marquis of, gran'-be, a famous English general, was the eldest son of the Duke of Rutland, and commanded with honour during the seven years' war in Germany. After the peace of 1763, he retired into private life, greatly beloved by all ranks for his many virtues. B. 1720; D. 1770.

GRANGER, James, gran'-jer, an English divine, who published a valuable work, entitled "The Biographical History of England," in 4 vols. 8vo. He was vicar of Shiplake, in Oxfordshire, and was seized with an apoplectic fit while administering the Lord's Supper in his church, and died the next morning, 1776. B. 1716.

GRANT, Anne, grant, usually designated Mrs. Grant of Laggan, a popular and instructive miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was M'Vicar, her father, after passing some years in America, having been barrack-master at Fort Augustus, in the Scottish Highlands. In 1779 she was married to the Rev. James Grant, who had been appointed minister of the parish of Laggan, Inverness-shire. She was left a widow, however, in 1801, and having a large family to support on but scanty means, was induced to publish a volume of poems, which profession, and at various periods produced near "Letters from the Mountains" (which have been often reprinted), "Memoirs of an American Lady," "Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland," "Popular Models and impressive Warnings from the Sons and Daughters of Industry," &c. Nearly the last 30 years of her life were spent in Edinburgh, where she formed the centre of a highly accomplished circle, numbering among her friends Sir Walter Scott, Lord Jeffrey, Henry Mackenzie, and all the Scotch "notables" of the day; and where her amiable character, no less than her literary celebrity, procured her general esteem and regard. b. at Glasgow, 1755; d. 1838. Her "Memoirs and Correspondence" have since been published.

GRANT, Sir Francis, R.A., an artist who spent his entire fortune, and then devoted himself to his art. He became one of the best portrait painters of fashionable life, and was warmly encouraged by Sir Walter Scott. At the commencement of his career he applied himself to the painting of sporting pieces, some of which were engraved and extensively patronized by sporting men; but he subsequently abandoned this branch of art, and applied himself to portrait-painting, and became, par excellence, the artist of "good society." In 1842 he was chosen an A.R.A., and, in 1851, a R.A. In 1866 he was elected president of the Royal Academy, and was knighted shortly after. b. at Kilgraston, Scotland, about 1800.

GRANT, Robert Edmund, M.D., a celebrated zoologist and comparative anatomist, who was educated at the High School, Edinburgh, where he distinguished himself in Greek and geometry. In 1808 he entered the literary classes of the university, and, in 1812, was elected president of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of Edinburgh. In 1814 he became president of the Royal Medical Society, and, in the same year, graduated as M.D. His father having now died, he passed some time in visiting the principal capitals of the continent, and, after his return, commenced the practice of his profession in Edinburgh, in 1820. In 1824, in conjunction with Dr. Barclay, he delivered lectures on comparative anatomy, and, during his vacations, devoted himself to original researches upon the animals of the coasts of Scotland. The result of these appeared in the "Transactions of the Wernerian Society." In 1827 he was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians at Edinburgh, and, in the following year, was called upon to fill the post of lecturer on comparative anatomy and zoology at the University College, London. From that time he continued to lecture at that institution, and was a large contributor to zoological literature. He was a fellow of the Royal, Linnean, Zoological, Geological, and Entomological Societies. b. at Edinburgh, 1793.

GRANT, Lieut.-General Ulysses S., entered the United States Military Academy, at West Point, in 1839, where he graduated with honours in 1843, and was attached as brevet second lieutenant to the 4th Infantry. He was promoted second lieutenant in September, 1845, and served as such through Mexico, under General Taylor, at Palo Alto, Rosena de la Palma, and Monterey, and under General Scott from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, and was twice promoted for his bravery. He was made regimental quartermaster April 1, 1847, and when he resigned the service, on the 31st of July, 1854, he was a full captain in the 4th Infantry of Regulars. After his resignation he settled in St. Louis County, Missouri, and moved from there to Galena, Illinois, in 1860. Upon the breaking out of the war of secession, he offered his services to Governor Yates, and was appointed colonel of the 21st Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and served with his regiment until promoted to be a brigadier-general, with commission and rank from the 17th of May, 1861. He was engaged as colonel and acting brigadier-general in several of the contests in south-eastern Missouri; and among his most noteworthy acts was the occupation of Paducah, and stoppage of communication and supplies to the Confederates via the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers. The manner in which he conducted the battle of Belmont was highly commended by his own government. After the capture of Fort Henry a new district was created under the denomination of the district of West Tennessee, and General Grant was assigned to the command of it. He subsequently captured Fort Donelson, an important position, where from 7000 to 9000 prisoners were taken, and for which he was made major-general. Subsequently he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and, in 1865, terminated the war by the defeat of Lee and the capture of Richmond. In 1869 he was elected president of the United States, as successor to Andrew Johnson. b. in Clairmont County, Ohio, 1822.

Granville

GRANVILLE, George, Baron Lansdowne, grand-évil, a nobleman of considerable talents, who in 1685 wrote some poetical pieces on the accession of James II. After the Revolution, he lived retired for a considerable time, amusing himself with literary composition. In 1688 was acted, with great applause, his tragedy of "Heroic Love," which was followed by the dramatic poem of "The British Enchanters." On the accession of Queen Anne, he obtained a seat in Parliament, and, in 1710, was made secretary-at-war. The same year, he married a daughter of the earl of Jersey, and was soon after created a peer, by the title of Lord Lansdowne, baron of Bideford. The accession of George I. deprived him of his place, and in 1715 he was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in a plot against the government. He obtained his release in 1717, and afterwards went to France, where he resided some years. b. in Cornwall, 1667; d. 1735. His works were published in 2 vols. 4to, 1732, and included, besides those mentioned above, several other plays and poems.

GRANVILLE, John Carteret, Earl of, was the eldest son of George, Lord Carteret, and succeeded to this title at the age of five years. He received his education at Westminster School and Christchurch College, Oxford, and, in 1711, took his seat in the House of Lords. Here he distinguished himself by his earnest support of the succession of the Hanover family, which recommended him to George I., who gave him several important places. In 1719 he was sent ambassador to Sweden, and effected the treaty between that power and Denmark. In 1721 he became secretary of state, and, in 1724, was appointed viceroy of Ireland, where his administration, in a trying season, was generally applauded. He was again nominated to that office, after the accession of George II., and governed that kingdom with great wisdom till 1730. He was the enemy of Walpole's administration, and moved, in 1741, for the removal of that minister. When this was effected, Lord Carteret became secretary of state, and in 1744, on the death of his mother, succeeded to the titles of Viscount Carteret and Earl Granville. b. 1763. He was a pleasant companion, and a great encourager of learned men.

GRANVILLE, Granville Geo. Leveson Gower, Earl, educated at Eton and Christchurch, Oxford, took his degree in 1834. In the following year he was attached to his father's embassy in Paris, and in 1836, and also in 1837, on a new election, was returned member of Parliament for Morpeth. He was now on the high road to power, and in a short time was appointed under-secretary for foreign affairs. In 1840 he was attached to the Russian embassy, and at the subsequent general election, was, in 1841, returned member for Lichfield. In 1846 he was summoned, by the death of his father, to the House of Peers, and, in the administration of Lord John Russell, became master of her Majesty's buckhounds. He subsequently became vice-president of the Board of Trade, and, in 1851, took a large share in "getting up" the Great Exhibition. Under Lord Aberdeen, he became president of the Board of Trade, and under Lord Palmerston, in 1855, filled the same post. He also held several other important posts. In 1856 he represented her majesty at the coronation of the emperor of Russia, and, under the Palmerston administration of 1859, held the office of president of the council. In 1869 he became secretary of state for the colonies under Mr. Gladstone. b. 1815.

GRASSE, Francis Joseph Paul, Count de, grass, a celebrated French admiral, who played a conspicuous part in the naval wars of the 18th century. When a youth he was captured by Anson, and remained in England for two years a prisoner. After many battles with the English in the West Indies, and on the coast of North America, he was defeated by Hood off St. Christopher's in 1782. This reverse was followed in the same year by the defeat and capture of his vessel, the Ville de Paris, by Admiral Rodney, when on his way with a large fleet to attack Jamaica. b. 1723; d. 1798.

GRATIAN, grai'-she-an, a Roman emperor, eldest son of the emperor Valentinian I., was raised to the throne, conjointly with his father, though only eight years old. Afterwards, he became sole emperor, in the 16th year of his age. He took as his colleague, Theodosius, whom he appointed over the eastern parts of the empire. His courage in the field was as remarkable as his love of learning and philosophy. He slew 30,000 Germans in a battle, and supported the tottering state by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the pagan superstition of his subjects ultimately proved his ruin. He was forsaken by his troops in the field of battle, fighting against Maximus in Gaul, and murdered by the rebels, 383 A.D., in the 24th year of his age.

GRATIAN, a Benedictine monk, who lived in the twelfth century, a native of Tuscany, who is noted for his collection of the canon laws of the church, known as Gratian's "Decretals."

GRATIUS FALISCUS, grai'-che-us fili'-lis'-kus, a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem on coursing, called "Cynegeticon," much commended for its elegance and perspicuity.

GRATTAN, Right Honourable Henry, grit'-tan, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he distinguished himself by his ability, and, after taking his degree, went to London, for the purpose of following the profession of the law. In 1772 he was called to the Irish bar, and, in 1775, was returned to the Irish Parliament, where his fervid eloquence not only procured him the admiration but the love and veneration of his countrymen, whose enthusiasm he raised to the highest pitch. The first public benefit which he was instrumental in conferring on his countrymen, was the partial liberation of Irish commerce which had hitherto been greatly trammelled by vexatious restrictions. In 1780 he obtained from the Irish Parliament the resolution "that the king's most excellent majesty, and the lords and commons of Ireland, are the only power competent to make laws to bind Ireland." His speech on this occasion, especially its closing passages, is a fine specimen of eloquence. The Irish nation now voted him £100,000 "as a testimony of its gratitude" for national services; but, at Grattan's own request, it was made £50,000, which he received. After the union of Ireland with Great Britain, he was chosen member for Malton, and subsequently sat in the Imperial Parliament as the representative for Dublin. He is only now remembered for his eloquence; but Lord Brougham, in a speech delivered in the House of Commons in 1823, says—"He was a man of singular candour, and of great moderation; and from his entrance into public life, to the close of his illustrious career, gave signal proofs of his moderation, of his extreme forbearance, nay, of his gentleness." "The purity of his life was the brightness of his glory," says Sir James Mackintosh. b. in Dublin, 1750; d. in London, 1820, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

GRAY, Karl Heinrich, groom, an eminent German musician, who was chapel-master to Frederic the Great. He enjoyed a reputation in Germany scarcely inferior to that which Handel enjoyed in England; and was the author of an immense number of masses, oratorios, and other musical compositions. b. 1701; d. 1759.

GRAY, Thomas, grai, an English poet, was the son of a money-scrivener in London, and was educated at Eton, whence he removed to Peterhouse, Cambridge. In 1738 he entered at the Inner Temple, but never engaged much in the study of the law. The year following, he accompanied Mr. Horace Walpole in the tour of Europe; but a difference arising between them, they parted in Italy, in 1741, and Mr. Gray returned to England, where his father died soon after. He now took up his residence chiefly at Cambridge, where, in 1763, he became professor of modern history. b. in London, 1716; d. 1771, and was buried in the family vault at Stoke Pogis, in Buckinghamshire. The odes of Gray possess uncommon merit, and his "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" has long been considered as one of the finest poems in the English language. General Wolfe, the night before he made his attack on Quebec, where he fell, declared to his fellow-soldiers, "Now, gentlemen, I would rather be the author of that poem than take Quebec." "I know not," says Sir Egerton Brydges, "what there is of spell in the following simple line—

"The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep;" but no frequency of repetition can exhaust its touching charm." There are other lines in this delightful poem which we could point out equally charming. "Had Gray written nothing but his Elegy," says Byron, "high as he stands, I am not sure that he would not stand higher. It is the corner-stone of his glory. . . . Gray's Elegy pleases instantly and eternally."

GREAVES, John, greeces, a mathematician and antiquary, who, after receiving a grammatical education in his native county, was removed to Balliol College, Oxford. In 1621 he was chosen fellow of Merton College, and, in 1623, took the degree of M.A. In 1630 he became professor of geometry in Gresham College, and was soon afterwards sent by Archbishop Laud to the East, where he made a large collection of oriental MSS., coins, and medals. He also took a careful survey and measurement of the Egyptian pyramids, and made many astronomical observations. After his return, in 1640, he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford; but was obliged to resign his situation, from the persecution of the parliamentary visitors. b. in Hampshire, 1602; d. 1652. He wrote "Pyramidographia; or, a Description of the Pyramids in Egypt;" "A Discourse on the Roman Foot and Denarius;" and other valuable works.

GREEN, Robert, green, an English poet, was a man of wit and talents, but noted alike for his good advice and bad example. He is said to have been the first Englishman who wrote for bread; but whether this be the case or not, he had great vivacity of mind, and a fertile imagination, which he had increased by extensive reading. He crowded simile upon simile, and wrote in accordance with the principles of the Euphean sect, fashionable in his time. The criticism of Hallam, in his "Literary History of Europe," is that "Green succeeds pretty well in that florid and gay style, a little redundant in images which Shakspeare frequently gives to his princes and courtiers, and which renders some unimpassioned scenes in his historic plays effective and brilliant." The same critic speaks of his novels, however, as "deplorable specimens." b. at Ipswich, 1560; d. in London, 1592.

GREEN, Matthew, an English poet, who was bred a dissenter, which sect he quitted, and ridiculed in his poem of "The Spleen." He obtained a place in the Custom-house. b. in London, 1696; d. 1737. His poems, which possess great merit, were published in Do collection, and together, in 1 vol. in 1796.

GREEN, Valentine, a distinguished engraver in mezzotint, was intended for the legal profession; but left it for the art in which he afterwards excelled. He settled in London in 1765; was keeper of the Royal Institution, and associate of the Royal Academy; and produced many fine engravings from Reynolds, West, the Dusseldorf Gallery, &c. He was also known as the author of a "History of Worcester," and some other works. b. in Warwickshire; d. 1813.

GREENE, Maurice, Mus. Doc., a celebrated composer of church music, who received his education in St. Paul's choir, under Brind, the organist. He first became organist of St. Dunstan's in the West, and subsequently succeeded his former master as organist of St.

Gregory

Paul's Cathedral. On the death of Dr. Croft, he became organist and composer to the Chapel Royal, and in 1736 was appointed master of his majesty's band. Previous to this appointment, he had the degree of Doctor of Music conferred on him at Cambridge, for his exercise on Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day." The fame of Doctor Greene rests on his "Forty Anthems, for one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, and eight voices." These place him at the top of English ecclesiastical music composers. b. in London 1694; d. 1755.

GREENOUGH, Horatio, green'-uf, a distinguished American sculptor, who, at an early age, displayed a talent for drawing and modelling, and adopted sculpture for his profession. With the view of studying his art at its source, he proceeded to Rome, where he remained for some years; but his health giving way, he was obliged to revisit his native country. He soon returned to Europe, however, and, fitting up a studio at Florence, devoted himself to his art. Here he produced his colossal statue of Washington, now in the grounds of the Capitol at Washington, and the "Pioneer's Struggle," now in the Capitol itself. In 1851 he returned to America to erect his group of the "Rescue," but his health was such as gave no prospect of his being able to continue his professional studies. b. at Boston, Massachusetts, 1805; d. 1852.

GREENVILLE, Sir Richard, green'-vil, a gallant English officer, who served in the imperial army in Hungary, against the Turks, and, on his return, engaged in the reduction of Ireland. In 1551 he represented Cornwall in Parliament, about which time he received the honour of knighthood. In 1558 he undertook an expedition to America, and in 1591 was appointed vice-admiral of a squadron sent out to intercept a rich Spanish fleet. He proceeded as far as the Western Islands, and while there, a powerful squadron was sent from Spain to escort the plate fleet. On their approach the English admiral, Thomas Howard, proceeded to sea; but Greenville, in the Revenge, staying to take on board some of his sick crew, was surrounded by the whole Spanish fleet. He defended his ship with the utmost bravery, and, after receiving several wounds, was about to sink her, but was carried on board the Spanish admiral's ship, where he died three days after. b. in Devonshire, 1540.

GREGORY, greg'-o-re, king of Scotland, contemporary with Alfred, succeeded to the throne in 876. He delivered his country from the Danes, acquired the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, performed many brilliant exploits in Ireland, and built the city of Aberdeen. d. 893.

GREGORY THE GREAT, Pope, was appointed prefect of the city of Rome, and held other civil dignities; but, being inclined to a religious life, he retired to the monastery of St. Andrew, of which he became abbot. On the death of Pelagius II., in 590, he was elected pope. b. 544; d. 604. He sent Augustin the monk to convert the English to Christianity.

GREGORY II., St., succeeded Constantine in the pontificate in 715, and died in 731.

GREGORY III., a native of Syria, succeeded to the pontificate in 731, and died in 741. He sent legates to Charles Martel to demand succour against the Lombards, which embassy is considered to be the origin of the apostolic nuncios in France.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Gregory

GREGORY IV., a native of Rome, succeeded to the pontificate in 827, and was greatly esteemed for his learning and piety. D. 844.

GREGORY V., a native of Germany, and a kinsman of the emperor Otho, was elevated to the pontificate in 996. An anti-pope, named John XVII., was set up against him by Crescencius, consul of Rome, but was expelled by the emperor. D. in 999.

GREGORY VI., a native of Rome, was elected pope in 1044. Finding the lands and revenues of the church greatly diminished by usurpations, and the roads infested by robbers, he acted with such vigour, that a powerful party was raised against him by those who had been accustomed to live by plunder. At a council held at Sutri in 1046, Gregory abdicated the pontificate.

GREGORY VII. was the son of a carpenter of Soano, in Tuscany, and succeeded to the pontificate in 1073. This pope formed vast projects for the reform of the church, and in attempting to execute them assumed unexampled powers. But he was embroiled with the emperor Henry IV., and after a violent struggle, retired to Salerno, where he died in 1085.

GREGORY VIII. succeeded Urban III. in 1137, and died the same year, after having exhorted the Christian princes to undertake a new crusade. He is not to be confounded with the anti-pope Bourdin, who assumed the same name in 1118. D. at Benevento.

GREGORY IX. was nephew of Innocent III., of the family of the counts of Segni. He was elected pope in 1227, and caused a new crusade to be undertaken, in which the emperor Frederick II. engaged, notwithstanding which he twice excommunicated that prince. D. 1241.

GREGORY X., of the illustrious family of Visconti, was elected pope in 1271, at which time he was in the Holy Land. He assembled a council at Lyons, to promote a union between the Eastern and Western churches, and other objects. D. 1278.

GREGORY XI., Peter Roger, a native of Limousin, in France, was a nephew of Clement VI., and son of the count of Beaufort. He was elevated to the pontificate in 1370, was a patron of learning, and endeavoured to reconcile the princes of Christendom, and to reform the religious societies. He transferred the papal see from Avignon to Rome, where he died, 1378.

GREGORY XII., Angelo Corario, a native of Venice, was raised to the pontificate in 1406, during the schism in the East; Benedict XIII. being the other pope. Both were deposed by a council held at Pisa, and Alexander V. elected in their stead. Gregory submitted, and laid aside the pontifical dignity. D. 1417.

GREGORY XIII., a native of Bologna, succeeded Pius V. in 1572. He embellished Rome with many fine buildings; but that which more particularly marks his government, is the reform of the calendar which goes by his name. He contributed greatly to correct and amend Gratian's "Decretals," which he enriched with learned notes. D. 1585.

GREGORY XIV., Nicholas Sfondrate, succeeded Urban VII. in 1590. He was the son of a senator of Milan, and involved himself in an unsuccessful war against Henry IV. of France. D. in 1591.

GREGORY XV., Alexander Ludovisio, a Bolognese, descended of an ancient family, was elected pope in 1621. He wrote several works, among which is one entitled "Epistola ad Regem Persarum, Schah Abbas, eum Notis Hegalsoni," 8vo, 1627. D. 1623.

Gregory

GREGORY XVI., Mauro Capellari, was elected pope in 1831. He was a man of respectable character, but bigoted and exclusive. D. 1846, and was succeeded by Pius IX.

GREGORY, George Florence, commonly called Gregory of Tours, a Romish saint, was chosen bishop of Tours in 573, and, in 578, distinguished himself in a council at Paris. He is said to have converted Chilperic from Pelagianism. B. at Auvergne, 544; D. 595. Gregory was the author of a History of the Franks, in 10 books; and other works.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, bishop of Constantinople, wrote poems to furnish the Christian youth with subjects for study when Julian prohibited Christians from reading the books of the Gentiles. In 378 he was appointed by the council of Antioch, to go to Constantinople to suppress Arianism, and was there chosen bishop. He afterwards resigned that see and retired to his native country, where he died, in 389. B. about 325, near Nazianzus, in Cappadocia.

GREGORY NYSSEN, the younger brother of St. Basil, was bishop of Nyssa, in Cappadocia, but was deposed by the Arian faction. He drew up the Nicene creed, by order of the council of Constantinople. D. about 395. His works were published at Paris in 1615, in 2 vols. folio.

GREGORY, James, a celebrated mathematician, who, at an early age, discovered a genius for the mathematics, which he cultivated with eagerness in the Marischal college of Aberdeen. In 1663 he published his "Optica Promota," in which he announced the invention of the reflecting telescope, which spread his name over Europe. Soon after this he made a tour to Italy, and resided some years at Padua, where he published his "Vera Circuli et Hyperbolæ Quadratura," &c., in which appeared an account of his discovery of an infinitely converging series for the areas of the circle and hyperbola, and the mode of computing them. Soon after his return to England he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and engaged in a controversy with Huygens on the subject of his treatise on the quadrature of the circle. In 1663 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the university of St. Andrew's. He had an amicable controversy with Newton concerning the reflecting telescope; in the course of which he suggested the idea of a burning concave mirror, which came into universal repute. In 1674 he became professor of mathematics at Edinburgh, where he died in the year following, after being struck with sudden blindness as he was lecturing. B. at Aberdeen, 1633. His "Optics" were translated into English by Dr. Desaguliers, and several of his papers are in the "Philosophical Transactions."

GREGORY, David, nephew of the above, completed his education at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A., and in 1634 became professor of mathematics in that university. In 1691, by the recommendation of Newton, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and elected Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford. In 1695 he published his "Catoptrica et Dioptrica Spherica Elementa," 8vo. His demonstration of the curve called the catenarian, appeared in 1697, in the "Philosophical Transactions;" but his greatest work was published in 1702, and entitled "Astronomia Physicæ et Geometricæ Elementa," folio. It was afterwards translated into English in 2 vols. 8vo. In 1703 he published a splendid edition of Euclid's works in folio. n. at Aberdeen, 1681; n. while engaged in superintending an edition of "Apollonius's Conics," in 1710. After his death appeared a treatise on logarithms, and another on practical geometry.—His brother James, when David was made Savilian professor at Oxford, as mentioned above, became professor of mathematics at Edinburgh, and held the post for thirty-three years. His other brother, Charles, was professor of mathematics at St. Andrew's thirty-two years, and was succeeded by his son, David, who published a system of arithmetic and algebra in Latin. Of this family, sixteen have held British professorships. There are few names, therefore, more illustrious in the annals of science and literature.

Gregory

GREGORY, John, a physician, the son of Dr. James Gregory, professor of medicine in King's College, Aberdeen. After studying at his native place, he removed to Edinburgh, and thence to Leyden. In 1745 he obtained the degree of doctor of physic, and became professor of philosophy at Aberdeen, which he exchanged in 1749 for that of physic. About 1751 he settled in London, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1761 he went back to Edinburgh, where, in 1766, he also became professor of physic. n. at Aberdeen, 1724; n. at Edinburgh, 1773. His works are, on the "Duties and Offices of a Physician," 8vo; "Elements of the Practice of Physic," 8vo; "A Father's Legacy to his Daughters," 12mo. All his productions have been collected into four volumes.

GREGORY, (Cilnius), LL.D., commenced his literary career at the age of nineteen; but the works which chiefly brought him into notice were his "Treatise on Astronomy" and the "Pantologia," a comprehensive dictionary of the arts and sciences, of which he undertook the general editorship. Through the interest of Dr. Hutton, he was nominated, in 1802, mathematical master at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, in which establishment he eventually obtained the professor's chair, filling it with reputation until he was obliged through ill-health to resign it in 1838. Besides the works above mentioned, and many others, Dr. Gregory wrote "Element of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry," "Mathematics for Practical Men," "Letters to a Friend, on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion," 2 vols.; and "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, &c., of the late John Mason Good, M.D." n. in Huntingdonshire, 1774; n. 1841.

GREGOIRE, Henry, Count, bishop of Blois, grai-gvire, a French prelate, was nominated by the clergy of his province a member of the states-general; and in the constituent assembly distinguished himself by the boldness of his opinions relative to civil and religious liberty. He was among the first of the clergy who swore fidelity to the constitution; but during the Reign of Terror, when the bishop of Paris abdicated his office, and several of the clergy abjured Christianity, the bishop of Blois stood forward as the supporter of the religion of his country. He also opposed the accession of the first consul to the throne of France, and, alone, objected to the obsequious address of the senate to the new sovereign. On the restoration of the Bourbons, he was excluded from the Institute, and deprived of his bishopric, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement. The bishop of Blois was also distinguished as a literary character. Among his writings are "Essai sur l'Amélioration Politique, Physique, et Morale des Juifs," "Mémoires en faveur des Gens de Couleur, ou Sang-mêlés de St. Dominique;" "Essai Historique sur les Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane," "Les Ruines de Port Royal," &c. n. 1750; n. 1831.

GREGG, Samuel Carlowitz, grecg, a distinguished naval officer in the Russian service, was a native of Scotland, and first served in the navy of Great Britain. He distinguished himself at the defeat of Confians by Admiral Hawke, the taking of the Havannah, and on other occasions. After the peace of 1763, he entered the Russian service; and, at the battle of Chio, contributed greatly to the destruction of the whole of the Turkish fleet. The empress promoted him to the chief command of the Russian navy, gave him an estate in Livonia, and honoured him with many other marks of her favour. n. 1738.

GRENVILLE, George, grev-vil, a British statesman in the reigns of George II. and George III., entered Parliament as member for Buckinghamshire, and was distinguished for his eloquence. He filled successively the situations of treasurer of the navy, first lord of the Admiralty, and first lord of the Treasury. In 1763 he became chancellor of the Exchequer, but, in 1765, he resigned his post to the Marquis of Rockingham. He published "Considerations on the Commerce and Finances of England, and on the Measures taken by the Ministers," &c., in reply to attacks made on his administration by the press. n. 1770. He was a younger brother of Richard Grenville, Earl Temple, and was the father of Lord Grenville.

GRENVILLE, William Wyndham, Lord, was the third son of the Right Honourable George Grenville, and studied at Eton College and Oxford University. In 1782 he became a member of the House of Commons; and Mr. Pitt, subsequently, gave him the office of paymaster of the army. In 1789 he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, and the following year became secretary of state for the home department. At the same time he was created Baron Grenville. In 1791 he became secretary of state for foreign affairs. For some years after this he was out of office; but, on the death of Mr. Pitt, he became first lord of the Treasury. In 1800 he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford, and, up to 1815, usually acted in conjunction with Earl Grey. Towards the latter part of his life, he retired from the public eye, and died at Dropmore Lodge, Buckinghamshire, 1834; n. 1750.

GRESHAM, Sir Thomas, gresh'-am, was a merchant of the days of Queen Elizabeth, and amassed a large fortune. In 1559 he received the honour of knighthood from his sovereign, and was frequently consulted by her in her political and commercial concerns. He founded the Royal Exchange, and in January, 1570, the queen dined at his house, and caused the building to be so named, and had it proclaimed by sound of trumpet. The original structure was burned in the great fire of 1666; but it was rebuilt on a larger scale. It was, in 1838, again destroyed by fire; but was replaced by the present building, which was opened by Queen Victoria in 1844, n. in London, 1519; n. 1579.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Grétry

GRÉTRY, André Ernest Modeste, grai'-tre, a French musical composer, who, in early youth, discovered a great passion for music, and went to study in Italy. Returning thence, he brought with him the knowledge of a pure and simple melody, lively but graceful. The true comic talent was given by him to the language of music, and he deserved his surname of the "Molière of Music." Amongst Grétry's numerous operas may be named "The Huron," which commenced his reputation, and of which the libretto was written by Marmontel; "L'Amant Jaloux," "La Caravane," and "Richard Cœur de Lion." He also produced an essay on music, in which he described his method. n. at Liège, 1741; n. at Rousseau's hermitage at Montmorency, which had become his property, 1813. —He came of a family of musicians; and his nephew, André Joseph, wrote some comic operas, comedies and romances, which had, however, little success. n. at Boulogne, 1774; n. 1826.

GRESCHE, or GRECH, Nicholas, grefek, a Russian littérateur, who edited several influential periodicals, among which may be named the "Northern Bee" and the "Circulating Library." In 1835 he started the great "Russian Encyclopædia," but seceded from it in its 7th volume. In 1823, he published a "History of Russian Literature," which is one of the best works of the kind that has yet appeared. He also published some grammars of the Russian language, which, for practical purposes, are esteemed the best. n. 1787.

GREVILLE, Fulke, Lord Brooke, grev'-il, a patron of letters and an ingenious writer, was in great favour with Elizabeth. He was created Lord Brooke by James I., who gave him Warwick Castle. He founded a history lecture at Cambridge. n. at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, 1554; stabbed by a servant whom he had reprimanded for an insolent expression, 1628. The man put an end to himself with the same weapon. After his lordship's death appeared several of his poetical works, and the Life of Sir Philip Sidney, written by him. Hallam calls him "of all our poets the most obscure."

GREY, Jane, gray, a celebrated and unfortunate English lady, was the daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by Frances Brandon, daughter of the duke of Suffolk and Mary, queen dowager of France and sister to Henry VIII. From her childhood she evinced an intelligent and amiable turn of mind, and was so far advanced in her education at the age of fourteen, that when the learned Ascham visited her family, he found her reading Plato's "Phædo" in Greek. She was also well acquainted with several modern languages. Her religious principles were those of the Reformation, and her virtue and modesty equalled her other accomplishments. When the health of Edward VI. began to decline, Dudley, duke of Northumberland, persuaded him, from a pretended concern for the interests of religion, to bequeath his crown to Lady Jane; thus setting aside his sisters Mary and Elizabeth. About the same time, the duke effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guilford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey. On the death of Edward, her father and the duke of Northumberland, much against her own wishes, paid homage to her as queen, and had her proclaimed in London with the usual formalities. This pageantry, however, only lasted a few days; for Mary proved successful, and the duke of Northumberland was beheaded, and Lady Jane and her husband sent to the Tower. After being confined some time, the council resolved to put these innocent victims of their father's ambition to death. Lord Guildford suffered first, and as he passed her window, his lady gave him her last adieu. Immediately afterwards, she was executed on the same scaffold, suffering with calm resignation, and a firm attachment to the Protestant faith, 1554. n. 1837. Fuller, in his "Holy State," says, "she had the innocence of childhood, the beauty of youth, the solidity of middle, the gravity of old age. . . . the birth of a princess, the learning of a clerk, the life of a saint, yet the death of a martyr, for her parent's offences."

GREY, Charles, Earl, was educated at Eton and Cambridge, after which he proceeded on a tour to the continent, and on his return, in 1736, became a member of Parliament for the county of Northumberland. He took the liberal side, and in 1762, was one of the founders and most active members of the "Society of the Friends of the People." In 1797 he brought forward a motion for parliamentary reform, for which he continued to labour strenuously, although he was, for many years, unsuccessful in carrying the object of his wishes. When Lord Grenville, in 1806, came into office, he, as Lord Howick, from the elevation of his father to the peerage, became first lord of the Admiralty, and, as one of the leaders of the House of Commons, carried the act for the abolition of the slave trade. In the following year, the cabinet was broken up, and he, in the same year, succeeded to the title, by the death of his father. In the House of Lords he became one of the leaders of the opposition. For many years he remained out of office; but, in 1830, he was called upon by William IV. to form a new cabinet, after the fall of the Wellington administration. He accordingly became prime minister, and announced "peace, retrenchment, and reform," as the objects of his policy. In 1831 the Reform Bill was introduced by Lord John Russell into the House of Commons; but, in the following year, the ministers resigned, on account of a motion of Lord Lyndhurst. They were restored to power, however, and, in the same year, the bill was passed. In the succeeding year, Earl Grey resigned, and, after about a couple of years, retired from public life. n. at Fallowden, near Alnwick, 1764; n. at Howick House, Northumberland, 1815.

GREY, Henry George, third earl, the eldest son of the above, received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and, in 1820, entered Parliament as member for the now disfranchised borough of Winchelsea. In 1831 he represented the county of Northumberland, and, in the previous year, filled the office of under-secretary of state for the colonies. In 1834 he became under-secretary for the home department, and in the following year, under the Melbourne administration, was appointed secretary-at-war. In July, 1815, his father died, when he was called to the House of Lords, and became colonial secretary in the administration of Lord John Russell. At this period the colonies were demanding a representative government, which Earl Grey opposed, and which led to considerable misunderstandings in the colonial-office. In 1852 he retired from his post, and vindicated his administration in a treatise of considerable length. In 1853 he declined to serve under Lord Aberdeen, and assumed an independent position in politics. B. 1802.

GREY, Sir George, K.C.B., entered the army, and rose to the rank of captain, when, in 1836, he offered himself, in conjunction with Lieutenant Lushington, to Lord Glenelg, then colonial secretary, to undertake a journey of discovery in Australia. In the following year, he proceeded on his expedition, and, after an absence of four years, arrived in England, and published the journals of his discoveries. He was now appointed lieutenant-governor of South Australia, and produced "A Vocabulary of the Dialect of South-Western Australia." In 1846 he became governor of New Zealand, and published a work entitled "Polynesian Mythology, and Ancient Traditional History of the New Zealand Race." In 1848 he was created a knight-commander of the Bath, and in 1854 he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief at the Cape of Good Hope. He was subsequently appointed governor of New Zealand, and put down the Maori insurrection of 1863-4. B. 1812.—There are some others of this name, known as legislators and administrators, connected with the English government.

GREY, Dr. Zachary, an English divine, well known for his edition of "Hudibras," accompanied with a great number of curious and entertaining notes, 2 vols. Of these notes, Warburton says, that "he hardly thinks there ever appeared, in any learned language, so execrable a heap of nonsense, under the name of commentaries, as hath lately been given us on this satiric poet." He also published Notes on Shakespeare, 2 vols.; and an Answer to Neale's History of the Puritans, in 3 vols. 8vo. B. 1837; D. 1786.

GRIEBACH, John James, grees'-bak, a distinguished German theologian, who studied successively at Frankfurt, Tübingen, Halle, and Leipzig. He subsequently became rector of the university of Jena, and ecclesiastical privy councillor to the duke of Saxe-Weimar. His works are very numerous; but the principal is an edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings. B. at Butzbach, 1745; D. 1812.

GRIFFIER, John, gre'-fe-er, known by the appellation of Old Griffer, an eminent painter, succeeded chiefly in landscapes, and painted several views on the Thames. He also etched prints of birds and beasts. B. at Amsterdam, 1658; D. in London, 1718.—His son Robert, called the Younger Griffer, born in England, was also a good landscape painter, though not equal to his father.

GRIFFIN, Gerald, grif'-fin, a popular Irish novelist, author of "The Collegians" and other works. In 1830 he relinquished the pen, and joined a religious society at Cork. B. at Lime-rick, 1803; D. 1840.

GRIFFITHS, Ralph, grif'-fiths, a man of letters, who was born in Shropshire, and settled in London as a bookseller. In 1749 he commenced the "Monthly Review," the success of which was very slow for a considerable time; but it made its way gradually to a leading place among periodical journals. Of this work he was both proprietor and editor, being powerfully assisted, from time to time, by men of first-rate talents. D. 1803.

GRIMALDI, Joseph, grim'-al-de, the famous pantomimic clown, was the son of Signor Grimaldi, an artiste, noted for his humour and eccentricities, who by day followed the profession of a dentist, and by night that of ballet-master at Drury Lane. For a period of forty years, "Grimaldi the clown" delighted the laughter-loving audiences of Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and Sadler's Wells, with a rich species of buffoonery, peculiarly his own—pourtraying to the life all that is grotesque in manners, or droll in human action. Grimaldi, however, was not a mere clown, even of the most refined class; he was a man of intellect, a wit, and, in private life, an estimable gentleman. B. 1779; D. 1837.

GRIMM, Jacob Ludwig Carl and Wilhelm Carl, grim, two brothers, whose devotion to German literature was distinguished by a rare communion of fellowship between them. The nature of their labours is, perhaps, sufficiently indicated in the following quotation from the works of Jacob: "All my labours," he says, "have been, either directly or indirectly, devoted to researches into our ancient language, poetry, and laws. These studies may seem useless to many; but to me they have always appeared a serious and dignified task, firmly and distinctly connected with our common fatherland, and calculated to foster the love of it. I have esteemed nothing trifling in those inquiries, but have used the small for the elucidation of the great,—popular traditions for the elucidation of written documents. Several of my books have been published in common with my brother William. We lived, from our youth up, in brotherly community of goods—money, books, and collectanea belonging to us in common; and it was natural to combine our labours." These brothers are the authors of a valuable and large German dictionary. Jacob, B. at Hanau, 1785; D. 1863; William, B. at Hanover, 1786; D. 1859.

GRIMSTON, Sir Harbottle, grim'-ston, a distinguished lawyer of the time of the Commonwealth, studied at Lincoln's Inn, became recorder of Colchester in 1638, and in 1640 was elected member of Parliament for that borough. He at first took part in the opposition offered to the measures of the king, but disapproving the extreme proceedings adopted by his party, went abroad after Charles's execution. He subsequently returned, however, and in 1660 was chosen speaker of what was designated the "Healing Parliament," and was one of the commissioners sent to Charles II. at Breda. At the Restoration he was made master of the Rolls. The "Reports" of Sir George Croke were published under Sir Harbottle's superintendence. B. about 1594; D. 1683.

GRINDAL, Edmund, grin'-dal, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in Pembroke Hall. Being attached to the principles of the Reformation, he became chaplain to the king, and prebendary of Westminster: but on the accession of Mary, he retired to Germany, and settled at Strasburg. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, he returned, and ultimately, in 1575, was made archbishop of Canterbury; but lost the royal favour, and was suspended for a time. B. in Cumberland, 1519; D. at Croydon, 1588. He contributed to Fox's "Acts and Monuments."

GROSE, Francis, grose, an eminent English antiquary, who illustrated the antiquities of England and Wales, in 4 vols., and those of Scotland, in 2 vols. He was executing a work of the same kind relative to Ireland, when he died in Dublin, in 1791. B. at Greenford, Middlesex, 1781. Besides the above, he published a "Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue," also a volume of "Miscellanies," 8vo, and "Military Antiquities," 4to.

GROSSETESTE, GROSTÊTE, or GREATHEAD, Robert, grosse-tait, an English prelate, who received his education at Oxford and Paris. After enjoying several preferments with great reputation, he was chosen bishop of Lincoln in 1234. He successfully resisted the encroachments of the papal power, and was a great encourager of learning. B. at Stradbrook, Suffolk, 1175; D. 1253. His "Opuscula Varia" were published at Venice in 1514, and his "Compendium Sphære Mundi" in 1508. Some of his discourses and letters are extant. "He was a very learned man, and had a knowledge of Greek; but by a knowledge of Greek," says Hallam, "when we find it asserted of some mediæval theologian like Grostête, we are not to understand an acquaintance with the great classical authors, who were latent in Eastern monasteries, but the power of reading some petty treatise of the fathers (or, as in this instance, a translation of the Testament of the twelve patriarchs from Greek into Latin), an apocryphal legend, or, at best, perhaps some of the later commentators on Aristotle. Grostête was a man of considerable merit, but has had his share of applause."

GROTE, George, grote, the historian of Greece, was the son of Mr. Grote, a banker, and was for some time a clerk in his father's banking-house. He began to devote himself to literature and politics, and, in 1832, became member of parliament for the city of London. In 1841 he resigned his seat, to apply himself exclusively to his great work, "The History of Greece," which has received universal commendation. Besides his History, Mr. Grote was a contributor to several of the Reviews. B. near Beckenham, Kent, 1794.

GROTIUS, Hugo, gro'-she-us, an illustrious writer, was the son of a burgomaster of Delft, and, at the age of eight years, composed Latin verses of great merit. In his twelfth year, he was sent to Leyden, and in 1593, accompanied the ambassador Barneveldt to the court of Henry IV. of France, who was so pleased with Grotius, that he gave him his picture and a gold chain. While in France he took the degree of doctor of laws. The year following, he commenced practice as an advocate, and pleaded his first cause at Delft. Soon afterwards, he published an edition of Martianus Capella, which was followed by a translation of a work of Stevinus, on finding a ship's place at sea. His edition of the "Phænomena" of Aratus appeared in 1600, and, about the same time, he composed Latin tragedies on sacred subjects. He was now appointed historiographer of the United Provinces, and advocate-general of the treasury for Holland and Zealand. In 1613 he accepted the post of pensioner of Rotterdam, by which means he obtained a seat in the States of Holland, and was sent to England to settle a dispute on the subject of the Greenland fishery. During the contests which arose in Holland on account of religion, Grotius sided with the Arminians, for which he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Loevestein, whence he was delivered by his wife in 1621. He found his way to Antwerp, and afterwards to France, where he obtained a pension. In 1622 he published his "Apology," which so stung the States, that they ordered it to be burnt, and the author to be seized wherever he could be found. In 1625 he finished his famous book, "De Jure Belli et Pacis," which greatly extended his reputation. In 1613 he accepted an invitation from Count Oxenstiern, and went to Stockholm, where he was appointed counsellor of state and ambassador to the court of France. He filled this important station, amidst circumstances of extreme difficulty, with honour to himself and satisfaction to the court which he represented. In 1645 he quitted France, and went to Holland, where he was honourably received. From Amsterdam he sailed to Sweden, and was welcomed in a cordial manner by Queen Christina. B. at Delft, 1583; D. on his journey to Holland, at Rostock, 1645. His remains were interred at Delft. The works of Grotius are too many to be enumerated here; but we must mention his treatise on the "Truth of the Christian Religion," which has become a standard book in all universities for students in divinity; his "Annales et Historiæ de Rebus Belgicis," and his "Commentaries on the Scriptures;" these last are an immortal monument of learning. In his religious sentiments he coincided with the church of England, and advised his wife to join in communion with it. —His sons Cornelius and Diederick entered into the army; Peter was bred to the law, and became pensionary of Amsterdam; his brother William was a learned man, and wrote some books on legal subjects.

GROUCHY, Emanuel, marquis of, groo'-chai, a distinguished marshal of France, and a scion of a noble Norman family, was a sub-lieutenant of the royal gardes du corps in 1789; but embracing revolutionary ideas, he took part in the wars of the republic, and gained great distinction, especially in the Alps and La Vendée, where he was named general of division in 1793. The decree which deprived all the nobles of France of military rank stripped him of his commission and position, but, joining the army as a private, his distinguished gallantry soon led to his restoration. Despatched in 1798 to the army of Italy, under the command of Jourdan, he arranged the abdication of the king of Sardinia, and thus united Piedmont to France. He took a prominent part in the battle of Novi, where he received fourteen wounds, and was taken prisoner by the enemy. Grouchy's bravery was no less conspicuous on the fields of Hohenlinden, Eylau, Friedland, Wagram, Moscow, &c.; and he obtained the marshal's baton from the hands of Napoleon shortly before his abdication. During the Hundred Days he was opposed to the Duke d'Angoulême in the south, and made him prisoner. He was then summoned into Belgium, and took a prominent part in the brief campaign which finally decided the fate of his imperial master. He had carried the villages of Fleurus (June 16) and Ligny (June 17), and was marching according to his instructions in pursuit of Blücher with a body of 30,000 men, when the battle of Waterloo was fought. Instructions not having reached him in time, he could not take part in the battle, and his absence probably contributed to decide the fortune of the day. Bonaparte, while at St. Helena, accused both Grouchy and Vandamme of disobedience to orders in not bringing up their corps in time to take part in the action. This, however, is believed to have been an unfounded charge. At the restoration, Grouchy's title of marshal was not acknowledged, and remained so till 1830, when it was restored. He was created a peer in 1832. n. 1706; d. 1847.

GRUTER, or GRUTERUS, John, groo'-tur, a distinguished philologist, whose father was a burgomaster of Antwerp, and fled to England, on account of his religion, taking his son, who was an infant, with him. Here John was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards went to Leyden, where he took his degrees in law. He became a professor at Heidelberg, but lost his valuable library when that city was sacked in 1622. n. at Antwerp, 1600; d. at Heidelberg, 1637. His principal works are, "A Collection of Ancient Inscriptions," folio, 1601; "Thesaurus Criticus," 6 vols. 8vo; "Delicia Poetarum Gallorum, Italorum, &c.," 18 vols.

GYLLUS, gril'-lus, a son of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himself slain at the battle of Mantinea, 362 b.c. His father, upon receiving the news of his death, observed that it ought to be celebrated with every demonstration of joy, rather than of lamentation.

GYXZEUS, Simon, grí-úe'-us, a learned German, and the son of a peasant in Suabia, became Greek professor at Vienna, and afterwards at Heidelberg. In 1531 he visited England, where his classical acquisitions procured him many friends. The learned are indebted to him for editions of several of the ancients, enriched with prefaces and commentaries. n. at Veringen, in Hohenzollern, 1493; d. at Bâle, 1541.

GRYPHIUS, Andrew, grí'-fús, a German dramatic writer, whose tragedies were greatly admired. He also wrote a critique, in which he ridiculed the ancient comedies of the Germans. n. at Glogau, 1616; d. 1664.

GREPHIUS, Christian, son of the preceding, and a man of great erudition, became professor of eloquence at Breslau, principal of the college of Magdalen, and librarian. His works are "German Poems," "History of the Orders of Knighthood," "Treatise on the German Language," &c. n. 1619; d. 1706.

GUARINO, surnamed Veronese, goo-a-re'-no, an eminent reviver of learning, and the first who reintroduced Greek into Italy. He became professor of the learned languages at Ferrara, and translated "Plutarch's Lives," part of Strabo, and other works. n. 1370; d. 1460. —His son Batista was also a learned man, and became an eminent professor at Ferrara. He translated into Italian some of Plautus's comedies, and wrote Latin poems and other works.

GUARINO, Batista, an Italian poet, great-grandson of the preceding, passed the greatest part of his life in courts, being in the service of Alphonso II., duke of Ferrara, and other princes. In these situations, however, he seems to have been a prey to continual disgusts. He wrote several poems, and a pastoral piece called "Pastor Fido," which gained him considerable reputation. He, however, contemned the title of poet, which he thought beneath the dignity of a gentleman. n. at Ferrara, 1537; d. at Venice, 1612.

GUELF, or GUELF, gwelf, a distinguished family which had its seat at first in Italy, from which it was transferred in the 11th century to Germany, where it became the ruling race in several provinces. The family is still continued in the two lines of the house of Brunswick—the royal in England, and the ducal in Germany, and is connected by marriage with most of the ruling races in Europe. The memory of this ancient name was revived by the institution of the Royal Guelphic Order of Hanover.

GUEBRICK, Otto von, ger'-ik-e(r), a German philosopher, who was counsellor to the elector of Brandenburg, and burgomaster of Magdeburg. He invented the air-pump and weather-glass, and published some treatises on experimental philosophy. n. 1602; d. 1686.

GUERRE, Martin, gair, a Frenchman, rendered famous by an extraordinary imposture, practised by Arnaud du Thil, his friend. Martin married Bertrande du Rols, and, after living with her about ten years, left her, and entered into the service of Spain. Eight years after, Du Thil presented himself to Bertrande as her husband, and so imposed upon her by relating various facts, that he lived with her. An uncle of Martin prosecuted Du Thil, and he was condemned to be hanged. Du Thil appealed to the parliament of Toulouse, the members of which were greatly divided, when Martin returned home; on which his treacherous friend was hanged and burned, in 1500.

GUERRERO, Vicente, goo'-er-rai-ro, chosen president of the Mexican States, in 1829, was by birth a Creole. At the commencement of the revolution in Mexico he took arms against the Spaniards, and ever after continued to play a prominent part in the affairs of that country. On numerous occasions, from 1819 to 1828, general Guerrero became the rallying point of the popular party, the Yorkinos, and was repeatedly called into active service in his military capacity. Having been successful in various contests with the aristocratical faction, he at length, in 1829, was elected to the presidency. The expedition of Barradas soon gave employment to the new government; and the better to enable the president to meet the exigency, he was invested with extraordinary powers; but after the victory over the Spanish troops, and when the invading expedition was destroyed, Guerrero evinced an unwillingness to relinquish the dictatorship, which became the pretext of another revolution; and Bustamente, the vice-president, assumed the reins of government. Guerrero, however, was not to be so set aside: in September, 1830, he collected a large force at Valladolid, and established a form of government in opposition to that of Bustamente, and the whole country was agitated by bodies of men in arms. Guerrero's course, however, was nearly run. In February, 1831, he was taken prisoner by his opponents, and shot.

GUESCLIN, Bertrand du, ges'-lin, constable of France, and an illustrious warrior who gained many victories over the English, and defeated the troops of the king of Navarre. He was very strong, and also very unprepossessing. "I am very ugly," he would say, "and shall never be a favourite with the ladies; but, by the enemies of my king, I shall be held in terror." n. in Brittany, 1314; d. while besieging Randam, 1380.

GUEVARA, Louis Velez de, gwai-va'-ra, a Spanish comic poet, who wrote many comedies, and a celebrated work entitled "El Diabolo Cojuelo," which furnished the foundation for "Le Diable Boiteux" of Le Sage. He was a native of Andalusia, and died 1646.

GUIBERT, Jacques Anthony Hippolite, ge-bair', a writer on military affairs, who served in Germany, and afterwards in Corsica, where he was made a colonel. In 1770, he published his great work, "Essai Général de l'art de la Guerre." Afterwards he directed his attention to dramatic composition, and produced several tragedies. He also wrote the Elogies of Catinat and L'Hôpital. The French Academy elected him a member, in the room of M. Thomas. b. at Montauban, 1743; d. 1780. Besides the above works, he wrote the elogy of Frederick the Great, king of Prussia.

GUICCIARDINI, god'-et-eh-e-ar-dé-ne, an eminent historian, who was descended from a noble family of Florence. He practised in early life as a lawyer, and filled several high offices in his profession. Afterwards he was employed in affairs of state for his native city. From this situation he passed into the service of Leo X. and the two immediate successors of that prince, and was raised by them to the highest civil and military dignities. His "History of Italy," in twenty books, is a valuable performance. b. in Florence, 1483; d. at his country seat at Arcetri, 1540. When the courtiers of Charles V. complained of the favour he showed to Guicciardini and other Florentines, he said, "I can make a hundred Spanish grandees in a minute, but I cannot make one Guicciardini in a hundred years."

GUICCIARDINI, Luigi, nephew of the preceding, wrote, among other works, a "Description of the Low Countries," folio. b. at Florence, 1523; d. at Antwerp, 1559.

GUIDO D'AREZZO, ge'-de da-ret'-so, an Italian musician, who invented the lines and spaces, or staff, reformed the scale, suggested the mode of notation, and the art of solmisation. Lived in the 11th century.

GUIDO RENI, an illustrious Italian painter, whose father was a musician, and who intended him for the same profession; but Reni conceiving an early attachment for painting, was placed under Denis Calvert, a Flemish master. He afterwards studied under the Caracci, and soon rose to higher fame than any of his contemporaries. Honours were heaped upon him by several crowned heads, and riches flowed upon him in abundance. He was unfortunate only in an immoderate love of gaming, which reduced him to such distress, that a languishing disease ensued, of which he died. His heads are beautiful, and considered by many to equal those of Raphael. His draperies are also much admired. His ideal of female beauty was founded on the antique, as he took the "Venus de Medici," and the "Daughters of Niobe" for his standard. b. at Bologna, 1575; d. 1642. The greatest work of Guido is the "Penitence of St. Peter after Denying Christ," in the Zampieri palace, at Bologna.

GUIDOTTI, Paul, ge'-dot'-te, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, who made wings with which he imagined he could fly; but, in making the attempt at Lucca, he fell, and received great injury. b. at Lucca, 1669; d. 1829.

GUISES, Joseph de, gween, a learned French writer, who studied the Oriental languages under Stephen Fourmont, and was appointed interpreter to the king in 1741, and member of the Academy of Belles Lettres in 1753. He particularly applied himself to the study of the Chinese characters, and had, for thirty-five years, a principal interest in the "Journal des Savaus." The Revolution reduced him to poverty. b. at Pontoise, 1721; d. at Paris, 1800. He wrote the Life of Fourmont, "General History of the Huns, Turks, Moguls, and Tartars," 5 vols. 4to; Memoir proving that the Chinese were an Egyptian colony; "Le Choo-King," 4to; "The Military Art of the Chinese," "Historical Essay upon the Oriental and Greek Topography," "Principles of Topographical Composition," "Memoirs in the Academy of Inscriptions," &c.

GUILLON, Joseph Ignatius, geel'-o-teen, a French physician, who, during the first revolution, proposed the introduction of an instrument of decapitation, made after the fashion of the more ancient one, the maiden, used on the Scottish borders in the 16th century. The proposal was adopted, and the engine named after its inventor. Mons. Guillon practised medicine in Paris many years, and was much respected. He was a member of the National Assembly, where his political principles were distinguished by moderation; and his introduction of his famous instrument of death was from a humane motive—that of rendering capital punishment less painful. He was not, as has been asserted, the victim of his own contrivance, though he was greatly annoyed by its being called by his name. He died, in tranquil retirement, in 1814; d. 1738.

GUISCARD, Robert, gee'-kar, a brave Norman knight, and son of Tancred de Hauteville, one of the warriors who conquered Naples from the Saracens, and acquired the dukedom of Apulia and Calabria. b. in the island of Corfu, 1035.

GUISCARD, Charles Gottlieb, ge'-shar, a Prussian officer, who fought with great reputation in the service of the Stadtholder, and afterwards in that of Frederick II. of Prussia, who gave him the name of Quintus Lilius, and a regiment. b. at Mardeburg, 1742; d. 1773. His works are "Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et les Romains," 4to; "Mémoires Critiques et Historiques sur plusieurs Points d'Antiquités Militaires," 4 vols. 8vo.

GUISE, Claude de Loraine, duke of, gess, was the fifth son of René II., duke of Loraine. He settled in France, where he married Antoinette de Bourbon, a princess of the blood, in 1513. At the battle of Marignan, when he was but 22 years of age, he received more than twenty wounds. d. 1550.

GUISE, Francis de Loraine, duke of, eldest son of the above, was a man of great talents and valour, and, during the greater part of his life, enjoyed almost unbounded power in France. With him began the famous factions of Condé and Guise. The duke of Guise was at the head of the Catholic party, and a great zealot. Shot with a pistol, in 1563, by a Protestant gentleman named Poltrot de Méry. b. 1519.

GUISE, Henry, duke of, eldest son of the preceding, was a good soldier, but of a turbulent temper, and formed the association called the League, on the pretence of defending the Catholic religion, and the liberty of the state. With its aid the duke of Guise long controlled Henry III., and even was in open rebellion against him. On the celebrated day of the barricades, the king, having escaped from the duke to Blois, convoked the states there, where Guise was assassinated in 1588. b. 1550.

GUISE, Charles, duke of, eldest son of the above, on his father's death, was shut up in the castle of Tours, from which he escaped in 1591. Proceeding to Paris, he was received with the greatest joy by the partisans of a league which had been formed against Henry IV. He afterwards became governor of Provence; but, under the reign of Louis XIII., he was forced to leave France, on account of the jealousy of Cardinal Richelieu. He went into Tuscany, where he died, in 1640. n. 1571.—His son, Henry II., was brought up to the church, which, on the death of his father, he quitted, and assumed the title of duke of Guise. He conspired against Cardinal Richelieu, and, in 1647, put himself at the head of the revolted Neapolitans, but was taken prisoner by the Spaniards. On being set free, he returned to France, where he died, without issue, in 1664.—His younger brother, Louis, left a son, Louis Joseph, of Lorraine, duke of Guise, who died in 1671, leaving an infant son, who died in 1675, and in whom the line of the Guises became extinct.

GUIZOT, Charles de, usually called the Cardinal of Lorraine, was the minister of Francis II. and Charles IX. He was notorious for his violent and intolerant spirit, and his memory will ever be held in execration for the furious persecution he promoted against the Protestants of France. n. 1525; p. 1574.

GUIZOT, François-Pierre Guillaume, gé-é-zo, was the son of an eminent French advocate, who was executed in 1794. Young Guizot and another brother were taken by their mother to Geneva, where they were educated in the Gymnasium, and where François acquired a knowledge of the Latin, Greek, English, German, and Italian languages. In 1805 he went to Paris for the purpose of studying law, but entered as tutor the family of the Swiss ambassador, and, through his means, was introduced to many distinguished literary men. In 1809 he published his "Dictionary of Synonyms," which was succeeded by "Lives of the Poets," "Gibbon's Roman Empire," and other works. In 1812 he became assistant professor of history in the Faculty of Letters, and, shortly afterwards, was appointed professor of modern history. In the same year he married Mademoiselle Pauline de Meulan, a lady who was considerably older than himself, and who supported herself and family by literary work. In 1814, under Louis XVIII., Guizot became secretary-general; but, on the return of Napoleon I. from Elba, he was driven from his office, and once more resumed his duties as professor of history. On the overthrow of the empire, he became secretary-general to the minister of justice, adopting the principles of a constitutional royalist. He now produced several political and educational pamphlets, and in 1818 was chosen a councillor of state. In 1820 he was expelled from office, and once more entered the field as a pamphleteer. He also gave lectures at the Sorbonne; but the freedom of his expressions caused them to be suppressed. Between 1822 and 1827 he produced his "History of the English Revolution," "Essays on the History of France," and his "Historical Essays on Shakspeare." He also established the "French Review," and assisted in founding the society called "Assist thyself, and Heaven will assist thee," designed to secure the freedom of elections. In 1828 he was permitted to resume his lectures at the Sorbonne, and, in the same year, married the niece of his first wife, who had recommended the union on her death-bed. In the following year he was re-appointed a councillor of state, and became one of the editors of the "Journal des Débats," and of "Le Temps." In 1830 he was elected a member for the Chamber of Deputies, and assisted in accomplishing the revolution which expelled Charles X. from his throne. He now became successively minister of public instruction and minister of the interior; but, in the same year, was driven from office. In 1832 he returned to office, as minister of public instruction, under the administration of Marshal Soult, and continued to hold his place till 1836, when he was appointed on an embassy to England. Here he concluded the treaty of 1840, which filled France with dissatisfaction. In that year, however, he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, which he held till the abdication of Louis-Philippe, in 1848. At that time he fled from France in the disguise of a workman, but returned in the following year, and again entered the political arena. He now became active with his pen, and produced many more works; among which we may notice his "History of Civilization," "History of Oliver Cromwell," "History of Richard Cromwell and the Restoration of Charles II.," "Shakspeare and his Times," and "Studies of the Fine Arts in general." B. at Nîmes, in the department Gard, 1787.

GUNDLING, Nicholas Jerom, goond'-ling, a German writer on jurisprudence, history, and politics, who was successively professor of philosophy, eloquence, and civil law at Halle. n. at Nuremberg, 1671; p. at Halle, 1720.

GUNDULF, gun'-doolf, bishop of Rochester, was one of the Norman ecclesiastics brought over by William the Conqueror. He was a skilful architect; and built that part of the Tower of London called the White Tower. He also erected Rochester Castle, and rebuilt the cathedral. Died 1108.

GUNNERS, John Ernest, goon'-ne-rus, a Norwegian divine, who was made bishop of Drontheim, in 1758, where he founded the Royal Norwegian Society, principally for the encouragement of the study of natural history. Linnæus gave the name of Gunnera to a plant in his vegetable system. n. at Christiansa, 1718; p. at Christiansund, 1773. He published "Flora Norwegica," &c.

GUNTHER, Edmund, gun'-ter, an English philosopher, whose genius led him to the study of mathematics, and he became professor of astronomy in Gresham College. He invented a portable quadrant, which goes by his name, and a scale used by navigators. He also discovered the variation of the magnetic needle. n. in Herefordshire, 1581; p. in Oxford, 1626. He published "Canon Triangulorum, sive Tabulæ Sinuum Artificialium," &c. His works were collected into one volume 4to, 1673.

GUWOOD, John, gur'-wood, entered the British army in 1808, and served in the Peninsular war under the duke of Wellington. At the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo, in 1812, he volunteered to lead the forlorn hope, and took general

"Then it is to you that the sword of the general should belong," said the duke, at the same time handing to Gurwood Barrie's sword. This weapon he wore ever afterwards, and he became a distinguished officer. About 1830 he became private secretary to the duke of Wellington, and, in 1834, commenced issuing "The Despatches of Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, K.G., during his various Campaigns in India, Denmark, Portugal, Spain, the Low Countries, and France, from 1799 to 1813, compiled from Official and Authentic Documents by Lieutenant-Colonel Gurwood." This work was a decided success, notwithstanding that it extended to thirteen volumes. In 1841 Gurwood was made a full colonel, and subsequently became deputy-governor of the Tower. b. 1790; d. by his own hand, in a fit of insanity, arising from a wound in his head received at Ciudad Rodrigo, 1845.

GUSTAVUS I., gus-ta'-vus, king of Sweden, known by the name of Gustavus Vasa, was the son of Eric Vasa, duke of Gripsholm, who was descended from the ancient kings of Sweden, and who was beheaded by the Danish tyrant, Christian II. This sovereign also got Gustavus into his hands, and, in the war in which he reduced Sweden, kept him several years a prisoner at Copenhagen. At length he made his escape, and having prevailed on the Dalecarlians to throw off the Danish yoke, in May, 1521, he found himself at the head of 15,000 men. After various fortunes, he recovered the whole of Sweden from the tyranny of Christian. In 1527 he was crowned king of Sweden, and the crown made hereditary in his family. Lutheranism was established as the national religion of Sweden in his reign. b. at Ockestad, near Stockholm, 1490; d. in 1559. His name is still revered by every Swede.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, king of Sweden, ascended the throne in 1611, when only in his seventeenth year. Notwithstanding his youth, he displayed great discernment in the choice of able ministers, and distinguished himself in the field, in a war with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. He subsequently rendered his name immortal, by his illustrious achievements in the war he carried on at the head of the German Protestants against the house of Austria. He penetrated from the Vistula to the Danube, and twice defeated the celebrated Tilly. He was a patron of the sciences, enriching the university of Upsal, founding a royal academy at Abo, and a university at Dorpat, in Livonia. This great prince fell in the battle of Lutzen, in 1632, not without suspicion of having been assassinated by the hand of Lawenburg, one of his generals. b. at Stockholm, 1594. There is something sublime in the conduct of Gustavus immediately before engaging in the battle at Lutzen. He himself sang a hymn of Luther's, and was followed in chorus by the whole of his troops. After this, he led the attack in person, and slew the foremost of the enemy with a lance; thus giving promise of the victory which his army obtained, although at an immense sacrifice, over the forces of Wallenstein, one of the most extraordinary men of his time.

GUSTAVUS III., king of Sweden, was the son of Adolphus Frederick and Louisa Ulrica, sister of Frederick II., king of Prussia. He was educated under Count Tessin, whose letters to his royal pupil are well known. He succeeded his father in 1771, at which time a corrupt senate, composed of two aristocratic factions, called the Hats and Caps, possessed the government, and treated the king as a mere cipher. Gustavus, in the following year, effected a revolution without bloodshed, and established a new constitution. He abolished the practice of torture, and introduced other good regulations in the administration of justice. He also formed a college of commerce, reformed his army and navy, caused a new translation to be made of the Bible, and greatly encouraged agriculture, arts, and literature. In 1777 he paid a visit to the empress of Russia, and was entertained in a magnificent manner. In 1783 he made a tour for his health to France and Italy, and was absent ten months. He afterwards entered into a war with Russia and Denmark. He headed his army himself, and stormed the defences of Fredericksham, where he took and destroyed a great number of vessels. Encouraged by this success, he made an attack on the Russian squadron and arsenal of Revel, but was obliged to retire. He was equally unfortunate in an attempt on Wyburg; but, on July 9, 1790, the Swedish fleet, commanded by the king, gained a victory over the Russians, who lost forty-five vessels and a great number of men. This was followed by an immediate peace. On the breaking out of the French revolution, a coalition was formed between the northern powers and Spain, by which it was agreed that Gustavus should march against France at the head of a considerable army; but while preparations were making, he was shot at a masquerade, by Ankarstroem, a disbanded officer of the army. b. 1746; assassinated 1792. Gustavus wrote some plays, and political pieces of merit.

GUSTAVUS IV., king of Sweden, after the assassination of his father, ascended the throne, in 1792. His reign was remarkable for the caprice with which he was permitted to govern, for several years, a brave people. His hatred to Napoleon I. was of the most intense description, and his avowed attachment to the principles of legitimacy led him to endeavour to restore the Bourbon dynasty to the crown of France. In 1809 he was arrested as a traitor in the name of the nation, and forced to abdicate his crown in favour of Duke Charles of Sudermania, who ascended the vacant throne as Charles XIII. b. 1778; d. at St. Gall, Switzerland, 1837. After abdicating his throne, he retired to St. Gall, where he mostly lived afterwards, supporting himself by his writings as an author and his pension as a colonel. He refused all assistance from his family and the people over whom he had reigned.

GUTHRIE, John, guth'-re, an antiquarian writer, who was registrar of the university of Oxford, rector of St. Clement's, and chaplain of All Souls College, published "Collectanea Curiosa," from the MSS. of Archbishop Sancroft, 2 vols.; "The History and Antiquities of the Colleges, &c., from MSS. in the Bodleian Library, written by Anthony Wood;" "The Antiquities and Annals of the University," &c. b. 1745; d. 1831.

GUTHRIE, William, guth'-re, a native of Scotland, and educated at Aberdeen, whose most esteemed work is his geographical grammar. b. 1701; d. 1770. He also wrote a "History of Scotland," "A History of the Peerage," "The Friends," a novel; "Remarks on English Tragedy," and several other works.

GUTHRIE, Thomas, D.D., an eminent Scottish clergyman and philanthropist, the son of an influential merchant and banker in Brechin, Forfarshire, studied for the church of Scotland at the university of Edinburgh, and after having been licensed to preach by the presbytery of Brechin proceeded to Paris, where he acquired a knowledge of medicine, with the view of being able to assist the poor medically, when engaged in his pastoral duties. On his return to Scotland, he went for a time into his father's banking-house, and in 1820 was ordained minister of the parish of Arbirlot, in his native county. He was afterwards translated to the collegiate church of old Greyfriars, Edinburgh, and in 1840 to St. John's, a new church and parish in that city, created chiefly in consequence of his popularity. He took a prominent part in the non-intrusion controversy, and other ecclesiastical questions, which ended in the disruption of the Established Church of Scotland in 1813, and the institution of the Free Church of that country. He was one of the four leading men of that important movement, the other three being Drs. Chalmers, Cunningham, and Candlish. In 1817, his fervent and heart-stirring appeals to the benevolent, on behalf of the destitute and homeless children of the Scottish capital, led to the establishment of the Edinburgh Original Ragged or Industrial School, which has been productive of incalculable benefit to the poorer classes of that city. B. 1800.

GUTTENBERG, or GUTENBERG, John, goot-ten-bair, one of those to whom the invention of the art of printing is attributed, was descended of a noble German family. If he did not invent printing, it is probable he was the first who conceived the idea of printing a book, which he executed, first with blocks of wood engraved, and afterwards with separate letters set in wood. He took, for a partner, John Faust, from whom he separated, and then printed for himself. There are few particulars of his life and habits, further than that he seems to have been frequently in litigation, and to have been a man of considerable ingenuity. B. at Mentz, about 1400; D. there, 1468. In 1837 a splendid monument in bronze was erected to his memory in Mentz, and the Gutenberg Society, with which the writers of the Rhenish provinces are connected, hold an annual meeting in Mentz, or Mayence, to celebrate his great discovery, and in honour of his memory.

GUY, Thomas, gi, the humane and charitable founder of Guy's Hospital, was the son of Thomas Guy, a lighterman and coal-dealer in Horselydown, Southwark. He was bred a bookseller, and began trade with only £200. The bulk of his fortune, however, was made by purchasing seamen's tickets during Queen Anne's wars, and by speculations in South-Sea stock in the memorable year 1720. Besides the well-known hospital, he erected an almshouse at Tamworth. B. 1613; D. 1724, worth £300,000.

GUYARD, De Berville, gé-yur, a French writer, who, after a life of extreme distress, died in the prison of the Bicêtre, at the age of 73. B. 1687. He wrote the lives of Bertrand du Guesclin and of the Chevalier Bayard. He is not to be confounded with Anthony Guyard, a Benedictine monk, who died at Dijon in 1770, and wrote "Political Observations on the Administration of Benefices," &c.

GUYON, Jeanne Marie Bouvrière de la Mothe, gé-yang, a famous enthusiast, who, at sixteen, married, and became a widow at the age of twenty-eight. She afterwards devoted herself to religious meditation, and imbibed all the mystical conceits of quietism, till she worked herself up into the belief that she was the pregnant woman in the Apocalypse, and the destined foundress of a new church. Having gained many followers, she was confined in a convent; but was released, at the instance of Madame Maintenon. After this, she was befriended by the illustrious Fénelon; but was treated with great severity by Bossuet of Meaux, by whose means she was sent to the Bastille, whence she was liberated in 1702. B. at Montargis, 1613; D. at Blois, 1717. Her works are numerous, and still admired by those who are fond of mysticism.

GUYON, General Richard Debaufre, a distinguished English general in the Hungarian service. In 1818 he became major of the Huns, or national guards of Hungary, and at the battle of Schwechat, fought near Vienna, he was, for his gallantry, made a colonel on the field. Subsequently, at Debreczin, he was raised to the rank of general. He continued to fight in the cause of Hungary, against the Austrians, throughout the war of 1848-49; but when Gorgei made an unconditional surrender, he, with Bem, Dembinski, and Kmety, took refuge in Turkey. Here he remained, protected by the sultan, and accepted service under his government. He rose to the rank of Lieutenant-general on the staff, and received the title of Kourschid Pasha. In 1853 he was sent to Damascus, and thence proceeded to Kars, where he organized the army, and constructed the defences which subsequently formed a basis for the operations of Sir Penwick Williams in that place. B. near Bath, Somersetshire, 1813; D. 1856.

GUYTON DE MORVEAU, Louis Bernard, gé-tang dai mor'-no, an eminent French chemist, the son of a lawyer at Dijon, was educated for the bar, and became advocate-general to the parliament of his native city; but applied himself chiefly to natural philosophy and chemistry, in which latter science he made many discoveries. In 1777 he was appointed to examine the coal-mines of Burgundy, on which he made a mineralogical tour of that province; and, in the course of these inquiries, he discovered a rich lead mine. Soon after this he wrote the articles on chemistry in the "Encyclopédie Méthodique;" in 1782 he published his new chemical nomenclature, paid great attention to the science of aerostation, and by various discoveries materially promoted the advance of science. He was one of the earliest and most violent of the revolutionists; nourished a determined aversion to the kingly authority and the priesthood; became successively a member of the Legislative Assembly, the Convention, the Committee of Public Safety, and the Council of Five Hundred. He was made a member of the Legion of Honour, and a baron of the empire, by Bonaparte; and was director of the Polytechnic School and administrator of the mint. Besides his share in the "Encyclopédie Méthodique," he was one of the principal editors of the "Annals of Chemistry," and wrote some other chemical works. B. 1737; D. 1816.

GWILT, Joseph, gwilt, an eminent English architect, who wrote largely on his profession, and published, with other works, "An Encyclopedia of Architecture, Historical, Theoretical, and Practical." He also wrote "Rudiments of the Anglo-Saxon Tongue," and the article on music in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." He held, for thirty years, the appointment of architect to the Grocers' Company, and was, for forty years, one of the surveyors of the sewers in Surrey. B. in Surrey, 1724; D. 1803.

GWYNNE, Nell, gwinn, an actress, famous for the circumstance of her rising from the lowest situation to be patronized by Charles II. In the early part of her life she entertained companies at taverns by singing; and, previous to her winning the affections of the "Merry Monarch," she had formed various questionable connexions. D. 1687.

GYLIPPUS, ji-lip'-pus, a Lacedæmonian, sent by his countrymen to assist Syracuse against the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demosthenes, and obliged them to surrender. After the capture of Athens by Lysander, he was intrusted by the conqueror with the money taken in the plunder, to convey it to Sparta; but he stole from it three hundred talents. His theft was discovered, and, to avoid the punishment which he deserved, he fled from his country, and tarnished the glory of his victorious actions. This, from the establishment of the laws of Lycurgus, was the first instance of any Spartan being infected by a corrupt desire for money. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

HAAK, Theodore, hawk, a German writer, who studied at Oxford; translated the Dutch "Annotations of the Bible," 2 vols., and was one of the founders of the Royal Society. B. at Newhausen, 1605; D. 1690.

HABINGTON, William, hab'-ing-ton, an English writer, who was educated in France. He wrote some poems, a play called "The Queen of Aragon," and the History of Edward IV. B. in Worcestershire, 1605; D. 1645. The poetry of Habington has both great elegance and poetical fancy: it shows the author to have been possessed, according to Hallam, of a "pure and amiable mind, turned to versification by the custom of the day, during a real passion for a lady of birth and virtue, the Castara whom he afterwards married."

HACKAERT, John, hak'-art, a Dutch artist, who greatly excelled in landscape-painting. B. at Amsterdam, about 1635.

HACKERT, Philip, a celebrated German landscape painter, who was also good at marine subjects, was a native of Prenzlau, in Prussia. His first work of importance was a series of six large pictures, representing the naval victory of the Russians over the Turks at Tchesine, and the burning of the fleet of the latter power in 1770, by Count Orloff, for which the Empress Catharine II. paid the artist £1350. The pictures were sent to Count Orloff, who, being dissatisfied with the way in which the blowing-up of a ship was depicted, ordered one of his ships to be blown up in the roads of Leghorn in order to let the painter see what such a scene was really like. The experiment, though costly, was not lost, for Hackert altered and greatly improved the picture. He was subsequently much engaged in painting scenes on the coast of Italy, particularly Naples and Sicily, many of which he executed for the king. His drawings are very numerous, and his paintings are not scarce: many of them have been engraved. He painted in oil, encaustic, and in body water-colour. B. 1787; D. 1807.

HACKET, John, D.D., hak'-et, an English divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1681 he became bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and wrote a Latin comedy, twice acted before James I.; a Life of Archbishop Williams, and "Christian Consolations." "What a delightful and instructive book Bishop Hacket's 'Life of Archbishop Williams' is!" exclaims Coleridge; "you learn more from it of that which is valuable towards an insight into the times preceding the civil wars, than from all the ponderous histories and memoirs now composed about that period." B. in London, 1592; D. 1670.

HADDIK, Andrew, Count von, had'-ik, a German field-marshal, who distinguished himself in the Seven Years' war, and who, in 1789, had the chief command of the Austrian forces against the Turks. He was equally renowned for his bravery and skill, and has rarely been equalled as a commander of cavalry. B. 1719; D. 1790.

HADDON, Walter, had'-don, an English lawyer, who, on the deprivation of Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, from the mastership of Trinity Hall, was selected to fill the vacant office. He was afterwards president of Magdalen College, Oxford; but during the reign of Mary was compelled to seek retirement. Under Elizabeth he became judge of the prerogative court; and was one of the three commissioners who met at Bruges in 1568, to arrange a treaty of commerce between England and the Netherlands. He was otherwise much employed by the government; particularly in drawing up the celebrated code, "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum." He wrote various poems and treatises in Latin, the purity and elegance of which are highly commended. B. 1516; D. 1572.

HADLEY, John, had'-le, the author of several philosophical papers which appeared in the "Transactions of the Royal Society," and the reputed inventor of the sextant which bears his name. Being on intimate terms with Sir Isaac Newton, it is generally believed that he borrowed the idea of the sextant from that great man, an account of which was communicated by Hadley to the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1731. Hadley became a member of the Royal Society in 1717, and died in 1744.

HADRIAN. (See ADRIAN.)

HÆMON, he'-mon, a Theban youth, son of Creon, who was so captivated with the beauty of Antigone, that he killed himself on her tomb when he heard that she had been put to death, by his father's orders.

HAFIZ, Mohammed-Shems-Eddin, haf'-iz, a celebrated Persian poet, whose muse delighted to depict the pleasures of love and wine. He was invited to the court of the sultan of Bagdad, but he seems to have passed the greater portion of his life in his native town. His effusions principally consist of odes and elegies, and were, after his death, given to the world under the title of "The Divan." B. at Shiraz, about the beginning of the 14th century; D. about 1333.

HAGHE, Louis, haq, a distinguished Belgian lithographer, who went to London, and, in connexion with Mr. Day, under the firm of Day and Haghe, issued many superior works. Among these may be noticed "Roberts' Sketches in the Holy Land, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia." Subsequently, Mr. Haghe devoted himself to water-colour painting, and became a leading member of the New Society of Painters in Water-colours. Many of his works consist of the antique interiors of Flemish town-halls and churches, which have received well-merited admiration. B. in Belgium, 1802.

HAGEDORN, Frederic, hag'-dorn, an eminent German poet, was educated in the college of Hamburg; came to London in the suite of the Danish ambassador; and, in 1733, was appointed secretary to the English factory at Hamburg. He was the author of fables, songs, tales, and moral poems; in all of which there is considerable originality, and many of them are very graceful. B. 1708; D. 1754.

HAGER, Joseph von, ha'-jer, professor of the oriental languages in the university of Pavia, who devoted himself to the acquisition of a critical knowledge of the Chinese tongue. He resided some time in London, and afterwards in Paris, in both of which cities he published books explanatory of the Chinese language. Among his works are, "The Chinese Pantheon," "An Explanation of the Elementary Characters of the Chinese Language," "A Dissertation on the newly-discovered Babylonian Inscriptions," &c. B. at Milan, 1750; D. there, 1820.

HAGUE, Dr. Charles, haig, an eminent musician, who, in 1799, succeeded Dr. Randall in the professorship of music at Cambridge. He composed a variety of excellent glees and other pieces, all remarkable for purity and good taste. B. 1760; D. 1821.

HAHNEMANN, Samuel, han'-man, a German physician, the founder of the system of medicinal practice to which he gave the name of the "Homœopathic," and, after years of study, succeeded in establishing himself at Leipsic, where he was successful in gaining numerous adherents to his system. As he was ruining the apothecaries, however, they rose against him, and in a court of law, it was decided, by an old decree, that no physician could dispense his own prescriptions. Accordingly, he quitted Leipsic, and found an asylum in the dominions of the duke of Anhalt-Cöthen, where, at Cöthen, he obtained a new practice. In 1829 his disciples in that place struck a medal in honour of him. In 1835 he married a French lady, with whom he removed to Paris, where, to commemorate his arrival in the French capital, another medal was struck, in gold, silver, and bronze. Here he enjoyed a wide reputation up to the time of his death. B. in Saxony, 1755; D. at Paris, 1843.

HAKKOWILL, George, hake'-will, an English divine, studied at Alban Hall, Oxford, after which he became fellow of Exeter College. Having taken his degree of D.D., he was made chaplain to Prince Charles, and archdeacon of Surrey; but never rose higher in the church, owing to his writing a tract against the proposed marriage of his patron with the infant of Spain. For this he not only lost his chaplaincy, but was sent to prison, though he soon obtained his release. Some time after, he was elected rector of Exeter College, which he held with the living of Heanton, in Devonshire. His greatest work is entitled "An Apology or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World." B. 1579; D. 1649.

HAKLUYT, Richard, hak'-lite, an English divine, who was distinguished for his skill in cosmography, and published a curious collection of voyages, in 3 vols. folio. In 1605 he was made prebendary of Westminster, besides which he had the benefice of Wetheringsett, in Suffolk.

B. in London or its vicinity, 1553; D. 1616. His countrymen, out of respect to his labours, named a promontory on the coast of Greenland Hakluyt's Headland. Of "Hakluyt's Voyages" it has been said that they redound as much to the glory of the English nation as any book that ever was published in it. In the first edition is a map, says Hallam, which "represents the utmost limit of geographical knowledge at the close of the sixteenth century, and far excels the maps in the edition of Orellius at Antwerp, in 1558."

HALDANE, Robert and James Alexander, haul-dane, two brothers, the sons of Captain James Haldane, the representative of the barons of Glenaeles, in Perthshire, by the sister of Admiral Duncan, Lord Camperdown, both of whom played a prominent part in the religious movements of the beginning of the 19th century. They both began life as seamen, Robert in the royal navy, and James in the service of the East India Company. They soon, however, quitted the naval profession, and devoted themselves to the propagation of religion, Robert directing his attention to the spread of the gospel among the natives of India, to which work he not only gave his time and his labours, but spent almost his entire patrimony in the effort; while James became an itinerant preacher in Scotland, over the whole of which he travelled, addressing large audiences, and producing a profound impression by his stirring and animated appeals to the consciences of his hearers. The vehemence of his style of preaching procured him the title of the "Scottish Boanerges." These brothers were both held in high esteem by a portion of the religious public for their benevolent efforts; though it is also true that James met with considerable opposition from a section of the clergy, and was ridiculed by some of the laity for the extravagance of language in which he occasionally indulged. Both, however, were well-meaning men, though perhaps over-enthusiastic and a little visionary. They were each authors of various works: Robert of an "Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans," "On the Evidences and Authority of Divine Revelation," "On the Inspiration of Scripture;" and James, of a "Treatise on the Doctrine of the Atonement," &c. Robert died in 1842, aged 79; and James in 1851.

HALE, Sir Matthew, hal, an English judge, who was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he followed the study of the law with great application. He was one of Archbishop Laud's counsel, and acted in the same capacity for Charles I. He took, however, the Covenant and Engagement, and accepted of a judge's place on the common bench, from Cromwell. On the death of Oliver, he refused to act under his son Richard. In the parliament which recalled Charles II. he sat for his native county, and after the Restoration, was, in 1660, made chief baron of the Exchequer; whence, in 1671, he was advanced to the chief-justiceship of the King's Bench. He resigned his office in 1675, and died the next year. B. at Alderley, Gloucestershire, 1609. Cowper, in his "Task," speaks of him as—

"Immortal Hale! for deep discernment praised
And sound integrity, not more than famed
For sanctity of manners undebild."
His writings are numerous on theological, philosophical, and legal subjects.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Hale

HALE, Mrs. Sarah, an American authoress, who wrote several novels, and other works of merit. She edited "The Ladies' Magazine," at Boston; "The Ladies' New Book of Cookery;" and produced "Woman's Record, or Sketches of distinguished Women, from the Beginning till 1850 A.D." B. at Newport, New Hampshire, 1795.

HALES, John, hails, commonly called "the ever-memorable," suffered great hardships in the rebellion, and was a man of learning and skill in argument, as appears from his works, which were collected after his death, and published under the title of "Golden Remains of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eton College," 3 vols. B. at Bath, 1584; D. 1656.

HALES, Stephen, an English divine and natural philosopher of great eminence, was brought up at Benet College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1703. He ardently entered upon the study of botany and experimental philosophy, and invented a machine for demonstrating the motions of the planets, nearly similar to the orrery. In 1741 he made public his system of ventilating close and unhealthy places, which was at last introduced into Newgate, and greatly reduced the mortality there. He was greatly esteemed by Frederick, prince of Wales, and was almoner to the princess. B. in Kent, 1677; D. 1761. His communications to the "Philosophical Transactions" were numerous; besides which, he published two volumes of "Statistical Essays," &c., and was an early advocate of temperance. His "Friendly Admonition to the Drinkers of Gin" was first published in 1734, and has frequently been reprinted.

HALFORD, Sir Henry, M.D., hál-ford, was the physician of four successive British sovereigns—George III., George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria. He was president of the Royal College of Physicians from 1820 till the time of his death. In 1831 a collective edition of his essays and orations was published, and pronounced by the "London Quarterly Review" to be "a delightful compound of professional knowledge and literary taste. Handled with skill and feeling such as his, subjects of medical research have not only nothing dry or repulsive about them, but are of deep and universal interest and attraction." The original name of Sir Henry was Vaughan, which, on coming into the possession of a large fortune by the death of Sir Charles Halford, his mother's cousin, he exchanged for that name. B. at Leicester, 1766; D. 1844.

HALHED, Nathaniel Brassey, hál-hed, a distinguished oriental scholar, was educated at Harrow School, and afterwards became a civil officer in the East India Company's service. He published "A Code of Gentoo Laws on Ordinances of the Pundits, from a Persian Translation;" "A Grammar of the Bengal Language;" and "A Narrative of the Events which have happened in Bombay and Bengal, relative to the Mahratta Empire, since July, 1777." He subsequently returned to England, and was chosen member of Parliament for Lymington; and became somewhat notorious in consequence of having patronized and defended a lunatic prophet named Brothers, whose confinement in Bedlam he denounced in Parliament as an instance of tyranny and oppression. B. 1751; D. 1830.

HALIBURTON, Thomas Chandler, hal-i-bour-to, popularly known by the name of "Sam Slick," was for a long time a judge of Nova Scotia. In 1835 he contributed a series of essays to a weekly paper in that country, professing to paint the peculiarities of Yankee character. These were well received, and, in 1837, they were collected and published under the title of the "Clock-maker; or, the Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville." A second series appeared in 1833, and a third in 1840. In 1842 he visited England as an attaché to the American legation, and, in the following year, embodied, in a work called "The Attaché," the results of his observations made in that country. This went through several editions. Besides these works, Mr. Haliburton published "Bubbles of Canada;" "An Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia;" "The Old Judge; or, Life in a Colony;" "Traits of American Humour;" "Yankee Stories;" "Nature, and Human Nature;" and a few others. In 1839 he was returned to the House of Commons, as member for Launceston. B. in Nova Scotia, 1796; D. at Isleworth, 1865.

Hall

HALIFAX, George Savile, Marquis of, hál-e-faks, an eminent English statesman, who was created marquis in 1682. Charles II. made him a privy councillor, and lord privy seal. He was also offered the post of secretary of state, and that of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but declined both. On the accession of James II., he was appointed president of the council, from which he was dismissed for refusing his consent to a repeal of the tests. In the Convention Parliament he was chosen speaker of the House of Lords, and, at the accession of William and Mary, was made lord privy seal. In 1689 he resigned that office, and became an opponent of the government. B. 1630; D. 1695. His lordship wrote an excellent piece, entitled "Advice to a Daughter." Macaulay says of Halifax, that at the inroads made by James on the constitution, when opposition first appeared in the cabinet, Halifax courageously gave utterance to those feelings which, as it soon appeared, pervaded the whole nation.

HALIFAX, George Montagu, Earl of, a statesman in the reigns of William III. and Anne assisted Prior in the composition of the "Story of the Country Mouse and the City Mouse," designed to ridicule Dryden's "Hind and Panther." He also wrote several other pieces. He is believed to be the person satirized by Pope, under the name of Buffo, in the "Prologue to the Satires." B. in Northamptonshire, 1661; D. 1715.

HALKET, Lady Anna, hál'-ket, an English lady, the daughter of Robert Murray, preceptor to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I. In 1656 she married Sir James Halket. She produced twenty-one volumes, in folio and 4to, on religious subjects. From these, a volume of Meditations was printed at Edinburgh, in 1701. B. in London, 1622; D. 1699.

HALL, Edward, hawl, an old English chronicler, whose works rank with those of Holinshed and Stowe, was a native of London, and being a lawyer by profession, attained the rank of a judge in the sheriff's court. As affording delineations of the manners, dress, and customs of the age, his "Chronicle," which was completed by Grafton, is very curious. P. 1547.

HALL, Richard, an English divine of the Romish church, who, in the reign of Elizabeth, went to Flanders, and became professor of divinity at Douay, and canon of St. Omer. He published, among other works, a "History of the Troubles of his Time," in which he is very severe on the Protestants. b. 1604.

HALL, Joseph, an English prelate and distinguished scholar, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1697 he published his "Virgidentiarum Liber," a series of satires, which were reprinted at Oxford in 1753. Of this work Pope said, "it was the best poetry and the truest satire in the English language." He professed himself to be the first English satirist, as is evident by the following egotistic couplet:—

"I first adventure; follow me who list,
And be the second English satirist."

Hallam, however, questions his claim to be the first English satirist, and puts Gascoigne before him. About 1603 he was presented to the rectory of Hawsted, in Suffolk, which he resigned on obtaining Waltham, in Essex. Henry Prince of Wales appointed him his chaplain, and had a great regard for him. In 1618 he obtained the deanery of Worcester, and two years afterwards was appointed one of the English divines at the synod of Dort. In 1627 he

b. at Ashby-de-la-Zouche, 1578; d. near Norwich, 1656. His works have been published in three vols. folio, and abound in fine thoughts, expressed in excellent language. He has been generally called the English Seneca. A great authority, speaking of the works of this writer, says—"His 'Art of Divine Meditation,' his 'Contemplations,' and, indeed, many of his writings, remind us frequently of Taylor. Both had equally pious and devotional tempers; both were full of learning; both fertile of illustration; both may be said to have strong imagination and poetical genius, though Taylor let his predominate a little more. Taylor is also more subtle and argumentative. . . . I do not know that any third writer comes close to either."

HALL, Captain Basil, R.N., was the son of Sir James Hall, the fourth baronet of Dunglass, and, in 1802, entered the British navy. For many years he was actively engaged in various parts of the globe, but is principally known by his popular books of voyages and travels, the titles of the most esteemed of which are "Voyage to the West Coast of the Corea and the Great Loo-Choo Island," which was favourably received; "Travels in North America;" "Fragments of Voyages and Travels," of which appeared several series, and which met with general favour. These, however, are but a few of his numerous writings, which embrace a considerable variety of subjects. These works extend to numerous volumes; but, as a general estimate of his talents as a writer, the following criticism appeared in the "London Quarterly Review:"—"Few writers lay themselves more open to quizzing; few can prose and bore more successfully than he does now and then; but the captain's merit is real and great; he imparts a freshness to whatever he touches, and carries the reader with untiring good-humour cheerily along with him. Turn where we will, we have posies of variegated flowers presented to us, and we are sure to find in every one of them, whether sombre or gay, a sprig of Basil." He wrote with great facility. Some time before his death he was deprived of the use of his reason. b. in Edinburgh, 1798; d. in confinement, 1844.

HALL, Robert, one of the most distinguished of modern divines in the Baptist connexion. His ministerial duties were performed during life in Cambridge, Leicester, and Bristol, where he died, 1831. b. at Arnsby, Leicestershire, 1764. As a preacher, Mr. Hall had a great reputation. "In the eloquence of the pulpit," says Lord Brougham, "Robert Hall comes nearer Massillon than either Cicero or Æschines to Demosthenes." As a writer, he stands equally high. "Whoever wishes to see the English language in its perfection," says Dugald Stewart, "must read the writings of that great divine, Robert Hall. He combines the beauties of Johnson, Addison, and Burke, without their imperfections."

HALL, Samuel Carter, a modern littérateur and lecturer, successfully edited several periodicals; among which we may mention "The New Monthly Magazine," "The Annulet," "The Book of Gems," and "The Art Journal." He is best known, however, by his share in an illustrated work on Ireland, written in conjunction with his wife. b. at Topsham, Devonshire, 1801.

HALL, Anna Maria, the wife of the above, whose maiden name was Fielding, is a native of Ireland, and well known by her admirable delineations of Irish life and humour. She has written many works of fiction, and composed some minor dramas, besides being a large contributor to the periodical literature of the day. b. in Dublin in the present century.

HALLAM, Henry, LL.D., hal'-lam, one of the most distinguished of modern writers, was educated at Eton and Oxford, after which he took up his residence in London, where he ever afterwards principally lived. He was the esteemed friend of Sir Walter Scott, and, about the same period, was engaged with him as a contributor to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review." He greatly assisted in achieving the abolition of the slave-trade, and became a foreign associate of the Institute of France. In 1830 he received one of the two fifty-guinea gold medals awarded by George IV. for eminence in historical composition, whilst Washington Irving, the American writer, received the other. He wrote three great works, of which it is unnecessary to say more than that either of them is sufficiently meritorious to confer literary immortality upon the author. They are entitled—1. "A View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages;" 2. "The Constitutional History of England from the Accession of Henry VII. to the Death of George II.;" 3. "An Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries." In 1882 a monumental statue of this great writer was erected in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, by public subscription. b. 1778; d. 1859. Henry Hallam was singularly unfortunate in seeing his two sons, young men of great promise, die before the hand of death was laid upon the father. It was to the memory of one of these loved friends that Tennyson wrote the poem of "In Memoriam."

HALLER, Albert von, hal'-ler, a famous physician, who, at a very early age, indicated the possession of considerable genius, particularly for poetry. His reputation procured him a medical professorship at Göttingen, where he afterwards became president of the Academy. He was also a member of most of the learned societies in Europe. b. at Bern, 1703; d. there, 1777. The poems of Halley are descriptive and elegant. Besides these, he published a number of works on medical subjects.—His son, who followed in his father's footsteps, produced an esteemed work, entitled "A Literary Biography of the Swiss." p. 1736.

HALLEY, Edmund, LL.D., hăl-le, a celebrated English astronomer, was educated at St. Paul's School, whence he was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he applied himself principally to the study of mathematics and astronomy. He made a number of observations, and having formed the design of completing the scheme of the heavens by the addition of the stars near the south pole, he went to St. Helena in 1676, and finished his catalogue. On his return he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1679 went to Danzig, to confer with Hevelius about the dispute between him and Dr. Hooke, respecting the preference of plain or glass sights in astronomical instruments. In 1680 appeared the great comet, known as Halley's comet, and which he first observed in his passage from Dover to Calais. He afterwards completed his observations upon it at the Royal Observatory at Paris. In 1686 Sir Isaac Newton committed to his care the publication of his "Principia," to which Halley prefixed some Latin verses. In 1693 he sailed along the coasts of Africa, America, &c., for the purpose of trying his theory of the variation of the compass. The year following he made another voyage with the same design, and, from his observations, constructed his general chart, exhibiting the variation of the compass in most parts of the ocean. He was subsequently sent on a third voyage to ascertain the course of the tides in the British Channel; and of these he also published a chart. Soon after he went, at the request of the emperor of Germany, to survey the Adriatic, and to examine two ports which the emperor intended to establish there. On his return, in 1703, the degree of doctor of laws was conferred on him by the university of Oxford. He was also appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, and had the half-pay of a captain in the navy settled on him. In 1713 he was chosen secretary to the Royal Society, and in 1719 made astronomer royal. p. in London, 1656; p. 1742. Dr. Halley published several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," a set of Astronomical Tables, and an edition of Apollonius's works, folio, 1710. He excelled in many departments of learning and scientific research.

HALLEWELL, James Orchard, hăl-li-wel, an eminent English author, who produced and edited many valuable works, chiefly illustrative of past ages. Their number is too great to be enumerated here, but his greatest work is a grand edition of Shakespeare, with a new collation of the early editions, and with all the original tales and novels on which the plays are founded. Copious archaeological illustrations accompany each play, and a life of the poet is given. A copy of this work costs £63. The edition was limited to 150 copies. p. in Surrey, 1820.

HAMILCAR BARCAS, ha-mil-kar, a celebrated Carthaginian general, who commanded the Carthaginians in the 18th year of the first Punic war. Fell in a battle against the natives of Spain, 239 B.C.

HAMILTON, P

479

religious reformer, was the nephew of James, earl of Arran, and was educated at St. Andrew's; after which he went abroad, where he imbibed the opinions of Luther. On his return home he was made abbot of Ferns, in the shire of Ross, where he promulgated the new doctrines with so much zeal as to excite the wrath of the clergy, who caused him to be apprehended and sent to Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's. After a long examination he was declared contumacious, and burnt at the stake opposite to St. Salvador's College, St. Andrew's, Feb. 23, 1523. p. 1504.

HAMILTON, James, first duke of, was the son of James, marquess of Hamilton, and, in 1625, succeeded his father, and gained the favour of Charles I. In 1631 he went with an army to the assistance of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and returned to England in the following year. He afterwards accompanied the king to Scotland, and, on the breaking out of the disturbances in that country respecting episcopacy, was appointed commissioner, and raised forces in defence of the royal cause, for which he was created duke of Hamilton and earl of Cambridge. After distinguishing himself greatly in behalf of the king, he was defeated by Cromwell at Preston, and was brought to trial and beheaded in 1649. p. 1606.

HAMILTON, Anthony, Count, an ingenious writer, descended from a Scotch family, attached himself to the fortunes of the house of Stuart, and wrote fairy tales and poems; but his best work is the "Memoirs of the Count de Grammont." p. at Roscrea, Ireland, 1649; p. at St. Germain's, 1720. Speaking of these memoirs, in his "History of England," Macaulay says that Hamilton is "the artist to whom we owe the most highly-finished and vividly-coloured picture of the English court in the days when the English court was gayest."

HAMILTON, William, an ingenious poet, and a man of fortune and family. He is the author of "The Braes of Yarrow," a poem which suggested to Wordsworth his three pieces of "Yarrow Unvisited," "Yarrow Visited," and "Yarrow Re-visited." p. in Ayrshire, 1704; p. 1754. His works were printed at Edinburgh, in 12mo, 1760.

HAMILTON, William Gerard, who obtained the appellation of "Single Speech Hamilton," from the remarkable impression produced by the first and nearly only speech he ever made in the British Parliament, was the son of a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, and was educated at Winchester School and Oriel College, Oxford. He was elected to parliament for Petersfield, in 1754, and in the following year delivered the speech referred to. In 1761 he went to Ireland as secretary to Lord Halifax, and in the Parliament of that kingdom confirmed the reputation which he had gained in England by his oratory. He was chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland for upwards of twenty years, and retired from public life in 1794. His works, consisting of "Parliamentary Logic," "Speeches," &c., were printed in 1803, with the life of the author prefixed. The authorship of the "Letters of Junius" was attributed to him, but upon very slender grounds. p. 1729; p. 1796.

HAMILTON, Sir William, K.B., was, for 36 years, English ambassador at the court of Naples. He explored the volcanic mountains of Vesuvius and Etna, his observations on which were published. His "Campi Phlegrei,"

Hamilton

2 vols. folio, is also an interesting performance. He greatly promoted the publication of the magnificent and elegant work, "Antiquités Etrusques, Grecques, et Romaines, tirées du Cabinet de Mr. Hamilton," the editor of which was D'Hancarville. In 1782 he lost his first wife, and, in 1791, married Emma Harte, the Lady Hamilton so well known in connexion with Lord Nelson. (See NELSON.) The "Philosophical Transactions" were enriched by many of his communications, and also the British Museum by his presents of antiquities and other curiosities. B. in Scotland, 1730; D. in London, 1803.

HAMILTON, Emma, Lady, wife of Sir William, was the daughter of a female servant named Harte; and at the age of thirteen was placed in the house of Mr. Thomas, of Hawarden, Flintshire, to attend upon his children. Emma, however, thought the situation dull, and left it. At sixteen, she went to London, got a place in the house of a shopkeeper in St. James's Market, and soon after was engaged to wait upon a lady of rank, where she passed her leisure time in reading novels and plays. She thus acquired a taste for the drama; and employed herself in imitating attitudes and manners of persons on the stage, from a desire to become an actress. In this way she laid the foundation of her extraordinary skill in pantomimic representations. But she neglected her business, was dismissed, and went to serve in a tavern frequented by actors, painters, musicians, &c. In this service, she formed an acquaintance with a Welsh youth, who, being impressed into the navy, Emma hastened to the captain who had pressed him, and obtained the boy's liberty. She remained with this officer, who loaded her with presents, for some time. She quitted him, however, for a gentleman of large fortune, who kept her for a time in great affluence; but, disgusted by her extravagance, and induced by domestic considerations, he dismissed her. Reduced to the greatest poverty, she became one of the most common of degraded females. From this state she was relieved by a person known as Dr. Graham, who took her to his house, and there exhibited her, covered only with a transparent veil, as a model of female symmetry of person, under the name of the goddess Hygeia. Painters, sculptors, and others, paid their tribute of admiration at the shrine of this new deity. The artful quack had her bust modelled, many purchased it, and a greater number still came to admire the original. Charles Greville (of the Warwick family) fell in love with, and would have married her, but for the interference of his uncle, Sir W. Hamilton, who, according to some accounts, made an agreement with Greville to pay his debts, on condition that he should give up his mistress; or, as others state the circumstance, in his endeavours to save his nephew, fell into the snare himself, and became the victim of her arts. This is not improbable, for she was an adept in deceit, and though of a violent and passionate temperament, she could assume an air of perfect simplicity, candour, and amiability. Sir William made her his wife in 1791; introduced her at the court of Naples, where the queen became so infatuated with the new ambassadress, as to have her a frequent visitor at the palace. It was there that she imbibed a violent passion for Nelson, then commanding the Agamemnon; and, from that period, she became his companion, and was sometimes useful to him as a political agent. After the victory of Aboukir, when the conqueror was received in Naples with extravagant rejoicings, Lady Hamilton was the second figure in the pageant, and accompanied Nelson wherever he went. To her advice is attributed the disgraceful death of Prince Caracciolo. She subsequently went with Nelson into Germany, where the figure they cut at the courts which they visited is represented by several eye-witnesses as anything but dignified and becoming. She was inordinately fond of champagne, and not unfrequently indulged in it till in a state not altogether decent. It was at one time believed that she had borne a daughter to Nelson, but this has never been satisfactorily ascertained. B. 1761; D. 1815.

HAMILTON, Alexander, a distinguished American officer and legislator in the war of independence, while a student of Columbia College, at the age of seventeen, published several essays concerning the rights of the colonies, which were marked by vigour and maturity of style, as well as by soundness of argument. He entered the American army, with the rank of captain of artillery, before he was nineteen; and by the time he was twenty, the commander-in-chief had made him his aide-de-camp, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. From this time Hamilton continued the inseparable companion of Washington during the war, and was always consulted by him on the most important occasions. After the war, colonel Hamilton, then about twenty-four, commenced the study of the law, and was admitted at the bar. In 1782 he had been chosen a member of congress from the state of New York, where he quickly acquired great influence and distinction. He contributed much to the favourable reception of the constitution by the essays he wrote, in conjunction with Madison and Jay, in the "Federalist." He was appointed secretary of the treasury on the organization of the federal government in 1789; and during his continuance in that office, about five years, raised the public credit from the lowest state of depression to a height quite unprecedented in the history of the country. In 1793, when an invasion was apprehended from the French, and a provisional army had been called into the field, his public services were again required; and on the death of Washington, in 1799, he succeeded to the chief command. When the army was disbanded, Hamilton again returned to the bar, and continued to practise, with increased reputation and success, until 1804. A quarrel having taken place between him and colonel Burr, the latter challenged him, and they met at Hoboken on the 11th of July, and Hamilton fell, mortally wounded, at the first fire, on the same spot where, a short time previously, his eldest son had been killed in a duel. The sensation which this occurrence produced throughout the United States was very great; for, of all the American statesmen, he displayed the most comprehensive understanding and the most varied ability. B. 1757; killed, 1804.

HAMILTON, Elizabeth, an eminent literary lady, who wrote "Letters of a Hindoo Rajah," "Life of Agrippina," "Memoirs of Modern Philosophers," "Popular Essays," "Letters on the Formation of the Religious and Moral Principles," &c. B. at Belfast, 1758; D. 1816.

HAMILTON, Thomas, is chiefly known as the author of "Cyril Thornton," a stirring novel of military adventure, combining the style of a mature classical scholar with the descriptive power and vivid feeling of one who had participated in the scenes and circumstances that he described. Captain Hamilton served the campaigns in the Peninsular, and in America, and afterwards devoted his time chiefly to literature. He was a voluminous contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," in which "Cyril Thornton" originally appeared. His principal works after "Cyril Thornton" are, "Annals of the Peninsular Campaign," and "Men and Manners in America." s. 1789; p. 1842.

HAMILTON, David, a Scotch architect of eminence, who erected the Royal Exchange in Glasgow, besides the Western club-house, the theatre in Dunlop-street, the British and other banks, and the ducal palace at Hamilton, and a great many other mansions for the noblemen and gentlemen of the western counties of Scotland. One of the four £500 premiums for designs of the new houses of Parliament was awarded to Hamilton. s. in Glasgow, 1768; p. 1843.

HAMILTON, Gavin, a painter of historical subjects, and connoisseur of ancient art, studied in Rome, and applied himself with great diligence to the elucidation of the antique, and in consequence gave his pictures a correctness in regard to costume which marked them out from the generality of the compositions of contemporary artists. His principal work was his "Homer," a series of scenes from the "Iliad." He occupied the later years of his life in making excavations among the ruins of the emperor Adrian's villa at Tivoli, and other places, and was thereby enabled to recover many long-lost treasures of art. s. at Lanark, Scotland; p. at Rome, 1796.

HAMILTON, Sir William, Bart., one of the most eminent of modern metaphysicians, was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained first-class honours. In 1813 he was called to the Scottish bar, but did not court extensive practice. In 1820 he competed with John Wilson for the moral philosophy chair in the university of Edinburgh, without success; but, in the following year, became professor of universal history in that institution. In 1836 he was summoned to the chair of logic and metaphysics, which he retained up to the time of his death. From 1829 to 1839 he contributed a series of articles to the Edinburgh Review, and was a member of the Institute of France, and of many other learned bodies. s. at Glasgow, 1798; p. at Edinburgh, 1858. This profound thinker contributed largely to the literature of mental philosophy, edited the works of Reid, and, at the time of his death, was engaged in editing an edition of the works of Dugald Stewart. His principal essays have been translated into French and Italian. On the European continent the intellectual calibre of Sir William was very highly estimated. M. Cousin calls him "le plus grand critique de notre siècle;" and M. Brandis, "le grand maître du Péripatétisme." In his own country he was equally appreciated. The "British Quarterly Review" observes that "the slightest perusal of Sir William Hamilton's writings will be sufficient to convince the reader that he is in intercourse with a mind of the most extraordinary comprehension and acuteness. He combines, in a degree unequalled since the time of Aristotle, the power of analysis and generalization. . . . The degrees in which these two counter-powers exist in any mind, together with their relative proportion, determine a man's philosophical character."

HAMMOND, Henry, häm'-mond, a learned English divine, who, in 1638, obtained the rectory of Penshurst, in Kent, whence he was ejected during the rebellion. In 1643 he was made archdeacon of Chichester, and was with the king at the treaty of Uxbridge, to confer with the parliamentary commissioners on church government, on which subject he disputed with Vines, a Presbyterian minister. In 1645 he was appointed canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and chaplain to ordinary to the king, whom he attended in the Isle of Wight. In 1653 he published his "Annotations on the New Testament," a work of great merit. s. at Chertsey, 1805; p. as he was about to be made bishop of Worcester by Charles II., in 1660. Besides the above, he wrote "A Commentary on the Psalms," "A Practical Catechism," sermons, and controversial pieces, all collected into 4 vols. folio. To the works of this writer Dr. Johnson was extremely partial, and sometimes gave them as a present to young men going into orders. He also bought them for the library at Streatham.

HAMMOND, James, M.P., an English gentleman, who cherished an unfortunate but unavailing passion for a Miss Dashwood, and wrote love elegies to unburden his woes. On these elegies Dr. Johnson thus generalizes:—"Where there is fiction, there is no passion. He that describes himself as a shepherd, and his Neera or Delia as a shepherdess, and talks of goats and lambs, feels no passion. He that courts his mistress with Roman imagery deserves to lose her; for she may, with good reason, suspect his sincerity." s. 1710; p. 1742.

HAMPDEN, John, häm'-den, a celebrated English patriot, descended of an ancient family in Buckinghamshire. In 1636 he distinguished himself by his resistance to the crown, and his objection to the payment of ship-money, by which he acquired great popularity. This case was argued twelve days in the court of Exchequer, before the twelve judges; and although the decision was given in favour of the crown, the popularity of Hampden by no means suffered. He became a leading man in the House of Commons, and, at the commencement of the civil war, took up arms against the king; but fell in an engagement with Prince Rupert on Chalgrove Field, Oxfordshire, 1643; s. in London, 1594. Lord Clarendon observes of him, that "he had a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a heart to execute any mischief." But others are of a different opinion from his lordship, in reference to Hampden's powers of contriving mischief. In fact, he was one of England's noblest worthies. He spoke, acted, fought, and fell for the liberties of his country; and what more can be allotted for man to do? In private life he was amiable and affectionate; in public debate, eloquent yet temperate; in counsel, sagacious; in action, vigilant; in enterprise, courageous; and his last moments were spent in prayer, breathed for the welfare of his country.

HAMPDEN, Renn Dickson, D.D., was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. In 1829 he became public examiner in classics; in 1832, Bampton lecturer; the following year, principal of St. Mary's Hall; 1834, White's professor of moral philosophy; 1836, regius professor of divinity; and, in 1847, bishop of Hereford. He was an able contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." Hallam says that no Englishman has gone so far into the wilderness of scholasticism. n. in Barbadoes, 1792; n. 1868.

HANDEL, George Frederic, han'-del, an illustrious German musician, whose father intended him for the law, and, perceiving his propensity to music, prohibited all instruments from his house. The son, however, contrived to have a small clavier concealed in the garret, where he used to amuse himself when the family were asleep. At the age of seven he went with his father to the court of the duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, who induced his father to allow his boy to pursue the bent of his genius; and accordingly a master was provided for him. His progress was now so rapid, that at the age of ten he composed a set of sonatas, which were in the possession of George III. In 1693 he went to Berlin, where he was greatly noticed by the king of Prussia. Thence he went, in 1703, to Hamburg; and had a duel with Mattheson, another musician, who made a lunge at him, and whose weapon was prevented from penetrating his heart by its being broken against a music score, which Handel happened to have buttoned under his coat. Shortly after this, he composed, at the age of twenty, his opera of "Almira," which had a run of thirty nights. In the following year he produced "Florinda" and "Nerone," and, shortly afterwards, revisited Italy. At Florence he produced the opera of "Rodrigo," for which he received a service of plate and £50. His fame had now spread far and near, and in 1710 he visited England; but being under an engagement to the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England, his stay was short. In 1712 he returned, and obtained a pension of £200 a year for a "Te Deum" and his "Jubilate," written by command of Queen Anne, to celebrate the peace of Utrecht. This pension was subsequently doubled. Some of the nobility now projected a plan for erecting an academy in the Haymarket, to secure a supply of operas composed by Handel, and under his direction. This was carried into effect, and succeeded for about ten years, but fell to the ground when the rage for Italian music set in, Handel finding it impossible to stem the tide of public taste. In 1742, however, his popularity returned, and he retained his glory to the last. n. at Halle, Saxony, 1684; n. in London, 1759, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where there is an elegant monument to his memory. But his greatest monument is in his works, a complete edition of which was published by Dr. Arnold. This great musician composed much, and all that he composed is valuable. His original MSS. are in the Queen's Library, and consist of 82 large folio volumes. Among these are 23 oratorios, 32 Italian operas, 8 volumes of anthems, and other compositions. In every style of music he excelled, but more especially in sacred music of the choral kind. Wherever his works are now performed, admiration is the meed which is universally conceded to them. In 1859 the centenary of his death was commemorated by a festival in many of the principal places of Europe, America, and even Australia, we believe, in token of the universal appreciation in which his compositions are now held.

HANKA, Waclaw, han'-ker, a modern Bohemian poet, more celebrated for his having accidentally discovered, in a vault of the church of Kralodvor, the Bohemian manuscript of a poem known as "The Queen's Court," than for the excellence of his own muse. He was, however, an ardent labourer in the field of Bohemian literature, and is said to have been master of eighteen different languages. n. 1791.

HANMER, Sir Thomas, han'-mer, chosen Speaker of the Commons in 1713, a position he ably filled; and in later life devoted himself to literature, and edited an illustrated edition of Shakespeare. n. 1676; n. 1746.

HANNAY, James, han'-nai, novelist, satirist, and journalist, began life in the royal navy, which he quitted in 1815, and devoted himself to literature, contributing largely to all the most respectable publications of the day, and in a variety of styles, his lucubrations having appeared in the "Quarterly Reviews," "Punch," various newspapers, including the "Athenæum," &c. Mr. Hannay published several separate works, such as "Satire and Satirists," "Eustace Conyers," "Singleton Fontenoy," &c. He also paid much attention to classical literature and genealogy, on both of which subjects he contributed valuable papers to the "Quarterly Review." He contested the Dumfries district of burghs in 1857, and, though unsuccessful, received a respectable measure of support. From 1860 to 1864, he was editor of the "Edinburgh Courant" newspaper, one of the oldest and most respectable journals in Scotland. n. at Dumfries, 1827.

HANNIBAL, han'-ni-bal, a celebrated Carthaginian general, the son of Hamilcar, was brought up in his father's camp, although from his earliest years he was accustomed to the labours of the field. He passed into Spain when nine years old, and, at the request of his father, took a solemn oath that he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death, he was appointed over the cavalry in Spain, and before his 25th year, some time after, was invested with the command of all the armies of Carthage. In three years of continual success, he subdued all the nations of Spain which opposed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum, after a siege of eight months, 219 n.c. This city was in alliance with the Romans, and its fall was the cause of the second Punic war, which Hannibal prepared to support with all the courage and prudence of a consummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he sent to Africa, he left another in Spain, and marched at the head of a third towards Italy. With this army he crossed the Alps, hitherto deemed impassable, and since accomplished by Napoleon I. under similar military circumstances. He no sooner had entered Italy, than he was opposed by the Romans, and after he had defeated the consul, Publius Cornelius Scipio, on the banks of the river Ticinus (Ticino), he crossed the Apennines, and invaded Etruria. He defeated the army of the consul Flaminius, near the lake Trasimenus, and soon after met the two consuls, C. Terentius and L. Æmilius, at Cannæ, in Apulia. His army consisted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horse when he engaged the Romans, and the slaughter was so great, that he sent to Carthage three bushels of gold rings, which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in the battle. Had he now marched his army to the gates of Rome, it is usually asserted that it must have yielded amidst the general consternation. After hovering for some time round the city, he retired to Capua, where his soldiers soon forgot to conquer, in the pleasures and riot of that luxurious town. From this circumstance it has been said, and with propriety, that Capua was a Cannæ to Hannibal. After the battle of Cannæ, the Romans became more cautious; and when the dictator, Fabius Maximus, had defied the artifice as well as the valour of Hannibal, they began to look for better times. Marcellus, who succeeded Fabius in the field, first taught the Romans that Hannibal was not invincible. After many important debates in the senate, it was decreed that war should be carried into Africa, in order to cause Hannibal to withdraw from the gates of Rome; and Scipio, who was the first proposer of the plan, was empowered to carry it into execution. When Carthage saw the enemy on her coasts, she recalled Hannibal from Italy; and he is said to have left, with tears in his eyes, a country which, during sixteen years, he had kept under continual alarms, and which he could almost call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama, and Hannibal suffered a great defeat, 202 B.C. This battle ended the second Punic war. Hannibal, after he had lost the day, fled to Adrumetum, and afterwards to Syria, to King Antiochus, whom he advised to make war against Rome, and lead an army into the heart of Italy. Antiochus distrusted the fidelity of the noble refugee, and was conquered by the Romans, who granted him peace on condition of his delivering their greatest enemy into their hands. The Carthaginian general, being apprised of this, left the court of Antiochus and fled to Prusias, king of Bithynia. He encouraged him to declare war against Rome, and even assisted him in weakening the power of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, who was in alliance with the Romans. The senate redevel intelligence of the country in which he had taken shelter from their vengeance, when they immediately sent ambassadors, amongst whom was L. Q. Flaminius, to demand him of Prusias. The king was unwilling to betray Hannibal, and violate the laws of hospitality; but, at the same time, he dreaded the power of Rome. Hannibal, however, extricated him from his embarrassment by swallowing a dose of poison, which he always carried with him in a ring on his finger. As he breathed his last, he exclaimed—"Solvamur diturnâ eura populum Romanum, quando mortem senis expectare longum censet." B. 247 B.C.; p. 183 B.C. In the same year, Scipio and Philopemen died. The Romans entertained such a high opinion of Hannibal as a commander, that Scipio, who conquered him, calls him the greatest general that ever lived, and gives the second rank to Pyrrhus of Epirus, and places himself the next to these, in merit and abilities.

HANNO, hân'-no, a Carthaginian general, who made great geographical discoveries in the interior of Africa, an account of which is extant.—There was another of this name, who tamed a young lion, which used to attend him like a dog. The Carthaginians, fearing his power, banished him.

HARCOURT, William, Earl of, har'-koort, entered the army as ensign in the 1st foot guards, in 1759, and while serving in America, performed the remarkable feat of going in one day 70 miles, on the same horse, through the enemy's country, with only a patrol of 30 men, and bringing back General Lee, who had deserted from the British army. He took Lee out of his quarters when surrounded by 2000 of the American troops. On his return to England, he was made aide-de-camp to the king, and had the command of the queen's regiment of light dragoons, which he held from 1779 till his death. B. 1743; d. 1830.

HARDENBERG, Charles Augustus, prince of, har'-den-bairg, a famous statesman, who several times represented the elector of Hanover at the English court. In 1790 he entered the service of the king of Prussia, whose minister for foreign affairs he became in 1806. At the close of the wars of the first French empire, he signed the treaty of peace at Paris, in 1814. B. at Hanover, 1750; d. at Genoa, 1822.

HARDICANUTE, or HARDACAN har'-di-kan'-ute, was eldest son of Canute the Great, king of England, Denmark, and Norway. On the death of his father, whose viceroy he was in Denmark, Harold, a younger son, by Canute's marriage with Alfgiva, daughter of the earl of Northampton, assumed the crown of England, and a bloody struggle was only prevented by the eldest son accepting the sovereignty of the whole country south of the Thames; thus forming the ~~three~~ kingdom of Wessex. ~~His~~ ~~he~~ ~~was~~ ~~an~~ ~~inordinate~~ ~~love~~ ~~of~~ ~~his~~ ~~hard~~ ~~drinking~~; and long after his death, apoplexy, his subjects continued to celebrate a event, under the title of Hog's Tide, or Hock Wednesday. HARDING, James Duffield, har'-ding, an English artist, distinguished no less as a teacher of and writer on art than for his practice of it. At the age of 15 he took lessons of the celebrated Prout; and at 16 won the silver medal from the Society of Arts. He was among the first to employ tinted lithography as a vehicle for producing fac-similes of elaborate sketches and studies. His "Elementary Art; or, the Use of the Lead-pencil advocated and explained," "The Principles and Practice of Art," "Lessons on Trees," are considered the best text-books for students of drawing extant. For a series of years he continued to adorn the exhibitions of the Royal Academy and the Water-colour Society with his exquisite productions. For facility and certainty of touch he has few superior. B. at Deptford, Kent, 1798; d. 1863.

HARDINGE, Henry, Viscount, har'-ding, a brave and accomplished English soldier, a field-marshal, and for some time commander-in-chief of the British army, was third son of the Rev. Henry Hardinge, rector of Stanhope, in the county of Durham; became ensign in an infantry regiment in 1793, lieutenant in 1802, and captain in 1804. He served throughout the whole of the Peninsular war, under the duke of Wellington, who early took him under his patronage. At the battle of Vimiera he was severely wounded, and at Corunna, he stood beside Sir John Moore when that hero received his mortal wound. After taking part under the duke of Wellington, in the first and second sieges of Badajoz, he was once more severely wounded at Vittoria. At the battles of the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes, he was present. Returning to England at the close of the Peninsular campaign, he was hailed as one of the bravest English officers. On the renewal of hostilities, he was again in the field, and served upon the duke's staff. He was wounded in the left arm at Ligny, while acting as a brigadier-general of the Prussian army; whereupon his arm was amputated. This skirmish taking place only two days before the battle of Waterloo, he was thus prevented from sharing in that glorious victory. He was created a K.C.B., with a pension of £300 a year. When the duke of Wellington was made premier, in 1828, he selected Sir Henry Hardinge as his secretary-at-war, a post which, two years after, he exchanged for the chief-secretaryship for Ireland, but retired from it a few months after. From 1835 to 1841 he had no official appointment; but, in the latter year, he resumed his former post in Ireland, and continued in it till 1844. In this year he was made governor-general of India, and to his firmness and military skill were chiefly due the successes of the English arms over the Sikhs. When the Sikhs crossed the Sutlej and invaded English territory, they were met by 32,000 British soldiers and 68 guns, and Mood-kee and Perozeshah witnessed the complete rout of the Sikhs. At the latter battle, the governor-general, waiving his title to command, fought under Sir Hugh Gough, and at the head of the 80th regiment carried and spiked the British troops now garrisoned Lahore, the capital of the Punjab. On the ratification of the treaty which annexed the fertile Punjab to the English dominions, he received the thanks of both houses of Parliament, a pension of £3000 a year, and was made Viscount Hardinge, of Lahore. The East India Company further increased his pension by a grant of £5000 a year. Under Lord Derby's administration, in 1852, he was made master-general of the ordnance, and in September of the same year, commander-in-chief, on the decease of the duke of Wellington. In the House of Lords he never spoke, save on military matters. In October, he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal. Being seized by a paralytic attack in July, 1856, he resigned the office of commander-in-chief. n. at Wrotham, Kent, 1785; d. 1856.

HARDOUN, John, har'-do'-a, known as "Father Hardouin," a learned French Jesuit, who devoted his life to the study of the dead languages, history, divinity, and philosophy. He is famous for his paradoxical attempts to prove that Virgil's "Æneid," the "Odes" of Horace, and other great works of antiquity, were forgeries of the monks during the middle ages. n. at Quimper, 1716; d. at Paris, 1792.

HARDWICK, Philip, R.A., hard'-wik, a distinguished architect and designer of the warehouses and large buildings of the St. Catherine's Dock Company, the new hall of the Goldsmith's Company, the entrance of the Euston station of the London and North Western Railway, and, in conjunction with his son, Charles Philip, of the New Hall and Library at Lincoln's Inn. He was, for many years, architect to the duke of Wellington and to Greenwich Hospital; received the gold medal of the Institute of British Architects, of which he was a fellow and vice-president; he was likewise a fellow of the Royal Society, and was awarded the gold medal of the Paris Exhibition of 1855. n. in London, 1792.

HARDWICKE, Philip Yorke, first earl of, a great English lawyer and judge, distinguished for his justice and skill as lord chancellor. In 1719 he was elected into Parliament for Lewes, in Sussex; after serving the offices of solicitor and attorney-general, he was, in 1733, appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, and created a peer. In 1736 he was made lord chancellor, which situation he held twenty years. In 1754 he was created earl of Hardwicke. In all his offices, particularly the last, he so conducted himself as to acquire the esteem of all parties, and the veneration of posterity. n. at Dover, 1690; d. 1764.

HARDY, Sir Charles, har'-de, an English admiral, and the grandson of an eminent naval commander of the same name, in the reign of Queen Anne. He had the command of the Channel fleet in 1779, and died the same year.

HARDY, Vice-admiral Sir Thomas, G.C.B., a gallant naval officer, the friend and brother-in-arms of Nelson, whose last breath he received on board the Victory. Hardy entered the navy as a midshipman on board the Melema, of 14 guns, at twelve years of age, and in November, 1793, was made lieutenant in the Melema, belonging to the squadron commanded by Nelson, under whose notice he was thus brought. He was thenceforth constantly employed under England's great naval hero, who, in 1797, promoted him to the command of the brig La Motine, to the capture of which he had mainly contributed. His unvarying bravery and skill, particularly his conduct at the battle of the Nile, in which his vessel, La Motine, was the only single decker present, induced Nelson to select him for the command of the Vanguard. In July, 1803, he became flag-captain to Nelson, on board the Victory, and he it was who, on the fatal but glorious 21st of October, 1805, received the last orders of the greatest naval warrior that ever lived. For his services at Trafalgar Hardy was created a baronet; and after thirty-six years of arduous and efficient service in every quarter of the globe, he was, in 1834, appointed to the honourable post of governor of Greenwich Hospital, where he constantly resided till the close of his valuable life. n. 1769; d. 1839.

HARDY, Rt. Hon. Gathorne, under-secretary for the home department under Lord Derby in 1853, and secretary of state for the home department from May, 1867, to December, 1868. n. at Bradford, 1814.

HARDYNE, John, har'-ding, an old English historian, who, entering in his youth the service of Sir Henry Percy, eldest son of the duke of Northumberland, surnamed Hotspur, fought under his banner at the battles of Homildon and Cokelawe. In 1405 he was made constable of Warkworth Castle, in Northumberland; in 1415 he accompanied King Henry to Harlebur; and his account of the march which preceded the battle of Agincourt forms one of the most striking episodes in his metrical "Chronicle," the composition of which was the sole occupation of his old age. It has been edited by Sir Henry Ellis. n. 1378; d. about 1465.

HARE, Julius Charles, hair, a distinguished English divine and essayist, and one of the leaders of that section of the Church called "Broad Church." In conjunction with his brother Augustus William, and others, he wrote "Guesses at Truth," a book which has strongly affected thinkers and scholars. He assisted Bishop Thirlwall in translating Niebuhr's "History of Rome." In 1848 he edited the remains of John Sterling, and was fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, rector of Hurstmonceux, and chaplain to the queen. His life was spent in earnestly searching after truth, many short works on philosophy, divinity, sermons, &c., attesting his industry. B. 1796; D. 1855.

HARGRAVES, Edmund Hammond, här'-gravis, an English traveller, celebrated for having first pointed out the existence of gold in Australia, served for some time on board a merchant vessel, but emigrated to Australia in 1833. In 1849 he went to California, where, while searching for "placers," he was struck with the similarity of the Californian soil to that which he had left. Strongly impressed with the idea, he, on his return to Sydney, in 1851, set out towards the Blue Mountains. Accompanied by a young guide, he reached the Macquarrie river, and there saw traces of the precious metal. Returning to Sydney, he induced the authorities to organize an expedition to search for gold. Hardly had it reached the place he had pointed out, when a large quantity of gold was discovered. The gold fever immediately set in. The colony he had enriched by his sagacity and disinterested perseverance has marked its gratitude by conferring on him a handsome pension. He was the author of "Australia and its Gold Fields." B. at Gosport, Sussex, 1815.

HARGREAVES, James, här'-greeves, a celebrated English mechanician, who, while working as a poor weaver at Stanhill, Lancashire, conceived the idea of imitating, by machinery, the action of the spinner seated at her wool-wheel; by means of which, the "roving" of wool could be extended indefinitely; and, after having been twisted, wound on the cope or spindle. This was the origin of the celebrated "spinning jenny;" and even at the period of its first construction (1768), it produced more work than the combined efforts of thirty spinners with the old wheel. Arkwright and others have since completed the invention; the machinery of cotton-spinning being, at the present day, among the very best and simplest of all mechanical contrivances. The cotton-spinners, who had hitherto worked by hand, imagining that their trade would be ruined by the new machine, besieged the house of the inventor, and endeavoured to destroy his "jennies." He removed to Nottingham, and very shortly after, his invention was superseded by the improvements effected by Richard Arkwright; and he died in poverty, about 1770.

HARLEY, Robert, earl of Oxford, har'-le, a distinguished statesman during the reign of Queen Anne, whose weak mind was alternately swayed by him and the celebrated duchess of Marlborough. He was a patron of literature, as well as a great collector of literary treasures. His collection of MSS., which was purchased for the British Museum for £10,000, contains sources of information on almost every subject, and has been freely referred to in Macaulay's "History of England." Impeached for treason by the Whig party, in the year 1715, he was confined in the Tower during two years; but on the Commons declining to prosecute, on his own petition he was released in 1717, and retired into privacy, when he brought together the splendid collection known as the "Harleian Manuscripts." B. in London, 1681; D. 1724.

HARLOW, George Henry, har'-lo, an English portrait and historical painter, who possessed a remarkable facility for drawing and colouring.

Harrington

He worked for some time in Sir Thomas Lawrence's studio, which was all the training he received in his art. When at Rome, he finished a copy of Raffaele's "Transfiguration" in eighteen days; Canova said it looked more like the work of eighteen weeks. The most celebrated of his historical pieces is "The Trial of Queen Catharine," in which Mrs. Siddons is drawn as the queen, and all the principal characters are portraits of the Kemble family. Although he died almost as soon as he had reached manhood, he achieved a very great deal in his profession. B. in London, 1737; D. 1819.

HARMODIUS. (See ARISTOGTON.)

HAROLD I., här'-old, surnamed Harefoot, king of England, was the son of Canute I.; but his legitimacy being questioned, Egelnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, refused to consecrate any but the sons of Emma. Harold, however, seized upon the throne in 1035, and divided the kingdom with his brother Hardicanute (see HARDCANUTE), and in 1037 he was crowned king of all England. D. 1040.

HAROLD II., was the second son of Godwin, earl of Kent, who had been the favourite during the preceding reign. On the death of Edward the Confessor, in 1066, he seized on the throne. His younger brother, Tostig, at the head of the king of Norway's army, invaded the kingdom; Harold met him, however, in 1066, when a battle ensued on the Derwent, and Tostig was killed. Scarcely had he disposed of this foe, when his kingdom was invaded by William duke of Normandy, known as William the Conqueror, and, in the celebrated battle of Hastings, Harold fell, pierced through the head by an arrow. B. a few years before the close of the 10th century; killed 1066.

HAROUN-AT-RASCHID, ha'-roon at rash'id ("the Dispenser of Justice"), a celebrated Eastern caliph, who was the great patron of arts and letters in his time, and the magnificence of whose court is constantly referred to in Eastern literature to this day. B. 753; D. 809.

HARPALUS, har'-pa-lus, a Grecian astronomer, who corrected the cycle of eight years, which was invented by Cleostratus, and adopted one of nine, which was afterwards improved by Meton. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

HARPALUS, a Macedonian chieftain, to whom Alexander committed the charge of the treasures at Babylon, when he went to the East. He squandered away a large part of the riches, and fled with the remainder. Assassinated at Crcte, 325 B.C.

HARPE, John Francis de la, harp, a celebrated writer and critic, who, after publishing some lesser pieces, brought forth, in 1764, his tragedy of "The Earl of Warwick," which was received with applause. This was followed by a number of dramatic pieces of great merit; also poems, which gained prizes from different academies.

The Earl of Warwick, Poems, &c. B. 1769; D. 1808.

HARRINGTON, Sir John, har'-ring-ton, an English poet, wit, and satirist. He published a translation of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," and received the honour of knighthood on the field from the earl of Essex; and in the reign of James I. was made a knight of the Bath. B. 1561; D. 1612.

HARRINGTON, James, a political writer. On leaving Trinity College, Oxford, he at first joined the parliamentary forces against Charles I., but afterwards became an attendant on his majesty. On the king's death, he devoted his time to study, and composed his "Oceana," a political romance, in which he defended republicanism. This work occasioned a great controversy, and the author formed a society upon its principles. In 1661 he was sent, on a charge of treason, to the Tower; whence he was removed to St. Nicholas's Island, near Plymouth, but was afterwards released on bail. n. 1611; n. 1677.

HARRIOT, Thomas, har'-re-ot, an eminent astronomer and mathematician, who accompanied Sir Walter Raleigh to Virginia, which country he surveyed and mapped. Documents, found after his death, prove him to have discovered the solar spots prior to their being described by Galileo; he is also said to have first observed the satellites of Jupiter, although this discovery has been assigned to Galileo. n. at Oxford, 1600; n. 1621.

HARRIS, John, har'-ris, an English divine and mathematician, who was secretary to the Royal Society. He published a translation of Pardie's "Elements of Geometry," but is best known by having first projected a cyclopædia or dictionary of sciences. This work appeared in 1710, in 2 vols. folio, entitled, "Lexicon Technologicum;" and a supplementary volume was added to it in 1736. n. about 1667; n. 1719.

HARRIS, James, a philosophical writer, who, after leaving Wadham College, Oxford, sat in Parliament for Christ Church, Hampshire, and in 1763 was appointed commissioner of the Admiralty, but was afterwards removed to the Treasury board. In 1774 he was made secretary and comptroller to the queen. He wrote three treatises, entitled, "Art," "Music, Painting, and Poetry," and "Happiness;" "Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar;" and several other philological works. n. 1709; n. 1780.

HARRIS, General Lord George, entered the army as a cadet in the royal artillery, before he was thirteen years of age, in 1769. He served during the campaign in America, and received a wound in the head at the battle of Bunker's Hill, which obliged him to be sent home; but he returned in time to take the field previously to the army landing on Long Island. He subsequently distinguished himself in India, and continued in active service until the capture of Seringapatam; when his services were rewarded with the honours of the Bath and a British peerage. He was colonel of the 73rd Regiment, and governor of Dumbarton Castle. n. 1829.

HARRIS, Sir William Snow, a distinguished natural philosopher and electrician, who introduced an improved form of lightning-conductor into the British navy; he also invented a new steering-compass; received one of the gold medals of the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow, and was knighted in 1847 for his eminent scientific services. He was the author of several volumes and pamphlets on electricity and magnetism; a large work on thunderstorms; and many valuable reports by him are included in the Transactions of the learned societies. n. at Plymouth, 1791; n. 1807.

HARRISON, John, har'-ri-son, one of the members of the High Court of Justice which sat in judgment on Charles I., and condemned him to death. He was the son of a butcher, and rose by bravery and merit to the rank of colonel in the parliamentary army. He was executed, with nine others of those who signed the king's death warrant, at the Restoration, 1660.

HARRISON, John, an eminent mechanician, who, though he began life as a carpenter, displayed such great mechanical powers, that a wooden clock he had constructed was universally admired for its accuracy. Encouraged by his success, he constructed a time-keeper, with which he, in 1735, travelled from Lincolnshire to London. Halley, Graham, and other eminent astronomers admitted its excellence, and procured him a passage to Lisbon in a man-of-war, with the view of correcting the longitude by its means. He had been several years in the instrument Harrison had ascertained the longitude within eighteen miles, and he accordingly claimed the reward. After a long delay, and considerable discussion, he received the whole of the £20,000 in 1767. Though he possessed the greatest scientific abilities, he was almost incapable of communicating his knowledge clearly in writing or speaking. n. near Pontefract, 1693; n. in London, 1776.

HARRISON, William Henry, one of the presidents of the United States, who, by reason of his military and civil services, acquired great popularity, and was elected president in 1840, but died only one month after his installation, being the first president who died in office. He communicated a valuable essay on the "Aborigines of the Ohio Valley" to the Philosophical Society of Ohio. n. in Virginia, 1778; n. at Washington, 1841.

HARRISON, Thomas, an architect, who, besides erecting a number of public buildings in Liverpool, Manchester, Chester, and other towns, designed for the late earl of Elgin the mansion of Broomhall, in Scotland. It is in the Grecian-Doric style, and has been pronounced a very fine specimen of the classical taste of the architect. n. 1744; n. 1819.

HART, Solomon Alexander, R.A., hart, professor of painting in the Royal Academy, began his career as a miniature-painter, but in 1828 abandoned it for oil-painting, on meeting with some success in the latter walk. The first work which attracted general notice was "The Elevation of the Lay," a representation of a circumstance of Jewish worship. He has since painted several pictures of the same nature. His style is marked by carefulness and correct drawing. He also painted many large portraits. n. at Plymouth, 1806.

HARTINGTON, the Rt. Hon. Spencer Compton Cavendish, Marquis of, har'-ting-ton, eldest son of the duke of Devonshire, returned for North Lancashire in 1857, and in April, 1863, became under-secretary of state for war. He held office as secretary of state for war in Earl Russell's short-lived administration of 1860. The general election of 1868 left him without a seat in the House of Commons. n. 1833.

HARVEY, William, har'-vee, a celebrated physician, who received his education at Cambridge, and then went to Padua, where he took his doctor's degree in physic. In 1607 he was admitted fellow of the College of Physicians, and in 1615 anatomical reader. This appointment was probably the more immediate cause of the publication of his great discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he made known to the world in his treatise "On the Circulation of the Blood," published in 1628. This discovery effected a revolution in medical science, was for a long time opposed in the most violent manner, and even when its truth was admitted, many foreign practitioners endeavoured to rob the author of his due honour, by ascribing it to other persons; but the right of Harvey to the discovery has long since been fully established. In 1632 he was made physician to Charles I., and, it is stated, frequently exhibited to him and his courtiers the motions of the heart and other phenomena upon which his doctrines were based. In 1645 he was chosen warden of Merton College, Oxford; but, when the parliamentary party were in the ascendant, he left it for London, and was elected president of the College of Physicians, but declined the office on account of his infirmities. After his death, he left his estate to the college, for which he had built a library and museum. A handsome edition of his works, all of which were composed in correct and elegant Latin, was published by the College of Physicians in 1766. s. at Folkestone, Kent, 1678; p. 1687.

HARVEY, Gideon, an English physician and writer on medicine, who, after completing his studies at Leyden, became a fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and was physician to Charles II. in his exile, and to the English army in Flanders. d. about 1700.

HARVEY, William, a clever English designer, principally on wood, at the age of fourteen was apprenticed at Newcastle to the celebrated Thomas Bewick, called "the reviver of wood-engraving," he having renewed the practice of it after it had almost become a lost art. Besides becoming one of Bewick's cleverest engravers, he drew many of the designs upon wood of the celebrated "Fables" published by his master. In 1817 he came to London, and entered the studio of Haydon, where, in company with the Landseers, Lance, and others, he received instruction in drawing and anatomy, maintaining himself by working as an engraver and designer on his favourite material, though at this time there was little demand for wood-engravings, almost the only ones required being for the illustration of primers and elementary school-books. In 1824 he began his career as a designer on wood, and continued to be one of the most skilful and prolific workers in this department of an art which has now reached extraordinary excellence, and has grown to be one of the most universal elements of delight and instruction. Like his master Bewick, he made engravings, almost at the outset of the renewed practice of wood-engraving, which are hardly excelled even in the present day. One of these, a copy of Haydon's picture of "Dentatus," is constantly referred to by modern engravers as a work remarkable for its size, breadth, and finish. Among his best works are "The Tower Menagerie," "The Zoological Gardens," "Northcote's Fables," and, later, "The Pilgrim's Progress." His designs for Mr. Lane's translation of "The Thousand and One Nights" stamp him as a true artist, whose luxuriant fancy and skilful graver have embellished a standard work. Many of the best designs in Charles Knight's "Pictorial Shakspeare" owe their origin to his facile pencil. s. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1800; p. 1866.

HASSALL, Arthur Hill, hâs'-sâl, an eminent English physician and experimental philosopher, who, after studying medicine at Dublin under his uncle, Sir James Murray, and during the period of his studentship contributing several papers to the "Annals of Natural History," became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1839. Shortly after, he received his diploma as doctor of medicine. His first works were "A History of the British Fresh-water Algae," "The Microscopical Anatomy of the Human Body in Health and Disease," the latter being embellished with about 500 coloured plates. His enfeebled health compelling him to abandon this arduous line of research, he commenced an investigation into the chemical properties of the articles of food. He was requested by the editor of the "Lancet" to communicate a series of articles on the "Adulterations of Food" to that journal. In 1855 he republished these articles under the title of "Food and its Adulterations." This was followed by another in 1856,—"Adulterations Detected." His labours, and those of others associated with him, have proved a great boon to the British public, he having analysed and pointed out the means of detecting the adulterations to be found in almost every article of an alimentary nature, as well as in drugs and pharmaceutical preparations. d. at Teddington, 1917.

HASSAN PACHA, has'-san pa'-châ, grand vizier of the Ottoman empire, was an African by birth, and when young, served in the Algerine navy. Being taken prisoner by the Spaniards, and sent to Naples, he found means of obtaining his liberty, went to Constantinople, and entered into the Turkish service. Here he soon distinguished himself by his superior skill and bravery, and was appointed capitan pacha, or high admiral. He vanquished the Egyptian insurgents; took Gaza, Jaffa, and Acre; and beheaded Daher, sheik of the latter city, who had for years defied the power of the Porte. He twice reduced the boys of Egypt to subjection, and carried with him vast treasures to Constantinople. In the war between Turkey and Russia, in 1783, although Hassan was then 85 years old, he was appointed to the supreme command of all the forces, and made grand vizier; but though there was no want of energy on his part, age had impaired his abilities, and the Ottoman forces were subjected to repeated discomfiture. The vizier was accordingly dismissed from his high command, and died in 1790.

HASSZ, Adolph, hass, a celebrated musical composer, who in his youth had been an excellent tenor vocalist. After studying in Italy under the best masters, he produced his opera "Sesostrate," at Naples, in 1735. In 1738 he was chosen by a section of the English nobility hostile to Handel to compose an Italian opera in opposition to that great master; but after meeting with some success in London, he retired to Dresden in 1745, and became the favourite composer of Frederick of Prussia. s. 1699; p. at Vienna, 1753.

HASTINGS, Warren, hais'-tings, a remarkable English statesman, who, after receiving his education at Westminster School, went out, in 1760, as writer in the service of the East-India Company. Having mastered the Persian and Hindustani languages, which, till his time, had been generally neglected, he was sent on more than one diplomatic and commercial mission into the interior, and in fourteen years he returned to England with a competent fortune, intending, henceforth, to live a life of retirement

Hastings

In 1769, however, he was appointed second in the council of Madras, and in 1772 was advanced to the highest civil post in the Company's service,—president of the Supreme Council of Bengal. An act of Parliament altering the constitution of the Indian government made Hastings governor-general. The territories of the Company, although greatly enlarged by the victories of Clive and others, were at this time in a very disorganized condition, and were in imminent danger from the persevering enmity of Hyder Ali, rajah of Mysore, supported by the Mahrattas and other native powers. But he vanquished the enemies of the Company, consolidated its power, and increased its revenue; the English people, however, were informed that all this had been accomplished by cruelty, corruption, and unlimited aggression, while the Court of Directors deemed that he acted in too independent a manner. The Court of Proprietors, however, supported him, and he commenced to wield absolute and irresponsible power, overruling the authority of the council, and refusing to obey orders, from whatever source transmitted. In 1785 he resigned, and on arriving in England was impeached, after long preparation, before the House of Lords, in Westminster Hall. Edmund Burke, in a speech which lasted more than three days, charged him with injustice and oppression towards the native princes, and illegally receiving presents himself, and with enriching his dependents and followers, by bribery and a wasteful expenditure of the Company's revenue. Three sessions were consumed in stating the case for the prosecution, and in the fourth several of the charges were abandoned, in order to bring the trial to a close. His defence was not finished till the 17th of April, 1795, whereupon he was acquitted on each charge brought against him. The historians of India, without palliating the vices of his administration, have sought an apology for his conduct in the difficulties of his situation, and the lax tone of morality prevalent among Indian officials at that period. It is universally admitted that his talents were remarkable and services great. The law expenses of his defence amounted to £78,080. In 1796 the Company granted him a pension of £4000 per annum for 28 years, and lent him £50,000 for 18 years without interest. He retired to Daylesford, an estate which his family had formerly owned, and which he had repurchased. b. 1733; d. 1818.

HASTINGS, Francis Rawdon, Marquis of son of the Earl of Moira, entered the army in 1771. He distinguished himself in the American war; was appointed, in 1778, adjutant-general of the British forces there, and rose to the rank of a brigadier-general; but a severe illness compelled him to return home before the conclusion of hostilities, when he was made aide-de-camp to the king and created an English peer. Advanced to the rank of a major-general in the summer of 1794, he was sent, with a reinforcement of 10,000 men, to join the duke of York in Holland, and helped to mitigate the disasters of that memorable campaign. In 1806, he was nominated master-general of the ordnance, which post he resigned on the fall of the Whig party. In 1813 he obtained the governor-generalship of India, which he held till 1823; and during the ten years of his sway, overcame the Nepaulese, the Pindarees, and other native powers, and rendered the British authority supreme in India. While absent he was created Marquis of Hastings. Ill health compelled him to return; and in 1824 he was appointed governor of Malta; but his health growing worse, his lordship proceeded to Naples, and died on board the Revenge, in Bala Bay. Lord Hastings was an able officer, an acute statesman, and a man of a frank and generous disposition. In accordance with his own request, his right hand was cut off, preserved till the death of the marchioness, and buried with her. b. 1754; d. 1825.

HATTON, Sir Christopher, hat-ton, an eminent statesman, and lord chancellor of England, was educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford; and studied at the Inner Temple. But instead of following the law, he became a courtier, and attracted Elizabeth's notice by his graceful dancing in a masque. He now rose in the queen's favour, and, in 1587, was made both chancellor and knight of the garter. His inexperience created much prejudice against him at first, but his natural capacity and sound judgment enabled him to acquit himself with tolerable credit. His death was the result of a broken heart, occasioned, as some historians affirm, by the queen's demanding a debt, which he was unable to pay. He wrote the Fourth Act in the tragedy of "Tancred and Sigismunda," and "A Treatise concerning Statutes or Acts of Parliament" is ascribed to him. b. 1540; d. 1591.

HATHERLEY, William Page Wood, Lord, hath-er-le, was called to the bar in 1827, sat for the city of Oxford from 1847 to 1852, became solicitor-general in 1851, a vice-chancellor in the court of Chancery in 1852, and lord-chancellor under Mr. Gladstone in December, 1868, when he was raised to the peerage. b. 1801.

HAUV, René Just, ho-e, a French abbé, who discovered and promulgated the geometrical law of crystallization, and was the author of many treatises on natural philosophy and crystallography. b. at St. Just, Picardy, 1743; d. at Paris, 1822.

HAVELOCK, Sir Henry, hav'-lok, a gallant British soldier, whose exploits have filled the world with his fame, was born at Bishopwearmouth, and educated at the Charter House, London. He was subsequently entered of the Middle Temple, but, yielding to his strong desire to join the army, he sought and obtained a commission as a second lieutenant in the rifle brigade (the 95th), where his military training was assisted by Captain (afterwards Sir) Harry Smith, the victor of Aliwal. After serving in England, Scotland, and Ireland, Havelock exchanged into the 13th Light Infantry, and embarked for India in 1823. On the breaking out of the first Burmese war, he was appointed deputy-assistant-adjutant-general, and was present at the actions of Napadee, Patanagoh, and Paghun. In 1827 he published the "History of the Ava Campaigns," and in that year was appointed adjutant of the military depot formed at Chinsurah by Lord Combermere. In 1838 he was promoted to a company, after having served 23 years as a subaltern. In the first Affghan campaign he was present at the storming of Ghuznee and the occupation of Cabul, and having obtained leave to visit the Presidency, he prepared a "Memoir of the Affghan Campaign," which was soon after printed in London. When the Eastern Ghilzies rose and blockaded Cabul, Havelock was sent to join Sir Robert Sale, then marching back to India, and was present at the forcing of the Khoord Cabul pass, at the action of Tezeen, and all the other engagements of that force till it reached Jellalabad. In the final attack on Mahomed Akbar, in April, 1843, which obliged that chief to raise the siege, Havelock commanded the right column, and defeated Akbar before the other columns could come up. For this he was promoted to a brevet majority, and was made companion of the Bath. He was then nominated Persian interpreter to General Pollock, and was present at the action of Manoo Keil, and the second engagement at Tezeen. He then proceeded with Sir John M'Caskill's force into Kohistan, and had an important share in the brilliant affair at Istaliff. Next year he was promoted to a regimental majority, and nominated Persian interpreter to the commander-in-chief, Sir Hugh Gough. At the close of 1843 he accompanied the army to Gwalior, and was engaged in the battle of Maharajpore. In 1844 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel by brevet. In 1845 he accompanied the army to meet the invasion of the Sikhs, and was actively engaged in the battles of Moodkee, Ferozeshah, and Sobraon. On the conclusion of the Sutlej campaign, he was appointed deputy adjutant-general of the queen's troops at Bombay. During the second Sikh war, he quitted his staff employment at Bombay in order to join his own regiment, which had been ordered to take the field, and had proceeded as far as Indore when his further progress was countermanded, and he returned to his post. He had now been 25 years in India, and his medical advisers, in 1849, ordered him to Europe for two years to recruit his health. He returned to Bombay in 1851, and was soon after made brevet-colonel, and appointed quartermaster-general, and then adjutant-general, of the queen's troops in India. In the expedition to Persia in 1856 he was appointed to the second division, and commanded the troops at Mohamurah, the success of which action was, however, achieved by the naval force. On the conclusion of peace he returned to Bombay, and embarked for Calcutta, but was wrecked off the coast of Ceylon. He proceeded, however, in a few days, and, on reaching Calcutta, was immediately sent up to Allahabad as brigadier-general, to command the movable column appointed to traverse Bengal, after the breaking out of the formidable Sepoy insurrection in 1857. With the greater portion of the 64th and 78th Regiments he first attacked the mutineers at Futteh-pore, on the 12th of July, and on the 15th, at Aoung and at Pandoo Nuddee; on the 16th at Cawnpore, where he had a horse shot under him, and where the enemy lost 23 guns. Advancing from Cawnpore on the 29th, he captured Oonao and Busseerut Gunge and 19 guns. This position he was obliged to give up, but retook it on the 5th of August, inflicting great slaughter. On the 12th of August he again defeated the mutineers, and on the 16th attacked them at Bithoor. Soon afterwards, on receiving reinforcements under Sir James Outram, he entered Lucknow on the 25th of September, having in the short space of two months gained no less than nine victories over forces five, eight, and ten times more numerous than his own, and capturing during these operations 70 pieces of cannon. At Lucknow he gallantly held his ground until the garrison was finally relieved by Sir Colin Campbell, on November 6th; but his constitution was now worn out by anxiety, fatigue, wounds, and hard service, and he sunk under an attack of dysentery shortly afterwards. Sir Henry was always as remarkable for unostentatious earnestness as a Christian, as for his bravery and devotion to his duty as a soldier; and he left behind him a name associated with all that is expressed in the words, noble, good, and courageous. b. 1795; d. 1857.

HAWES, Stephen, hawz, an English poet, well versed in French and Italian poetry, was groom of the privy chamber to Henry VII. His works are, "The Temple of Glass," which is a copy of Chaucer's "House of Fame," "The Passetyme of Pleasure," which was finished in 1506, and printed in 1517, 4to, by Wynkyn de Worde, with woodcuts.

HAWES, William, an English physician, studied medicine, and followed the profession of an apothecary, which he practised in the Strand, until 1780, when he took his degree as a physician. Before this, however, he had become popular by his exertions in the establishment of the Humane Society, to the benefits of which institution he may truly be said to have devoted the best part of his life. He wrote several useful tracts, and among others, "An Examination of the Rev. John Wesley's Primitive Physic," being at once an ironical and serious exposure of the crudities of that production. b. at Islington, London, 1736; d. 1808.

HAWKE, Edward, Lord, hawk, a gallant English admiral, the son of a barrister, entered the navy at an early age. In 1731 he obtained the command of a ship, and distinguished himself in the famous battle of 1744, when the English fleet was commanded by Matthews, Lestock, and Rowley. In 1747 he was made rear-admiral of the White, and in the same year defeated a large French fleet, and captured five sail of the line. For this he was created a knight of the Bath. In 1759 he defeated Conflans, and was rewarded with a pension of £2000 a year. In 1765 he was made vice-admiral, and first lord of the Admiralty, and, in the following year, was created a peer. b. 1715; d. at his seat of Shepperton, in Middlesex, 1781.

HAWKESWORTH, John, hawkes-werth, an able writer in the 18th century, who succeeded Dr. Johnson in compiling the parliamentary debates. He is stated to have been brought up a watchmaker, but afterwards applied himself to literature with considerable success. "The Adventurer," which he wrote with Dr. Johnson and others, is his principal work, and which caused him to obtain the degree of LL.D. He published the Life and Works of Swift, and was employed to compile an account of the discoveries made by Captain Cook and others in the South Seas, for which he received the sum of £6000. He afterwards became an East-India director. He translated "Telemachus," wrote "Almorán and Hamet, an Oriental Tale," and other pieces of a like kind, very popular in their day. b. between 1715 and 1719; d. at Bromley, Kent, 1773.

HAWKINS, Sir John, haw'-kins, a gallant admiral of the Elizabethan age, who came of a good family, and went early to sea in the merchant service. In 1562 he sailed with three ships from London for the coast of Africa, where he procured a cargo of slaves, which he disposed of in the West India islands. He made several other voyages to Guinea and the West Indies, and experienced a variety of adventures, which are detailed in "Hakluyt's Voyages." In 1583 he was appointed rear-admiral, and knighted for his services in the defeat of the Spanish armada. n. at Plymouth, 1520; n. off Porto Rico, 1505. Sir John Hawkins founded an hospital at Chatham.

HAWKINS, Sir Richard, son of the above, distinguished himself in the engagement with the invincible armada, and in 1593 obtained a commission under the great seal to attack the Spanish settlements in South America, where, after an obstinate conflict with a superior force, the English were beaten and taken prisoners. Sir Richard, who was severely wounded in the action, was detained a prisoner in America a considerable time, and was then sent to Spain, where he remained some years. On his return to England, he employed himself in writing the history of his own life. n. at Plymouth, about 1560; p. 1622, of an attack of apoplexy while attending the privy council.

HAWKINS, Sir John, a writer and magistrate, and the historian of music, was apprenticed to an attorney, and acquired a considerable knowledge of the law. At the same time he did not neglect other studies. He formed an early intimacy with Dr. Johnson, which lasted through life. He wrote several pieces in various publications, particularly the "Gentleman's Magazine," and, in 1760, printed a good edition of Walton's "Angler." In 1772 he received the honour of knighthood, for suppressing a riot in Spitalfields. In 1776 he published his "History of Music," 5 vols., after having spent 16 years in its composition. His "Life of Dr. Johnson" was written at the request of the booksellers, but not to the satisfaction of the public. n. in London, 1719; p. 1789.

HAWTHORNE, Nathaniel, haw'-thorn, a distinguished American novelist, who, a few years after leaving Bowdoin College, Massachusetts, published an anonymous novel, which he has never thought proper to claim. In 1837 he published a volume of sketches and tales, which had formerly appeared in the American periodicals, under the title of "Twice-told Tales." In 1835 he edited the "Journal of an African Cruiser," the MS. of which was supplied to him by an officer of the U. S. navy. His retiring habits led him to take up his residence in an old manse at Concord, where, for three years, he occupied himself in composing some charming tales and sketches, which he afterwards published under the title of "Mosses from an Old Manse," and in the introduction to which some interesting autobiographical passages are to be found. In 1846, while his friend Mr. Bancroft was at the head of the Boston custom-house, he acted as surveyor to the department, and his mode of life therein forms the introduction to his extraordinary romance of "The Scarlet Letter," published in 1850. In 1851 "The House of Seven Gables," and in 1852 "The Blithedale Romance," were produced, the chief incidents in the latter work being founded upon his experience as a member of the "Brook Farm Community." A third collection of his contributions to the periodicals, under the title of "The Snow Image," and a "Life of General Pierce, President of the United States," were his next productions. He also wrote some excellent works for the young, the chief of which are "True Stories from History and Biography," "The Wonder-Book," and "Tanglewood Tales." From 1852 to 1857 he acted as American consul at Liverpool. A later work by Hawthorne is HAY, James, hai, earl of Carlisle, came to England with James I., and was the first Scotchman created an English peer. His first title was Baron Hay; he was afterwards made Viscount Doncaster, and, lastly, earl of Carlisle. James I. employed him in several embassies, particularly to France, to mediate on behalf of the Protestants, and to negotiate a marriage between the Prince of Wales and Princess Henrietta Maria. p. 1636.

HAY, David Ramsay, a distinguished decorative artist and writer on art, began life as a reading-boy in a printing-office, but was afterwards apprenticed to a house-painter in Edinburgh. He occupied all his leisure moments in copying and painting pictures, one of which met the eye of Sir Walter Scott, who engaged him to paint a portrait of his favourite cat, and advised him to devote himself to decorative house-painting, promising him the painting of his house at Abbotsford, then being built. In 1823 he commenced business as a decorative painter, and published his first work—"The Laws of Harmonious Colouring." This was followed by "An Essay on Ornamental Design," "A Nomenclature of Colours," and numerous other works on art, full of suggestion and practical knowledge. He decorated the hall of the Society of Arts in London, in 1846. n. in Edinburgh, 1798.

HAYDN, Joseph, haidn, a celebrated musical composer, of a most original and prolific genius, was the son of a small wheelwright in the village of Rohrau, 45 miles from Vienna, his mother having been cook to the chief man of the village previous to her marriage. Both were musical, and being early taught to sing, Haydn was heard by the chapel-master of St. Stephen's Cathedral at Vienna, who immediately engaged him as a chorister for that church. At the age of 17 his treble voice broke, and he was left without any means of obtaining a livelihood; but a friendly wigmaker took him into his house, and he was thus enabled to pursue his studies as a composer. After a time, he married the daughter of his hospitable friend; but the union was an unhappy one, and a separation soon followed. Fortune conducted him to the house of the Italian poet laureate, Metastasio, whose niece he instructed in music. His connexion with the court poet brought him into acquaintance with the wealthy Prince Esterhazy, who, in 1761, made him his chapel-master, an office he held to the end of his life. Comfortably located in the prince's palace in Hungary, Haydn, for thirty years, composed and played over his magnificent works. In 1791 he was induced to visit London, where he produced six of his twelve "Grand Symphonies," causing the utmost possible excitement among the English musical public. In 1794 he again visited England, meeting with a most flattering reception, receiving for his services a sum amounting to £1550, and becoming a doctor of music of the Oxford university, and the guest of royalty. In his 64th year he composed his greatest work, "The Creation;" and two years later, "The Seasons." Like Handel, he was remarkable for his fertility: besides smaller works, he wrote 118 symphonies, 83 violin quartets, 15 masses, 4 oratorios, a Te Deum, a Stabat Mater and 14 Italian and German operas. His death is said to have been due to the shock caused by the bombardment of Vienna, although Napoleon gave orders that the great musician's house should be respected; and when the French troops entered the city, a guard was placed at his door to protect him. B. at Rohrau 1732; D. at Vienna, 1809.

HAYDON, Benjamin Robert, hai'-don, a great but unfortunate English historical painter and writer on art, was educated at the Plympton grammar-school, where Sir Joshua Reynolds had previously been a scholar. His father was a bookseller, and apprenticed his son to the same business; but he was greatly averse to it, and at the same time displayed a strong predilection for art. His father's opposition to his son becoming an artist was at length overcome, and Haydon started for London in May, 1804, to enter as a student of the Royal Academy. It was at this period that enthusiasm for the grand "high art," as it is called, was first awakened in his breast. It caused him to become a great painter; but his inflexible pursuit of this line of art, rather than paint what was more popular and remunerative, caused him many troubles through life, and greatly contributed to bring about his melancholy end. Although he was a student with such men as Wilkie and Jackson, he was regarded as a young man of great promise. In 1807 he exhibited his first painting at the Royal Academy; its title will show the young painter's ambition—"Joseph and Mary resting with our Saviour after a day's journey on the road to Egypt." It was sold; and the next year he exhibited the celebrated "Deutatus," which he considered badly hung by the Royal Academicians, and forthwith proceeded to make enemies of those forty potentates of art—a most imprudent step for so young a man to take. Lord Mulgrave bought the "Deutatus," and it was shown at the British Institution, gained the prize of the committee, and became very popular. The sanguine and ambitious young painter's prospects were now of the most encouraging nature. The Elgin marbles arriving in England about the same time, he wrote and talked about them enthusiastically and eloquently, and mainly contributed to get them purchased for the nation. He painted the "Judgment of Solomon," and sold it for 700 guineas; and "Alexander returning in Triumph," which produced him 500 guineas: but his second application for admission to the Royal Academy was refused. In 1814 he commenced another great work—"Christ's Entry into Jerusalem," which was exhibited by himself in Bond-street, in 1820, but could not find a purchaser; he, however, added two more works of the same class to his list—"Christ in the Garden," and "Christ Rejected." In 1821 he married; and in 1823 painted the "Raising of Lazarus," now hanging in the Pantheon. A few years before, he had opened a school for the purpose of "establishing a better and more regular system of instruction than even the Academy offered;" and had for pupils Edwin, Charles, and Thomas Landseer, Lance, Harvey, and others of our best draughtsmen and painters. He also continued to contribute to "The Annals of the Fine Arts" criticisms upon the Royal Academy; but this made him unpopular in his profession, and his large pictures being often left on his hands, caused him to be involved in pecuniary difficulties, which still increasing, he was incarcerated in the King's Bench prison for debt. Here he was witness of a scene which he afterwards reproduced in a popular picture, "The Mock Election," which George IV. purchased for 500 guineas. A continuation of the same subject—"Chaining the Members," was sold for 300 guineas. About this time his friends procured his release, and he painted "Pharaoh dismissing Moses," which sold for 500 guineas. A great failure and a great success followed: the first was "The Great Banquet at Guildhall, after the passing of the Reform Bill;" the second, "Napoleon musing at St. Helena." A second picture of the same character—"The Duke on the Field of Waterloo," was unsuccessful, and his debts again overpowering him, he was once more an inmate of the King's Bench. On his release, he commenced lecturing on the fine arts at the mechanics' institutions in the metropolis and in the provinces, meeting everywhere with the greatest success. Perhaps the severest blow he ever received was now awaiting him. For a long time he had been petitioning, writing, and lecturing on having the interiors of our large public buildings decorated with paintings. The government decided to embellish the interior of the new Houses of Parliament with cartoons. He set to work, prepared his design, and the judges left his name out of the list of successful competitors, not even giving it a place among the third class. It is said he never completely recovered the shock this disappointment caused him. His last works were "Uriel and Satan," "Curtius leaping into the Gulf," "Alfred and the Trial by Jury," "The Burning of Rome." In 1846 he exhibited this last-named work, and "The Banishment of Aristides," at the Egyptian Hall, "General Tom Thumb" holding his levees at the hall at the same time. The degree of success which awaited each of the exhibitors is thus chronicled by Haydon in his diary:—"Tom Thumb had 12,000 people last week; B. R. Haydon, 132½ (the ½ a little girl). Exquisite taste of the English people!" The exhibition was a failure, and Haydon's mind gave way under his accumulated embarrassments, and he ended his life by his own hand, in 1846. B. at Plymouth, 1789. Though far from being generally admitted to be a great historical painter, it must be allowed that Haydon did much, both by his works and writings, to elevate the character of English art. His quick temper, love of controversy, and readiness to charge every person that differed from him in opinion with mean motives, combined with his obstinate refusal to paint, as other and wiser artists have been forced to do, for the popular taste, marred the character and career of a virtuous, earnest, and eloquent lover of art, and brought his life to a sad termination, after causing him long years of embarrassment.

Hayman

HAYWOOD, Elizabeth, haz'-wood, an ingenious writer, who published "The Female Spectator," 4 vols.; "Epistles for the Ladies," 2 vols.; "Fortunate Foundling," "Adventures of Nature," "Jemmy and Jenny Jessamy," 3 vols.; "Invisible Spy," 2 vols.; "Husband and Wife," 2 vols.; "Betsy Thoughtless," and "A Present for a Servant-maid." n. 1693; p. 1756.

HAZLITT, William, haz'-litt, a distinguished English essayist and critic of literature and the fine arts, was the son of a Unitarian minister, who, in 1733, emigrated with his family to the United States, but returned two years later, and fixed his residence in Shropshire, where William commenced his education. In 1793 he was sent to the Unitarian college at Hackney, to be educated for the profession of his father, but neglected theology for moral and political philosophy. From an early age he had shown a great predilection for drawing, and, in the year 1802, visited Paris for the purpose of copying the pictures in the Louvre, and, on his return, met with some success as portrait-painter in London and the provinces; but abandoned the pursuit for that of literature, in 1803, displaying great industry and talent in the latter profession. In 1813 he delivered a course of lectures on the history of English philosophy, at the Russell Institution, and, afterwards, on the "Comic Poets" and the "Poets of the Elizabethan Age." He also wrote for the "Morning Chronicle," the "Examiner," and, in the latter part of his life, for the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His principal works are "The Round Table," the "Table-Talk," "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays." The articles "Fine Arts" and "The Life of Titian," in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," are from his pen. n. at Maidstone, 1778; p. 1830.

HEAD, Sir George, hed, knight, and author of several interesting books of travel. After having served as captain in the West Kent militia in 1802, he joined the British army in the Peninsula, and served as commissariat clerk at Badajoz, and afterwards rose to the rank of deputy-assistant commissary-general to the Peninsular army, with which he served throughout the campaign. He was sent to superintend the commissariat department in Canada, where he remained for several years. He has described his adventures and experience there, in his "Forest Scenes and Incidents in the Wilds of North America," and his "Residence on the Borders of Lakes Huron and Simcoe." In 1831 he was knighted. He also wrote many other excellent books, among the chief of which is "A Home Tour through the Manufacturing Districts." He likewise contributed several articles to the "Quarterly Review." n. 1782; p. in London, 1855.

HEAD, Sir Francis Bond, a clever and humorous writer of books of travel, began his career in the British army, but went out to South America in the year 1825, at the head of a mining association. Leaving his party at the foot of the Andes, he returned alone, on horseback, across the Pampas to Buenos Ayres, a distance of 1000 miles, and performed several journeys in the same manner, riding over upwards of 6000 miles, living on dried beef and water, and sleeping on the ground. On his return to London, he published "Rough Notes of some Rapid Journeys across the Pampas," in 1826. In 1835 he was made lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, during which appointment the Canadian insurrection broke out and was suppressed. He resigned in 1837, and on his return to England, in 1838, published a "Narrative" justifying his conduct. In 1850 he produced a pamphlet on "The Defenceless State of England," which excited a great deal of interest. He afterwards principally employed his leisure in composing light, humorous, and graphic sketches of tours made in the United Kingdom and on the continent. "A Fagot of French Sticks," "A Fortnight in Ireland," "The Royal Engineer," were among his latest productions, as the "Bubbles from the Drums of Nassau" formed one of his earliest. n. at Rochester, Kent, 1793.

HEAPHY, Thomas, heep'-e, a famous painter in water colours, and the first president of the Society of British Artists, whose pictures are well known. n. about 1775; p. 1835.

HEARNE, Thomas, hern, a learned antiquary, and editor of old MSS., had been a domestic servant to Mr. Cherry, of Shotterbrooke, who took him into his family, and gave him a liberal education. In 1695 he entered at Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he applied himself to the study of antiquities. In 1703 he took his degree of M.A., and in 1714 was appointed under-librarian of the university. He edited and published several ancient MSS. and old books; among others, the "Life of Alfred," by Spelman; Leland's "Itinerary," 9 vols. 8vo; and a collection of curious Discourses written by eminent antiquaries. n. at White Waltham, Berkshire, 1678; p. 1735.

HEARNE, Thomas, an artist of considerable eminence, born at Marshfield, in Gloucestershire, was eminent as a topographical designer; but his principal talent lay in landscape painting in water colours—a branch of the art which he may be said to have been the first who successfully practised. n. 1744; p. 1817.

HEATH, Charles, heeth, a famous line engraver, whose taste for art was fostered and formed under the tuition of his father, James Heath, also an engraver, whose plates are familiar to print collectors. Charles Heath's artistic publications, the "Book of Beauty," the "Keepsake," &c., established his fame as a first-rate engraver, and did much to inculcate a popular taste for the fine arts. n. 1784; p. 1843.

HEATHFIELD, Lord. (See ELLIOT, Gen. G. A.)
HEBER, Reginald, he'-ber, bishop of Calcutta, a learned, pious, and accomplished divine, after a brilliant career at college, composed his prize poem, "Palestine," which, unlike similar productions, has found a permanent place in English literature. In 1805, he set out on an extended continental tour, and visited Russia, the Crimea, Hungary, Austria, &c. He took holy orders in 1807, contributed during the few subsequent years to the "Quarterly Review," and worked at a Dictionary of the Bible, which, however, was never published. He had long considered that devotional poetry stood in need of improvement, and, with a view to raise the standard of this department of sacred literature, composed a volume of "Poems and Translations for Weekly Church Service," in 1819 he edited Jeremy Taylor's works, and in 1822 was made preacher of Lincoln's Inn. After twice refusing the appointment, he was ordained, in June, 1823, bishop of Calcutta, which diocese, in his day, extended over the whole of India, Ceylon, and Australasia. In June, 1824, he began the visitation of this immense diocese, and travelled through Bengal, and, after an eleven months' journey, arrived at Bombay, sleeping, for the most of the time, in a tent or cabin. His journal was published in three 8vo volumes, and now forms two volumes of Murray's "Home and Colonial Library." In it he describes, with the utmost clearness and picturesque, the strange provinces he visited, and graphically details the manners and customs of the natives of India. After having visited Ceylon, he left Calcutta on a journey to Madras, and reached Trichinopoly, where, after confirming a number of the natives, he retired to take a cold bath, in which he was found dead a short time afterwards. His life has been published by his widow. b. at Malpas, Cheshire, 1783; d. at Trichinopoly, 1826.

HEBERT, Jacques René, he-bair', commonly called Père Duchêne (from the title of a Jacobin paper of which he was the editor), was one of the most violent advocates for the French revolution, and one of the most unprincipled. He was made a member of the commune for his assistance in the massacres which took place in September, and the cruel murder of the Princess de Lamballe. It was Hebert who so grossly insulted Marie Antoinette by the vilest of all accusations; and put questions to the children of Louis XVI., which, when reported to Robespierre, called forth reproaches even from him. Having dared to oppose his colleagues and masters, they hurled him from his position, and accomplished his destruction with a promptitude that astonished him. He was guillotined amid the hisses of the populace, March 24, 1794. b. at Alençon, 1755.

HACQUET, Philip, hak'-ai, a French physician, who was a great advocate for the use of warm water and bleeding, and, in consequence, was ridiculed by Le Sage, in his novel of "Gil Blas," under the name of Dr. Sangrado. He was, however, a man of skill and piety, and wrote several medical books. b. at Abbeville, 1661; d. 1737.

HEEMSKERK, James, heems'-kerk, a Dutch admiral, who sailed with Barentien to discover a north-east passage to Asia, in which voyage the commander died, but Heemskerk brought back the ships safe to Holland. In 1607 he was made vice-admiral, and sent against the Spaniards in the Mediterranean, where he defeated a superior force, and took the Spanish admiral prisoner, but was himself slain in another action in 1607.

HEEREN, Arnold Hermann Ludwig, heer'-en, an eminent German philologist and historian, who, after travelling in Germany, France, and Italy, was appointed professor of philosophy at Göttingen in 1787, when he devoted the remainder of his life to learning and research. His "Manual of Ancient History," "Handbook of Modern History," and "Essay on the Influence of the Crusades," are considered to rank among the best productions of their class. He was elected a member of nearly every European learned society. b. near Bremen, 1760; d. at Göttingen, March, 1842.

HÄGEL, George William Frederick, hai'-gel, a celebrated German philosopher; studied with Schelling at Tübingen, and afterwards at Jena, where Fichte taught. He at first embraced the doctrines of that philosopher, but afterwards those of Schelling, and finally proceeded to propound a system of his own. In 1806 he became professor at Jena, and from 1808 to 1816 was director of the college of Nuremberg. In 1818 he replaced his former master Fichte in the chair of philosophy at Berlin, where he taught till the time of his death. An account of his system of metaphysics, and a comparison of his philosophy with that of Fichte and Schelling, would be out of place here. It will be sufficient to say that he ranks very high among German philosophers. His works, comprised in nineteen 8vo volumes, were published at Berlin between the years 1832-45, and have been translated in part both into French and English. b. at Stuttgart, 1770; d. of cholera, at Berlin, 1831.

HEIBERG, Johann Ludwig, hi-bairg, an eminent Danish metaphysician and comic dramatist, who, after receiving a good education, was undecided, at the age of 27, as to his choice of a profession; but the Danish government granted him a travelling pension; whereupon he went to London, and afterwards spent three years in Paris in the society of his father, who had been banished thither, and mixed in the best French society. On returning to his native country, he was made professor of the Danish language at the university of Kiel, in Holstein. After spending some years in this occupation, he commenced writing for the stage, and endeavoured to introduce among the Danes pieces written upon the model of the lightest French comedies. "King Solomon and the Hatter" was his first production, which met with the greatest success. "The Danes in Paris" succeeded; and in 1829 he was appointed royal dramatic poet and translator, and soon after married a lady, who, as Madame Heiberg, was accounted the most brilliant Danish actress of her time. Many other dramas, and some philosophical works, were next published by him. In 1827-28 he edited the "Copenhagen Flying Post," in which appeared the "Everyday Story," considered as one of the best Danish novels, and which was long thought to be his composition, but which has been ascertained to be the production of his mother. b. at Copenhagen, 1781; d. 1860.

HEIDEGGER, John James, hi-deg'-ger, a native of Zurich, in Switzerland, who went to England in 1708, and by his address and ingenuity, became the leader of fashion among the English upper classes, and manager of the opera-house, by which means he contrived to gain £5000 a year. He was an amiable and liberal man. b. about 1660; d. 1749.

HEIN, Peter, hine, an obscure sailor, who rose by his bravery to the command of the Dutch fleet, with which he defeated the Spaniards off the coast of Brazil, in 1636. He was slain in fighting with the French off Dunkirk. When the news arrived, the States sent a deputation to condole with his mother on the melancholy occasion; but the old woman only replied, "Ah, I always said Peter was an unlucky dog, and would come to an untimely end."

HEINE, Heinrich, hi'-ne, a celebrated French-German poet, essayist, and satirist, was born of Jewish parents, at Dusseldorf, on the 1st of January, 1800. "Which makes me," he wrote, "the first man of my century." He embraced the Protestant faith in 1825, to prevent, he said,

"M. de Rothschild's treating him with familiarity." He studied jurisprudence successively at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen, in which latter city he received the degree of doctor of laws, and while resident there, in 1824, made a tour in the Harz Mountains, an account of which he published at Hamburg. England, South Germany, and Italy, were next visited; and a description of these countries was written by him, and published under the title of "Reisebilder" (Pictures of Travel), between the years 1826-31, a French translation of which, by himself, under the title of "Impressions de Voyages," made him as celebrated in France as he already was in Germany. The brilliant wit, combined with the bold political addresses to the sovereigns of Germany and the whole of Europe, contained in this volume, established his fame. His "Book of Songs," published at Hamburg in 1827, placed him at the head of that political and literary section of his countrymen called "The Young German School," and, from its satirical humour, caused him so many enemies in Germany, that he withdrew to Paris, where he became, as much from temperament as from the natural bent of his genius, more a Frenchman than a German. During the last twenty-five years of his life, he continued to reside in the French capital, making only a few furtive visits to his native land. In 1847 he was attacked with paralysis, by which he lost the sight of one eye; and, in the following year, he had a second attack, which, although it left his mental faculties unimpaired, deprived him of the use of his other eye, and made him a cripple for life, besides subjecting him, at intervals, to intense bodily suffering. Though he was never again able to quit his chamber, he continued to embody in prose and verse the rich and fertile creations of his brain, by the aid of an amanuensis. A translation of his poems into French was made by Gerard de Nerval, under his superintendence, in 1855. In addition to the works we have quoted, he wrote many volumes of poetry, sketches, and satirical pieces. As a satirical wit, he is worthy to be classed with Cervantes, Swift, and Voltaire; while his poems are characterized by tenderness, originality, and rare beauty of versification. b. 1800; d. at Paris, 1856.

HEINSIUS, Daniel, hine'-se-us, an eminent Dutch philologist and critic, was made Greek professor at Leyden, when he was but 18, and afterwards succeeded his master, Joseph Scaliger, in the professorship of politics and history. Besides annotating several of the classic authors, he wrote some excellent works in prose and verse. b. at Ghent, 1580; d. 1655.

HEINSIUS, Nicholas, son of the preceding, was an eminent Latin poet, and editor of several editions of Virgil, Ovid, and Claudian, and other classic authors. b. 1620; d. 1681.

HEINSIUS, Anthony, a distinguished Dutch statesman, who for forty years filled the high station of grand pensionary; and whose prudence, skill, and probity gained him the confidence and regard of William III., Marlborough, and Prince Eugene. In the intervals between their campaigns, Marlborough and Prince Eugene were in the habit of retiring to the Hague, and, in concert with Heinsius, planning future operations; in the carrying out of which their military enterprise in the field was ably seconded by Heinsius in the cabinet. b. 1641; d. 1720.

HELENA, Se, he'-le-na, a native of Bithynia, of obscure origin, but of an accomplished mind and handsome person, became the wife of Constantine Chlorus, and was the mother of Constantine the Great. When her husband espoused the daughter of Maximianus Hercules, in 292, he divorced Helena; but, on the accession of her son, she was recalled to court, and treated with the honours due to her rank. She visited the Holy Land, where she is said to have discovered the true cross. She founded several churches, and bestowed immense sums in charity. b. about 247; d. 327.

HELIODORUS, he-li-od'-o-r-us, a native of Emesa, in Phœnicia, and who lived near the end of the 4th century, was bishop of Tricea, in Thessaly, but deposed towards the close of his life. His youthful work, "Æthiopia, or the Loves of Theagenes and Chariclea," in poetical prose, is distinguished by its strict morality from the other Greek romances. It is said that the alternative of burning his romance, or resigning his bishopric, being given him, he preferred the latter.

HELIOGABALUS, M. Aurelius Antoninus, he-lo-o-gab'-a-l-us, a Roman emperor, so called because he had been a priest of the sun, was, at the age of 14, chosen emperor, after the death of Macrinus, and associated with himself in the government his grandmother Mesa, and his mother Soemias, and chose a senate of women, over whom the latter presided. He afterwards fell into every kind of cruelty and debauchery, raised his horse to the consular dignity, and caused divine honours to be paid to himself. He was assassinated in 232.

HELL, Maximilian, hel, an eminent German Jesuit, who, at twenty-five years of age, was engaged as an assistant in the Jesuits' observatory at Vienna. In 1751 he was made professor of mathematics in Transylvania; but, after some years, he returned to Vienna, and there became head of an observatory, erected after his own designs. He left Vienna for Lapland in 1763 to observe the transit of Venus across the sun's disc. His observation was conducted under very favourable atmospheric conditions, and his report of the phenomena was so accurate and complete, that astronomical science was greatly advanced by it. His report also contained some valuable information relating to the natural history, the geography, and the meteorology of Lapland. He wrote many excellent mathematical and astronomical works, as well as editing the astronomical observations made by the Jesuits at Peking, between the years 1717 and 1752. b. in Hungary, 1720; d. at Vienna, 1792.

HELLANICUS, he-lan'-i-k-us, an early Greek prose writer, who composed a "History of Argos," and other works which have been quoted by ancient authors. b. at Mitylene, 496 B.C.; d. 411 B.C.

HELLOT, John, hel'-lo, a French chemist, who was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris, and of the Royal Society at London. He wrote some treatises on chemistry, and several dis-

HELPS, Arthur, helps, a distinguished English essayist and historian, whose first work was published anonymously, in 1841, under the title of "Essays written in the Intervals of Business," "Catherine Douglas," a tragedy, and "King Henry the Second," an historical drama, followed, in 1843. Two short works on "The Claims of Labour," and on "The Means of Improving the Health, &c., of the Labouring Classes," were his next productions. "Friends appeared in 1851, and, like its predecessor, was universally admired. He published all these works anonymously; but it was well known in literary circles that he was the author of them. After having graduated B.A. at Cambridge, in 1835, he entered one of the chief departments of the Civil Service; and rose gradually till, 1859, he became clerk to her Majesty's Privy Council. He now resided principally at his paternal estate, near Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire, and about this time published his greatest work, "The Spanish Conquest in America, and its Relations to the History of Slavery," upon the title-page of which he placed his name. Among his latest works may be named a "Life of Columbus," a "Life of Las Casas, the Apostle of the Indies," and "Realma," a story which first appeared in Macmillan's Magazine. n. about 1817.

HELST, Bartholomew van der, helst, an admirable Dutch painter, excelling in portraits, but also great in landscapes and historical subjects. n. at Haarlem, 1613; p. 1670.

HELVERIUS, Adrien, hel-ve-she-us, a Dutch physician, who, being at Paris while the dysentery was raging in that city, arrested its progress by administering ipecacuanha, and was rewarded with 1000 louis d'ors, and made inspector of the military hospitals. n. 1661; p. 1727.

HELVERIUS, Claude Adrien, in 1758, produced his celebrated work, entitled "De l'Esprit," which for its atheistical principles, was condemned by the parliament of Paris. On this he went to England, and thence to Prussia, where he was well received by Frederick the Great. On his return to France, he led a retired life, and wrote "Le Bonheur," a poem, and a philosophical work on "Man," of the same nature as his first performance. p. at Paris, in 1715; p. there, 1771.

HEMANS, Mrs. Felicia Dorothea, he-mans, a distinguished English poetess, was the daughter of Mr. Browne, who, dying while she was quite young, left her, with her mother, an inmate of a solitary old mansion in North Wales. She commenced writing verses when but nine years of age, and printed a volume of poems, called "Early Blossoms," before she was fifteen. In 1812 she was married to Captain Hemans, of the 4th regiment, whose health had, however, become so shattered by his service in the Peninsular war, and in the ill-fated Walcheren expedition, that, in a few years, he was compelled to leave his young wife and five sons and proceed to Italy, with a view to his recovery. Shortly after arriving there, he died. Strongly imbued with a love of poetry and literature, Mrs. Hemans studied Latin, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and German; made translations from Horace, Herrera, and Camoens, and wrote a series of articles on foreign literature for the "Edinburgh Magazine." She published "The Restoration of the Works of Art to Italy," in 1815; "Tales and Historic Scenes," in 1819; and obtained the prize from the Royal Society of Literature, for her poem of "Dartmoor," in 1821. Becoming acquainted with Bishop Heber, she wrote, at his suggestion, the "Vespers of Palermo," a drama, which was produced at Covent Garden Theatre in 1823, when it was unsuccessful, but was afterwards more popular at the Edinburgh theatre, upon which occasion Sir Walter Scott wrote an epilogue for it. In 1825 she contributed her "Lays of Many Lands" to the "New Monthly Magazine," then edited by the poet Thomas Campbell. "The Forest Sanctuary," and "The Records of Women," followed. The "Songs of the Affections" were published in 1830. In the spring of 1831, her health being very weak, she changed her residence to Dublin, where, while preparing a collected edition of her poems, she died. n. at Liverpool, 1791; p. 1835.

HEMINGFORD, Walter de, hem-ing-ford, canon of an Austin priory, Yorkshire, an English chronicler of the 14th century, whose history extends from the Norman conquest to the reign of Edward II. p. 1347.

HEMSKERCK, Martin van, hem-skerk, a Dutch painter, surnamed the "Raffaello of Holland," was the son of a mason, who brought him up to the same trade; but evincing a talent for design, he left his father's house and travelled to Italy. On his return he enriched his native country with his productions, most of which were destroyed by fire on the taking of Haarlem by the Spaniards in 1572. n. at Hemskerk, '98; p. 1574.

HENDERSON, John, hen-der-son, a celebrated English actor, who, evincing in his youth a taste for drawing, was placed under Mr. Fournier, an artist of ability, but of eccentric character, with whom he did not continue long. He next lived with a silversmith, on whose death he devoted himself to theatrical studies. His first appearance was in 1773, at Bath, under the name of Courtney, in the character of Hamlet, which he performed with great applause. His fame increased; but it was not till 1777 that he made his appearance on the London stage, when he was engaged by Mr. Colman, at the Haymarket Theatre, and made his first appearance in Shylock. After this he distinguished himself as a most excellent representative of Falstaff, Richard III., and other strong characters, which he personated with unbounded applause at Drury Lane, and at different provincial theatres. n. in London, 1747; p. 1785.

HENDERSON, Thomas, an eminent Scottish astronomer, who, after completing his education as an attorney, became secretary to Lord-advocate Jeffrey, in whose service he remained till 1831. For several years previously, he had been an earnest student of astronomy, and, although his health was delicate and his eyes weak, he continued to make himself so proficient therein, that he became the correspondent of Dr. Thomas Young, whom he assisted in the calculations for the "Nautical Almanack." On the death of Dr. Young, a paper was left by him, informing the admiralty that Mr. Henderson was the most proper person to fill the post left vacant; but though the admiralty did not act upon this suggestion, it appointed him to the charge of the observatory at the Cape of Good Hope in April, 1832. While thus engaged, he communicated upwards of seventy papers of the greatest value to different scientific publications. In 1834 he was made astronomer royal for Scotland, and, while fulfilling the duties of his office, he voluntarily imposed upon himself the task of reducing to order the mass of observations he had brought home from the Cape. His writings and observations have caused him to be reckoned among the best of modern astronomers. b. at Dundee, 1798; d. at Edinburgh, 1844.

HENGIST, hen'-jist, the first Saxon king of Kent, towards the end of the 5th century, was a descendant of Woden, whom the Saxons deified. Hengist and his brother Horsa, being called in by Vortigern, king of the Britons, to assist him in expelling the Picts, took with him his daughter Rowena, of whom Vortigern became enamoured, and married her. Hengist then obtained the kingdom of Kent, one of the seven of the Saxon heptarchy, and in which were included Kent, Middlesex, Essex, and Surrey. b. 489.

HENLEY, Rev. John, hen'-le, commonly called "the Orator," was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, after which he entered into holy orders, and became a preacher in London; but, disappointed in obtaining preferment, he commenced lecturing, not only on theology, but on politics, &c., on Sunday evenings, near Lincoln's Inn Fields. Pope satirized, and Hogarth caricatured him. He published a translation of Pliny's "Epistles," and other works. b. 1692; d. 1756.

HENRIETTA MARIA, of France, hen-ri-et'-ta, wife of Charles I. of England, was daughter of Henry IV. and Marie de Medici. During the struggle between the king and the people, in 1644, she was forced to fly to France. On the death of Charles, in 1649, she retired into a convent which she had founded at Chaillot, where she died in 1689, Bossuet pronouncing her funeral oration. b. at Paris, 1609.

HENRIETTA ANNE, of England, duchess of Orleans, the daughter of king Charles I., was born amid the turbulent scenes of the civil war. Her mother fled with her to France when the infant was scarcely three weeks old; and after the death of the king repaired to the convent of Chaillot, and there devoted herself to the education of her daughter. Henrietta united with great sweetness of character the charm of beauty, and was married to Philip, duke of Orleans. Their marriage was, however, rendered an unhappy one by the jealousy of the duke, who feared that his brother, Louis XIV., had supplanted him in his wife's affections; and when the latter afterwards employed her mediation in some difficult diplomatic affairs with her brother Charles II., the duke no longer doubted that which he had before suspected. Louis wished to detach the king of England from the triple alliance with Holland and Sweden. Henrietta went, therefore, in 1670, with the court to Flanders, and, under pretence of visiting her brother, passed over to Dover, where Charles was waiting her arrival. Mademoiselle de Kéroual, a native of Brittany (afterwards mistress of Charles II., under the title of duchess of Portsmouth), accompanied her. Their mission was not in vain; for in ten days the persuasions of the sister, aided by the fascinations of her companion, gained over to the French interest the profligate monarch. Soon after her return to France, the duchess of Orleans was suddenly seized with violent pains, which terminated her life; and though a post mortem examination took place, which was declared to be satisfactory, it is believed that she fell, in the prime of life and beauty, the victim of jealous revenge. The sweetness of her manners made this unfortunate princess an object of general regret, and caused her to be compared with her still more unfortunate ancestor, Mary queen of Scots. b. 1644; d. at St. Cloud, 1670.

HENRIOT, Francois, hen-re'-o, one of the chief actors in the worst horrors of the first French Revolution, having robbed his master, an attorney in Paris, was driven on the town without resource, and became a spy of the police. He first appeared in his revolutionary character the day after the taking of the Tuilleries, in 1792. He was one of the most sanguinary of the assassins of September; and presided at the massacre of the prisoners in Orleans. The commune of Paris then made him chief of the sous-culottes section. With these banditti, armed with bayonets and cannon, he marched to the Convention, and demanded the proscription of the Girondists. Under terror, the assembly consented to give up 29 of their most talented members to the guillotine. Henriot afterwards became the tool and satellite of Robespierre. When the latter was condemned to death by the Convention, Henriot and Coffinhal, the vice-presidents of the revolutionary tribunal, made an effort to raise the Jacobin factions in his favour; and had nearly succeeded, when Henriot's courage failed just as the brigands were pointing their cannon against the Convention. Some of the sections, and a body of gendarmes, rallying in favour of the Convention, Henriot was outlawed, and was arrested in a state of helpless intoxication, produced by large draughts of brandy which he had drunk in order to sustain his courage. His colleague, Coffinhal, maddened by the loss of the day, attacked him in the upper room of the Hotel de Ville, where both were confined, and threw him out of the window. He fell into a sewer, where he tried to conceal himself; but his groans betraying his hiding-place, he was dragged out, and sent to the scaffold, with Robespierre and his colleagues, on the 28th of July, 1794. Henriot, who was only 33 when he suffered, was an ignorant, brutal, and debauched ruffian; and, perhaps, his character is best displayed by the fact that it was he who proposed that all the public libraries and books in France should be burned. b. at Nanterre, 1761.

HENRY, hen'-re, a name borne by numerous kings and other persons of eminence in various countries, the most remarkable of whom were:—

HENRY I., king of England, surnamed, for his learning, Beauclerc, or the scholar, was the youngest son of William the Conqueror, and was the first monarch of the Norman line who was English by birth. He succeeded his brother Rufus in 1100, at which time his brother Robert was in Normandy. Robert soon after invaded the kingdom, but agreed with Henry, for a yearly tribute, to renounce his right. The two brothers again resorted to arms, and Henry invaded Normandy, deposed Robert, and brought him prisoner to England, where he died in Cardiff Castle. Though the personal character of Henry was cruel and licentious, his reign was marked by some substantial benefits conferred on the English people. He restored the university of Cambridge; forgave all debts owing to the crown prior to his accession; reformed the court, and conquered Wales; abolished the curfew-bell, established a standard for weights and measures, and made many other valuable improvements in the government of the country. b. at Selby, Yorkshire, 1068; d. at Rouen, 1135.

HENRY II., eldest son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, so named from planta genista, Latin for a sprig of broom, which he wore in his cap, and Maud, empress of Germany, succeeded Stephen as king of England, in 1154. He added the provinces of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Poitou, Saintonge, Guienne, and Gascony, to the English crown. His reign was troubled by disputes between him and Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, who being murdered in 1170, the pope obliged the king to undergo penance for it at Becket's tomb at Canterbury. In 1170 he caused his eldest son Henry to be crowned king of England; in 1173 he conquered Ireland, and, in the following year, his sons, instigated by their mother, rebelled against him, on account of his attachment to the Fair Rosamond. The kings of France and Scotland gave them assistance; but peace was concluded between all parties in the following year. In 1183 his son Henry died, in his 27th year. Richard, his third son, revolted against his father, and was supported by the king of France. Henry, being defeated in Normandy, was obliged to submit to disgraceful terms. b. at Le Mans, Normandy, 1133; d. at Chinon, France, 1189.

HENRY III. succeeded his father, John, in 1216, when only 10 years of age. When he reached the age of 16, he was declared of age; but his feeble character caused him to relinquish Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Touraine, and Maine, to the king of France. A civil war broke out in England, and he was taken prisoner by the barons, after a severe battle at Lewes, in Sussex. The tide of affairs turned in his favour after the battle of Evesham, in which the barons were totally defeated, chiefly through the brilliant skill and courage of his son Edward; whereupon he deprived several of these lords of their estates, and gave them to his friends. He cancelled the Great Charter, and suffered the pope to appoint an archbishop of Canterbury, and to collect tithes in England. b. at Winchester, 1206; d. at Westminster, 1272.

HENRY IV., eldest son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and third son of Edward III., after some time spent in exile at Paris, invaded England at the head of a few followers, deposed his cousin, Richard II., and seized the throne, in 1399. This usurpation gave rise to the civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster, which broke out under the sway of Henry VI. After a short reign of only fourteen years, he died, filled with remorse for many of his unscrupulous deeds while king. b. at Bolingbroke, Lincolnshire, 1366; d. 1413.

HENRY V., surnamed Monmouth, from the place of his birth, was eldest son of Henry IV.,

and was educated at Oxford, under the guidance of his half-uncle, Cardinal Henry Beaufort. On commencing his reign, in 1413, he displayed many noble traits, although in his youth he had been very irregular; but, on coming to the crown, he discarded his evil companions, and conducted himself with a dignity becoming his station. Having laid claim to the French crown, he left his kingdom in the hands of a regency, and invaded France, where he displayed uncommon courage. With 15,000 men he gained the battle of Agincourt, though the French amounted to 52,000. He then returned to England; but, three years afterwards, went again to France, where he married Catharine, the daughter of the French king. He was a brave and energetic monarch, and the most popular ruler that had hitherto sat upon the throne of England, not a single instance of insurrection or discontent being manifested throughout his reign. b. at Monmouth, 1384; d. at Vincennes, 1422. The youthful escapades of Henry, and his association with that marvellous creation, Sir John Falstaff, form the leading incidents in Shakespeare's "First Part of Henry IV." An incident of his early life, however, which is authentic, gives a better notion of his character than the mad pranks of "the wild young Prince and Poins." Some of his dissolute companions having been apprehended and carried before the lord-chief justice Gascoigne, the prince endeavoured to obtain their release, and on this being refused, so far forgot himself as to strike the justice on the bench. The latter at once ordered the prince into custody, to which he quietly submitted; and to show his approval of justice Gascoigne's conduct, Henry continued him in office, and treated him with high favour, when he became king.

HENRY VI., the only son of the above, was but ten months old at the death of his father, and was proclaimed king on the day after that event. His grandfather Charles, king of France, died soon after, and the duke of Orleans, encouraged by the minority of Henry, assumed the title of King, by the name of Charles VII. This renewed the war between England and France, and the English, for a while, were successful. Henry was crowned at Paris, and the great duke of Bedford, his guardian, obtained several important victories. But the raising of the siege of Orleans by Joan of Arc gave a new turn to affairs, and the English power declined, and was, in the end, quite subverted. The death of the duke of Bedford was a fatal blow to the cause of Henry; and, to add to his misfortunes, the York party in England grew strong, and involved the country in a civil war. They adopted the white rose as their badge of distinction, and the Lancastrians the red. Hence the title given to the struggle—"The Wars of the Roses." After various contests, the king was defeated and taken prisoner. However, his wife, Margaret of Anjou, carried on the war with spirit, and for some time with considerable success. Richard, duke of York, was slain at Wakefield, and Henry recovered his liberty; but Edward, earl of March, son of Richard, laid claim to the crown, and routed the queen's forces at Ludlow, but was himself afterwards defeated at St. Alban's. At length the York party prevailed, and Henry was sent to the Tower, where, it is believed, he was slain by Richard, duke of Gloucester. b. at Windsor, 1421; found dead in the Tower, 1471.

THE DICTIONARY

Henry VII.

HENRY VII. was the son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret, of the house of Lancaster. By the assistance of the duke of Brittany, he landed in Wales with some troops, and laid claim to the crown in 1485. The people, disgusted at the cruelties of Richard III., joined him in such numbers that he was enabled to give the usurper battle at Bosworth Field, where Richard was slain, and Henry crowned upon the spot. He united the houses of York and Lancaster by marrying Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. His reign met with little disturbance, except from two impostors, set up by Lady Margaret, sister to Edward IV. One was a joiner's son, called Lambert Simnel, who pretended to be the young earl of Warwick, son of George, duke of Clarence, and the daughter of the "King Maker," whom, having captured, Henry made a turnspit in his kitchen. The other was Perkin Warbeck, who personated Richard, duke of York, younger son of Edward IV., who, along with his brother, Edward V., is generally believed to have been murdered in the Tower by Richard III.; but he was apprehended and executed, along with young Warwick, whom, while in the Tower, he had induced to enter into a conspiracy against the king. Henry reigned 24 years, and greatly increased trade and commerce; but his avarice was excessive. B. at Pembroke Castle, 1487; D. at Richmond, 1509. Buried in Henry the Seventh's chapel, built by him in Westminster Abbey.

HENRY VIII. succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, at the age of 18. The first years of his reign were very popular, owing to his great generosity; but at length his conduct grew capricious and arbitrary. The emperor Maximilian and Pope Julius II., having leagued against France, persuaded Henry to join them, and he, in consequence, invaded that kingdom, where he made some conquests, but did not push his advantages as he might have done, and finally concluded peace with the French King, Louis XII. About the same time, James IV., king of Scotland, invaded England, but was defeated and slain at Flodden Field. Cardinal Wolsey succeeded in bringing Henry over from the imperial interests to that of the French king. When Luther commenced his reformation in Germany, Henry wrote a book against him, for which he was complimented by the pope with the title of Defender of the Faith. But this attachment to the Roman see did not last long; for, having conceived an affection for Anne Boleyn, he determined to divorce his wife, Catharine of Aragon, to whom he had been married eighteen years. His plea for the divorce was, that Catharine was his brother Arthur's widow. The divorce being refused by the pope, Henry assumed the title of supreme head of the English church, put down the monasteries, and alienated their possessions to secular purposes. His marriage with Anne Boleyn followed; but he afterwards sent her to the scaffold, and married Lady Jane Seymour, who died in childbirth. He next married Anne of Cleves; but she not proving agreeable to his expectations, he put her away, and caused Cromwell, earl of Essex, the projector of the match, to be beheaded. His next wife was Catharine Howard, who was beheaded for adultery; after which he espoused Catharine Parr, who survived him. He was a man of strong passions and considerable learning; but it is truly said of him, "that he never spared man in his anger nor woman in his lust." B. at Greenwich, 1491; D. 1517.

SOVEREIGNS OF I

HENRY I., king of France, succeeded his father Robert in 1031. His mother, Constance of Provence, excited a revolt against him, in favour of her second son Robert, but without success. He had the reputation of being a valiant commander and a good king. B. about 1004; D. 1080.

HENRY II., the son of Francis I., succeeded his father in 1547, at which time France was at war with England. In 1550 peace was restored, and Boulogne ceded to the French for a large sum. The year following, a league was entered into between Henry and the Protestant princes of Germany against Charles V., which produced a war ruinous to France. In 1556 a truce was concluded for five years; but the emperor having resigned his crown to his son Philip, the war was renewed. In 1557 the French army was defeated by the Spaniards at St. Quentin. In 1559 Henry concluded a dishonourable peace. The same year he was accidentally wounded in the eye, at a tournament, by a lance, of which injury he died in 1559. B. 1518.

HENRY III., third son of the above, succeeded his brother, Charles IX., in 1574. While he was Duke of Anjou, the Poles elected him to their throne, on the death of Sigismund Augustus; but he renounced it on taking possession of that of France. In the same year he gained the battle of Dormans, and concluded a peace with the Huguenots, by which toleration was granted them. But this was revoked in 1585, and the Protestant princes, of whom Henry, King of Navarre, was the chief, had recourse to arms. The king of Navarre defeated the Catholic army in 1587. The duke of Guise, on the other hand, obtained a signal advantage over the Huguenots and their allies; but on his marching to Paris, the gates were shut against him. The people, however, were attached to Guise, and the king was obliged to retire from his capital, which was commanded by the head of the Catholic league. France was then divided into three parties: the Royalists, the Guises, and the Huguenots. At length the two first became apparently reconciled, but Henry caused the duke, and his brother the cardinal, to be assassinated soon after. Civil war again broke out with additional fury; the pope excommunicated Henry, and the parliament instituted a criminal process against him. In this exigency he had recourse to the king of Navarre, who set out on his march to Paris; but the face of affairs was suddenly changed by the death of the king, who was assassinated by a monk, named James Clement, at St. Cloud, 1589. B. at Fontainebleau, 1551.

HENRY IV., surnamed the Great, king of France and Navarre, was the son of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre, and Jeanne d'Albret. Being descended from Louis IX. of France, he became the heir to that kingdom; but, as he was educated a Protestant, his claim was resisted. Born a mountaineer, he was early trained to activity of body, and soon distinguished himself by feats of arms. After the peace of St. Germain, in 1570, he was taken to the French court, and, two years afterwards, married Margaret, sister of Charles IX. At the rejoicings on this occasion happened the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew, and his life was only spared on condition of his becoming a Roman Catholic; but, in 1576, he escaped from Paris, and put himself at the head of the Huguenots. In 1587 he gained the battle of Coutras. In 1572 he succeeded to the throne of Navarre, and in 1589 to that of France; but his religion proving an obstacle to his coronation, he again consented to abjure it in 1593. In 1598 he issued the edict of Nantes, granting toleration to the Protestants. The same year he concluded the treaty of Vervins with Spain, after which time his country enjoyed uninterrupted peace till his death. His abjuration was very disagreeable to the Protestants, and did not prove quite satisfactory to the opposite party, who doubted his sincerity. His greatest enemies were the Jesuits, one of whose pupils wounded him in the mouth in an attempt upon his life, which was finally taken by Francis Ravalliac. The wisdom, generosity, and talent displayed by Henry throughout his reign, have truly merited the title of Great, which is applied to his name; and he is the only king of the old monarchy who remains popular with the French nation. b. at Pau in Béarn 1553; assassinated, 1610.

SOVEREIGNS OF G :

HENRY I., surnamed the Fowler, emperor of Germany, was the son of Otho, duke of Saxony, and elected to the imperial dignity in the year 919. He reunited the German princes, and subdued the Hungarians, framed good laws, and built several cities. He vanquished the Bohemians, the Slavonians, and the Danes, and conquered the kingdom of Lorraine. b. 876; d. 936.

HENRY II., surnamed both the Saint and the Lame, and great-grandson of the preceding, was elected emperor in 1002. He re-established Benedict VIII. in the papal chair, and was crowned by that pontiff in 1014 at Rome. He tranquillized Italy, and expelled thence the Saracens and Greeks. b. 972; d. near Göttingen, 1024.

HENRY III., surnamed the Black, or Bearded, son of Conrad II., succeeded his father in 1039. He was crowned at Rome by Clement II., and governed with a firm hand the people over whom it was his destiny to rule. b. 1017; d., supposed by poison, in 1056.

HENRY IV. was son of Henry III., whom he succeeded at the age of six years. Agnes, his mother, governed with ability during his minority. The Saxons rebelled against him, and accused him of simony and other crimes to Pope Gregory VII., who took from him the right of presenting to benefices. Henry then called a diet at Worms, in 1076, for the purpose of deposing the pope, who excommunicated the emperor. The German princes deposed Henry, who went to Italy, and made his submission to the pontiff; but Gregory was not to be appeased, and Henry resolved on vengeance. The electors chose Rodolphus, duke of Suabia, and Gregory confirmed his title; but Henry, after defeating his competitor, put him to death. He then called a council, which deposed the pope, and elected in his room the archbishop of Ravenna. In 1106 his son Henry assumed the title, and being supported by the princes of the empire, the emperor was obliged to renounce his crown; after which he became a wanderer, and supplanted the archbishop of Spire to give him a prebend in his church, which he refused. b. 1050; d. in poverty, at Liege, 1106.

HENRY V., surnamed the Young, deposed his father in 1106. In 1110 he forced Pope Pascal II. to restore to him the right of nominating to ecclesiastical benefices, which Gregory VII. had wrested from his father. Pascal afterwards called two councils, and excommunicated Henry. He was the last emperor of the Franconian line. b. 1081; d. 1125.

HENRY VI., surnamed the Cruel, was son of Frederick Barbarossa, and succeeded his father in 1190, at the age of twenty-five. This prince behaved treacherously to Richard I., king of England, who, in returning from the crusade through Germany, was arrested by Leopold, duke of Austria, and sent to the emperor, who exacted from him an enormous ransom. His wife, Constance, is said to have poisoned him. b. 1165; d. 1197.

HENRY VII., son of Henry, count of Luxembourg, was elected emperor in 1308, at the age of forty-five, and soon after went into Italy, at that time distracted with the contentions between the Guelphs and Ghibelines. He was crowned at Rome in 1312, and died in the following year.

HENRY THE LION, a remarkable prince of Germany in the 12th century, assumed the government of Saxony in 1142. He demanded restitution of Bavaria, which had been taken from his father in 1138. The emperor aided him, and a war ensued, which resulted in Henry recovering Bavaria, his possessions extending from the Baltic and the North Sea to the Adriatic. In 1173 he went on an expedition to the Holy Land, and, during his absence, his enemies, and even the emperor, made encroachments on his dominions. This was the fruitful source of quarrels; and, in 1180, Henry was expelled from Bavaria by his former ally, Frederick Barbarossa. He was, however, allowed to retain possession of his hereditary dominions, and died in peace at Brunswick, in 1185. b. 1129. Henry was pious, bore up manfully against misfortune, and protected the interests of commerce, science, and the arts.

HENRY DE BLOIS, bishop of Winchester, nephew of William Rufus, and brother of King Stephen, was an active prelate, and a bold, ambitious, and enterprising statesman. When England was invaded by the partisans of the Empress Matilda, he at first joined her standard, but subsequently deserted it, and became her most determined enemy. The empress-queen and her followers having taken refuge in the castle of Winchester, Henry laid siege to it, set the city on fire, and consumed twenty churches, a number of religious houses, and many other buildings, so little respect did he pay for the capital of his diocese when he had a personal purpose to serve. He is now remembered chiefly as the founder of the hospital of St. Cross, near Winchester, the church of which is regarded by many antiquaries as furnishing the model of the distinguishing features of the Gothic or pointed style of architecture. d. 1171.

HENRY, the Navigator, the fourth son of John I., king of Portugal, early gave proofs of brilliant courage; but his love of arms was surpassed by his love of the sciences, particularly mathematics, astronomy, and navigation. While vigorously prosecuting a war against the Moors in Africa, he neglected no opportunity of obtaining from them a knowledge of the regions bordering on Egypt and Arabia, and of inquiring into the probability of a passage to the treasures of India by a voyage round the western coast of Africa. He conversed with men of learning; and finding their testimony agreeable to the reports he had collected, he resolved to execute his designs. He was the first who applied the compass to navigation; and to him also a principal part is ascribed in the invention of the astrolabe. Various expeditions were undertaken, and discoveries made, under his patronage and at his expense. It was at this period that the Portuguese doubled Cape Verd, and discovered the group of islands called the Azores, about 800 miles west from the Portuguese coast. Henry continued these efforts till his death, in 1463, and thus secured for himself an undying name as the patron and friend of navigation. B. 1394.

HENRY RASPON, landgrave of Thuringia, was elected emperor by the ecclesiastical princes in 1246, when Pope Innocent IV. deposed Frederick II.; but died the year following, of a wound received in fighting against his rival.

HENRY, prince of Wales, and the eldest son of James I. of England, was an amiable and accomplished prince, and a great patron of learning and science. His death caused great grief to the nation, which had formed of him the highest expectations. B. at Stirling, Scotland, 1694; D. 1812.

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON, an English historian, was canon of Lincoln and archdeacon of Huntingdon. He wrote a "History of England to the year 1164," and was also author of a Latin work, entitled, "Contempt of the World." Lived in the 12th century.

HENRY, Matthew, an eminent nonconformist divine, and biblical commentator, received his education under his father, and having made considerable progress in learning, entered at Gray's Inn; but renounced the study of the law, and became a dissenting minister at Chester, where he resided many years, and then removed to Hackney. His chief work is "The Exposition of the Old and New Testaments," which is to this day considered one of the best commentaries upon the Bible; he wrote also many other theological works. B. in Flintshire, 1662; D. whilst travelling between Chester and London, 1714.

HENRY, Robert, a Scotch divine, who, in 1776, was chosen one of the ministers of the Old Church at Edinburgh; he was the author of a valuable History of Great Britain to the reign of Henry VII. B. 1718; D. 1790.

HENRY, Patrick, a celebrated American orator and statesman, who, by the display of great natural eloquence, became a leader of the American people in their struggle against the mother country. Jefferson says of him, that "he gave the earliest impulse to the ball of the revolution." In 1769 he became the leader of the democratic party in Virginia, and in 1775 was one of the first to make an appeal to arms. He said "Of peace there is no longer any hope. If we wish to be free, we must fight." He became the first governor of Virginia on the declaration of independence, and was re-elected the three following years. He was offered the secretaryship of state in 1785 by Washington, but declined the appointment. B. 1736; D. 1799.

in the 16th centry, was schoolmaster at Dunfermline, and a monk of the Benedictine order. His "Fabils" were printed at Edinburgh in 1621; and his "Testament of Faife Crescide" in 1593. He wrote a number of other pieces, which are to be found in the collections of Hailes, Pinkerton, &c.

HERBURN, James Bonaventura, her'-burn, an eminent philologist, was bred in the Protestant religion by his father, who was a presbyterian minister; but, after studying at St. Andrew's, Scotland, he embraced the Romish faith, and went to Italy. He next travelled through Turkey, Persia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Ethiopia, and most of the countries of the east; and it is asserted that he became master of so many languages, that there was scarcely a region of the globe with whose inhabitants he could not have conversed in their own tongue. On his return, the fame of his acquisitions having reached the ears of Pope Paul V., he invited him to quit the retirement he had sought at Rome, and gave him the wardship and inspection of all the Oriental books and manuscripts in the Vatican library. He is supposed to have died at Venice, about 1620. B. in Haddingtonshire, 1573. He published a Hebrew and Chaldaic Dictionary and an Arabic Grammar in one vol. 4to.

HERBURN, Robert, a native of Scotland, a miscellaneous writer, who, at the age of twenty-one, published in thirty numbers, a series of essays, entitled "The Tatler, by Hector Macstaff, of the North." He studied the civil law in Holland, and became a member of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh. Some of his manuscripts are in the Advocates' Library. B. 1690; D. 1712.

HERPHESTION, he'-phes-ti-on, the favourite of Alexander the Great, and the companion of his campaigns and festivities, married one of the daughters of Darius. D. at Ecbatana, 325 B.C.

HERACLITUS, he-ra'-cli-tus, a celebrated philosopher of Ephesus, who flourished about 500 B.C. He was fond of solitude, and obtained the appellation of "the mourner," from his custom of weeping at the follies of men. He supported the doctrine of fatalism, and maintained that the world was made of fire, which element he deified. He died in the sixtieth year of his age.

HERACLITUS, her'-a'-li-us, emperor of the East, was the son of Heraclius, governor of Africa, who dethroned Phocas, in 610, and caused himself to be crowned in his stead. Chosroes, king of Persia, having ravaged Palestine, and committed dreadful cruelties on the Christians, Heraclius marched against him, forced him to sue for peace, and to deliver up the holy cross. The end of his reign was disturbed by ecclesiastical disputes and the inroads of the Saracens. B. 575; D. 641.

HERACLIVS-CONSTANTINE, son and successor of the above, was associated in the throne with his brother Heraclionas, agreeably to the will of Heraclius. He reigned only a few months, having been poisoned, it is said, by his mother-in-law, Martina. B. at Constantinople, 612.

HERACLIVS, patriarch of Jerusalem was a debauched and scandalous prelate, and showed great enmity to Henry II., king of England, for not going to Jerusalem in person, agreeably to the terms of his penance, on account of the murder of Thomas à-Becket. Lived in the 12th century.

HERBERT, John Frederick, hair'-bar, an eminent German metaphysician and philosophic writer, was appointed professor of philosophy at Königsberg, while fulfilling the duties of which office he greatly assisted in the organization of the Prussian educational system. He composed a number of works on metaphysics, wherein it would appear that he was a follower partly of Fichte and partly of Kant. n. at Oldenburg, 1776; p. 1841.

HERBERT, Bartholomew d', hair'-be-lo, a learned French orientalist, who obtained a pension from the king, and the place of regius professor of the Syriac language. Ferdinand II., grand-duke of Tuscany, made him a present of a large library of oriental manuscripts. His great work, entitled "Bibliothèque Orientale," containing whatever relates to the knowledge of the eastern world, is universally known. The best edition is that of the Hague, in 4 vols. 4to, 1777-99. He also compiled a Turkish and Persian Dictionary. n. at Paris, 1835; p. 1695.

HERBERT, Mary, her'-bert, countess of Pembroke, the sister of Sir Philip Sidney, and mother of the scholarly Earl of Pembroke, translated from the French a tragedy called "Annius," 1595, 12mo, and rendered into English some of David's Psalms. p. 1621. Ben Jonson wrote the following elegant epitaph for her:—

"Underneath this sable hearse,
Lies the subject of all verse;
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother,—
Death! ere thou hast kill'd another
Fair and good and learn'd as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee."

HERBERT, William, earl of Pembroke, a poet and the patron of learned men, was educated at New College, Oxford, and in 1626 was elected chancellor of that university, to which he was a liberal benefactor through life, and bequeathed to it at his death a valuable collection of manuscripts. n. 1580; p. 1630.

HERBERT, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, an English statesman and philosopher, was educated at Oxford, after which he travelled on the continent. On his return, he was made one of the king's counsellors for military affairs, and soon after was sent ambassador to France, to intercede on behalf of the Protestants. In 1625 he was made a peer of Ireland, and, in 1631, an English peer. At the breaking out of the rebellion, he sided with the Parliament. Lord Herbert was the author of some singular books: the most remarkable is entitled "De Veritate," in which he espouses deism. He also wrote "The History of Henry VIII." a treatise in Latin on the Religion of the Gentiles, and his own memoirs, which are the first instances of autobiography in the English language, and which were edited by Horace Walpole, and printed by him at his own press at Strawberry Hill. n. 1581; p. 1648.

HERBERT, George, an English poet and divine, brother of the above, received his education at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became acquainted with Lord Bacon, and was chosen fellow of his college. He was also appointed orator to the university. On taking orders, he obtained the rectory of Bemerton, in Wilts, and a prebend of Lincoln. His poems, of the same school as those of Donne and Herrick, were published under the title of "The Temple," n. 1593; p. 1632. He also wrote a prose sequel to "The Temple," wherein he lays down some very excellent rules for the life of a country clergyman. He also translated Cornaro "On Temperance."

HERBERT, Sir Thomas, a scion of one of the branches of the Pembroke family, was the son of an alderman at York. After receiving his education at Oxford, he travelled for four years in Asia and Africa, of which he published an account. On the breaking out of the civil wars he sided with the Parliament; but having been appointed to attend upon Charles in his captivity, became warmly attached to him, and proved himself a zealous and incorruptible servant to him up to the hour of his execution. He survived the king twenty years, devoting his life principally to literary pursuits. He assisted in the reformation of the monastic system, and published an account of the last two years of the life of king Charles, under the title of "Threnodia Carolina." He was created a baronet at the Restoration, 1660. n. 1606; p. 1682.

HERBERT, Right Hon. Sidney, Lord Herbert of Lea, an eminent English politician, who, after receiving an education at Harrow and Oriel College, Oxford, at which latter place he graduated in classical honours in 1831, entered on his public life as member of Parliament for the southern division of Wilts. His first speech in parliament was delivered in 1831, upon which occasion he seconded a resolution for the exclusion of Dissenters from the colleges of Oxford. In 1838 he opposed Mr. Grote's motion in favour of the ballot. But, soon after this period, more enlightened and broader political views appear to have replaced his first somewhat narrow and illiberal opinions as a member of Parliament. He followed Sir Robert Peel as a convert to free trade, and, on that statesman's accession to the office of premier, Mr. Herbert became his secretary to the Admiralty. In 1846 he supported Sir Robert in all his measures tending to pave the way for the repeal of the corn-laws, and the introduction of free trade as the principle of English commerce. During the premiership of Lord John Russell and Derby, he was in opposition; but on Lord Aberdeen's accession to power, he accepted the post of secretary at war, but resigned it in 1855. He was colonial secretary for a very short time under Lord Palmerston, but, on the appointment of a committee of inquiry into the state of the army before Sebastopol, he, conceiving it to imply a censure upon the Aberdeen administration, of which he had been a member, relinquished the post. After that period he retired from politics, devoting his leisure to schemes of social benevolence and utility, and was called to the House of Lords as Lord Herbert of Lea. He was second son of the earl of Pembroke, by a daughter of Count Woronzoff, of Russia. n. 1810; p. August 2, 1861.

HERBERT, John Rogers, R.A., a distinguished English historical painter, who, after completing his studies at the Royal Academy, began his artistic career as a portrait-painter. His first work which attracted attention was "The Appointed Hour," wherein a young Italian gentleman lies dead, from the dagger of a bravo, at the bottom of a flight of steps, while his mistress, unconscious of the act, is descending to meet him. This was one of the most popular prints of its day. After having travelled in Italy, Herbert produced a series of Venetian pictures, among the best of which were "The Brides of Venice," and "Pirates of Istria bearing off the Brides of Venice." On embracing the Roman Catholic faith, his style underwent a very marked change; henceforth he painted only scriptural or ecclesiastical subjects, all of which were wrought in the mediæval manner; "The First Introduction of Christianity into Britain," "Christ and the Daughter of Samaria," and "Our Saviour and his Parents at Nazareth," being among his best works at this period. He was elected a R.A. in 1848, whereupon his style became again modified. In 1849 he was commissioned to paint a picture from "King Lear," which, with some others, was executed in fresco for the new palace at Westminster. He subsequently engaged to paint "Moses Descending from the Mount," for the same building. n. at Maldon, Essex, 1810.

HERDER, Johann Gottfried von, her'-der, a German philosopher and poet, who was brought up for the church, and held various ecclesiastical offices at the court of the Duke of Saxe-Weimar. His chief prose work is entitled "Ideas on the Philosophy of the History of the Human Race," while his "Voices of the People" is his best and most-read poetical work. He was remarkable for his industry, his collected works on a wide range of subjects occupying forty-five volumes. n. at Mohrungen, in Prussia; d. 1803.

HEUSTAT, Pepin d', hair'-is-fal, surnamed the Young, the founder of the family from which sprang the Carolingian dynasty of the kings of France. He held the office of mayor of the palace under Clovis III. and Childbert III., who were mere puppets in his hands.

HELENGARDE, her'-men-gard, the name of several princesses during the middle ages:—1. The second wife of Charlemagne, daughter of Desiderius, king of the Lombards, who was divorced in 771, after being married a year.—2. The first wife of Louis le Debonnaire.—3. A queen of Provence.

HELIUS TRIMEGISTUS, her'-mes tris-ma-jis-tis, "the three grand," an Egyptian priest and philosopher, who instructed his countrymen in the cultivation of the olive, in language, writing, geometry, arithmetic, astronomy, and medicine. Many treacherous of his works have been published, but they are generally considered to be apocryphal.

HELIUS GEMUS, her'-mof'-e-nee, of Tarsus, surnamed Nysus, a rhetorician, who, at 15 years of age, is said to have taught Greek oratory at Rome, and whose lectures were attended by the emperor Marcus Aurelius. He wrote several works on oratory, which were edited and translated into Latin, by Heeren, in 1812. At 24 he is said to have become imbecile, and to have lingered in this condition to an advanced age. Lived in the 2nd century.

HERO, hé-ro, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, who distinguished himself by his skill in the construction of warlike machines, and who wrote some able works on the art. The time of his death is not recorded.

HEROD, her'-od, the name of several Jewish princes.—Herod the Great was the son of Antipater, the Idumean, who appointed him governor of Galilee. Antony appointed him tetrarch, and Augustus made him king of the Jews. He governed with savage cruelty, and sacrificed his wife Mariamne, her grandfather Hyrcanus, and brother Aristobulus. At the birth of our Saviour, he caused all the infants of Bethlehem to be massacred, in hopes that He would fall among the number. He also put to death his sons Alexander and Aristobulus, so that Augustus said, "It was better to be Herod's hog than his son." He rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and, in a time of famine, sold his curiosities to relieve the sufferers. n. at Ascalon, in Judea, 74 B.C.; d. at the age of 70, in the same year as the birth of Jesus Christ.—Herod Antipas the son of the above, succeeded his father as tetrarch of Galilee. He divorced his wife, the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia, and espoused Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, on which Aretas declared war against him. Herod sacrificed John the Baptist to the cruelty of Herodias, and his conduct occasioned the Jews to revolt. Being called to Rome to justify his conduct, he died on the road. This is the Herod to whom our Saviour was sent by Pilate.

HERODIAN, he-ro'-di-an, a Greek historian, who was a native of Alexandria, but lived the greatest part of his life at Rome. He wrote a Roman history in Greek, in eight books, which was edited by Bekker, and published at Berlin, 1828. Lived in the 3rd century.

HERODOTUS, he-ro'-d-o-lus, a celebrated Greek historian, surnamed "the Father of History," who in his youth, while his country was oppressed by the tyrant Lygdamis, travelled in Greece, Africa, Asia, and Europe, gathering materials for his great work, and noting the manners and customs of the people whom he visited. On his return he assisted in expelling the tyrant; but meeting with ingratitude from his countrymen, he retired into exile, and occupied himself with the composition of his history. He is said to have read the commencement of it at the Olympic games, 486 B.C., when it was received with universal applause. His History is comprised in nine books, to which his countrymen, in their admiration, gave the names of the nine Muses. Its principal subject is the internal struggles of the Greeks; but he has introduced episodical narratives of the histories of the Persians, Medes, Egyptians, and other peoples. He is universally considered as the most reliable of all ancient historians, a love of the marvellous being his only drawback; his elegant and harmonious style approaches poetry. The principal editions of it are Larcher's French translation; the German translation by Lange; and the English reproduction of it by the Rev. H. Carey, published in Bolin's Classical Library. n. at Halicarnassus, 484 B.C.; d., it is uncertain when, but perhaps about 408 B.C.

HEROPHILUS OF CHALCEDON, he-rof'-i-lus, an ancient physician, who was an accurate anatomist, and is said to have discovered the lacteal vessels. He was also a good botanist. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

HERREIRA, Ferdinand de, hair'-rai'-ra, a celebrated Spanish poet, surnamed by his contemporaries "the Divine." He was a voluminous writer of songs, odes, elegies, &c. A collected edition of his works was published at Seville, in 1582. n. at Seville about 1616; d. about 1595.

HERRICK, Robert, her'-rik, a celebrated English poet, of whom very little is known, except that he was vicar of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, for twenty years, from which he was ejected by Cromwell, but reinstated by Charles II. He wrote sacred and amatory verses, displaying in both a luxuriant fancy, with an elegant quaintness. His poems were collected and published in 1633, under the title of "Hesperides," and HERSCHEL, Sir Wm. herah'-el, a great astronomer, was the son of a clever musician of Hanover, and followed, for some time, the profession of his father. In 1759 he went to London, and, for several years, gained a scanty livelihood by giving lessons in his art. Becoming organist at Halifax in 1765, and of a chapel in Bath in 1766, his condition was much improved. In the latter place he began to turn his attention to astronomy, and attained to a considerable degree of proficiency in its pursuit. Being unable to purchase a telescope, he, in 1774, proceeded to make one for himself. After many disappointments, he at length succeeded in constructing a Newtonian telescope of five feet focal length. This instrument was a most valuable adjunct to his studies, and, in 1781, he announced his discovery of a comet, but which soon turned out to be a planet. This discovery made him famous, and he was appointed private astronomer to George III., at a salary of £400 a year. He removed to Slough, near Windsor, and henceforth his abode "became one of the remarkable spots of the civilized world." His labours were shared by his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel, who assisted him in his observations and calculations. After having finished more than one large instrument, he constructed the most powerful telescope then known, and, after four years' labour with these instruments, he made the most unexpected and important discoveries. A new planet—Uranus, in 1781: its satellites in 1787; two new satellites of Saturn in 1789; the rotation of Saturn's ring, and that of Jupiter's satellites, are among the principal of his invaluable discoveries. More than seventy of his memoirs on astronomical subjects are contained in the "Transactions of the Royal Society;" and his papers on the construction of telescopes remain unsurpassed even at the present day. He became a F.R.S., and afterwards president of that learned body. He was also knighted, and received the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Oxford. B. at Hanover, 1733; D. 1822.

HERSCHEL, Caroline Lucretia, the sister of the above, came to England in order to reside with her brother, while he was engaged as organist at Bath. From the first commencement of his astronomical pursuits, she attended him in both his daily and nightly studies. In the intervals of her labours under her brother's direction, she observed the heavenly bodies on her own account. She discovered seven comets, and, in 1793, published, with her brother, "A Catalogue of Stars, with a Correction of Flamsteed's Observations." On the decease of her brother, she returned to Hanover, where, for twenty years longer, she continued to labour at her scientific pursuits. The Royal Society voted her their gold medal, and she was also an honorary member of the same. She lived to the age of 98 years. B. at Hanover, 1750; D. 1848.

HERSCHEL, Sir John Frederick William, the son and worthy inheritor of the fame of William, from his earliest years was distinguished for his great mathematical powers, as well as his love for physical science. He became a B.A. of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1813; and, on the death of his father, pursued in the path of discovery pointed out by him. In 1825 he commenced observing the heavenly bodies, with his father's instruments and after his method. This pursuit, in which he was assisted for some time by Sir James South (see SOUTH, Sir James), lasted during eight years, and produced the most brilliant results. In his work, observations of 2306 nebulae and clusters are contained. The Royal Astronomical Society voted him its gold medal for his observations of the double stars. In 1830 he published a "Treatise on Sound," and a "Treatise on the Theory of Light," as well as the "Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy," published in Lardner's Cyclopaedia, for which series he also contributed his excellent treatise on Astronomy, in 1836. In 1834 he sailed for the Cape of Good Hope, in order to make observations of the southern heavens; and for four years, at his own expense, uninterruptedly watched the skies, and nine years after his return, he, in 1847, published the results of his labours. His honourable career was appreciated by the learned men of all nations; the Royal Astronomical Society voted him, a second time, its gold medal; he was made D.C.L. of Oxford; and, in 1848, he became president of the Royal Astronomical Society. His "Outlines of Astronomy," "Manual of Scientific Inquiry," have made the profound science he adorned popular with a large section of the reading public. He was created a baronet at the coronation of Queen Victoria. In 1850 he was made master of the mint, an appointment he was compelled to resign in 1855, on account of ill-health. B. at Slough, near Windsor, 1792.

HERTZBERG, Ewald Frederick Von, hairt'-baing, an eminent statesman, whose merit recommended him to a situation in the department of foreign affairs at Berlin, and he afterwards became secretary to the Prussian embassy at Vienna. The king made him counsellor of legation, in which capacity he distinguished himself as a profound politician. In 1752 his essay on the population of the March of Brandenburg obtained the prize from the Academy of Sciences of Berlin. He was employed to draw up every state paper and memorial of consequence, and was gradually advanced to the first offices in the kingdom, and to the rank of nobility. B. 1725; D. 1795.

HERVEY, James, her'-ve, a writer of numerous popular books on theological subjects, with a Calvinistic leaning. In 1746 he published his "Meditations among the Tombs," and "Reflections in a Flower-Garden," which being well received, he added another volume. In 1755 appeared his "Theron and Aspasia; or Dialogues and Letters on Important Subjects," in 3 vols. 8vo, well written, but Calvinistic. The profits of his works, which were considerable, he applied to charitable purposes. B. 1714; D. 1768.

HERVEY, John, Lord, second son of John, first earl of Bristol, was educated at Westminster, and Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1715; and after a short tour on the continent, returned to England, where he spent much of his time in the literary and fashionable circles of the metropolis. In 1730 he married Miss Lepell, so often mentioned in Pope's letters and verses; in 1723 he succeeded to the title of Lord Hervey by the death of his elder brother; and in 1725 became member of Parliament for Bury, when he attached himself to Sir Robert Walpole's party in opposition to that of Pulteney, and was made vice-chamberlain in 1730, which office he retained by court influence till 1740, when he became lord privy seal. From an early age, Lord Hervey took an active part in the literary and political contests of the day. His pamphlets in answer to the "Craftsman" involved him in a duel with Pulteney; his quarrel with Pope, which extended over many years, gave rise to some of the bitterest satirical sketches ever penned (particularly Pope's celebrated prose letter, the epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, and the character of Sporus); and he carried on an active correspondence with Dr. Middleton regarding the mode of electing the Roman senate, besides writing some able pamphlets on foreign affairs, which may still be read with interest. Lord Hervey was generally designated "Lord Fanny," by the wits and satirists of the time, in consequence of his effeminate habits and appearance, one lampooner even going the length of saying that he was,

"Ne'er meant for use, just fit for show, Half wit, half fool, half man, half beau."

The editor of a recent edition of Pope's works says, in a note on this nobleman:—"Lord Hervey's effeminacy arose partly from ill-health, but was carried to an extreme. Having been threatened with epileptic fits, he adopted a regimen suitable for an anchorite. He took no wine or malt liquor, breakfasted on green tea unsweetened by sugar, and biscuits without butter; at dinner, he ate no meat but a little chicken; and once a week he indulged in a Scotch pill, and took thirty grains of Indian root when his stomach was loaded. To soften his ghastly appearance, he used rouge. Another account represents him as drinking ass's milk; and when once asked at dinner whether he would have some beef, he answered—'Beef! oh, no! Faugh! Don't you know I never eat beef, nor horse, nor any of those things?'" His "Memoirs of the Reign of George II., from his Accession to the Death of Queen Caroline," were published in 1813, with an account of the author by John Wilson Croker. b. 1696; d. 1743.

HERZEN, or HERTZEN, Alexander, hai'ts'-en, a Russian politician and political writer, who, after leaving the university of Moscow, in 1834, was charged with having assisted at a seditious meeting of students, and, although he was not present at it, he was condemned, after some imprisonment, to banishment under surveillance at Viatka. On the death of his father, in 1846, he became possessed of considerable estates, and was granted leave to travel in 1848. In Italy, and afterwards in Paris, he openly expressed his republican ideas, and shared in the acts of his party at the latter place. Soon after, he found it expedient to take up his residence in England, where he published his memoirs, under the title of "My Exile," and set up a journal in the Russian language, in which the suppressed poems of the Russian poet Pushkin, as well as the opinions of the exiled republican leaders of the continent, were put forth to the northern world. b. at Moscow, 1812.

HEROD, he'-si-od, an ancient Greek poet, the date of whose works is uncertain; some placing them before, and others after Homer. He was the first who wrote on agriculture; his poems being entitled "The Works and Days." His "Theogony" is valuable as affording an account of the ancient mythology; his "Shield of Hercules" is only a fragment of a larger work. The best edition of Herod is that of Dindorf, 1825; and his poems have been translated into English by Thomas Cooke. Lived in the 10th century b.c.

HESS, William, Prince of, hes'-se, celebrated as a patron of learning, and for his studies and observations, during many years, of the heavenly bodies. For this purpose he built an observatory at Cassel, and called to his assistance two scientific men, Rothmann and Byrge. His observations were printed at Leyden, in 1618. n. about 1545; d. 1697.

HEVELIUS, John, he-ve'-le-us, an eminent astronomer, came of a distinguished family, and studied mathematics with great ardour, but devoted himself chiefly to astronomy. He built an observatory for the purpose of making accurate observations, the result of which he published in 1647, under the title of "Selenographia; or, a Description of the Moon;" to which he added the phases of the other planets, as observed by the telescope. This work was followed by many others, the most distinguished of which was his "Cometographia," published in 1683. Besides the above works, he was the author of "Uranographia," 1690, folio; "De Naturâ Saturni." b. 1611; d. at Dantzic, 1688.

HEYLIN, Peter, hai'-lin, a learned divine, who obtained a fellowship of Magdalen College, where he read cosmographical lectures. In 1625 he published his "Description of the World," which he afterwards enlarged under the title of "Cosmography." In 1628 he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king, and in 1631 obtained a prebend of Westminster, which was followed by the living of Houghton, in the diocese of Durham. In 1633 he took his degree of D.D. He obtained some other preferments, of which he was deprived by the Parliament, and voted a delinquent; his goods were also confiscated, and his person endangered. At the Restoration he was restored to his prebend. He was a man of great abilities and uncommon industry. His principal works, besides the above, are, "The History of the Reformation in England;" "History of the Presbyterians;" "Life of Archbishop Laud." b. 1600; d. 1662.

HEYNE, Christian Gottlob, he'-ne, a distinguished German classical scholar and critic, who published a number of valuable works illustrating ancient literature. He published copiously-annotated editions of Homer, Virgil, Tibullus, Pindar, &c., and contributed many valuable essays to the "Transactions" of the University of Göttingen, where he was professor of eloquence and poetry. b. at Chemnitz, Saxony, 1729; d. 1812.

HEYWOOD, John, hai'-wood, one of the earliest English poets and dramatists. He is also said to have been well versed in music, and skilful as a player on the virginals. He was a great favourite with Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, but on the accession of Elizabeth he went to Mechlin. One of his principal works is entitled "The Spider and the Fly, a Parable." b. about 1500; d. 1565.

HEYWOOD, Thomas, an actor and dramatic writer, who is said to have written 220 plays, of which only 24 are now extant, and those of little merit, except one, called "A Woman Killed with Kindness." Lived in the 17th century.

HICETAS, hi-se'-tas, a philosopher of Syracuse, who maintained that the heavens, sun, and stars were all immovable, while the earth revolved on its axis. This is the account given by Cicero, and from it Copernicus took the idea of his system.

HIRO I., hi'-e-ro, king of Syracuse, who rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war against Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. d. 467 B.C., leaving the crown to his brother Thrasybulus.

HIRO II., was unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians; but afterwards joining them in besieging Messina, was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory lost, he made peace with the enemies of his country, and proved faithful to all his engagements. He liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. d. 216 B.C.

HIROCCLES, hi-er'-o-kleez, the name of several Greeks.—1. A professor of rhetoric at Alabanda, in Caria, who is said to have excelled in what Cicero called "the Asiatic" style of eloquence. Lived in the 1st century before the Christian era.—2. A writer on the veterinary art, of whose work three chapters have been preserved.—3. A Stoic philosopher, who is said to have flourished about the time of Hadrian.—4. A writer of a work, which, under the title of "Travelling Companion," gave a description of the provinces of the Eastern empire. This work was edited and printed by Wesseling, at Amsterdam, in 1735. He is supposed to have lived in the 6th century.—5. A persecutor of the Christians, who was president of Bithynia, and afterwards governor of Alexandria, where he committed numberless cruelties. He wrote some books against the Christians, mentioned by Lactantius and Eusebius. The remains of his writings were published by Bishop Pearson in 1654, with a curious discourse upon them. Lived in the 4th century.—6. An Alexandrine Platonic philosopher, who wrote seven books on "Providence and Destiny," and a commentary on the "Golden Verses of Pythagoras;" the latter of which is extant, also fragments of the former. A book entitled "Asteia," ridiculing the works and manners of pedants, is sometimes attributed to him; but it is probably the work of another author of the same name. It was translated into English in 1741, and published in the "Gentleman's Magazine." Lived in the 5th century.

HIERONYMUS, hi-e-ro-n'i-mus, a tyrant of Sicily, who rendered himself odious by his oppression and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had enjoyed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family extirpated, 214 B.C.—A Christian writer, commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, distinguished for his zeal against heretics. He wrote Commentaries on the Prophets, St. Matthew's Gospel, &c. d. 420.

HIERFERNAN, Paul, hi'-fer-man, an Irish dramatist, who, after being educated for the practice of medicine in France, pursued that profession in Dublin for some time; but went to London in 1759, and commenced writing for the stage, and compiling works for booksellers. He met with little success as an author, and lived chiefly by contributions from the purses of his friends. b. at Dublin, 1719; d. 1777.

John, hig'-gins, an English divine and schoolmaster, who lived at Winslow, near Ilminster, in Somersetshire. He published some school-books, a treatise on Christ's descent into hell, and part of the "Mirrour for Magistrates." b. about 1544; d. about 1603.

JOSEPH, hi'-mor, an English historical painter. He painted the portraits of several eminent persons, also a set of pictures, the subjects of which were taken from Richardson's "Pamela." At the foundation of the Royal Academy, he was chosen one of the professors. His best pictures are "Hagar and Ishmael," at the Foundling hospital; the "Finding of Moses;" and the "Good Samaritan." He was also eminent for his literary abilities, and published "A Critical Examination of the Two Paintings by Rubens on the Ceiling of the Banqueting-house at Whitehall," &c.; "The Practice of Perspective on the Principles of Dr. Brooke Taylor;" "Observations on a Pamphlet entitled Christianity not founded on Argument," and two volumes of Essays. b. in London, 1692; d. 1730.

HIGGONS, Devil, hig'-gons, a dramatic poet and historian, whose principal works are, a tragedy called "The Generous Conqueror," and a "Short View of the English History." He accompanied James II. to France, and died there in 1735; b. 1670.

HILAIRE, Geoffrey St., hi'-lair, a distinguished French naturalist, was the son of Etienne Geoffrey St. Hilaire, also an eminent naturalist. The example and the teachings of his father inspired him even in his childhood with a taste for the natural sciences, to the study of which he devoted himself with untiring ardour and remarkable success. In 1826 he presented to the Institute a "Memoire" upon the mammalia, and was but 21 when elected a member of the Academy, which was then presided over by his father. He was successively professor of zoology at the Museum, director of the menagerie, inspector-general, councillor of the university, &c. Among other movements with which his name is more especially connected, was the establishment of the Imperial Zoological Society of Acclimatisation, of which he was the president. St. Hilaire often caused amusement, both in his own country and out of it, by the pertinacious efforts which he made to introduce the use of horseflesh as a staple article of human food; having on more than one occasion presided at banquets where horses supplied the material for almost every dish. b. 1805; d. 1861.

HILARION, hi-lair'-e-on, the founder of the monastic life in Palestine. He visited St. Anthony the anchorite in Egypt, and on his return to his own country, followed his example, and obtained a number of followers. b. 291; d. in the island of Cyprus in 371.

HILARY, St., hi'-a-re, a father of the Church in the 4th century, who embraced Christianity when far advanced in life. On being instructed in the principles of religion, he was baptized with his wife and daughter. In 350 he was made bishop of Poitiers, and the year following was sent by Constantius to defend Athanasius at the synod of Beziers against Saturninus, which he did with such zeal that Saturninus prevailed on the emperor to banish him to Phrygia, where he wrote his books on the Trinity. He was also the author of a treatise on Synods. d. 367.

HILARY, a saint of the Roman calendar, who succeeded Honoratus in the bishopric of Arles, and presided at a council at Orange, in 481. His works are—1. Homilies, under the name of Eusebius of Emesa; 2. "The Life of St. Honoratus;" 3. "Opuscula." b. 401; p. 449.

HILDEBRAND, hil'-de-brand, king of the Lombards, ascended the throne in 738, and shared power with his uncle Luitprand; but his tyranny became insupportable to his subjects, who deposed him in 744, electing in his stead the duke of Friuli.

HILL, Aaron, hil, an English poet and dramatist. At the age of fifteen he went to Constantinople to visit his relation, Lord Paget, who was ambassador there, and whom he accompanied to England, in 1703. He next travelled with Sir William Wentworth over Europe. In 1709 he became manager of Drury-lane Theatre, for which he wrote his "Elfrid; or, the Fair Inconstant." The following year he became manager of the Opera-house, and wrote the opera of "Rinaldo," the first for which Handel composed the music in England. About 1718 he published a poem, called "The Northern Star; or, a Panegyric on Peter the Great," for which the empress Catharine sent him a gold medal. b. in London, 1685; p. 1750.

HILL, Sir John, a voluminous English writer, who commenced life as an apothecary in St. Martin's Lane. His first publication was a translation of Theophrastus' tract on Gems, which procuring him some reputation, he undertook a natural history, in 3 vols. folio. He afterwards became a general writer on almost all subjects. He published a supplement to Chambers's "Cyclopædia," and conducted a magazine, and a daily paper under the title of the "Inspector." At this time he obtained his degree of M.D. from Scotland, and set up as a vender of quack medicines. Under the patronage of the earl of Bute he commenced a voluminous work, called "The System of Botany," which he sent to the king of Sweden, who invested him with one of his orders of knighthood. Besides the above works, he wrote, among others, "Mrs. Glasse's Cookery," "A Review of the Works of the Royal Society," some novels, and a few farces. These last brought him into a controversy with Garrick, who wrote the following epigram on him:—
"For physic and farces, his equal there scarce is;
His farces are physic, his physic a farce is."

b. at Peterborough, 1718; p. 1775.
HILL, Rev. Rowland, minister of Surrey Chapel, son of Sir Rowland Hill, bart., was born at Hawkstone, near Shrewsbury, and in the grammar school of that town commenced his education, then went to Eton for a few years, and finished his studies at St. John's College, Cambridge. At the time he quitted the university, the celebrated George Whitefield was in the zenith of his popularity; and so congenial to Hill's nature was that extraordinary preacher's manner and doctrine, that he adopted both, and became his zealous disciple; prosecuting his favourite plan of itinerancy, preaching in the streets of Bristol, on the quays, or among the colliers at Kingswood; wherever, in fact, he could gain an audience; but resuming, at stated periods, the services of the London and Bristol tabernacles. In 1783 the building of Surrey Chapel was completed; and from that time to the period of his death, an interval of fifty years, he continued to pass his winters in town for the purpose of officiating there, his place being supplied during the summer months by a succession of ministers from the country. The numerous tales that are told of his eccentricities should be received with caution; though it is certain he occasionally illustrated the most solemn truths by observations which savoured more of the ludicrous than the pathetic—of the grotesque than the serious. His writings are very numerous, the principal of which is entitled "Village Dialogues;" but he was not sparing of wit, humour, or sarcasm, whenever he could make either subservient to his purpose, as was strikingly seen in a satirical pamphlet against the ministers of the established church, which he published anonymously, under the title of "Spiritual Characteristics, by an Old Observer." b. 1744; p. 1833.

HILL, General Sir Rowland, Viscount, the second son of Sir John Hill, bart., entered the army at the early age of sixteen; served at Toulon under Lord Mulgrave, General O'Hara, and Sir David Dundas; through the whole of the Egyptian campaign, where he was wounded in the head; in Ireland, throughout the Peninsular War, and at Waterloo. In 1828, he was appointed commander-in-chief, and discharged the duties of the post to the entire satisfaction of the public, and with great benefit to the army. In the field—in every rank, from that of ensign to that of general—he was remarkable for a rare union of daring, zeal, and prudence. In the distribution of his patronage, he was proverbially impartial; private or political feeling never prevented him from doing justice to professional merit. b. 1772; p. Dec. 10, 1842.

HILL, Sir Rowland, the distinguished author of the cheap postage system, and secretary to the Post-office, in early life supported himself by teaching mathematics in his father's school and in private families at Birmingham. His talent for organization was displayed, even at this period, by his improvements in his father's academy, as well as in originating schemes of education. Hard work so shattered his weak health, that, in 1833, he retired from his scholastic duties. Shortly after, he was appointed secretary of the South-Australian commission. Early in 1837 he turned his attention to postal reform, and published a number of pamphlets upon the subject. Of these, it will be sufficient to name one,—"State and Prospects of Penny Postage," in which he proposed that letters should be charged by weight and not by distance, and that a uniform tax of one penny on all letters of a certain weight should be imposed. In the same year, the House of Commons appointed a committee to examine his project. In their report this committee strongly recommended the plan, as eminently favourable to commerce, while it would serve as a valuable aid in developing the intellect of the lower classes. In the course of the following session, more than 10,000 petitions were presented to Parliament praying for a uniform rate of postage. In 1840 the penny postage system was adopted, and the author was nominated to the task of directing its early growth. After many vexatious struggles with the officials, he retired in 1843, and received, in 1846, a testimonial of public gratitude, the sum of £13,000 being collected by subscription. The progress of postal communication became very rapid throughout the United Kingdom. In 1837 it rose to 75,000,000, which number, in 1842, was increased to upwards of 300,000,000. Mr. Hill was reinstated as secretary of the Post-office in 1847, where he afterwards laboured to improve the organization of the establishment. He was made a K.C.B. (civil division) in 1860, and, in 1884, retired on a pension of £2,000 a year for life; receiving also a parliamentary grant of £20,000. b. 1795.

HILLIARD, Nicholas, hi'l-yard, goldsmith and portrait-painter to Queen Elizabeth, whose miniature portraits were highly esteemed. He painted Mary queen of Scots, and Queen Elizabeth several times. b. 1547; d. 1619.

HILTON, William, hi'-ton, was admitted as a student at the Royal Academy about the year 1800, and in 1803 exhibited a picture of banditti of high merit for an artist so young as Hilton then was. Next followed his "Hector inspired by Apollo," "Cephalus and Procris," and by a series of noble compositions, which fully established the artist's fame. He was elected an associate of the Academy in 1814, and became a member in 1820, when he presented to the Academy his picture of "Ganymede," as his diploma piece. In 1822, he succeeded Fuseli as keeper of the Academy, a post he continued to occupy till his death. Though possessed of great merit as a painter, Hilton was not popular, and had the mortification of seeing the works of inferior artists bought up rapidly, while his own remained on his hands. b. 1786; d. 1839.

HIND, John Russell, hi'-nde, an eminent modern astronomer, was the son of a Nottingham lace-manufacturer, who was among the first to introduce the Jacquard loom. His education was conducted with the view of fitting him for commercial pursuits; but, from his earliest youth, he evinced a strong predilection for astronomical studies. In 1840 he was sent to London, where he became assistant to a civil engineer. His love for scientific pursuits, however, led him to apply to Professor Wheatstone for a situation more in accordance with the bent of his genius. Through the interest of that gentleman, he obtained a situation under Professor Airy in the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, where he remained for four years, making the best use of his time in studying the valuable astronomical works in the library, by which a solid foundation of scientific knowledge was obtained. In 1843 he was sent to Valentia, near Dublin, to settle the longitude of the place; and, in 1844, he left the Royal Observatory to take charge of Mr. Bishop's private observatory in Regent's Park; and, soon after his appointment, became a member of the Royal Astronomical Society. Applying himself assiduously to the observation of the heavens, he discovered ten new planets—Iris, Flora, Victoria, Irene, Melpomene, Fortuna, Calliope, Thalia, Euterpe, and Urania; three comets, several stars, as well as having calculated the orbits of a number of planets and comets. He was chosen member and correspondent of nearly all the great continental learned societies; received the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society, besides being appointed its assistant secretary. The government granted him a pension of £200 per year, and appointed him superintendent of the Nautical Almanac. Besides his many valuable contributions to the "Transactions" of the Royal Astronomical, and other English and foreign societies, he published a pamphlet "On the expected Return of the Great Comet of 1264 and 1556;" "An Astronomical Vocabulary; being an Explanation of the Terms in use among Astronomers at the present day;" "The Solar System," a description of the sun, moon, and planets; "An Account of all the Recent Discoveries;" "An Illustrated London Astronomy, for the use of Schools and Students;" in addition to several others, some calculated for the more learned in science, and others fitted for the popular exposition of that science in which he laboured with so much industry and success. n. at Nottingham, May, 1823.

HIPPARCHUS, hip-par'-kus, son of Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens, after whose death in 523 b.c., he reigned with his brother Hippias; both of whom had a great love of letters, and protected learned men. Hipparchus was slain by Harmodius, b. b.c.

HIPPARCHUS, a celebrated Greek astronomer, who was the first to reduce astronomy to a regular science; and whose catalogue of stars is still preserved in Ptolemy's "Almagest." He foretold the course of the sun and moon for 600 years, calculated according to the different manners of reckoning the months, days, and hours, in use among several nations, and for the different situations of places. He also formed the lunar period which bore his name; invented the planisphere, or method of describing the stars upon a plane; and was the first to mark the positions of places upon the earth in the same manner as that of the stars, by circles drawn from the poles perpendicularly to the equator, in other words, by latitudes and longitudes; he was also the author of the projection by which maps of the world and the best geographical maps are made. Lived between 180 and 125 b.c.

HIPPAS, hip'-pi'-as, a philosopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue consisted in not being in want of the assistance of men.—A son of Pisistratus, who became tyrant of Athens, after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He wished to revenge the death of his brother, who had been assassinated, but was driven from his country. He fled to King Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians, 490 b.c.

HIPPOCRATES, hip-pok'-ra-tees, the father of medical science, who flourished during the epoch of the Peloponnesian war, and before whose time the art of healing consisted of mystical juggleries and superstitious practices, pursued the priests as a source of profit. He was born a family called the Asclepiadae, who for 300 years had followed the pursuit of medicine. He taught the necessity of closely observing the signs of diseases, and prescribed only the most simple remedies; always insisting that the physician should follow nature. He is said to have been the first to recognise the value of diet as an adjunct to the physician in the treatment of disease, and wrote a treatise on the subject; he practised both as physician and surgeon; but, owing to the great respect paid to the remains of the dead among the Greeks, he had few opportunities of studying anatomy, of which he is said to have possessed but a scanty amount of knowledge. A large number of medical works are attributed to him; but it is believed that many are the composition of some other members of his family. The most valuable of his treatises are essays on Air, Water, Locality, Epidemics, Wounds of the Head, and Diet in Acute Diseases; all of which have been edited, translated, and annotated by the most learned men in modern times. A complete edition of his seventy-two essays has been published in Germany. B. at Cos, 480 B.C.; D. about 361 B.C.

HIPOLYTUS, hip-pol'-i-tus, a bishop and father of the church, chiefly remarkable as the presumed author of a work on "Heresies," hitherto attributed to Origen. The Chevalier Bunsen, a few years since, wrote a work called "Hippolytus," in which, while giving the arguments on both sides, he pronounced himself an advocate for the claims of Hippolytus to the authorship of the work in question. Lived during the 3rd century.

HIPOXAX, hip-pol'-naz, a Greek satirical poet, of whose writings only a few fragments remain was so deformed that two sculptors made ridiculous representations of him, for which he retaliated upon them with such severity in his satires, that they are said to have hanged themselves. B. about 540 B.C.

HIRNE, Philip de la, heer, a celebrated mathematician, who, after studying painting under his father, having a turn for mathematics, quitted that profession and went to Italy, where he applied himself diligently to his favourite science. On his return to France, he was made a member of the Academy of Sciences, and was employed by Colbert in constructing the great map of the kingdom, with Picard and Cassini. His principal works are, "Treatise on Mechanics," "New Method of Geometry," and an essay on "Conic Sections." B. at Paris, 1640; D. 1711.

HOADLEY, Benjamin, hode'-le, a celebrated English bishop, was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1708, he commenced his polemical career by remarks on one of Dr. Atterbury's funeral sermons; and in 1709 answered another sermon of the same author, on the power of charity to cover sin. The year following, he had another controversy with Atterbury on the doctrine of non-resistance, which recommended Hoadley to the notice of the House of Commons, who prayed the queen to bestow preferment on him. On the accession of George I. he was made bishop of Bangor, which see he never visited, but continued in London, preaching and publishing political sermons. One of these, on the spiritual kingdom of Christ, produced a violent dispute called the Bangorian controversy. He was afterwards engaged in a contest with Dr. Hare on the nature of prayer. From Bangor he was removed to Hereford, thence to Salisbury, and lastly to Winchester. In 1735 he made an attack on the orthodox faith, in his "Plain Account of the Lord's Supper," which he treated as a matter of mere indifference. This excited another considerable controversy. A complete edition of his works has been published in 4 vols. folio. B. at Westerham, Kent, 1676; D. 1761.

HOADLEY, Benjamin, eldest son of the preceding, a physician, published some medical and philosophical pieces; but he is best known as the author of "The Suspicious Husband," a comedy. B. 1706; D. 1757.

HOARE, Prince, F.S.A., hoar, a dramatic author, a native of Bath, and secretary to the Royal Academy; wrote several farces, which were successful, and published some works on art. D. 1754; D. 1834.

HOARE, Sir Richard Colt, bart., F.R.S. and F.S.A., an eminent local historian and topographer, was the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet. In 1818 he printed for private circulation among his friends, his "Recollections of a Classical Tour," in 4 vols. Various treatises on antiquarian and other kindred subjects occasionally came from his pen; but his great work is the "Ancient and Modern History of Wiltshire," which at the time of his death was not quite complete. B. 1758; D. 1838.

HOBBS, Thomas, hobs, a celebrated English philosopher, who received his education at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1608 he became tutor to a son of the earl of Devonshire, with whom he made the tour of Europe. On the death of his patron and pupil, he became travelling tutor to a young gentleman, but the countess dowager of Devonshire recalled him into her family to take upon him the education of the young earl. In 1634 he reprinted his translation of Thucydides, the first edition of which appeared in 1623. The same year he attended the earl on his travels, and at Pisa contracted an intimacy with Galileo. In 1642 he printed his book "De Cive," which procured him many enemies by its dangerous principles. Soon after this he was appointed mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales. In 1650 appeared, in English, his book on Human Nature; and one, "De Corpore Politico;" or, the Elements of Law. The next year he published his famous book, entitled "Leviathan," which is full of paradoxical doctrines. At the Restoration he received a pension of £100 per annum, he having formerly supported the royalist cause with zeal; but in 1666 the Parliament passed a censure on his writings, which greatly alarmed him. Hobbes maintained the propriety of making use of bad means to procure a good end; which he thus illustrated: "If I were cast into a deep pit, and the devil should put down his cloven foot, I would readily lay hold of it to get out." Besides the above works, he published "The Wonders of the Peak," a poem; a translation of Homer; "Elements of Philosophy;" "Letter on Liberty and Necessity;" "Six Lessons to the Professors of the Mathematics;" "Marks of absurd Geometry;" &c. B. at Malmesbury, 1588; D. 1679.

H HOBBINCH, hob'-e-ma, an eminent Dutch landscape painter. His pieces are remarkable for the grace and beauty of their execution, and, being rare, are now very valuable. B. at Antwerp, about 1611.

HOBHOUSE, John Cam, Baron Broughton, hob'-house, a distinguished English politician and writer of books of travel. After receiving his education at Cambridge, he, in 1809, travelled in the East, and on his return, in 1812, published a work called "A Journey into Albania and other Provinces of the Turkish Empire." Lord Byron dedicated the fourth canto of "Childe Harold" to him about the same time. He was in France during the Hundred Days, and, after the battle of Waterloo, wrote "The Letters of an Englishman," in which he declared himself a supporter of the emperor Napoleon. Mainly through the rancour of his political opponents, he was incarcerated in gaol for four years; but this was the means of his attaining to a considerable degree of popularity. He became a member of the House of Commons in 1820, and, at the same time, assisted several members of the Radical party in establishing the "Westminster Review," wherein he opposed, in the most forcible manner, the Tory party under Canning. Becoming more moderate in his political views, he was, in 1831, appointed secretary of state for war in the cabinet of Earl Grey, and, in 1833, secretary of state for Ireland; but, in the same year, lost his seat in the House of Commons, through an inconsistent vote. In 1834 he was elected M.P. for Nottingham. On the accession to power of the Whig party, headed by Lord John Russell, in 1846, he became president of the India Board of Control, in which important office he remained till 1851, when he was again unseated through his change of political opinions. In the same year he was created a peer, under the title of Baron Broughton of Gyford. After a short ministerial career, as a member of the coalition ministry of 1853, he retired into private life. b. 1786.

HOCHÉ, Lazarus, hosh, a general of the French republican army, was the son of an hostler. Being deprived of his father while a child, the rector of St. Germain-en-Laye took him under his care and made him a chorister, after which he became a groom in the royal stables. At the age of sixteen he entered the army, and became a corporal in the grenadiers. Soon after the breaking out of the Revolution, he obtained a commission, and distinguished himself in several engagements. During the tyranny of Robespierre, he was confined in the Conciergerie several months; but the fall of this terrorist in 1794 set him at liberty. He drove the Austrians out of Alsace, and being sent against the royalists at Quiberon, acted with great cruelty, and put to death the brave Charette. Soon afterwards, he commanded the forces sent to Ireland, but returned in disgrace. He next had the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, with which he defeated the Austrians on the Rhine; but, after a short illness, he died, in 1797, suspected of being poisoned. b. near Versailles, 1768.

HODGSON, Rev. Francis, B.D., hody'-son, educated at Eton, was a man of great learning and various accomplishments. He was classical tutor of King's College, Cambridge, where he formed an intimate friendship with Lord Byron, which continued unimpaired until the noble poet's death. For some time Mr. Hodgson was one of the assistant masters at Eton, and succeeded Dr. Goodall in the provostship in 1840. His Latin contributions to the "Arundines Cami," and other works of that class, are distinguished by elegant diction and classical taste. He also wrote English poetry, of which a translation of "Juvenal" and "Lady Jane Grey," a poem, are the most generally known. b. 1780; d. 1845.

HOEL I., ho'-el, duke of Brittany in 509, who, driven by Clovis from his estates, became an exile in England; but returned in 513, and obtained possession of his domains by force. b. 545.—HOEL II. Son and successor of the above, was killed by his brother Canor, while hunting, in 547.

HOFFER, Andrew, ho'-fer, a distinguished Tyrolese patriot, and leader of his countrymen against the Bavarian and French invaders of the Tyrolese mountains. When the treaty of Presburg was signed, by which Napoleon I. transferred the Tyrol to his allies the Bavarians, Hofer was a rich innkeeper and dealer in cattle and wine. By his great natural eloquence and the exercise of his power as a wealthy citizen, Hofer stirred his countrymen into a revolt against the Bavarians and French. The mountaineers were assisted by an Austrian army of 10,000 men, and in the spring of 1809 fell upon the advancing columns of the Bavarians, while marching through the narrow defiles, defeated them with great slaughter, and recovered every fortress in the Tyrol from the enemy. Upon this, Napoleon sent three armies against the mountaineers, one of which defeated the Tyrolese, and put a large number of the inhabitants, male and female, to death. But in May, 1809, Hofer led his countrymen against the Bavarian army, defeated it, and once more set his country free. The Austrians were, however, compelled to evacuate the country a few months later; whereupon he and his countrymen were left alone in the struggle, and at the outset the invaders were victorious; but after several desperate engagements, the Tyrolese were at length successful against the French, from whom they captured twenty-five pieces of cannon. On the 12th of August, 1809, Marshal Lefebvre, with an army of 23,000 French and Bavarians, and 2000 cavalry, was defeated by 18,000 Tyrolese in a battle which lasted from five in the morning until midnight; thus freeing their native land a third time. Hofer was now proclaimed the head of the province; but his power lasted only a short time: for in October of the same year, an army of 50,000 French and Bavarians, all veteran troops, was marched against him; whereupon he was compelled to seek refuge in the mountains, where he was betrayed by a false friend, a priest named Douay. He was taken and conveyed to Mantua, where, after a trial by court-martial, he was condemned to be shot. In his short, but exceedingly brilliant career, which lasted less than one year, he thrice delivered his country; and for his services the emperor of Austria pensioned his widow and family, created his son a noble, and raised a fine marble statue to his memory in the cathedral of Innsbrück. b. at St. Leonard, in the Tyrol, 1767; shot at Mantua, 1810.

FFMAN, Maurice, hofs'-man, an eminent physician, who took his doctor's degree at Padua in 1648; he was made professor of anatomy and surgery at Altdorf, and, the year following, professor of physic. In 1653 he obtained the professorship of botany, to which was added the direction of the physic garden. He was the author of several works on medical botany. b. 1621; d. 1693.

HOFFMAN, John Maurice, son of the above, studied under his father, and, in 1674, took his doctor's degree. In 1681 he was chosen professor of physic. He was also appointed physician to the Margrave of Anspach, and, on the death of his father, succeeded him. b. 1653; d. 1727.

HOFFMAN, John James, professor of Greek at Bâle, who is known as the author of a work of great labour and value,—“A Universal Historical Dictionary,” in Latin, published first in 2 vols. folio, and afterwards enlarged to 4 vols. He also wrote a “History of the Popes,” in Latin. b. 1635; d. 1706.

HOFFMAN, Frederick, a celebrated physician, who was chosen professor of physic at Halle, in 1693, which situation he retained till his death. His works, under the title of “A Complete System of Medicine,” have been published at Geneva, in 6 vols. b. at Halle, 1660; d. 1742.

FFMAN, Augustus Henry, of Fallersleben, a popular German poet, the son of a burgo-master at Fallersleben, who published, in 1820, “The Fragments of Ottfried.” In the same year, he undertook a journey along the banks of the Rhine and in Holland, with the view of collecting the scattered fragments of the popular poetry of the middle ages. In 1823 he was appointed conservator of the Breslau University Library, and soon afterwards published his "Unpolitical Songs," which caused him to become very popular. He also wrote songs for children, for workmen, and for peasants; indeed, as a poet, he may be said to address himself only to the simplest among his countrymen. He likewise contributed a number of very valuable philological articles to the best periodicals in Germany. B. 1798.

HOFFMAN, Ernest Theodore William, a German of varied talents, studied the law, and held various judicial appointments in Prussia; till his legal career was interrupted by the invasion of Warsaw by the French, in 1806, in the government of which city he had been appointed counsellor. He now devoted his leisure hours to the study of music, and being at the same time a romance writer and an artist, applied himself to these pursuits in order to obtain a livelihood. Among his works are, "The Devil's Elixir," "The Entail," "The Adversary," &c.; all displaying a singularly wild and romantic imagination. In 1818 he was reinstated as counsellor in the court of judicature in Berlin. B. at Königsberg, 1778; D. 1822.

HOFFMAN, Charles Fenne, an American poet and novelist, who, after leaving Columbia College, was called to the bar at New York, where he practised during three years; but, compelled by the state of his health to travel in the prairies, he published, in 1834, a record of his wanderings, entitled, "A Winter in the Far West," which obtained a considerable share of popularity. This was followed by "Wild Scenes in the Forest and Prairie," in 1837, and the romance of "Greyslayer," in 1840. He had also been one of the founders of the "Knickerbocker Magazine;" but soon retired from its direction. Hoffman was subsequently one of the most active and successful contributors to the American magazines, for one of which, "The American Monthly," he wrote his novel of "Vanderlyn." In 1842 he published a collected edition of his poems, under the title of "A Vigil of Faith, and other Poems." For nearly two years he was at the head of the "Literary World," in which he wrote his sketches and essays, under the title of "Sketches of Society." An unfortunate attack of mental alienation, in 1849, suddenly stopped his brilliant career, during which, save for his love of the horrible and repulsive, he might have claimed the first rank among American novelists. B. at New York, 1806.

HOFLAND, Mrs. Barbara, ho'-fland, well known by her numerous works, written principally for the amusement and instruction of youth, was the daughter of a manufacturer at Sheffield, named Wreake. At the age of 26 she married Mr. T. Bradshaw Hoole, of that town, whose death happened about two years after. Our authoress began her literary career in 1805, by the publication of a volume of poems, by subscription; from the proceeds of which she established herself in a school at Harrowgate, at the same time appearing occasionally as a writer of moral and amusing tales. Ten years had now elapsed since the death of her husband, when she became the wife of Mr. T. C. Hofland, landscape-painter. They soon after settled in London; and from that period till her decease she may be said to have never discontinued writing; for, although the majority of her books were neither laborious nor bulky, they were very numerous, and required considerable powers of invention. Among the more important of this lady's productions are, "Emily," a novel in 4 vols.; "Beatrice," "The Unloved One," "The Son of a Genius," "Tales of the Priory," "Self-denial," "The Merchant's Widow," "Decision," &c. B. 1770; D. 1844, after being a widow a second time for one year, Mr. Hofland having died in 1843.

HOGARTH, John, ho'-gan, a sculptor, first introduced to the English public at the Exhibition of 1851, but who was previously well-known in Ireland, was originally placed in the office of a solicitor, but developing considerable talent for sculpture, was allowed to follow the bent of his genius. After executing a variety of carvings in wood, which displayed much skill and taste, he was, in 1823, through the liberality of the late Lord de Tabley and others, enabled to visit Rome; where, after a year's study, he produced his first sculpture in marble, "The Shepherd Boy." This figure afforded undoubted evidence of genius. It was purchased by the late Lord Powerscourt, who placed it in his gallery by the side of Thorwaldsen's "Cupid." Hogan's next work, "Eve after her Expulsion from Paradise finding a dead Dove," executed for Lord de Tabley, he probably never surpassed. The "Drunken Faun" followed. In 1829 he revisited Ireland, and first publicly exhibited there, namely, his "Dead Christ." The greater portion of his works, chiefly religious subjects and monumental—including memorials to Dr. Doyle, to O'Connell, and were to a daughter of Curran—executed for Roman Catholic ecclesiastics and Roman Catholic gentlemen. The plaster model of his "Drunken Faun," which is an originality in sculpture, obtained a medal at the Great Exhibition of 1851. B. at Tallow, Waterford, 1800; D. 1867.

HOGARTH, William, ho'-garth, a celebrated painter and pictorial satirist of morals, was apprenticed to an engraver of arms, &c., on silver plate. In 1718, being twenty-one years of age, he set up for himself, his first employment being the engraving of coats-of-arms, ciphers, and shop-bills. In 1724 he undertook to execute plates for booksellers, the chief of which are the prints of "Hudibras" and the illustrations to "Mortraye's Travels." His first performance as a painter was a representation of Wanstead Assembly, the portraits being taken from life. In 1730 he married a daughter of Sir James Thornhill, in whose academy he had studied drawing from the living figure. After gaining some pecuniary profit and fame by the publication of a series of small etchings representing London life and folly, he afterwards began to paint portraits; but soon abandoned this line of pictorial art, as being too full of drudgery for a man of invention and original genius. In 1733 appeared his "Harlot's Progress,"—prints which stamped his reputation, and were followed by other works of the same class, admirably executed. Soon after the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, he went to France, and while at Calais, began to sketch the gate of the town, for which he was arrested, but was soon released. This circumstance he ridiculed in an excellent caricature. In 1733 he published his "Analysis of Beauty." The sale of engravings of his pictures, executed by himself, was so great, that, notwithstanding they were largely pirated, he was enabled to set up his carriage. His "Rake's Progress," "Marriage à la Mode," "March to Finchley," as well as many other works, have constituted him one of the greatest satirists of the worldly vices and weaknesses that have ever lived; whilst his fine and solid, though unpretending efforts as a colorist, have marked him as one of the best painters of the early English school. He was the greatest master of caricature the world has seen. n. in London, 1697; p. 1764.

HOGG, James, hog, generally known as the Ettrick Shepherd, a Scotch poet of considerable genius, whose forefathers had been shepherds for many generations, and he himself, previously to his poetical career, followed the same pursuit. In 1801, while acting as shepherd to Mr. Laidlau, of Blackhouse, Sir Walter Scott became acquainted with him, and engaged him to collect materials for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border." In 1803 he published a collection of poems, under the title of "The Mountain Bard," which, together with a couple of prizes obtained from the Highland Society for essays on the rearing and management of sheep, made him the possessor of a sum amounting to £300. With this money he took a farm, which was a failure; and after in vain seeking employment as a shepherd, he, "in utter desperation," as he said, "took his plaid about his shoulders, determined, since no better could be, to push his fortune as a literary man." From this period he laboured busily in the field of literature, with varying success. He contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine" and other periodicals, wrote "Madoc the Moor," "The Pilgrim of the Sun," and produced a volume of poems, some original, some ancient, entitled "Jacobite Relics of Scotland." "The Altrive Tales," "A Volume of Lay Sermons," and many other works, issued from his fertile but somewhat wild fancy. On his marriage, in 1814, the duke of Buccleuch made him a present of a farm; but the management of it appears to have been so bad as to have made it a bequest of little value to the irregular poet. B. in the Forest of Ettrick, Selkirkshire, 1772; p. at his farm at Altrive, 1835.

HOHENLOHE, Prince of, ho-hen-lo'-e, a general of artillery in the service of the emperor, distinguished himself in Transylvania against the Turks, in 1789; and in the campaign against France, in 1792, he gained great reputation, particularly in the battles of Famars and Marmal. p. 1796.

HOHENLOHE-INGELFINGEN, Frederick Louis, Prince of, in'-gel'-fin'-gen, after having fought with distinction in various battles at the commencement of the French revolution, was, in 1804, made governor of the principality of Franconia, and commandant of Breslau. After the battle of Jena, Oct. 14, 1806, he directed the retreat, and led the remnants of the great Prussian army; but being destitute of cavalry, and his infantry exhausted by fatigue, he surrendered, with 17,000 men, at Prenzlau, Oct. 28. B. 1746; p. 1818.

HOHENZOLLERN, ho-hen-tsol'-lern, one of the most ancient reigning houses of Germany, said to have sprung from Tassillon, duke of Bavaria, in the 8th century. It owes its name to a château, situate on the Zollernberg, supposed to have been built by Rudolph II., count of Zollern, whose two sons, Frederick and Conrad, became the chiefs of the two principal lines of the royal house,—the line of Swabia and the line of Franconia; from which, in 1417, sprang the electors of Brandenburg, who afterwards became the kings of Prussia.

HOLBACH, Baron d', hole'-bak, a rich German noble, who went to Paris while young, and there embraced the sceptical doctrines professed by those who were called the "Philosophical School," previous to the revolution of 1791. He wrote a large number of works of an atheistical nature, most of which were condemned by the Parliament of Paris, and placed in the Index Expurgatorius of Rome. He also composed and translated several works on chemistry, mineralogy, and the natural sciences. B. at Heidesheim, 1723; p. at Paris, 1789.

HOLBEIN, John, or Hans, hole'-bine, a famous portrait-painter and skilful architect, who was instructed in his art by his father. For the town-house of Bale he painted a fine picture of our Saviour's passion, and for the fish-market of the same town a "Dance of Peasants," and "Dance of Death," the last of which has been engraven in a series of plates. He visited England in the reign of Henry VIII., who liberally patronized him, on the recommendation of Sir Thomas More. He painted a number of portraits of the king and the highest nobility, as well as several historical pieces. B. about 1485; p. in London, of the plague, 1543.

HOLBERG, Louis, Baron de, hole'-jaire, a celebrated Danish writer, called the Plautus of his country, who abandoned a military career for one of letters; and was, in 1720, appointed professor in the University of Copenhagen. From that time he wrote especially for the theatre, and produced a large number of plays, which have caused his countrymen to regard him as the founder of dramatic art in Denmark. He wrote also a "History of Denmark" and an "Ecclesiastical History." B. at Bergen, 1684; p. at Copenhagen, 1754.

HOLCROFT, Thomas, hol'-kroft, an English playwright and translator of dramas, &c., was the son of a shoemaker, and became, when very young, a stable-boy in one of the racing stables of Newmarket. At the age of 17 he quitted this employment, and, for several years, led the life of a tramping shoemaker and wandering schoolmaster, all the while working sedulously at the task of self-education. At 21 he married, and, soon after, contributed a few articles to the "Whitehall Evening Post;" subsequently he left London to become a strolling player. After following the career of an actor for some time, and appearing on the London stage, he, in 1750, commenced writing for the theatre. He was one of the most fertile dramatic authors of his day, and was among the first to introduce to the London stage the system of adaptation from the French. He also wrote several novels and a sceptical poem; but it is as a translator of plays that he is chiefly known. His life has been published, and an abridged version of it issued by Messrs. Longman in their "Travellers' Library." B. in London, 1745; p. 1809.

HOLE, Richard, hole, a poet and miscellaneous writer, received his education at Exeter College, Oxford. He was the author of a poetical romance, called "Arthur, or the Northern Enchantment;" translated into heroic verse Ossian's "Fingal" and published several original works. B. at Exeter; p. 1802, rector of Farrington,

Holinshed

HOLINSHED, Raphael, hol'-in-shed, a celebrated old English chronicler, whose work is considered highly important by English historians. Nothing certain is known of his profession, but his annals show that he possessed considerable learning. His "Chronicles" were first published in 1577, in 2 vols. folio; and again in 1587 in three. B. uncertain when; D. about 1580.

HOLKAR, Mulhar Rao, hol'-kar, a Mahratta soldier, who, for his military services, received a grant of territory in Malwa in 1737, and subsequently made himself chief of more than half of the same province. B. about 1693; D. 1769.

HOLKAR, Jeswunt Rao, a daring military adventurer, who proclaimed himself a relative of the above, and at the head of a large army, collected by his ability and tact, defeated Scindia, the most powerful of the Mahratta chieftains, in 1802, and established himself in Malwa. Hercupon, the Marquis Wellesley, who was at that time governor-general of India, proclaimed war against him; but, after a struggle of nearly three years, a peace was concluded, by which Holkar was allowed to retain the greater portion of his territories. His violent temper subsequently culminated in madness, and he passed the closing years of his life in confinement. D. 1811.

HOLLAND, Philemon, hol'-land, an English writer, and fellow of Trinity College, among the fruits of whose industrious life may be mentioned the translation of Pliny's "Natural History," and Camden's "Britannia." He was also an eminent practitioner of the healing art in his day. B. at Chelmsford, 1551; D. 1636.

HOLLAND, Henry Fox, first Lord. (See Fox, Henry.)

HOLLAND, Henry Richard Vassal Fox, third Lord, nephew of the celebrated orator, and, like him, the champion of public liberty. In 1806 he became lord privy seal in the Grenville ministry; and in 1814-15 he denounced the war against Napoleon. He greatly aided in the abolition of the Corporation and Test Acts, as well as strongly advocated parliamentary reform. In 1806 he published the "Memoirs of Lope de Vega," and other works, and afterwards translated three comedies from the Spanish. His lordship's house at Kensington was, for a very lengthened period, a hospitable resort for the distinguished in literature and politics. B. 1773; D. at Holland House, 1810.

HOLLAND, Henry, a distinguished English architect, the favourite of George IV. when Prince of Wales. His personal history is unknown; but of his works we may mention that he designed Carlton House and the Pavilion at Brighton for his patron, though this last was afterwards improved by Nash. (See NASH.) He was the architect of Drury-lane Theatre: but this building was destroyed by fire in 1809. The India House, in Leadenhall-street, was also his design. B. about 1746; D. 1806.

HOLLAND, Sir Henry, an eminent English physician, who, after graduating M.D. at the university of Edinburgh, in 1811, went to London, where he rapidly acquired consideration as a physician. In 1840, he became physician in ordinary to H. R. H. Prince Albert, and in 1852 was appointed to the same duties towards her Majesty. He wrote a work, entitled "Medical Notes and Reflections," which is regarded by the medical body as being very valuable. In 1853, he was raised to the dignity of a Baronet, in consideration of his professional knowledge; and became a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of London, and of the Royal Society. B. in Cheshire, 1738.

HOLLAR, Wenceslaus, hol'-lar, a distinguished draughtsman and etcher during the 17th century, whose drawings of old London have a peculiar value with the antiquarian and historian. He was educated for the profession of law at Prague, but abandoned it for the more congenial pursuits of drawing and engraving, obtaining instruction therein from Matthew Marian, an engraver, who had worked for Vandyk and Rubens. At the outset of his artistic career, he travelled from one great German town to another, copying the pictures of great painters, and making perspective views of cities, towns, and remarkable localities, becoming very celebrated for his drawings of the Rhine and Danube. In 1638, Howard, earl of Arundel, met him at Cologne, and at once took him under his patronage. On leaving Germany, the earl brought Hollar with him to England, where he commenced his artistic labours with the "Prospect of Greenwich," which he executed in two plates, in 1637. Two years afterwards, he drew the portraits of the royal family for the great plate of the Entrance of Queen Marie de Medici into England, on a visit to her daughter, Henrietta Maria, queen of England. During the civil war he was taken prisoner by the Parliamentarians, and deprived of his liberty for some time; on his release, he went to Antwerp. Returning to England in 1652, he executed the etchings for Dugdale's "Monasticon" and his "History of St. Paul's," besides a very large number of other views and drawings. According to one authority, he etched as many as 2400 prints. Though he had been so laborious an artist, it is recorded that, at the age of 70, he had an execution in his house; whereupon the worthy old man requested only to be left to die in his bed. B. at Prague, 1607; D. in London, 1677.

HOLLES, Denzil, Lord, hol's, a prominent leader of the popular party against the illegal proceedings of Charles I., and one of the five members of the Long Parliament who were demanded by the king when he went to the House of Commons. Holles, like many others who were prominent at the beginning of the struggle between king and parliament, refused to concur in the extreme measures of Cromwell and the republicans, and at the Restoration was advanced to the peerage; in 1663 he was sent ambassador to France, and in 1667 was one of the English plenipotentiaries at Breda. Notwithstanding these employments, he remained a zealous friend to liberty; and when the measures of the King tended to introduce absolutism, Lord Holles was a conspicuous leader of the opposition. He enjoyed through life a high character for honour, integrity, and patriotism. B. 1597; D. 1680.

HOLMAN, Joseph George, hol'-man, a dramatist and actor, was a native of London, and intended for the church; but in 1784 he made his début as an actor at Covent Garden Theatre. He afterwards went to America, and became manager of Charlestown Theatre. Among his dramatic works are the "Votary of Wealth," "Red Cross Knights," "Abroad and at Home," &c. He died of yellow fever, along with his second wife, two days after their marriage, in 1817.

the royal navy, and took part in the wars against the French. At the age of 25 he lost his sight; but, notwithstanding this melancholy infirmity, he, in 1819, commenced his wanderings by travelling over France, Italy, Switzerland, and Holland; an account of which he published in 1822. He had been made, several years previously, a naval knight of Windsor. He again set out, in 1822, and embarked for St. Petersburg, intending to travel through the Russian empire, and to enter Mongolia and China, after having visited Eastern Siberia; but when he had arrived at Irkutsk, an order from the czar Alexander commanded his return, and he was conducted as a state prisoner back to the German frontier. When he reached England, he published an account of his wanderings, in two volumes. His Russian journey was intended as the commencement of a series of travels and voyages round the world, which he afterwards performed, and which occupied him five years to accomplish. In 1834 he published his work, "Travels Round the World," in 4 volumes. His last wanderings were in the Danubian Provinces, in 1843-44. b. about 1787; d. 1857.

HOLMES, Oliver Wendell, holme, an American poet and physician, who has earned, by his poetical works, the title of one of the best lyrical writers of his country. After completing his education at Cambridge, in Massachusetts, he became a doctor of medicine, and visited Europe. Returning to America, he established himself at Boston in 1836, and in 1838 was appointed professor of anatomy and physiology in the college at Dartmouth, and later in Harvard University, the most ancient college in the United States. He wrote several valuable medical works, but his fame is due to his poetical effusions, which he contributed to many of the best American periodicals. These, with "Elsie Venner," a novel, the "Professor," and the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," have been reprinted in England, and have met with considerable success. b. 1809.

HOLSTEIN, the house of, hol'-stine, a princely German family, which includes the royal line of Denmark and the collateral branches of Holstein-Sonderburg and the ducal line of Holstein-Gottorp, which last is again divided into two branches, the elder being the reigning line of Russia, while the younger is represented by Gustavus, prince of Wasa, a field-marshal in the Austrian service, and also by the Oldenburg family.

HOLT, Sir John, holt, an eminent English judge, famous for his integrity, firmness, and great legal knowledge, studied at Oriel College, Oxford, and became a member of Gray's Inn. He filled the office of recorder of London for about a year and a half, which situation he lost in consequence of his uncompromising opposition to the abolition of the Test Act. Becoming a member of the House of Commons, he distinguished himself so much by his exertions and talents in what is called the "Convention Parliament," that on King William's accession he was made lord chief justice of the King's Bench. On the removal of Lord Somers, in 1700, he was offered the chancellorship, but declined it, and continued to discharge the important duties of his high judicial authority with a resolute uprightness which gained him respect while living, and has endeared his memory to posterity. b. 1642; d. 1709.

chemist, who at first entered the army, but quitted it to practise the law, which he also abandoned, and applied himself to the study of the sciences, particularly botany, medicine, and chemistry, to improve himself in which he travelled through various countries. In 1652 he settled in France, and abjured the Protestant religion; but being disappointed in his expectations, he went to Rome, and practised physic. He afterwards returned to Paris, where he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and chemist and physician to the duke of Orleans. He discovered the properties of the Bologna stone, and its phosphoric appearance after calcination. Some of his scientific essays are printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of France. b. 1652; d. at Paris, 1715.

HOMES, Henry, Lord Kames, hume, a Scotch judge and elegant writer, who became senior lord of session in Scotland. He wrote "Essays upon several subjects concerning British Antiquities," 1764; "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion," "Historical Law," "The Principles of Equity," "The Elements of Criticism," 3 vols. 8vo; "The History of Man." b. 1696; d. 1752.

HOMER, John, a Scottish divine and dramatic author, who, while acting as a minister of the kirk, wrote his tragedy of "Douglas," which was represented with the greatest success at Edinburgh. This work, notwithstanding its purity of thought and language, evoked the indignation of the elders of the kirk, and the author was compelled to retire to England, where he obtained a pension from Lord Bute. He afterwards wrote four more tragedies, which, however, did not obtain the popularity of "Douglas," and which are now never heard of in the theatre. b. about 1723; d. 1808.

HOMER, Sir Everard, bart., an eminent surgeon, was the son of Robert Home, Esq., of Greenlaw Castle, in the county of Berwick; and was brought up to the profession under his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter. For a period of more than 40 years, Home practised with great success in London; and during that time produced numerous medical works of great merit and utility. He was sergeant-surgeon to the king, surgeon to Chelsea Hospital, vice-president of the Royal Society, president of the Royal College of Surgeons; and was created a baronet in 1813. Among his works are, "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy," 2 vols. 4to, and "Practical Observations" on a variety of diseases, consisting of several volumes; besides numerous valuable contributions to the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. b. 1750; d. 1832.

HOMER, ho'-mer, the most ancient and celebrated of the Greek poets, but of whose birthplace, station in life, and actual existence, in point of fact, the most diverse opinions are held by the learned of modern days. The honour of his birthplace was disputed by seven Greek cities. According to one tradition, he was the natural son of a young orphan girl of Smyrna, who lived on the banks of the Meles, and called her son after it, Melesigenes. It further relates, that Phemius, who kept a school for music and belles-lettres at Smyrna, having fallen in love with his mother, married her and adopted Homer, who, on his death, succeeded him as master of the school. Subsequently, having conceived the idea of the "Iliad," he travelled in order to gather knowledge of men and realities for his great work; but being badly treated by his fellow-countrymen on his return, he left Smyrna and established himself at Chios, where he set up a school. Becoming blind in his old age, he was overtaken by poverty, and compelled to earn his bread by wandering from city to city reciting his verses. Finally, according to this version of his life, he is said to have died in the little isle of Cos, one of the Cyclades. Homer's greatest works are two epic poems. In the "Iliad," which contains 24 rhapsodies or chants, are recited the story of Achilles' revenge upon Agamemnon for depriving him of his mistress Briseis; the misfortunes which the Greeks suffered in consequence while besieging Troy, and the death of Hector at the hands of Achilles, who, to avenge the death of his friend Patroclus, killed the Trojan hero. In the "Odyssey," the story of the wanderings and adventures of Ulysses on his homeward journey from Troy to his kingdom of Ithaca is told. The "Batrachomyomachia," or Battle of the Frogs and Mice, and the "Homerica Hymns," are by some allowed to be the work of this poet, while others consider them spurious. The whole of these works are written in the Ionic dialect. Both the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" have always been considered as the great beginning of all literature, though each shines with a lustre different from the other. In the "Iliad" grandeur of conception, beauty and simplicity of plan, a soaring imagination, rich and sublime images, are the characteristic excellences. In the "Odyssey," a plan less regular, an imagination less brilliant, are to be discovered; but it nevertheless commands delight by its strong interest and its entrancing style. In addition to these intrinsic beauties, the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" have preserved the theological traditions, the names and origin of nations, and the description and situation of cities and towns. The poems of Homer, according to the most learned critics, were composed anterior to the invention of writing, and were for a long time preserved by memory alone. They are said to have been interpolated and abridged by the rhapsodists, or Homeridae, who selected from them the most interesting episodes for recital. Plutarchus, or, as some others maintain, his son Hipparchus, was the first person who collected and arranged these poems, which were afterwards revised and divided into twenty-four books each, by the grammarians under the Ptolemies, who thus gave them the form in which we now possess them. Some learned critics—Wolf at their head—have put forth a theory that Homer never existed, and that the poems which have come down to us under his name are only a collected version of fragments which have been composed and sung by various authors, whom he terms Homeridae, and who formed a species of school. Another set of scholars hold that the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey" are not the work of the same author, but that the latter is a very much later production than the former. Again, the derivation of the word Homer has been variously given by different schools of critics; each adopting that which best agrees with its own theory. One, the partisan of common tradition, translates the name by blind; others, by hostage, pretending that Homer was a hostage in a war which was raging between the inhabitants of Smyrna and Colophon; others, finally, assert that the word is derived from homereo, "I collect;" which would seem to show that we owe these poems to a compiler, who only collected scattered fragments, and united them into an harmonious whole. So far as our limits would permit us, we have endeavoured to sketch the theories which are held relating to this, the most interesting literary question in the world. Those who would seek more complete information on the subject, should turn to Thirlwall's "History of Greece," vol. i.; Gladstone's "Homerio Age;" and if they would desire to go still deeper, to the works of Heyne, and the "Lexilogus" of Buttmann; the last two being German writers. Hobbes, Chapman, Pope, and Cowper have translated Homer. Pope's version is the best known; but it is only a poor reflection of the vigorous original. Chapman's is the best old translation. A very excellent translation is that by the Earl of Derby, published in 1865. Homer is said by some to have lived about 900 B.C.

HOMERSON, Ferdinand de, hom'-peak, the last grand master of the order of the Knights of Malta, who was invested with that dignity in 1797. Bribed, it is asserted, by the money and promises of the Directory, he surrendered to the French fleet which was conveying Bonaparte and his army to Egypt. He was conducted to Trieste. Subsequently, he protested against the usurpation of the French, and abdicated his sovereignty in favour of the emperor of Russia, Paul I. He wandered about Germany for some years, but finally took refuge in France, a. at Dusseldorf, 1744; d. 1803.

HONE, William, hone, a political pamphleteer and compiler of popular antiquities, began life in an attorney's office, at first in London, and subsequently at Chatham. In 1800 he established himself as a bookseller in Lambeth Walk, from which he removed to St. Martin's Churchyard, close to the present Charing Cross. In 1806, he commenced his singular literary career by issuing an edition of Shaw's "Gardener." An attempt at establishing a savings' bank, as well as a being the book short time before, had been engaged in the compilation of the index to Froissart. But he was quite unfitted for business, and while engaged in the above post he was occupied in investigating the abuses in lunatic asylums: he was soon a bankrupt for the second time. His family now consisted of seven children, and he gained a livelihood by writing for the "Critical Review" and the "British Lady's Magazine." He next opened a bookseller's shop in Fleet Street, but his ill-fortune still continued: it was twice plundered. In 1815, he was the publisher of the "Traveller" newspaper, and, soon after, began to publish those bold political pamphlets and satires which made him universally known, and led to his being tried for three days in the Court of King's Bench. He was acquitted, however, and a large sum of money was collected by subscription for him, with which he established himself once more in business, and once more failed. From this time he was occupied in the compilation and publication of those well-known books which will continue to preserve his name. The chief of these were "Ancient Mysteries Described," "The Every-day Book," "The Table Book," and "The Year Book;" his last work being an edition of "Strutt's Sports and Pastimes of the English." b. at Bath, 1779; d. at Tottenham, 1842.

HONORIUS, ho-nor'-e-us, emperor of the West, was the second son of Theodosius the Great, and was associated in the empire with Arcadius, his brother, in 395. His guardian, Stilicho, endeavouring to dethrone him, was slain. In 409, Alaric the Goth besieged Rome, and ravaged all the country, while Honorius remained indolent at Ravenna. b. 384; d. 423.

HONORIUS I., Pope, succeeded Boniface V. in 626. He governed with zeal and prudence. Some of his letters are extant. d. 638.

HONORIUS II., of Bologna, succeeded Calixtus II. in 1124, and, at the same time, Thibault was chosen by another party, under the name of Celestin; but he resigned the chair to his rival. d. 1130.

HONORIUS III. was made pope after Innocent III., in 1216. He confirmed the order of Dominicans, and left several works. d. 1237.

HONORIUS IV., a Roman, ascended the papal chair in 1235. He displayed great zeal for his church, and promoted the crusades. d. 1237.

HOOD, Robin, hoo'd, a famous English outlaw in the 12th century—whose personal courage, skill in archery, boldness of enterprise, and generous disposition, have rendered his name famous in the legendary history of our country—lived in Sherwood forest, in Nottinghamshire. The heads of his story, as collected by Stowe, are briefly these:—"In this time (about the year 1190, in the reign of Richard I.) were many robbers and outlaws, among whom Robin Hood and Little John, renowned thieves, continued in the woods, despoiling and robbing the goods of the rich. They killed none but such as would invade them, or by resistance for their own defence. The said Robin entertained 100 tall men and good archers, with such spoils and thefts as he got, upon whom 400 (were they ever so strong) durst not give the onset. He suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poor men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbays and the houses of rich old carles." He is believed to have died in 1247. Robin Hood figures in a great variety of old English ballads, and he has likewise been introduced upon the stage by numerous romance writers, some of whom have taken considerable liberties with his history and character, and especially with the time he lived in. For instance, Sir Walter Scott introduces him in "Ivanhoe," under the name of Locksley, temp. Richard I.; and Mr. G. P. R. James makes him play a prominent part in his "Forest Days," temp. Henry III.

HOOD, Samuel, Lord Viscount, the son of a clergyman at Thorncombe, in Devonshire, entered the royal navy at the age of 16. For his bravery in the capture of a 50-gun ship, in 1759, he acquired the rank of post-captain; and was present, as rear-admiral, at the famous defeat of De Grasse, by Rodney, April 12th, 1782, when his services on that occasion were rewarded with an Irish peerage. In 1784 he was returned to Parliament for Westminster; but in 1788 he vacated his seat on being named one of the lords of the admiralty. In 1793 he signalised himself by the taking of Toulon, and afterwards Corsica; in reward of which achievements he was made a viscount, and governor of Greenwich Hospital. b. 1724; d. 1818.

Hook

HOOD, Thomas, a modern English poet and humorist, author of the celebrated "Song of the Shirt" and "The Bridge of Sighs," was the son of a bookseller in the Poultry. When about 14 years old, he was placed in the office of a city merchant; but his health being delicate, he was soon after sent to Dundee on board a coasting vessel. He remained in Scotland for two years, his chief occupations being reading, fishing, and boating. His health improving, he returned to London, and was apprenticed to his uncle, an engraver. In 1821 the "London Magazine" became the property of some of his friends, and he, having already given signs of the possession of literary talent, was offered the post of sub-editor. Soon afterwards he published his first work,—Odes and Addresses to Great People; and, in 1826, he collected his contributions to the "London Magazine," and re-issued them in a work called "Whims and Oddities." "The Comic Annual," which he produced for nine years, was commenced in 1829; and while editor of "The Gem," he wrote his well-known poem, "Eugene Aram's Dream." His work, "Up the Rhine," was published after a three years' residence on the continent. Subsequently, he became editor of "The New Monthly Magazine," and on his retirement from this post, he collected his prose and poetry, scattered through many periodicals, and published them under the title of "Whimsicalities." In all these works a rich current of genial humour runs; and his pleasant wit, ripe observation, and sound sense, have made him an ornament to English literature. b. in London, 1793; d. 1845.

HOORT, Peter Cornelius van, hoof't, a Dutch writer, to whom Louis XIII. of France gave the order of St. Michael, as a reward for his history of Henry IV. His other works are "Poems and Comedies," "The History of the Low Countries from the Abdication of Charles V. to 1598," and a translation of Tacitus into Dutch. b. at Amsterdam, 1631; d. 1617.

HOOK, James, hook, a musical composer of great industry and talent, whose operatic and melodramatic productions amount to more than 140 complete works, many of which were highly successful; he also set to music upwards of 2000 songs. b. 1746; d. 1827. He was the father of the Rev. Dr. Hook, dean of Worcester, and of Theodore Hook, the famous novelist, &c.

HOOK, Dr. James, dean of Worcester, son of the preceding, an accomplished scholar, and an able dignitary of the church, was educated at Westminster School and St. Mary Hall, Oxford; in 1802 he was made chaplain to George IV.; held the livings of Hertingfordbury and St. Andrew's, in Hertfordshire, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight; obtained a prebendal stall in Winchester cathedral, in 1807; succeeded Dr. Middleton, as archdeacon of Huntingdon, in 1814; and accepted the deanery of Worcester, in 1825. Besides some dramas, which he wrote early in life, he published, in 1802, "Anguis in Herba; a Sketch of the true character of the Church of England and her Clergy," which he inscribed "To the sober sense of his country." Few writers have surpassed Dr. Hook as a polemical or a political pamphleteer, and some of the most effective pamphlets that appeared during the French revolutionary war, in support of monarchical principles, were written by him. d. 1823.

Hook

HOOK, Theodore Edward, a popular English humorist and playwright at the beginning of the present century, another son of the musical composer, was remarkable in his youth for his beauty, his sweet voice, and his quick intelligence. He soon began to assist his father, by writing the words of ballads for him; and was thus early made familiar with musical and theatrical life before and behind the curtain. He had been at Harrow for a short period; but on the death of his mother he left it, and never went to a school again. It was at one time intended to enter him at a college at Oxford; but, after some preliminary reading, he returned to London, where he quickly began to write operas, farces, and published a novel,—"The Man of Sorrow," under an assumed name. His light and joyous temperament, great conversational powers, and marvellous talent as an "improvisatore," made him the favourite of the most fashionable society; and it was while he was leading this life of exuberant gaiety, that he played off his notorious "hoaxes;" one of which, "the Berners Street hoax," made a great sensation at the time. His social qualities attracted the notice, and procured for him the patronage of the Prince-regent, who caused him, in 1812, to be appointed accountant-general and treasurer to the Mauritius, he being then only 25 years of age. But in March, 1818, he was arrested on a serious charge, a deficiency of $7,000 dollars having been discovered in the colonial treasury chest. He was brought to England a prisoner, the law officers of the crown reporting that he was only liable to prosecution for debt; but a long and harassing course of legal proceedings was the result. In the year 1820, he became, through the instrumentality of Sir Walter Scott, editor of the "John Bull," on its establishment. In this position he distinguished himself by his powerful writing against Queen Caroline, her supporters, and the whole of the Whig party. So successful was this Tory newspaper, that Hook, for a long period, derived from it an income of £2000 per annum. The Whig party, however, would not allow the law proceedings against him to drop, and in 1823 he was arrested, and remained in custody till May, 1825, when he was permitted to go at large, but was informed that the crown could not consent to forego its debt. With respect to this mysterious affair, it was never clearly shown that he was guilty of false appropriation of the funds intrusted to his charge; but great carelessness was proved against him, it being shown, among other acts of culpable neglect, that he was in the habit of leaving the keys of the treasure-chest with his subordinates, while he was away on parties of pleasure. Between the years 1824 and 1836, he wrote about 30 volumes of novels, which were very successful, and which yielded him large sums. He continued to lead the life of a gay and fashionable man till July, 1841, when, as he looked in the glass, when dining, he rose, and said, "Ay, I see I look as I am; done up in purse, in mind, and in body too, at last." Henceforth he was confined to his room; his fine constitution and his great intellectual powers had been worn out by the mercurial mode in which he had overtaxed them. His novel of "Gilbert Gurney" contains an interesting autobiographical sketch of himself. n. in London, 1788; p. at Fulham, 1841.

HOOKS, James Clark, R.A., a modern English painter, of solid merit, studied at the Royal Academy, whose three medals he carried off by his skill in drawing. His first efforts as an artist were on the most ambitious scale, though he afterwards painted pictures of a simple rustic character. His "Bianca Capello," "Escape of Francesco de Carrara," and "The Chevalier Bayard wounded at Brescia," are admirable specimens of historical painting, the last gaining for him election into the Royal Academy. Although not so popular with the general public as many inferior men, he was highly esteemed as a painter by his brother artists. n. 1819.

Hooker, was placed under Sir Peter Lely; but painting in oil-colour disordering his head, he abandoned this pursuit, and was taken by Dr. Busby into his house; after which he went to Christ Church, Oxford. He worked with Dr. Willis in his chemical operations, and became assistant to Mr. Boyle. He was one of the first fellows of the Royal Society, the repository of which was intrusted to his care. In 1662 he was made curator of experiments to that learned body, and about two years after elected Gresham professor of geometry. After the fire of London, he produced a plan for rebuilding the city, which procured him the appointment of one of the city surveyors; but his design was not adopted. In 1668, he had a dispute with Hevelius respecting telescopic sights, which he conducted with great asperity. In 1671, he attacked Sir Isaac Newton's theory of light and colours, and afterwards pretended that the discovery made by that great man concerning the force and action of gravity was originally made by himself. In 1691, Archbishop Tillotson created him M.D. In 1665, he wrote a book called "Micrographia, or Philosophical Description of Minute Bodies made by Magnifying-glasses." His posthumous works were published after his death. Hooker was a man of great mechanical genius, and the sciences are indebted to him for several valuable instruments and improvements. n. at Freshwater, Isle of Wight, 1635; d. in London, 1702.

HOOKER, Nathaniel, an English historian, was a Roman Catholic, and when Mr. Pope lay in his death-bed, Hooker introduced a priest to him, which gave great offence to Bolingbroke. He wrote the duchess of Marlborough's account of her conduct, for which he received £5000; but his best work is a Roman history in 4 vols., n. 1764.

HOOKER, Richard, hook'-er, a celebrated English divine, received his education at Exeter grammar school, whence he was sent by his relation, Bishop Jewell, to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he was made bible-clerk, and in 1577 chosen fellow. In 1581 he took orders, and in 1584 was presented to the rectory of Drayton-Beauchamp, in Buckinghamshire, where he was discovered leading a life of poverty by the son of the archbishop of York, who had formerly been his pupil. The young man represented his case to his father, through whose influence he was appointed master of the temple in 1585. But this place did not suit Hooker, who was best fitted for a country rector; he therefore applied to Archbishop Whitgift for a removal to "some quiet parsonage," and was accordingly presented to a living in Wiltshire, where he wrote part of his "Ecclesiastical Polity." In 1595 the queen presented him to the rectory of Bishop's Bourne, where he finished his great work. Pope Clement VIII. said of the "Ecclesiastical Polity," "there are in it such seeds of eternity as will continue till the last fire shall devour all learning." He wrote many tracts and sermons in addition to his great work, and is regarded as one of the most profound, learned, and pious divines of the English church. B. at Heavitree, near Exeter, about 1554; D. 1600.

HOOKER, Sir William Jackson, a distinguished English botanist, and, till his death, director of the Royal Gardens at Kew. He abandoned the pursuit of commerce for that of botany, and, in his youth, travelled in Iceland, for the purpose of becoming acquainted with its natural history. Unfortunately losing his collection of specimens collected in that country, he, notwithstanding, published, in 1803, an account of the botany of that island, under the title of "A Tour in Iceland." This was followed, in 1812, by "A Monograph on the British Jungermannia;" and, in 1813, he produced a continuation of Curtis's "Flora Londinensis." The "Flora Scotica," "Exotic Flora," a continuation of Curtis's "Botanical Magazine," and the "Botanical Miscellany," were brought out by him between the years 1823 and 1833. In 1837 he completed, in conjunction with Dr. Greville, the "Icones Filicum," in which a complete catalogue of ferns was given, with figures. A complete description of British plants, under the title of "British Flora," was issued under his direction. He also edited the "Journal of Botany," assisted in the management of "The Annals and Magazine of Natural History," and filled the chair of professor of botany in the university of Glasgow; but resigned this to assume the direction of the Royal Gardens at Kew, which, under his control, rapidly became the first establishment of its kind in the world. He was among the foremost professors of systematic botany of the present century. In 1836 he was knighted for his eminent scientific attainments; he was also one of the vice-presidents of the Linnæan Society, an honorary D.C.L. of the university of Oxford, and a knight of the Legion of Honour in France. B. at Norwich, 1785; D. 1865.

HOOKER, Joseph Dalton, son of the above, also a distinguished botanist, was educated for the pursuit of medicine, which he followed as M.D. for many years; but, on the fitting out of Sir James Ross's expedition to the Antarctic Ocean, in 1839, he was appointed assistant-surgeon to the ship Erebus, to which post were added the duties of observing and collecting the botanical specimens of the country to which the expedition was dispatched. On his return he published "Flora Antarctica." In 1843 he set out on a botanical expedition to the Himalayas, during which he discovered many new and valuable plants, although his travels had been conducted under many disadvantages, he having been at one time prisoner in a district of the Sikkim Himalayas. In 1852 he produced the fruits of his long travels, in his "Himalayan Journals," besides which, he was the means of introducing several valuable varieties of rhododendrons into England. Before his travels, he was a professor in the Museum of Economic Geology, to the "Transactions" of which institution he contributed a most valuable and interesting paper on the Vegetation of the Carbo-nerous Period, as compared with that of the presentday. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, a member of the council of the Linnæan Society, and one of the examiners of candidates for the East-India medical service. B. at Glasgow, 1817.

HOOLZ, John, hool, an ingenious writer, was the son of a watchmaker, who was a very able mechanic, and director, for many years, of the machinery at Covent-garden Theatre. At the age of seventeen he became a clerk in the India House, but devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits, particularly the study of the Italian language, of which he acquired considerable knowledge, as appears by his excellent translations into English of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso" and Tasso's "Jerusalem." He also published two volumes of the dramas of Metastasio, and was the author of three tragedies, viz., "Cyrus," acted at Covent Garden in 1768; "Timanthes," performed the year following; and "Cleoneice," in 1775. B. in London, 1727; D. 1803.

HOPE, Thomas, hope, a liberal art-patron and writer on art, was a descendant of the rich banking family of the Hopes of Amsterdam. An enthusiastic admiration for architecture led him, at the age of 18, to travel through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Sicily, France, Germany, and Spain, in search of the greatest examples of the art extant. On his return to England, he commenced applying the principles of which he had made himself master abroad, by extending and enlarging his residence in Duchess-street, Portland-place, which, when finished, he stored with classical vases and statues. In 1806 he issued his splendid work entitled "Household Furniture," which, in 60 folio plates, depicted the magnificent upholstery and decorations of his house. His "Costume of the Ancients" had appeared in 1809; and this work, together with its successor, "Modern Costume," as well as many valuable contributions to fine art periodicals, greatly tended to improve English taste in matters artistic. The celebrated work, "Anastasis; or, the Memoirs of a Modern Greek," was published by him in 1819, and as it was issued anonymously, Lord Byron was long held to be the only person capable of having been its author. Two other works, both published after his death, came from his pen—one "On the Origin and Prospects of Man," and the other "An Historical Essay on Architecture." Although a constant patron of the arts, and the first to discern and foster the genius of Thorwaldsen, he became engaged in a dispute with Dubost, a French artist, who, to revenge himself upon him, painted the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Hope, and exhibited them under the title of "Beauty and the Beast;" but the exhibition was terminated in a sudden manner, by his brother destroying the canvas with his stick. B. about 1770; D. 1831.

HOPITAL, Michael de l', hop-e-tal, was an eminent chancellor of France, to which high station he rose through the zeal, ability, and integrity he displayed in the various offices he before filled. He studied jurisprudence in the most celebrated universities of France and Italy; rose rapidly in his profession, and was sent by Henry II. as ambassador to the council of Trent. In 1554 he was made superintendent of the royal finances, when by his good management, and his disregard of the demands of court favourites, he replenished the exhausted treasury.

Horne

He was a sincere friend to religious toleration, and the principal author of the edict of 1562, which allowed freedom of worship to Protestants. This brought on him the hatred of the court of Rome; his seals of office were taken from him; and he retired to his country-house. When the massacre of the Protestants on Bartholomew's Day, 1572, was at its height, and his friends thought he would become one of its victims, he not only declined to take measures for his own safety, but when a party of horsemen advanced towards his house, he refused to close his gates. The party, however, had been sent by the queen, with orders to save him: and on their informing him that the persons who made the list of proscription pardoned him, he calmly observed, "I did not know that I had done anything to deserve either death or pardon." The whole course of this great man's life was productive of benefit to his country, and did honour to his nature. He survived this execrable event a few months only. B. 1505; D. 1573.

HOPITAL, Guillaume François Antoine, marquis de l', a French mathematician, who evinced, at an early age, a genius for mathematical study, and, when only fifteen, solved a difficult problem of Pascal's. He served for some time in the army, which he left on account of a defect in his sight. In 1693, he was admitted an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and published a work on Newton's Fluxions, being the first Frenchman who wrote on that subject. He afterwards published another mathematical work. B. at Paris, 1681; D. 1704.

HOPKINS, Charles, hop'-kine, an English poet and classical translator, who, in 1694, published some epistolary poems and translations, and the year following produced a tragedy, called "Pyrrhus, King of Egypt." He translated Ovid's "Tristia" and "Art of Love," and was greatly esteemed by Dryden and other poets. B. at Exeter, about 1683; D. 1699.

HOPKINSON, Francis, hop'-kin-sun, an eminent American author, and one of the signers of the declaration of American independence, was a native of Philadelphia, his father being the intimate friend and scientific coadjutor of Franklin. After graduating at the college of Philadelphia, and making the law his study, Francis visited England; and, a few years after his return, entered congress as a delegate from New Jersey. He produced many satires and ironical pieces, such as the "Prophecy," the "Political Catechism," &c., tending to ridicule the old country; while, at the same time, he directed his efforts against the ribaldry of the newspapers, and the exaggerations and prejudices with which the federal constitution was at first assailed. After his retirement from congress, he was appointed judge of the admiralty for Pennsylvania. Among his works, the greater part of which are of a political character, there are many sound essays and scientific papers, acute and learned judicial decisions, and a variety of songs possessing much sweetness and delicacy, which were rendered still more popular by the airs he composed for them. B. 1738; D. 1791.

HOPFNER, John, R.A., hop'-ner, one of the first Royal Academicians, and a fashionable portrait-painter in his day. In his early years was chorister in the Chapel Royal, but afterwards became a student of the Royal Academy, and attracting the notice of the Prince of Wales, he painted a considerable number of royal and fashionable portraits, and divided the favour of the highest patrons of art with Lawrence and Opie. He also excelled in landscape-painting. B. in London, 1759; D. 1810.

HORATII, ho-ra'-she-i, the name of three brave Roman brothers, who fought against the three Curiatii of Alba, 667 B.C. Two of them were slain; but the third, by adding artifice to his courage, slew all his antagonists. On his return to Rome he met his sister, who had been betrothed to one of the Curiatii, and on her reproaching him for what he had done, he slew her also. His eminent services, however, were considered an extenuation of his crime, and he was pardoned.

HORATIUS, or HORACE, Quintus Flaccus, ho-ra'-she-us, an elegant Roman poet. His father was a freedman; but though poor, he gave his son a good education, placing him first under the best masters at Rome, and then sending him to Athens, that he might study philosophy. Here he was patronized by Brutus, who took him into his army, and made him a tribune; but he had more wit than courage, and at the battle of Philippi he threw away his shield and fled. Being reduced to want, Virgil became his patron, and recommended him to Mæcenas, by whom he was introduced to Augustus, who offered him considerable advancement, which he declined, preferring a private life to the honours of the court. He was greatly esteemed by the highest people in Rome, particularly Mæcenas and Pollio. In the latter part of his life he retired to the country, where he indulged in a philosophical ease, which he has admirably described in his odes. These have been translated into every European language. The last modern edition of his works is Milman's "Life and Works of Horace," published in 1849. B. at Venusia, or Venusium, 65 B.C.; D. 8 B.C.

HORATIUS COCLES. (See COYLES.)

HORN, Charles Edward, horn, the son of C. F. Horn, a German musician and the tutor of George III.'s daughters, was perhaps the best composer of melodies in modern times. He showed indications of musical genius when very young, and was engaged as second tenor on the opening of the English Opera House, and obtained a large share of public favour. He wrote the music, in whole or the greater part, for a vast number of operas; and was especially successful as a composer of ballads, as is proved by the fact that three of the most popular pieces of this description—"Cherry Ripe," "The deep, deep Sea," and "I've been roaming"—are his work. These songs were not only well received at the time of their production, but keep their hold on public favour still. B. in London, 1786; D. in New York, 1849.

HORNBY, George, bishop of Norwich, and author of the celebrated "Commentary on the Book of Psalms," received his education at Maidstone school, whence he was elected to a scholarship of University College, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. He was afterwards chosen fellow of Magdalen College, and applied himself with great diligence to sacred literature, particularly the study of the Hebrew language. In 1753 he entered into orders, and soon became distinguished as an excellent preacher. He appeared also as an acute writer, particularly in controversy, defending the principles of Hutchinson with singular dexterity. In 1768 he was chosen president of his college, on which he took his degree of D.D., and was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king. His valuable "Commentary on the Psalms" was produced in 1776. B. at Otham, Kent, 1730; D. at Bath, 1792.

HORNE, Rev. Thomas Hartwell, an eminent biblical writer, who was ordained by the bishop of London, without having taken a degree at a university, in consequence of the high estimation in which that prelate held his "Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures." After having been presented to the rectory of two united parishes in the city of London, he published a new and enlarged edition of the above popular work; besides which, he produced "A Compendious Introduction to the Study of the Bible," "A Manual of Biblical Biography," "A Manual of Parochial Psalmody," and many other theological works. B. 1750; D. 1862.

HORNE, Richard Henry, an English littérateur, who was at first sent to Sandhurst for the purpose of being educated for the military service of the East-India Company, but left that seminary to enter, in 1826, the Mexican navy, as midshipman, while that republic was at war with Spain. On the termination of the war, he went to London, and commenced writing extensively for periodical publications. In 1827, he produced "The Death of Marlowe," and "Cosmo de Medici," two dramas written upon the Elizabethan model; these being followed by "The Death Fetch," and "Gregory the Seventh;" to which latter play was appended a critical essay on tragic influence. He appears to have been greatly disappointed in the expectations he had formed on commencing his literary career; for, in 1841, he published a singular pamphlet, called "An Exposition of the False Medium excluding Men of Genius from the Public." His plays were not successful either on the stage or with the reading public. In 1841, he wrote a "Life of Napoleon," which was published in Tyas's illustrated series. In 1843, he produced an epic poem, thus singularly announced:—"Orion, an Epic Poem. Price One Farthing," which was generally supposed to be a sarcastic mode of expressing what he thought the value of public appreciation of such works. Its success was very great, however, first at one farthing, next at a penny, and afterwards at half-a-crown and five shillings. "A New Spirit of the Age" was published in 1844; "Ballad Romances" in 1846; and "Judas Iscariot," a miracle play, with Poems, in 1848. In addition to these, he wrote extensively for the periodicals and reviews of the time. In 1852, he, with Mr. Howitt and others, emigrated to Australia; where, after undergoing many privations as a gold-digger, he became chief of mounted police, and afterwards a gold commissioner: a narrative of his adventures having been contributed, at various times, to the pages of "Household Words." B. about 1803.

HORNE TOOKER. (See TOOKER.)

HORNER, Francis, hor'-ner, an English politician, writer on political economy, and one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Review." After having received his education at the High School and the university of Edinburgh, embraced the profession of the law, intending to practise at the Scottish bar. In 1802, he went to London to seek employment in the English courts, and became acquainted with Sir James Mackintosh, Sir Samuel Romilly, and other leading Whigs. After having sat as commissioner at the board of the East India Company, he was, in 1806, returned to Parliament for St. Ives, and gradually assumed importance in his new career. His first great speech was made in 1810, on the subject of the alleged depreciation of bank notes; he was appointed one of the members of the Bullion Committee, his influence in the House of Commons continuing to increase. In 1814, he went abroad, and travelled in Switzerland and the north of Italy. His last speech was in favour of the claims of the Catholics, in 1816. A pulmonary disease compelled him, in the same year, to visit the south of Europe, where he died. B. in Edinburgh, 1773; D. 1817.

HORROX, Jeremiah, hor'-rocks, an English astronomer, who received an academical education at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, after which he retired to Houl, near Liverpool, where he devoted himself to astronomical observations. He was the first who observed the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, his account of which was published by Hevelius, at Dantzic, in 1661, under the title, "Venus in Sole visa, anno 1639." B. at Toxteth, about 1619; D. 1640.

HORSA, hor'-sa, a Saxon prince, the brother of Hengist (see HENGIST), and one of the founders of the kingdom of Kent. He was killed in battle with the Britons at Eaglesford, now Aylesford, in 455.

HORSLEY, John, hors'-le, a learned antiquary, who was educated first at Newcastle and afterwards in Scotland, where he took his degree of M.A. He became pastor of a dissenting congregation in his native country. He is the author of a work entitled "Britannia Romana," folio, which gives a copious and exact account of the remains of the Romans in Britain. D. 1731.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a prelate of the established Church of England, was educated at Westminster School and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. After entering into holy orders in 1759, he became rector of Newington, on the resignation of his father; in 1767 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society, of which body he was made secretary in 1773. Soon after his appointment as archdeacon of St. Alban's, in 1781, he entered into a theological controversy with Dr. Joseph Priestley, against whom he combated the doctrines of materialism and Unitarianism. In 1783 he was ordained bishop of St David's, and on taking his seat in Parliament, displayed great political capacity, strongly supporting the measures of Mr. Pitt; for which services he was made, successively, bishop of Rochester and of St. Asaph. He published a large number of theological works, chiefly controversial, but one of them, the "Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestley," was held to be the exponent of a sound and orthodox theology. B. 1733; D. 1806.

HORSLEY, John Calcott, an English painter and R.A., who, from his earliest youth, evinced a talent for the fine arts. The first work which attracted the attention of the public towards him was his "Leaving the Ball," exhibited in 1840, a success which was followed up by his gaining a prize of £200 for his cartoon of "St. Augustine Preaching," in 1843. He afterwards painted two frescoes for the House of Lords,—"The Spirit of Religion," and "Eve Surprised;" and was one of the best among the exhibitors in the yearly display of artistic productions at the Royal Academy. Her chief works are "Malvolio," "Master Shalimar," "Scene from Don Quixote," "L'Allegro and Il Penseroso." In 1855 he was elected an A.R.A., and was admitted as R.A. in 1864. n. in London, 1817.

HORTENSE, (Eugénie Hortense de Beauharnais), hor'-tense, queen of Holland, and mother of Napoleon III., was daughter of Alexander, viscount de Beauharnais, and Josephine Tascher de la Pagerie, afterwards first wife of Napoleon I., and empress of France. On the marriage of her mother to Bonaparte, Hortense became, by her beauty, wit, and accomplishments, the ornament of the consular and imperial courts. She was espoused, though unwillingly, in 1802, to Louis Bonaparte; but the marriage afforded little happiness to either party. Becoming a queen by the elevation of Louis Bonaparte to the throne of Holland in 1806, she displayed little affection for her husband's kingdom, and lived in it only when compelled to do so. After the abdication of Louis, in 1810, she obtained a divorce from him, and took up her residence in Paris, where, still retaining her title of queen, she became the centre of a most distinguished and fashionable circle. She remained in Paris after the first return of the Bourbons, and was accused of assisting Napoleon to re-enter France, and compelled to depart from the capital in 1815. After having wandered about Germany and Switzerland for some time, she retired, in 1817, under the title of the duchess of St. Leu, to the château of Arenenberg, in the canton of Thurgau, on the borders of Lake Constance. She had by her marriage with King Louis three children: Napoleon Louis Charles, born in 1802; Napoleon Louis, born in 1804; Charles Louis Napoleon, born in 1808. The first died young; the second perished in the unfortunate expedition to Forlì, in 1831; and the third became emperor of the French, as Napoleon III. n. at Paris, 1783; p. 1837.

HORTENSIVS, Quintus, hor'-ten'-she-us, a Roman orator, who pleaded his first cause, with great applause, at the age of 19, b. c. 94. He became successively military tribune, prætor, and consul. n. 114 b. c.; p. 50 b. c. — HORTENSIA, daughter of the above, who inherited his eloquence. When the Roman women were required to render on oath an account of their property, she pleaded the cause of her sex with such force that the decree was annulled.

HOUBIGANT, Charles Francis, hoo'-be-gong, an eminent Hebrew scholar, a priest of the Oratory, and professor of philosophy at Soissons. He became deaf after his removal to Paris, and unable to perform his duties as a preacher and public lecturer. Turning his attention to Hebrew literature, he produced at Paris, in 1753, in 4 vols. folio, his "Biblia Hebraica cum Notis Criticis," in which the Hebrew text and a Latin version of it are printed in parallel columns. n. at Paris, 1836; p. 1783.

HOUBRAKEN, Arnold, hoo'-brak-en, a famous Dutch painter, who wrote a trustworthy account of the lives of the Dutch painters of eminence, which was illustrated with portraits engraved by his son. n. at Dort, 1660; p. 1719. — His son, Jacob, was an excellent engraver. He engraved some of the plates in a work called "Heads of the Illustrious Persons of Great Britain," published 1748. n. 1698; p. 1780.

HOUGHARD, Jean Nicolas, hoo'-shar', a French republican soldier, who, from being at first a private in a regiment of cavalry, rapidly arrived at the rank of general, and displayed great boldness and activity in repeated engagements when opposed to the Prussians on the Rhine, and afterwards against the English and their allies before Dunkirk, &c. But neither his bravery nor his successes could save him from the guillotine; for having been denounced by his colleague, General Hoche, as a conspirator against the republic, he was arrested, and shortly after executed, 1793; n. 1740.

HOUDON, hoo'-dawn, a celebrated French sculptor, who, after studying in Italy, returned to Paris, and executed the busts of Voltaire, Rousseau, Molière, Franklin, Buffon, Diderot, Catherine II., &c. He became, in 1777, member and professor of the Academy of Fine Arts, and was invited to Philadelphia to carve a statue of Washington. n. at Versailles, 1741; n. at Paris, 1828.

HOUGH, John, huf, an English prelate, memorable for the noble stand he made against the arbitrary conduct of James II., was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; became chaplain to the duke of Ormond; and, in 1685, was made a prebendary of Worcester. In 1687, the presidency of Magdalen College becoming vacant, the king sent mandatory letters to the fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, who did not belong to that society, and was a man of doubtful character. The fellows upon this, seeing their privileges attacked, applied by petition for leave to proceed to a free election, according to their statutes. No answer being returned, they chose Mr. Hough, who was confirmed by the visitor, the Bishop of Winchester; and the new president having taken his doctor's degree, was installed. The king, instead of letting the matter rest, now thought proper to send another mandate, ordering the Society to elect Dr. Parker, bishop of Oxford, for their president; which they refused, and were all expelled except two. Thus the business stood till September, 1688, when James, finding that his affairs grew desperate, became alarmed, and commissioned the bishop of Winchester to settle the society of Magdalen College regularly and statutely. Dr. Hough and the fellows were accordingly restored; and in 1690 he was made bishop of Oxford, from whence he was removed to Lichfield, and next to Worcester, where he died, honoured for his patriotism, piety, and munificence. n. 1651; p. 1743.

HOUGHON, Richard Monckton Milnes, Lord, hoo'-ton, a poet of some note, who sat for Ponthract from 1837 to 1863, when he was raised to the peerage. His principal works are "Memorials of a Tour in Greece," "Palm Leaves," and the "Flight of Time," n. 1800.

HOUSSAYE, Arsène, hous-sâ', a modern French littérateur, who went to Paris early in life, to push his fortunes as an author. He began his career in 1836, with the publication of two romances. His essays in art criticism, and especially his writings illustrative of the biographical history of the regency, attracted the notice of the reading public towards him. During the revolution of 1848, he presented himself as a candidate for the suffrages of his native province, but was beaten by M. Odillon Barrot. Through the influence of Mdlle.

RACHEL, he was made manager of the Comédie Française in 1849, and succeeded in restoring that theatre to a most prosperous condition, producing more than a hundred new works by the best French playwrights. After the coup-d'état of 1851, he wrote the cantata for Mdlle. Rachel, entitled "L'Empire c'est la paix." On the death of his wife, in 1856, he resigned the appointment. His literary performances include romances, plays, poems, essays, and criticisms; many of them displaying his strong predilection for the age of Louis XV., while all are characterized by refinement, grace, and lively wit. b. at Bruyères, near Laon, 1815.

HOUSTON, Samuel, hou'-ton, an American general, who began life in a merchant's office, but, incited by a love of adventure, went to reside among the Indians, with whom he stayed five years. Returning to his native state, he founded a school on the borders of the prairie for the children of the red men. In the war against the English in 1813, he served with much distinction under General Jackson, and was severely wounded at the Horse-shoe Falls. Subsequently General Jackson employed him to negotiate a treaty with his former hosts, the Red Indians. After having brought this mission to a successful termination, he resolved to proceed to Nashville to study the law; and soon afterwards obtained considerable practice by his great abilities in his new profession. In 1821 he was appointed major-general of the militia of the state of Tennessee. On the breaking out of the war with Mexico, he was named general-in-chief, and at the battle of Saint Jacinto, he, with 700 men, took or killed the 1800 soldiers of Santa Anna, who was himself among the prisoners. The inhabitants of Texas, out of admiration for his bravery, appointed him president of the new republic they founded after gaining their independence from Mexico; and on the incorporation of Texas with the other states of the Union, General Houston became a member of Congress, b. at Rockbridge, Virginia, 1793; d. 1863.

HOVDEN, Roger de, hou'-den, an English historian in the reign of Henry II., who is said to have been an ecclesiastic and lawyer, two professions then commonly united. His "Annals of English History from 731 to 1202" were printed at London in 1595, and at Frankfort in 1601, and, lately, in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. Lived towards the end of the 12th century.

HOWARD, Sir Edward, hou'-ard, a naval commander, who entered early the maritime service, and, about 1494, was knighted. In 1512 he was sent as lord high admiral of England with a large fleet against France, the coasts of which he ravaged. He also defeated the enemy's fleet off Brest; but, the year following, was slain in boarding the French admiral's ship, and his body thrown into the sea. d. 1513.

HOWARD, Thomas, earl of Surrey and duke of Norfolk. (See SURREY, Thomas Howard, earl of).

HOWARD, Henry, earl of Surrey. (See SURREY, Henry Howard, earl of).

HOWARD, Catherine, fifth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of Edmund Howard, third son of the second duke of Norfolk. She was married, in 1540, to the king; but, two years afterwards, Henry sent her to the scaffold, under pretext of unfaithfulness. b. about 1520.

Howard

HOWARD, Charles, Lord Howard of Effingham, lord high admiral of England, and commander, in 1589, of the fleet which destroyed the invincible Armada. In 1596, he, with the earl of Essex, burnt a second Spanish fleet in the harbour of Cadiz, for which he was created earl of Nottingham. When the earl of Essex made his attempt at rebellion, he was appointed to command the army which acted against and defeated him, under the title of lieutenant-general of England. After Queen Elizabeth's death, he still continued to enjoy the most distinguished posts under her successor, James I., discharging every duty with a singular ability and honourable zeal. b. 1536; d. 1624.

HOWARD, Thomas, earl of Arundel, a distinguished patron of the arts, was earl-marshal in the beginning of the reign of Charles I., by whom, as well as by king James, Howard was employed in various foreign embassies. He is principally known, however, by the efforts he made, at immense trouble, to collect in Greece and Italy all the remains of antiquity that could be procured. In this way he collected a splendid museum, a portion of which was, about 1668, presented to the university of Oxford by Henry, sixth duke of Norfolk, and is now known, with other curiosities, as the Arundelian marbles. b. 1538; d. at Padua, 1646.

HOWARD, Sir Robert, an English poet and historian, the son of Thomas, earl of Berkshire, was a zealous friend of the revolution of 1688. He wrote several plays, the "History of the Reigns of Edward and Richard II.," the "History of Religion," &c. d. 1693.

HOWARD, John, an eminent philanthropic English gentleman, was the son of a tradesman in London, who died while he was an infant, leaving him in the hands of guardians, by whom he was apprenticed to a grocer. His constitution, however, being delicate, and having an aversion to trade, he purchased his indentures from his master, and went abroad. On his return he lodged with a widow lady at Stoke Newington, who attended him with such care in his illness, that he conceived an affection for her, though she was twenty-seven years older than himself, and they were married; but Mrs. Howard died about three years afterwards. In 1756 he embarked for Lisbon, intending to aid the sufferers by the great earthquake, but, on the passage, the ship was taken and carried to France. On his release he went to Italy, and at his return settled in Hampshire. In 1758 he married a second wife; but she died in childhood in 1763, leaving him one son. He was at this time resident at Cardington, near Bedford, where he purchased an estate. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, which, as he declared, "brought the distress of the prisoners more immediately under his notice," and led him to form the design of visiting the gaols through England, in order to devise means for alleviating the miseries of the sufferers. In 1774 he was examined before the House of Commons on the subject of the prison regulations, and received the thanks of the House. He then extended his benevolent views to foreign countries, making excursions to all parts of Europe. In 1777 he published the "State of Prisons in England and Wales, with Preliminary Observations, and an Account of some Foreign Prisons." In 1790 he published an appendix to it, with and account of his travels in Italy; and in 1784 an new edition appeared, with considerable additions. About this time some admirers of Mr. Howard opened a subscription for erecting a statue in his honour, but at his request the design was dropped. In 1780 he published an "Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe." In this work he signified his intention of visiting Russia, Turkey, and of extending his route into the East. "I am not insensible," he said, "of the dangers that must attend such a journey. Should it please God to cut off my life in the prosecution of this design, let not my conduct be uncandidly imputed to rashness or enthusiasm, but to a serious, deliberate conviction that I am pursuing the path of duty; and to the sincere desire of being made an instrument of more extensive usefulness to my fellow-creatures, than could be expected in the narrower circle of a retired life." He fell a sacrifice to his humanity; for, visiting a sick patient in the Crimea, who had a malignant fever, he caught the infection. A statue of Mr. Howard, erected by public subscription, was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, with an inscription. n. about 1726; p. 1790.

HOWARD, Lieut. Edward, R.N., the scion of an ancient and opulent family, was one of the earliest and best of the naval school of novelists. With all the graphic power and stirring eloquence of other writers of that class, he was wholly free from their too frequent coarseness. "Rattlin the Reefer," "Outward Bound," the "Old Commodore," and "Jack Ashore," attest his powers as a novelist; while his "Life of Sir Henry Morgan, the Buccaneer," gave promise of even higher excellence. p. 1842.

HOWARD, Henry, J.A., professor of painting in the Royal Academy, after receiving some tuition from Reinagle, became a student of the Royal Academy in 1788, displaying great talent as a draughtsman, and carrying off the highest honours of the school of art in which he was being educated. In 1791 he went to Italy, and studied at Rome with Flaxman. On his return to England, he was extensively employed to illustrate books with steel plates, and, at the same time, he continued to send to the exhibitions of the Academy a number of paintings on classical subjects. In 1801 he was elected an associate, and, in 1803, an academician, and, subsequently, secretary to the Royal Academy. At the first cartoon competition, in 1843, although seventy-three years of age, he contributed a drawing—"Man beset by Contending Passions," which gained a prize of £100. n. 1769; p. 1847.

HOWDAX, John Hobart Canadoc, second Lord, how'-den, an English diplomatist, in early life served in the army, and was engaged in the battle of Navarino, where he was wounded. He was sent as English commissioner to the siege of Antwerp in 1832, and to the Spanish constitutional army in 1834. In 1847 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Rio Janeiro, to settle the Argentine question. In 1850 he became ambassador to the court of Madrid, and in 1854 major-general. n. at Dublin, 1798.

HOWE, Richard, Earl, hou, a gallant English admiral, entered the naval service at the age of fourteen, and at twenty was appointed to the command of a sloop of war, in which he beat off two large French frigates, after a gallant action; for which he was made a post-captain. After a variety of active service, he obtained the command of the Dunkirk, of 60 guns, with which he captured a French 84 off Newfoundland. In 1757 he served under Admiral Hawke, and, the year following, was appointed commodore of a squadron, with which he destroyed a number of ships and magazines at St. Malo. In 1760 Prince Edward, afterwards duke of York, was put under his care, and the commodore, on the 6th of August, took Cherbourg and destroyed the basin. This was followed by the unfortunate action off St. Cas, where he displayed great courage and humanity in saving the retreating soldiers at the hazard of his own life. The same year, on the death of his brother, he became Lord Howe, and soon afterwards had a great share in the victory over Confans. When Admiral Hawke presented him, on this occasion, to the king, his majesty said, "Your life, my lord, has been one continued series of services to your country." In 1763 he was appointed to the Admiralty board, where he remained till 1765, when he was made treasurer of the navy. In 1770 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean. In the American war he commanded the fleet on that coast. In 1782 he was sent to the relief of Gibraltar, which service he performed in sight of the French and Spanish fleets, which, however, avoided an action, though far superior in numbers. In 1783 he was made first lord of the Admiralty, which office he soon afterwards resigned; but, at the end of the year, he was re-appointed, and continued in that station till 1788, when he was created an English earl. In 1793 he took the command of the channel fleet, and, on June 1, 1794, obtained his splendid and decisive victory over the French fleet. The same month he was visited on board his ship at Spithead by the king and queen, when his majesty presented him with a magnificent sword, a gold chain, and medal. He also received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, the freedom of the city of London, and the applause of the nation. In 1795 he became general of the marines, and, in 1797, was honoured with the garter. n. in London, 1725; p. in London, 1799.

HOWE, Sir William, brother of Admiral Lord Howe, succeeded General Gage in the chief command of the British forces in America, having landed at Boston with Generals Clinton and Burgoyne, in May, 1775. General Howe commanded at the attack on Bunker's Hill, was besieged in Boston during the next winter, evacuated that town in the ensuing spring, and retired to Halifax. In June, 1776, he arrived at Staten Island, where he was joined by his brother, Lord Howe. Here the brothers informed Congress that they had received full powers to grant pardon to all the rebels who should return to their obedience; but the commissioners appointed by that body considered both the form and substance of the propositions too objectionable to deserve attention. In August Howe defeated the Americans on Long Island, and took possession of New York in September. After the campaign of the Jerseys, he set sail from New York and entered Chesapeake Bay. Having previously secured the command of the Schuylkill, he crossed it with his army, and repelled the attack of the Americans at Germantown. In May, 1778, he was succeeded in the command by General Sir Henry Clinton. p. 1814.

HOWITT, William, hou'-it, a clever English littérateur, the son of a member of the Society of Friends, who educated him and his five brothers in the principles of Quakerism. Although he had been sent to several schools kept by Quakers, his education was almost entirely owing to his own perseverance. Up to his twenty-eighth year, when he married and commenced with his wife a career of literature, his time had been spent in acquiring mathematical and scientific knowledge, in studying the classical authors, and in mastering the German, French, and Italian tongues. His studies were varied by rambles in the country, shooting, and fishing; and these again led him to obtain an amount of information relative to English rural life and nature, which was afterwards reproduced in his works. The lady who became his wife was, like himself, a member of the Society of Friends, and strongly imbued with literary tastes. In 1823, the first year of their marriage, they published together a volume of poems, entitled, "The Forest Minstrel," and followed it up by contributions to the "Amulet," "Literary Souvenir," and other annuals then in vogue. These contributions, with some original pieces, were collected and published in 1827, under the title of "The Desolation of Eyam," &c. The "Book of the Seasons," "Popular History of Priestcraft," "Tales of the Pantlik; or, Traditions of the most Ancient Times," "Rural Life of England," "Colonization and Christianity," and several other works, were produced by him during the ten following years. In 1839 and succeeding year, he wrote his "Boy's Country Book," and "Visits to Remarkable Places." In 1840 he went to Germany for the purpose of educating his children, and his sojourn there led to the production of the "Rural and Domestic Life of Germany," "German Experiences," &c. In 1847 and the four following years he published his "Homes and Haunts of the most eminent English Poets," "The Hall and Hamlet; or, Scenes and Characters of Country Life," "The Year-Book of the Country," and a novel, "Madame Dorrington of the Dene." In 1846 he contributed to the "People's Journal," and afterwards became part proprietor of it; but a quarrel between himself and his partner led him to establish a rival publication—"Howitt's Journal" which, however, like its predecessor, was subsequently unsuccessful. In 1852 he, with his two sons and Mr. R. H. Horne (see HORNE), sailed for Australia, where he, for some time, worked as a "digger." He also visited Tasmania, Sydney, &c., and communicated his observations in a number of letters to the Times newspaper, which he afterwards collected and published with some new matter, under the title of "Land, Labour, and Gold," in 1855. B. at Heanor, Derbyshire, 1793.

HOWITT, Mrs. Mary Botham, an English authoress, wife of the above, came of a family of Quakers, and commenced her literary career, shortly after her marriage, with a volume of poems, called the "Forest Minstrel." After having published several volumes of graceful poetry, and a number of books for the young, she, on visiting Germany with her husband, proceeded to acquire the Swedish and Danish languages, with a view of translating the novels of Miss Bremer and the tales of Hans C. Andersen. The translations of Miss Bremer's works were published between 1844 and 1852; and the "Improvisatore," a reproduction in English of Andersen's novel, in 1857. Besides being an industrious contributor to the periodicals, she wrote a volume of "Ballads and other Poems," "Sketches of Natural History in Verse," two novels, called, "The Heir of West-Wayland," and "Wood Leighton," and translated "Ennemoser's History of Magic" for Bohn's Scientific Library. The valuable work entitled "Literature and Romance of Northern Europe," published as the joint production of herself and husband, is almost entirely her work. B. at Uttoxeter, Staffordshire, about 1804.

HOWLEY, William, archbishop of Canterbury, was educated at Winchester School, where he had for his teacher Dr. Warton, and for a class-fellow William Lisle Bowles, the poet; and after distinguishing himself by the elegance of his academic exercises, he proceeded, in 1783, to New College, Oxford, passing through the various grades of the university with honour and success, till, in 1809, he was appointed regius professor of divinity. This closed his academic career. In 1813 he was nominated bishop of London; and in 1823 translated to the primacy, the onerous duties of which he discharged with zeal and fidelity for twenty years. He seldom took part in the secular discussions in the House of Lords. When bishop of London he supported the bill of pains and penalties against queen Caroline, laying it down with much emphasis that the king could do no wrong either morally or politically; and, as archbishop of Canterbury, he vehemently opposed the catholic emancipation bill, in 1829, as dangerous to the church; and the reform bill, in 1831, as no less dangerous to the constitution. B. at Ropley rectory, Hampshire, 1765; D. 1843.

HUARTE, John, hoo-ar-tai, a Spanish philosopher, who, in 1578, published a work which excited considerable interest at the time: it was entitled "A Trial of Wits; or, a Treatise on the different Kinds of Genius among Men, with Rules and Directions showing to what Kind of Study any Person is best adapted." This book has been translated into English, French, and German, and has been condemned at Rome. B. in Navarre, about 1530; D. about 1600.

HUBER, John, hoo'-bair, a Swiss draughtsman and naturalist, who was eminent for his talent in cutting portraits out of paper. He painted several pictures illustrating incidents in the private life of Voltaire, with whom he lived in intimate terms during twenty years. He wrote a clever work, entitled "Observations on the Flight of Birds of Prey," which was published at Geneva in 1784. B. at Geneva, 1722; D. 1790.

HUBER, Francis, a distinguished naturalist, son of the preceding, by whom he was taught to observe nature from his earliest years, and he studied with exemplary patience and success the habits of bees. While young, he lost his sight, but nevertheless continued to prosecute his studies with ardour, chiefly through the aid of Francis Burnens, his servant, and his wife, Aimée Lullin. In 1792 he published his discoveries, under the title of "New Observations on Bees," which were conveyed under the form of a series of letters to Charles Bonnet. He published a second and enlarged edition of the same in 1814. B. at Geneva, 1750; D. at Lausanne, 1830.

sive in Italy, and on his return attracted the notice of Prince Metternich, who appointed him to an important position in his cabinet. In 1837, he served on the staff of the Austrian ambassador at Paris, but was recalled soon after; and in 1841, on the resumption of diplomatic relations between Portugal and Austria, he was dispatched as secretary of embassy to Lisbon, a post he vacated, to assume that of Austrian consul-general at Leipzig, in 1844. When the Italian revolution of 1848 broke out, he was acting as secretary to the viceroy of Lombardy, was made prisoner by the Italians, and retained as a hostage for several months but was subsequently released; whereupon he retired into private life. When Prince Schwartzburg had made head against the Italian and Viennese insurgents, he was recalled, and intrusted with the issuing of proclamations and imperial manifestoes to the populations of Austria and Italy. In 1849, he became Austrian minister plenipotentiary to the French republic, a post he retained for several years. In 1856, he was one of the plenipotentiaries of the belligerent powers who signed the treaty of Paris. B. at Vienna, 1811.

HUC, Abbé, hoo'k, a French missionary priest, who, after being ordained, embarked, in 1839, for China. After a voyage of five months, he arrived at Macao, and entered upon the functions of a former missionary, who had been put to death. For five years he travelled throughout China and Tartary, and at length took up a residence in a Buddhist monastery, to study the language and literature of Buddhism. Commanded by the emperor of China to return, he travelled back to Macao, and embarked there, in 1852, for France, but stopped at Ceylon, whence he wandered through India, Egypt, and Palestine. On his return to France, at the beginning of 1853, he collated and arranged his notes of travel, and published "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith in China;" "Travels in Tartary, Thibet and China;" "The Chinese Empire and Christianity in China;" all of which became very popular, and were translated into most of the European languages. Several of his works have been reproduced in an English form, and have attracted considerable attention. B. at Toulouse, 1813.

HUDSON, Henry, hoo'-son, an English navigator, and discoverer of the Arctic strait called after him. He made several voyages to seek the north-west passage to India and China; in the last attempt he discovered the bay now known as Hudson's Bay, where he wintered; but, on his passage home, some of his crew mutinied, and forced him, his son, and others, into a boat, which was never afterwards heard of. B. about the middle of the 16th century; D. about 1611.

HUDSON, Thomas, a popular English portrait-painter, the predecessor and master of Sir Joshua Reynolds. His greatest work is the portrait of Charles, duke of Marlborough, at Blenheim. His portrait of Handel, hanging in the gallery at Oxford, is said to be the only one the great musician ever sat for. He acquired a large fortune by the practice of his art, and retired to Twickenham, when his former pupil, Sir Joshua Reynolds, became the great English portrait-painter. B. in Devonshire, 1701; D. 1779.

brun, a Jesuit, and Greek and Hebrew under Bochart, whom he accompanied in 1652 to the court of Christina, queen of Sweden, who wished to engage him in her service; but he declined the honour, and returned to France. In 1661 he published an excellent work on the art of translation, entitled, "De Interpretatione." In 1679 appeared his "Demonstratio Evangelica," which was greatly admired. His reputation became so great, that the place of sub-preceptor to the dauphin was conferred on him, and he had for his colleague the illustrious Bossuet. In 1681 he published his valuable edition of the works of Origen. He formed the plan of publishing editions of the classics which are now known by the title, "In usum Delphini," and spent twenty years in carrying out the project. In 1688 he printed his "Censures on the Cartesian Philosophy," a system to which he had been zealously attached, but the fallacy of which he now exposed. Huet, considering the number and excellence of his works, may be considered as one of the most learned men that any age has produced. His "Origin of Romances," "The Situation of the Terrestrial Paradise," and "Weakness of Human Understanding," have been translated into English. B. at Caen, 1630; D. 1721.

HUFELAND, Christopher William, hoo'-fo-land, an eminent German physician, pursued his profession at Weimar, and became, in 1793, professor in the university of Jena. In 1801 he was appointed physician to the king of Prussia, in 1809 professor of medicine in the university of Berlin, and finally director of the academy of military medicine and surgery in 1819. His celebrated work, "The Art of Prolonging Life," was published in 1799; his "Counsels to Mothers on Physical Education," in 1800; and his "History of Health," in 1812. He was among the first continental physicians to recognise the truth of animal magnetism. B. at Erfurt, 1762; D. at Berlin, 1830.

HUFNAGEL, George, hoo'-na-gel, a Flemish painter, extensively employed by several German princes. His reputation recommended him to the emperor Rodolphus, for whom he executed four admirable books representing quadrupeds, birds, insects, and fishes. He also wrote some poems in Latin and German. B. at Antwerp, 1545; D. 1600.

HUGH CAREW. (See CAREW.)

HUGHES, John, hoes, an English poet, whose first work was "An Ode on the Peace of Ryswick," 1697, which was well received, and introduced him to the acquaintance of several men of letters. In 1717 he was appointed, by Lord Chancellor Cowper, secretary to the commissions of the peace. His last literary piece was the tragedy of "The Siege of Damascus;" but he expired on the first night of its performance, Feb. 17, 1720. B. at Marlborough, Wilts, 1677.

HUGHES, Thomas, a barrister, educated at Rugby and Oriel College, Oxford, and called to the bar in 1843. He is the author of "Tom Brown," one of the best books that could be put into a school-boy's hands. He was returned for Lambeth in 1865, and for Frome in 1868. B. at Donnington Priory, Berks, 1823.

HUGO, Victor-Marie, Viscount, hoo'-go, a celebrated French poet, dramatist, and novelist. The son of a distinguished French general of the imperial army, his early years were spent with his father in the isle of Elba, Italy, Rome, and Naples. Returning to Paris in 1809, he being then eight years old, his education was, for the first time, attended to; but being sent for from Spain by his father, he entered into a seminary for nobles in that land, whose bright skies helped to develop his poetical genius, and, at ten years of age, he commenced writing verses. In 1813 he became a student at an institution in France, to be prepared for the École Polytechnique. While studying mathematics, poetry was not neglected by him; and in 1817, having previously composed a short poem, he completed a tragedy called "Istamine," written after the classic model. Between the years 1819-22 he three times carried off the poetry prizes of the Académie des Jeux Floraux, at Toulouse. These three odes first attracted public attention to him; the appearance of Lamartine's "Méditations" quickened his poetical genius into the production of a volume of "Odes and Ballads," which, given to the world in 1822, stamped his reputation permanently as a genuine poet. His next publication was "Hans of Iceland." A second edition of the "Odes and Ballads" appeared in 1823. Hitherto he had composed after the manner of Racine and the classical school; but in 1827 he produced "Cromwell," a play, not written so much for the stage as to combat the principles of the classic school of dramatists. His magnificent collection of lyrics, entitled, "Les Orientales," was brought out in 1823. "Marion Delorme" and "Ernani" were his two next works for the theatre, both written in the "romantic" manner; as also were his "Lucretia Borgia," "Mary Tudor," "Esmeralda," and "Ruy Blas." His best romance, "Notre Dame de Paris," was published in 1831, and his finest set of lyrics, "Autumn Leaves," in 1832. In 1845 he was created a peer of France by Louis Philippe. Returned by the city of Paris, after the revolution of 1848, to the Assemblée Nationale, he took his seat among the extreme democrats, one of whose chief orators he became. On the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was among the first individuals to be expelled from France, and went to reside in the island of Jersey, where he never ceased to compose burning philippics in prose and verse against Napoleon III. "Napoleon the Little" and "Les Châtiments" being the best-known of these. In 1856 he was compelled to leave Jersey, and went to reside in Guernsey, where he wrote another poetical work, "Contemplations;" and in 1863 published "Les Misérables," a social romance. In 1864 he produced a work on the life and writings of Shakespeare; in 1865, "Chansons des Rues et des Bois"; in 1866, a romance called "The Toilers of the Sea"; and, in 1869, an historical novel, the scene of which is laid chiefly in England, entitled, "By Order of the King." b. 1802.

Hugo, François Victor, a French littérateur, son of the above, who, after completing his education at the University of Paris, became a writer of political articles for the French papers; he afterwards assisted his father in editing a democratic journal, which the latter had established in 1843. He was sent out of France with his father, on the coup d'état of 1851, and went to reside with him in Jersey, and afterwards in Guernsey, where he occupied himself with historical research. He published "The Island of Jersey, its Monuments and its History," in 1857; but his best work is a fine French translation of "Shakespeare's Sonnets," which he brought out with an introduction in 1857. In 1862, after the appearance of his father's "Les Misérables," he prepared a dramatised version of the work, the representation of which in France was forbidden. b. at Paris, 1829.

HUMBERT, Joseph Amable, hoom'-bair, a French revolutionary general, who owed his rise to his fine person, bravery, and bold demeanour. After having received some little education, he became a strolling workman, and afterwards a hawker of rabbit-skins; but, entering the revolutionary army in 1792, he rapidly rose to the position of colonel. In 1793 he was made a general of brigade, and served in that capacity against the insurgents of La Vendée. He was with General Hoche when he attempted to invade Ireland in 1796; but when that expedition was disorganized by a violent storm, he returned to France. In 1798 he was again sent to Ireland at the head of 1500 men. He landed at Killala, of which he took possession. General Lake marched against him three days afterwards, with a very superior force, but which was mainly composed of yeomanry and militia. Lake was beaten at Castlebar, and Humbert sought to raise the country in behalf of the French, but met with little success. In a short time the advanced guard of Lord Cornwallis met and defeated him, taking himself and whole force prisoners. He returned to France in 1799, and was sent to St. Domingo a few years afterwards under General Leclerc, with whose widow he returned to France in 1804. Bonaparte was so enraged at this act, that he ordered him to leave Paris, and threatened more severe measures. He fled to America, and led an adventurous life in the Spanish settlements. b. at Rouvray, 1767; d. at New Orleans, 1823.

HUMBOLDT, Frederick Henry Alexander, Baron von, hoom'-boldt, a distinguished German philosopher and traveller, was the son of a wealthy soldier who had served under Frederick the Great of Prussia. Having previously received an excellent rudimentary education at home, he was sent with his elder brother, in 1786, to the university of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, to study the natural sciences. In 1793 he quitted Frankfort for Göttingen, at which Heyne, the great classical scholar (see HEYNE), was then a professor. Heyne's son-in-law, George Forster, had accompanied Captain Cook in his discoveries in the South Seas, and his glowing descriptions of those regions made a deep impression on the young man's mind. In 1790 Humboldt accompanied Forster in a tour through the Rhine districts and Holland, and afterwards visited England with him. His scientific observations made in Germany were afterwards published in 1790, under the title of "Mineralogical Considerations on Certain Basaltic Formations on the Rhine." His intention being to seek employment in the civil service of the Prussian kingdom, he subsequently went to Hamburg to study book-keeping and the other forms of commercial knowledge, and afterwards studied in the mining academy of the eminent Werner, at Freiberg. In 1792 he obtained the post of mining superintendent in the works at Baireuth, in which situation he remained till the year 1795, during which time he wrote many scientific articles for the German periodicals, and published a botanical work in Latin, called "Specimens of the Flora of Freiberg." Soon after the production of this work he resigned his post as mining superintendent, having determined to explore those parts of the world which had been left unvisited by travellers. "I had, from my earliest youth," he says, "felt a burning desire to travel in distant lands unexplored by Europeans." The disturbed state of the continent at the time, owing to the wars consequent on the French revolution, prevented him from executing his design for about two years, during which time he resided at Jena, and became acquainted with Göthe and Schiller, and occupied himself with the composition and publication of "Investigations on the Muscles and Nerve-fibres, with Conjectures on the Chemical Process of Life," and "On Subterranean Gases;" two small works which established his reputation as a natural philosopher. A short visit to Italy was made in 1799, and, in the same year, he went to Paris, with the view of accompanying the expedition about to be despatched from that capital to Egypt. The expedition was abandoned; but Humboldt made the acquaintance of Bonpland, who was to have been the naturalist of the journey, and the two learned men resolved to undertake a great enterprise together. Their first idea was to explore Northern Africa; but, being prevented by the English cruisers in the Mediterranean, they landed in Spain, and obtained permission from the government to travel in the Spanish possessions of South America. In the month of May, 1799, the two travellers embarked at Corunna, and, eluding the English cruisers watching the port, reached Teneriffe, where they ascended the peak and collected some valuable scientific data. Going on board their vessel again, they sailed for Cumana, in South America, which was reached in July. Humboldt and his companion now proceeded to explore the great South American continent, and to collect a body of scientific information, during five years of adventurous research, theretofore unparalleled. For 65 days, Humboldt navigated, in an Indian canoe, the Orinoco, the Rio Negro, and the Atrabapo, discovering the connexion between the Orinoco and the Amazon. The botany, mineralogy, geology, the physical aspects of the country, and the habits of the natives, were all observed and noted during this great journey. He now returned to the coast and embarked for Havannah, where he sojourned for some time. Returning to South America in 1801, he travelled southward till he reached Lima, crossing the Cordilleras and Andes five times during the journey. In June, 1802, he ascended Chimborazo to an elevation of 19,300 feet, the highest point of the mountain ever attained by a human being. In December, 1802, he embarked for Guayaquil, and in the April following reached Mexico, in exploring which and the adjoining countries he spent a year. Wishing to complete his scientific observations of the island of Cuba, he once more set sail for Havannah, in 1804. A visit to the United States, and a short stay in Washington and Philadelphia succeeded, after which he quitted America for France, and arrived at Bordeaux in August, 1804. He spent nine months in Paris arranging his notes, and assisting Gay-Lussac (see GAY-LUSSAC) in making experiments relative to the chemical composition of the atmosphere. After spending a short time in Italy and at Berlin, where he obtained permission from the king to take up his residence in the French capital while his works were being printed, he returned to Paris. In 1807 appeared the first of a large number of volumes, all published under the general title of "Travels of Humboldt and Bonpland in the Interior of America between the years 1799-1804." In this magnificent undertaking, composed partly in Latin, partly in French, he was assisted by Oltmans for the astronomical, Arago and Gay-Lussac for the chemical and meteorological, Cuvier for the zoological, and Klaproth for the mineralogical divisions. It was mainly divided into six great sections, which again were subdivided into many more, the botanical portion alone consisting of twenty volumes, embellished with 1200 plates. He spent a portion of the years 1827-28 at Berlin, whither he had been invited by the king of Prussia; in 1829 he, at the express desire, and at the sole expense, of the emperor Nicholas, set out with Rose and Ehrenberg to explore the eastern provinces of Russia, and in nine months travelled, between St. Petersburg and the Chinese frontier, over a distance of 2320 geographical miles. The results of this expedition were published by him at Paris in 1843, under the title of "Central Asia; Researches on its Mountain-chains and Climatology." Between the years 1830 and 1848, although he desired to keep aloof from politics, he was intrusted by the king of Prussia with several diplomatic missions to the court of Louis Philippe. In 1843 he went to reside near the king of Prussia, whose court he ornamented till his death. In 1845 he commenced his great work, "Kosmos, or a Physical Description of the Universe," which was concluded in 1851, and which has become exceedingly popular in an English translation. He was a member of almost every scientific body in the world; an associate of the Academy of Sciences of Paris and Berlin; was decorated with many orders, and was a grand officer of the French Legion of Honour. By the labours of his long and valuable life he earned the title of creator of the science of comparative geography, and reviver of the study of the natural sciences. In addition to those already quoted, the titles of a few of his most important works may be given: "Essay on the Chemical Analysis of the Atmosphere;" "Pictures of Nature;" "Essay on Electrical Fishes;" "Essay on the Geography of Plants;" "Causes of the Difference in Temperature of various Portions of the Earth's Surface;" "Fragments of Asiatic Geology and Climatology;" and "The Progress of Nautical Astronomy during the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries." B. at Berlin, September, 1769; d. 1859.

HUMBOLDT, Charles William, Baron von, a distinguished philologist, classical critic, and diplomatist, was elder brother of the above; with whom he pursued an educational career at the universities of Göttingen and Jena. When very young, he wrote many essays on the Greek poets and philosophers; but his first work of consequence was a critical essay on Göthe's "Hermann and Dorothea." In 1802 he was nominated to the post of minister plenipotentiary to Rome; resigning this in 1803, he became head of the department of public instruction, which he quitted to retire into private life, two years afterwards. In 1812 he became Prussian ambassador at the court of Vienna; represented his country at the conference of Prague, in 1813; and signed, with Hardenberg (see HARDENBERG), the treaty of Paris. In 1819 he was recalled from England, where he was ambassador, to Berlin, to assume the functions of minister and privy councillor; but not agreeing with his sovereign as to his retrograde policy, he tendered his resignation, and once more sought a retired life. He now occupied himself with the study of classical and semi-civilized languages and comparative grammar, varying these pursuits with critical essays on poetry, philosophy, and the fine arts. He published a small number of poems, but, on the advice of Schiller, he abandoned creative for critical authorship, for which his mind was more fitted. He wrote critical essays on Sanscrit poetry, and on Wolf's edition of Homer's "Odyssey," published "An Examination of the Basque Language," and a treatise on the Celts and Iberians; besides a very large number of smaller works on classical literature and on speculative physiology. The latter years of his life were occupied with the study of the Malay and American languages; but failing health caused him to abandon the American in order that he might conclude his researches in the Malay tongue. At his death, in 1836, he had almost completed his task, and his work was afterwards published by Dr. Buschmann, in 1836. B. at Potsdam, 1867.

HUME, David, hume, a celebrated English historian and philosophical writer, was destined for the law, but having little inclination for that profession, he tried mercantile pursuits, and became, in 1731, clerk in an eminent house at Bristol. But he did not continue long in that situation; for, having a strong propensity to literature, he went to France, where he wrote his "Treatise on Human Nature," which he published at London, in 1733. This metaphysical work, however, met with an indifferent reception; nor were his "Moral Essays," which appeared in 1742, more successful. About this time he resided with the marquis of Annandale as a companion, but soon afterwards became secretary to General Sinclair, whom he attended to Vienna and Turin; and while he was abroad, his "Enquiry concerning the Human Understanding" was published at London. In 1752 appeared his "Political Discourses," and his "Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals," the latter of which he accounted the best of his writings. In 1754 he published the first volume of the "History of England, from the Accession of James I. to the Revolution." This volume was poorly received; but the second, which came out in 1756, met with a better fate, and "helped," as the author said, "to buoy up its unfortunate brother." About the same period he published his "Natural History of Religion," which was smartly answered by Dr. Warburton, in a pamphlet which Mr. Hume attributed to Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Hurd. In 1759 appeared his "History of the House of Tudor," and in 1761, the more ancient part of the English history. The work had now acquired considerable celebrity, and the writer gained largely by its popularity; for, besides the profit it brought him, he obtained a pension through Lord Bute. In 1763 he accompanied the earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, where, in 1765, he remained as chargé d'affaires. The year following he returned home, and became under-secretary of state to Mr. Conway. In 1769 he retired to his native country on a small, but to a man of his frugal habits, independent income. After his death appeared a work by him, entitled "Dialogues concerning Natural Religion." His History, although written in an excellent style, is not to be relied on, by reason of its partiality and inaccuracy. He left a charmingly-written HUME, James Deacon, a commercial statistician, and writer on financial and commercial questions, and compiler of the Customs-statute Code, after receiving his education at Westminster School, obtained, in 1780, a clerkship in the custom-house, and displayed so much zeal and talent that, although very young for the post, he was appointed to a responsible office in the department. On his marriage, in 1788, he rented a large piece of land at Pinner, near Harrow, where he set up as a scientific farmer, on a very extensive scale. He continued to fulfil his custom-house duties, and in 1823 was induced by the government to abandon his farm and take up his residence in London, where he was employed in the preparation of reports on the revenue. Up to this period the customs legislation consisted of 1500 different statutes, mostly contradictory—an "intricate and labyrinthian chaos," as it was termed. He was requested to reduce this confused mass into one harmonious and intelligible code, a task he performed after three years of the most unremitting labour. The ministry of that day, fully alive to the importance of his task, rewarded him, on its completion, with a sum of £5000, in addition to the salary of his office in the custom-house. In 1829 he was appointed joint assistant-secretary of the Board of Trade; but in the year 1840, after he had passed 49 years of the most untiring and zealous service in the commercial department of the government of his country, he was allowed to retire on the full salary of his office. He still, however, continued to give valuable evidence on revenue questions in committees of the House of Commons. In 1843 his constitution, worn out by hard work, gave signs of breaking up; an apoplectic stupor ensued, and he was carried off. B. at Newington, 1774; D. 1842.

HUME, Joseph, a distinguished financial reformer and politician, was the son of a poor widow who kept a shop in Montrose, her husband, the master of a small coasting vessel, having died while Joseph was quite young. In his 14th year he was apprenticed to a surgeon, and having obtained a medical diploma from the university of Edinburgh, and passed at the Royal College of Surgeons in London, he received an appointment as surgeon to an East-Indian man in 1797. After a short residence in India he mastered several native languages, and became successively Persian interpreter, paymaster, and postmaster to Lord Lake's army operating against the Mahrattas. He laboured so energetically and successfully in his various employments that he was enabled to return to England in 1811, still a young man, with a fortune of about £30,000. Having travelled in Spain, Turkey, Greece, and Egypt, he was, in 1812, elected an M.P. for Melcombe Regis; but on the dissolution of Parliament, soon after, he was not returned again. Upon this he turned his attention to the establishment of savings-banks, schools on the Lancasterian principle, and other schemes of social amelioration and utility. He was returned to Parliament again in 1818 for the Montrose burghs, which he represented till 1830, in which year he was returned for Middlesex. He lost this seat in 1837: but, through the influence of Mr. O'Connell, was chosen by the electors of Kilkenny to be their representative in Parliament. In 1842 his old constituents of the Montrose burghs returned him to the House of Commons, and he sat for his native place till his death. During his Parliamentary career he energetically struggled for financial reform, advocated the reduction of taxation, and watched the expenditure of the national funds with more perseverance and disinterested industry than any member of the House of Commons before or after his time. Military, naval, ecclesiastical, fiscal reforms were his constant effort. The abolition of military flogging, imprisonment for debt, and numberless other ameliorations, found in him an untiring advocate. In 1835 he greatly assisted in the discovery of a remarkable Orange plot, the object of which was to secure the throne of England for the Duke of Cumberland, instead of giving it to the Princess Victoria, whose education was considered of too liberal a tendency. When his remains were consigned to the tomb, speakers of all shades of political opinion in the House of Commons acknowledged the value of this uncompromising labourer for reform, and enemy of extravagance, privilege, and monopoly. b. at Montrose, 1777; d. at Burnley Hall, Norfolk, 1856.

HUMMEL, John Nepomuk, hoom'-mel, a German composer and pianist, who, displaying great musical talent from his earliest youth, became chapel-master to Count Esterhazy in 1803, and afterwards to the King of Wurtemberg in 1818. He was only excelled in instrumental composition by Beethoven. He composed four operas, two masses, and a large quantity of smaller musical pieces. b. at Presburg, 1778; d. 1837.

HUMPHRY, Ozias, hum'-fre, an eminent miniature painter, first settled at Bath; then went to London, by the advice of his friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and was made a royal academican. In 1780 he proceeded to India, where he was held in high esteem by Sir W. Jones and Warren Hastings, and was chosen one of the first members of the Asiatic Society. b. at Moniton, Devonshire, 1742; d. in London, 1810.

HUNNEBIC, hun'-er-ik, king of the Vandals in Africa, succeeded his father Genserik in 477. He was a violent Arian; and though he at first gave the orthodox Christians toleration, he afterwards commenced a persecution against them, and caused upwards of 40,000 to be put to death in the most cruel manner. d. 484.

HUNYADES, John Corvinus, hun'-ne-a'-dees, voivode of Transylvania, and general of the armies of Ladislaus, king of Hungary, was born in the beginning of the 15th century. He fought against the Turks heroically, and for many years rendered himself so formidable to them, that they surnamed him the Devil. The sultan, Mahomet II., was compelled, in 1456, to retire from the siege of Belgrade, owing to his energetic defence of it. He died in the same year, the acknowledged hero of the Christian cause. n. about 1400.

HUNT, Henry, M.P., huné, was born at Up-haven, Wilts, where he was well known as an opulent farmer, and a regular attendant at the Devizes market. When Mr. Hunt was a young man, he was a decided loyalist; and in 1801, when the whole country was apprehensive of an invasion, he voluntarily tendered his entire stock, worth £20,000, to the government, for its use, if it were needed; besides which he engaged to enter, with three of his servants, all well mounted and equipped, and at his own cost, as volunteers into any regiment of horse that might make the first charge upon the enemy; and for this proffered service he received the thanks of the lord-lieutenant of the county. Mr. Hunt joined the Marlborough troop of cavalry; but owing to some misunderstanding between Lord Bruce, its commander, and himself, he challenged his lordship; for which he was indicted in the Court of King's Bench, found guilty, fined £100, and imprisoned six weeks. Owing to this, or some other cause, Mr. Hunt became a "radical reformer," and was looked up to by many of the party as the fearless champion of their cause. As "lord of the manor of Glastonbury," he acted fairly at his court-leet; and, as a popular orator, obtained much notoriety; but a radical meeting at Manchester, where he presided and declaimed, having been interrupted by the yeomanry, the "Peterloo massacre" was the consequence, which has always been bitterly resented by the people of the district, and by liberal politicians all over the country ever since. Hunt, for his share in this affair, was indicted as the ringleader of an unlawful assembly of the people; tried, found guilty, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in Bchester gaol—a sentence which was condemned by thinking men at the time, and has certainly been reversed by popular opinion since. But, though in confinement, Hunt was not idle; he discovered and made known to the public some flagrant malpractices going on at the gaol, which, through his means, were afterwards corrected. He long tried for a seat in Parliament, but was unsuccessful at Bristol, Westminster, and for the county of Somerset. He was, however, twice elected for Preston, in 1830 and 1831; but, the year after his second return, his constituents declined his further services. He was seized with paralysis while alighting from his phaeton at Alresford, Hants, where he died, Feb. 12, 1835. b. about 1773.

HUNT, James Henry Leigh, an English poet, essayist, and critic, was the son of a West-Indian gentleman, who was resident in America when the war of independence burst forth. Being a staunch royalist, he was compelled to seek refuge in England, where he entered into orders, and afterwards became tutor to Mr. Leigh, nephew to the duke of Chandos. Leigh Hunt was educated with Lamb, Coleridge, and Barnes at Christ's Hospital, London, which he left at fifteen. He had already written verses, which were published under the title of "Juvenilia; or, a Collection of Poems written between the Ages of Twelve and Sixteen." After leaving school, he first became assistant to his brother Stephen, an attorney, and afterwards obtained a clerkship in the War-office. In 1805 his brother John started "The News," and for this paper Leigh wrote reviews of books and theatrical criticisms. These last were composed in a more elegant style than had been the case with such literary performances hitherto; and, in 1807 he edited them, and published the series, under the title of "Critical Essays on the Performers of the London Theatres." A year afterwards, he resigned his situation in the War-office, to undertake the joint editorship of the "Examiner" newspaper, which he and his brother John had established. The bold political strictures of this print caused its proprietors to undergo three government prosecutions. The first was in 1810, for an attack on the regency,

Hunt

This was, however, abandoned; but, next year, the Hunts were again tried by Lord Ellenborough, for alleged seditious sentiments expressed in an article on military flogging. On this occasion, the remarkable defence of Lord (then Mr.) Brougham greatly contributed to their acquittal by the jury. A third article, in which the prince-regent was severely criticised, and called "an Adonis of fifty," led to their being condemned to two years' imprisonment, with a fine of £500 each. This sentence caused Hunt to become very popular, and to receive the sympathy of Byron, Lamb, Keats, Shelley, and Moore. While in prison, he wrote "The Descent of Liberty, a Masque," "The Story of Rimini," and "The Feast of the Poets;" and, on his release, Keats addressed to him his fine sonnet, "Written on the day that Mr. Leigh Hunt left Prison." His next literary labour was "Foliage; or, Poems Original and Translated from the Greek of Homer, Theocritus, &c." In 1813 he commenced a small periodical after the model of Addison's "Spectator," &c., called the "Indicator." In 1823, the "Quarterly Review" attacks on the "cockney school" of poets, to which he belonged, elicited from his pen a satire against Mr. Gifford, its editor, called "Ultra Crepidarius." His fortunes were at this period at a very low ebb, and he was induced to accept the kind invitation of Shelley to go to Italy, where himself and Lord Byron then were. But Shelley meeting his death almost as soon as Hunt had reached Italy, he, for some time, resided with Lord Byron, leaving his house, however, with feelings less friendly than he had entered it. In 1823, after his return to England, he published "Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries, with Recollections of the Author's Life and his Visit to Italy," a book which contained severe criticisms of Lord Byron's personal character, but which, at a later period, Hunt admitted were of too harsh a nature. During the subsequent ten years he edited the "Companion," a sequel to the "Indicator;" wrote "Captain Sword and Captain Pen," contributed to the magazines and reviews, and published a play,—"The Legend of Florence." In addition to these, he superintended the publication of the dramatic works of Wycherley, Farquhar, and Congreve; wrote "The Palfrey, a Love Story of Old Times;" produced a volume of selections, called "One Hundred Romances of Real Life;" and wrote a second novel of a more ambitious nature than the first, under the title of "Sir Ralph Esher; or, Memoirs of a Gentleman of the Court of Charles II." Leading, henceforth, the uneventful life of a studious man of letters, the record of his career is nothing more than a catalogue of the names of his literary productions, with the dates of their publication. Firstly, there are his essays and criticisms on poets and poetry. Of these the chief are "Imagination and Fancy;" "Wit and Humour;" "Men, Women, and Books;" "A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla;" and "A Book for the Corner." Among his genial, chatty, antiquarian sketches, we have "The Town; its Remarkable Characters and Events," and "The Old Court Suburb; or, Memorials of Kensington, Regal, Critical, and Anecdotal." "Stories from the Italian Poets, with Lives," and the dramatic works of Sheridan, were of a similar character with his former editions of Congreve, &c. His last efforts were his Autobiography, in 3 vols., published in 1850, and "The Religion of the Heart; a Manual of Faith and Duty." He became the recipient, in 1847, of a pension of £200 per annum from the crown. b. at Southgate, Middlesex, 1784; d. 1859.—His eldest son, Thornton Hunt, also a literary man of talent, was for many years connected with the newspaper press of London and the provinces. b. 1810.

HUNT, Robert, a scientific writer and lecturer, who was brought up for commercial pursuits, but, urged by an enthusiastic love of science, became an earnest student of natural philosophy, &c., and obtained the appointment of secretary to the Cornwall Polytechnic Institution. His lectures and writings on science, chiefly on geology and mineralogy, recommended him to Sir Henry de la Beche, who obtained for him the post of keeper of the mining records in the Museum of Economic Geology. He wrote an excellent "Manual of Photography," and published some profound researches into the laws and nature of light. One work by him,— "The Poetry of Science," attracted considerable attention; his elementary "Treatise on Physics" is also a popular book. He was one of the most active of the scientific men engaged in the organization of the Great Exhibition of 1851, and wrote an essay on the industrial sciences involved therein. He was formerly professor of mechanical philosophy in the Museum of Economic Geology, but after his resignation of that post, was chiefly engaged in writing on science and delivering lectures on natural philosophy in various parts of the kingdom. b. at Devonport, 1807.

HUNT, William, an eminent English water-colour artist, unrivalled for his transcripts of simple rural life, his healthy, ruddy peasant boys, his rustic interiors, and his bits of still life. His works, both in the exhibitions of the Water-colour Society and in engravings, were among the most popular art-productions of the time. He was elected a member of the Society of Painters in Water-colours in 1827, his previous career as an artist being very obscure. b. 1790; d. 1864.

HUNT, William Holman, a distinguished English artist, and one of the founders of the new school of art generally known as the Pre-Raphaelite. On concluding his studies at the Royal Academy, he exhibited his first picture in 1846, which was called "Hark!" The "Scene from Woodstock," the "Eve of St. Agnes," and a subject from Bulwer Lytton's "Rienzi," were his subsequent works, all being painted after the usual mode; but in 1850 he, with Millais and other young artists, sought to protest against the old conventional style of art, by an earnest and vigorous attempt at founding a new mode of pictorial representation. These young men called themselves the "Pre-Raphaelite Brethren;" and their works inaugurated a new era in art. Hunt's first work in this new style was called "A Converted British Family Sheltering a Christian Minister." "Valentine Rescuing Sylvia from Proteus," and the "Awakened Conscience," were subsequently produced. His last great works are the "Scapegoat," the "Light of the World," the "After-Glow," and the "Festival of St. Swithin." b. 1827.

HUNT, Robert, hunt', an English gentleman, who wrote the famous "Letter on Enthusiasm," which was ascribed to Swift and to Shaftesbury. He was governor of New York and the Jerseys several years, and afterwards of Jamaica. b. 1734.

HUNTER, John, a celebrated English anatomist and surgeon, worked for some time as a cabinet-maker; but solicited his brother William, the celebrated physician, to take him as an assistant, which was granted, and in 1748 he removed to London. The year following he became a student at Chelsea Hospital, where he assiduously studied the rudiments of surgery. He afterwards attended St. Bartholomew's Hospital; and in 1756 was appointed house-surgeon of St. George's Hospital. In the same year he assisted his brother in his school, and acted as demonstrator to his course of lectures. He laboured for 10 years on human anatomy, and not only made himself master of the science as it was then known, but added to it several important discoveries. He also dissected a large number of animals, which laid the foundation of his collection of comparative anatomy. In 1760 he was appointed an army surgeon, and in that capacity went to Belleisle and Portugal. On his return to England, he fixed his residence in London, and taught anatomy and surgery with the highest reputation. In 1767 he was admitted fellow of the Royal Society, and the year following his brother resigned to him his house in Jermyn Street. In 1768 he was chosen one of the surgeons of St. George's Hospital; and in 1768 was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to his majesty. His collection having become extremely large, he took a house in Leicester Square, and erected a building adjoining it for a museum. In 1700 he was appointed inspector-general of hospitals, and surgeon-general of the army. He made more than 10,000 preparations, illustrative of human and comparative anatomy. His contributions to the "Philosophical Transactions" were numerous and interesting. His other works are, a treatise on the "Natural History of the Human Teeth," "Observations on the Animal Economy;" a treatise on the "Blood, Inflammation, and Gunshot-wounds." n. at Long Calderwood, near Glasgow, 1728; n. in London, 1783.

HUNTER, William, brother of the preceding, a celebrated English anatomist and physician, was educated for the church, but an acquaintance with Dr. Cullen inclining him to the study of physick, he resided with the doctor three years. In 1740, he removed to Edinburgh, where he pursued his studies with intense application, and the year following visited London: soon after this he was taken by Dr. Douglas into his house as dissector, and also as tutor to his son. In 1746, he was appointed lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent Garden, and the year following was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons. In 1750, he obtained his doctor's degree from Glasgow, and became very distinguished as a physician, particularly in midwifery. In 1764, he was appointed physician-extraordinary to the queen, and the same year he published his "Medical Commentaries." In 1767, he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and furnished the "Transactions" of that body with many valuable papers. In 1768, he was appointed professor of anatomy to the Royal Academy, which office he discharged with great reputation, adapting his anatomical knowledge to the arts of painting and sculpture. In 1781, he succeeded Dr. Fothergill as president of the Society of Physicians in London, and his fame having spread through Europe, he was chosen member of several foreign societies. Dr. Hunter formed a splendid anatomical museum in his house in Windmill Street, at an immense expense; after which, he extended his collection to natural history and general science. He also possessed a magnificent collection of Greek and Latin books, a cabinet of ancient medals, and a large stock of shells, corals, and other curious productions. This museum he bequeathed, at his death, to his nephew Dr. Baillie and Mr. Cruikshank, for thirty years, after which it was to go to the University of Glasgow. n. at Long Calderwood, 1718; n. 1783.

HUNTER, Henry, a Scotch divine and biblical writer, who, after completing his school and college education in Scotland, became, first, a minister of the Scotch church, in his native country, and afterwards at the Scotch church at London Wall. He was a good scholar, a sound divine, very liberal in his principles, and an eloquent preacher. His works are, "Sacred Biography, or Sermons on the principal Characters recorded in Scripture" 6 vols.; two vols. of Miscellaneous Sermons, translations of Lavater's "Physiognomy," St. Pierre's "Studies of Nature," Saurin's Sermons, &c. n. at Culross, Perthshire, 1741; n. at Bristol Wells, 1802.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, Countess of, hunt'-ing-don, one of the great patrons of Methodism, was the second daughter of Washington Shirley, Earl Ferrers, and was married to Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, in 1728. After a dangerous illness, she became deeply religious, and during the remainder of her life, supported a number of itinerant preachers, and built several chapels in various parts of the kingdom. Her religious sentiments were rigidly Calvinistic, and she was the patroness of all of that persuasion. n. 1707; n. 1791.

HURN, Richard, hur'd, bishop of Worcester, an English divine and writer, who, after leaving the university of Cambridge, in 1757, became rector of Thurstaston, in Leicestershire. In 1775 he was ordained bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence he was translated to Worcester in 1781. In 1783 he refused the archbishopric of Canterbury. His literary works are numerous; "Letters on Romance and Chivalry," "Commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry," and "Twelve Discourses on the Prophecies," being among the chief of them. n. in Staffordshire, 1720; n. 1808.

HURSTON, Frederick Yeates, hur'-ston, a modern English painter, who completed his studies at the Royal Academy in 1820, exhibiting his first picture in 1821. In a short time he became extensively employed as a portrait-painter, and was very popular for his Spanish, Italian, and historical pieces. A quarrel with the hanging committee of the Royal Academy in 1830 induced him to join the Society of British Artists, to whose annual exhibitions he afterwards sent his works. He subsequently became president of this body. His best pictures are, "Arthur and Constance," the "Game of Morra," an Italian subject, a "Spanish Beauty and a Young Moorish Peasant." n. in London, 1801.

HUSKISSON, William, hus'-kis-son, an English statesman, who commenced his political career in 1790 as secretary to Lord Gower, ambassador to the French court. He was under-secretary of state for War, and secretary of the Treasury, in the Pitt administration. In 1823 he became president of the Board of Trade, and both in the ministry and in the House of Commons, where he had sat from 1796, distinguished himself by his profound knowledge of finance and political economy. As a follower of Adam Smith, he combated the prohibitive system of commerce, and advocated the relaxation of customs duties and those on colonial produce. He met his death in an unfortunate manner, having been knocked down and run over by a locomotive at Parkside, near Liverpool, at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. B. at Birch-Moreton Court, Worcester-shire, 1770; D. 1830.

Huss, John, hus, a martyr, was educated at Prague, where he was ordained in 1400, and became rector of the university, and confessor to the queen. Meeting with some of the writings of Wickliffe, he perceived the errors of popery, and by his means a reformation was commenced in the university of Prague, to check which, the archbishop issued two decrees, whereby the new doctrines spread the more. The pope then granted a bull for the suppression of these errors, and Huss being cited to appear at Rome, was excommunicated for disobedience. He continued to propagate his principles, and was supported therein by Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, till 1411, when he was summoned to appear before the council of Constance. The emperor Sigismund sent him a safe-conduct, promising to preserve him in going to and returning from the council; but the members of that assembly, in violation of this pledge, decreed, "that no faith is to be kept with heretics;" and as Huss refused to retract his opinions, he was degraded, and burnt alive. After his death a civil war broke out in Bohemia, in which those who followed the martyr's doctrines, and who were called Hussites, fought against King Wenceslaus. The struggle lasted till 1437. Huss's works were printed at Nuremberg in 1558. B. at Hussinatz, Bohemia, about 1370; suffered 1415.

Hussey, Giles, hus'-se, an English painter, born at Marnhull, Dorsetshire, who studied in France and Italy, possessed considerable talents, and painted some good pictures; but was somewhat eccentric, and met with little encouragement in proportion to his merits. B. 1710; D. 1788.

HUTCHESON, Francis, hutch'-e-son, a philosophical writer, who received his education at Glasgow, after which he became pastor of a dissenting congregation in Dublin, where he also kept an academy, till 1729. He afterwards removed to Glasgow, on being appointed professor of philosophy in the university of that city. His chief works are, "An Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue;" "A Treatise on the Passions," "A System of Moral Philosophy," five vols. B. in Ireland, 1804; D. at Glasgow, 1747.

HUTCHINSON, John, hutch'-in-son, a philological and biblical writer, who received a liberal education, after which he became steward, first to a country gentleman, and next to the duke of Somerset. Having a love for natural history, he made a large collection of fossils, which he intrusted to Dr Woodward, to be arranged, and an account published of them. The doctor never began the work, which induced Hutchinson to rely upon his own pen. He therefore quitted the duke's service, who, however, made him his riding purveyor. He also gave him the presentation to the living of Sutton, in Sussex, which

Hutchinson

Hutchinson bestowed on his friend Mr. Julius Bates, a zealous defender of his doctrines. In 1724, he published the first part of his "Moses's Principia," in which he ridiculed Woodward's "Natural History of the Earth." He also attempted to refute Sir Isaac Newton's doctrine of gravitation. In the second part he maintained, in opposition to the Newtonian system, that a plenum and the air are the principles of scripture philosophy. In this work he intimated that the idea of the Trinity might be taken from the grand agents in the natural system,—fire, light, and spirit; which is said to have made an impression on the mind of Dr. Clarke. Mr. Hutchinson was a great admirer of the Hebrew language, and maintained that all its radicals were to be explained by their etymologies; by the aid of which he fancied that he had discovered the true system of natural philosophy in the writings of Moses. For a time, his notions occasioned some warm controversy, being supported by several ingenious and pious writers, but they were zealously opposed in the universities. His works, which are very curious, though obscurely written, have been printed in 12 vols. B. 1674; D. 1737.

HUTCHINSON, Thomas, lord-chief-justice, and afterwards lieutenant-governor of the colony of Massachusetts, was a native of Boston, Massachusetts, and had been much respected in that province for his able conduct on the judicial bench; but having covertly taken part with Great Britain against the American colonies, it was found necessary to remove him and place General Gage in the post of governor. Hutchinson accordingly came to England, where he lived in a retired manner at Brompton. Governor Hutchinson was the author of a "History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay," &c. B. n. 1711; D. 1780.

HUTCHINSON, John Hely, an Irish statesman and lawyer, who became secretary of state, and was a man of powerful eloquence and great and varied ability, which he devoted to the acquirement of a vast number of lucrative employments. So great, indeed, was his avidity for office and emolument, that Lord North said, "If England and Ireland were given to this man, he would solicit the Isle of Man for a potato garden." B. 1715; D. 1794.

HUTCHINSON, John Hely, Earl of Donoughmore, the second son of the preceding, entered the army in 1774 as a cornet in the 15th dragoons, and rose rapidly till he obtained a lieutenant-colonelcy in the 77th, in 1783. At the commencement of the French revolution, he visited the French camp at a very interesting period, and saw Lafayette compelled to leave those troops of which he had been the favourite, and seek safety in flight. When war was declared against France in 1793, he raised a regiment, and obtained the rank of colonel. He served in Flanders as aide-de-camp to Sir Ralph Abercromby, and subsequently in Ireland during the rebellion. In 1796 he was made a major-general, and in 1799 was wounded at the Helder. In the expedition to Egypt, in 1801, he was second in command to Sir Ralph Abercromby; and when that gallant officer was killed at the battle of Alexandria, the chief command devolved on Major-General Hutchinson; who, receiving reinforcements, advanced upon the enemy, and having pursued them to Cairo, a capitulation took place, and the expedition terminated in the evacuation of Egypt by the French. For his able services in this campaign he was raised to the peerage as Baron Hutchinson of Alexandria, and of Knocklotty, in the county of Tipperary, with a pension of 2000*l.* a-year. In 1506 he was sent on an extraordinary mission to the Prussian and Russian armies afterwards to the Court of St. Petersburg; and, at a later period, to meet Queen Caroline at St. Omer's, as the personal friend of the king. In 1513 he became a full general, and in 1525 succeeded his brother as Earl of Donoughmore, &c. b. 1757; d. 1832.

HUTTEN, Ulric von, hoo't-en, a German writer. He studied at Cologne and Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where he took the degree of M.A. at the age of 18. He then went to Italy; but receiving no supplies from his parents, he enlisted in the army, and served at the siege of Parma. In 1509 he returned to Germany, and was reduced to such poverty as to be obliged to beg his bread. In 1512, he published a Latin poem in praise of the emperor Maximilian, which gained him reputation and friends. The same year he went to Pavia to study the law; but falling into indigence, he again entered the army. He soon obtained his discharge, and returned to his native country, where he embraced the doctrines of Luther, and wrote some elegant pieces in Latin. For his epigrams the emperor knighted him, and made him poet-laureate. In 1518, he discovered a manuscript of Livy, which he published, as he afterwards did Pliny, Quintilian, and Marcellinus. His writings against the church of Rome were so severe, that the Pope sent orders to the inquisitor to seize him; but Hutten fled into Switzerland with Erasmus. b. at Steckelberg, Franconia, 1483; d. at Uffhu, near Zurich, 1523.

HUTTEN, Jacob, a native of Silesia, who, in the 16th century, founded the sect called the Bohemian or Moravian Brethren. These were the descendants of the Hussites, and appear to have given rise to the anabaptists. Hutten is supposed to have been burnt as a heretic at Innspruck.

HUTTOR, James, hut'-ton, an English chemical philosopher, who took the degree of doctor of medicine at Leyden, in 1749. He wrote many works after his return to England, principally on agriculture, mineralogy, mathematics, and chemistry. His "Dissertation on the Philosophy of Light and Heat," was first published in 1794. b. at Edinburgh, 1726; d. 1797.

HUTTON, William, an ingenious and self-educated writer, was apprenticed to a stocking-weaver; and at the expiration of his time employed his leisure hours in bookbinding. In 1750 he opened a shop for the sale of old books, to which he added a circulating library, at Birmingham; succeeded so well as to embark in the paper-making business; and by frugality and industry arrived at opulence. He wrote several ingenious works, among which were Histories of "Birmingham," "Derby," "Black-poll," and the "Battle of Bosworth Field," "Tour to Scarborough," "Remarks on North Wales," "Poems," &c. b. 1723; d. 1815.

HUTTON, Charles, an English mathematician, who, after receiving some education, became teacher of a school at Jesmond, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He afterwards removed to the latter place, and opened a school on his own account, meeting with considerable success in his undertaking. He published several mathematical works, and, in 1773, offered himself as a candidate for the professorship of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and passed his examination for the post in the most successful manner. He was made fellow of the Royal Society, and, a few years afterwards, foreign secretary to the same body. His mathematical works were both numerous and valuable. He was made LL.D. of the university of Edinburgh in 1779, and is said to have received the sum of £8000 for condensing the "Philosophical Transactions." His "Course of Mathematics" is still one of the text-books of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. b. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1737; d. 1823.

HUGENS, Constantine, hoi'-gens, lord of Zuylichem, was secretary to the Prince of Orange, and president of the council, and is known by fourteen books of Latin poems, under the title of "Momenta Desultoria," consisting of epigrams and miscellaneous pieces. b. at the Hague, 1596; d. 1687.

HUGENS, Christian, an eminent mathematician, son of the above, who, from his youth, evinced great aptitude for mathematical science, and in 1651 gave a specimen of his abilities in a book on the "Quadrature of Circles, Ellipses, &c." Not long after, he published a treatise on horology, in which he described the model of a newly-invented pendulum for clocks. In 1656 appeared his "System of Saturn," giving an account of the discovery which he made of a satellite attending that planet. In 1661 he visited England, and was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. He afterwards resided at Paris, on the invitation of Colbert, who gave him a pension, and he was also admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. His "Cosmotheoros, or a Treatise on the Plurality of Worlds," was printing in 1695, the year of his death; and in 1700 appeared his "Opuscula Posthuma," in 1 vol. 4to. He wrote other works on geometry, mechanics, astronomy, and optics. b. 1629.

HURST, John van, hoi'-sum, a Dutch painter of flower and fruit pieces. His reputation was so great that he fixed immoderate prices on his works. He would never suffer any person to see him while he was painting; so that his method of mixing his colours was an impenetrable secret. His flower-pieces are exquisitely beautiful, as are also his landscapes and animals. b. at Amsterdam, 1693; d. in England, 1749.

HYDE, Earl of Clarendon. (See CLARENDON, Edward Hyde, Earl of.)

HYDE, Thomas, hide, a learned divine, who studied at King's College, Cambridge, where he applied himself to the mastery of the Oriental languages. Dr. Walton employed him in his great work, the Polyglot Bible, and in the preface gratefully acknowledged his assistance. In 1653 he was admitted of Queen's College, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A., and was made under-keeper of the Bodleian Library. In 1665, he translated from the Persian, into Latin, Ulugh Beg's "Observations on the Longitude and Latitude of the Fixed Stars, with Notes," and soon after he obtained a prebend in the church of Salisbury. In 1678, the archdeaconry of Gloucester was conferred on him; in 1682 he took his degree of D.D.; in 1691 he was chosen Arabic professor; in 1700 appeared his most celebrated work, entitled "Veterum Persarum, Magorum Religionis Historia." Besides the above preferments, he was made regius professor of Hebrew and canon of Christ-

HYDER-ALI-KHAN, hi'-der-a-lie'-kan, a celebrated Indian chieftain, who became commander-in-chief of the troops of the rajah of Mysore, and supplanted his master as ruler of this province in 1761. In 1767 he entered into an alliance with the Mahrattas against the British, but after concluding a peace with the latter in 1769, he turned his arms against his former allies. Once more obtaining their aid, after a contest which lasted about ten years, he suddenly invaded the presidency of Madras in 1780, and even threatened the annihilation of the British power in India. The war was carried on with great vigour, and the issue of the contest seemed doubtful, when, in 1782, Hyder died, leaving his territory to his son, Tippoo Saib, who concluded a peace two years after. b. about 1730.

HYPATIA, hi'-pat'-she'-a, an illustrious female, was the daughter of Theon, an eminent mathematician of Alexandria, whom she succeeded in the government of that school, had a number of disciples, and became very celebrated for her lectures on Plato and Aristotle, both at Alexandria and Athens. Synesius in particular, who afterwards became a Christian bishop, celebrated her praises in the most glowing terms. Orestes, the governor of Alexandria, had a high respect for Hypatia, and frequently consulted her on matters of importance. Between the governor and the patriarch Cyril there was a bitter enmity, which broke out into open war, and the monks siding with their chief, assembled in a riotous manner against Orestes, who was obliged to fly from the city. They then seized Hypatia, and having torn her in pieces, burnt her mangled limbs to ashes. She wrote a commentary on Diophantus, and other works, which have been lost. b. at Alexandria, between 370-380; killed at the same place, 415.

HYPERIDES, hi'-per'-i-dees, an Athenian orator, the disciple of Isocrates and Plato, was for a long time the rival of Demosthenes, and distinguished himself by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the secrets of his country, he cut out his tongue. Only two of his numerous orations remain, which are admired for the sweetness and elegance of their style. d. 322 B.C.

HYRCANUS, John, her'-kan'-nus, high priest and prince of the Jews, succeeded (B.C. 135) his father Simon Maccabæus, who was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemæus. The same traitor then invited Antiochus into Judæa, and that monarch accordingly laid siege to Jerusalem, which, however, held out against all his attempts. At length a peace was concluded on condition of the Jews becoming tributary to Antiochus, after whose death Hyrcanus restored his country to independence. d. 106 B.C. He was succeeded by his son, Aristobulus, who did not long survive him.

HYSTASPES, his-tās'-pees, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His son Darius reigned in Persia after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. Hystaspes was the first who introduced into Persia the mysteries of the Indian Brahmins; and to his researches in India the sciences were greatly indebted,

HYWEL AP OWAIN GWYNEDD, hoo-el, a prince of North Wales, some of whose poems are included in the "Welsh Archæology." On the death of his father, in 1169, he endeavoured to ascend the throne in place of his brother, but was defeated and wounded; on which he went to Ireland, where he died in 1171.

HYWEL AP MORGAN MAWR, prince of Glamorgan, in 1030, is represented as having been one of the wisest and best of the British princes. b. 913; d. 1013, at the great age of 130 years. In this line we have the following instances of longevity:—Morgan Mawr, aged 129; Hywel ab Rhys, 124; and Arthrael ab Rhys, 120.

HYWEL DDA, or Howel the Good, a celebrated prince and legislator of Wales, who went to Rome with the purpose of revising the code of laws for the government of his country. d. 943.

IAMBLICHTS, i-am-ble'-kus, king of Arabia, who was deprived of his estates by Augustus, after the battle of Actium, for supporting the cause of Marc Antony; but his son was restored to the throne by the same emperor, b.c. 22.

AMBLICHTS, a Greek author, and a musician by profession, wrote several works in Greek; among others, one entitled "Dalylonicus," preserved in the library of the Escurial in Spain. Lived in the 2nd century.

IAMBLICHTS, a Platonic philosopher, who studied under Porphyry, and gained many dis-against Porphyry's letter on the Egyptian mysteries. Lived about 350.

IAMBLICHTS, a Greek author, was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and flourished in the reign of Constantine and Julian the Apostate. d. about 363.

IAROSLAV, George, yar'-os-laf, grand-duke of Russia, son of Vladimir I., dethroned his brother Swiatopolk in 1015, and reigned till 1054. He suppressed several insurrections, and defeated Boleslas, king of Poland, and the emperors of Constantinople. He encouraged architecture and painting, built schools, made many salutary laws, and rendered the Russian church independent. Henry I., king of France, married his daughter, Anne. Iaroslav founded the city which bears his name.

IBARRA, Joachim, e-bar'-ra, a Spanish printer, whose editions of the classical authors of his country are regarded as marvels of the typographical art. b. at Saragossa, 1725; d. at Madrid, 1785.

IBAS, e'-bas, a bishop of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, in the 5th century, who is noted in ecclesiastical history on account of the opposite decisions of different councils, relative to the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of his opinions. He was deposed and reinstated, condemned and acquitted, several times, on the charge of favouring the heresy of Nestorius.

IBBETSON, Agnes, a lady who devoted her attention to the study of astronomy, geology, and botany, particularly to that branch of the last-named science which deals with the physiology of plants. She made many highly interesting microscopical observations on the structure of vegetables, which were published in the "Annals of Philosophy" and other periodicals. She was the daughter of A. Thompson, Esq., of London, and had been married to Mr. Ibbetson, a barrister, by whose death she was left a widow. b. 1533.

IBEK, Cothaddin Ibek, i-lak, the chief slave of Schahabeddin, sultan of India, on whose death he usurped the throne, and added to his dominions many provinces of Hindostan. An account of his conquests was written in a volume entitled "Tuge al Mather."

IBEK, Azeddin Ibek, or Ibeg, first sultan of the Mameluke Turks in Egypt, had been an officer in the court of Malek-al-Saleh, sultan of Egypt. On the latter's death, Ibek married his widow, and became partner with her in the throne; but she caused him to be assassinated, in 1257.

IBRAHIM, ib-ra-hem, the son of the caliph Mahadi, brother of Haroun-al-Raschid, and uncle of Amin and Mamun. He was an excellent poet and musician, and the first orator of his time. He was proclaimed caliph at Bagdad, on the death of his nephew Amin, in 817; but Mamun marching from Khorassan to Bagdad with a powerful army, Ibrahim thought it prudent to abdicate the throne. b. at Samara, in 839.

IBRAHIM, the son of Massoud, eighth caliph of the dynasty of Gaznevides, succeeded his brother Perokzad. He acquired great reputation as a just and pious prince, notwithstanding the frequent wars he made on the borders of Hindostan, in which he gained such advantages as to acquire the name of the "Conqueror." He reigned forty-two years, during which time he erected a number of cities, mosques, and hospitals; he was also a liberal encourager of arts and letters. b. 1093.

IBRAHIM, emperor of the Turks, was the son of Aehmet, and succeeded his brother Aehmet IV. in 1640. He besieged and took the capital of Candia from the Venetians, in 1644; but his cruelties and debaucheries were so great that the soldiers strangled him in 1649.

IBRAHIM IMAM, the chief priest of the Mohammedan religion, was a descendant of the illustrious house of the Abbassides. His reputation and authority became so great, that Marvan, or Hemar, the last caliph of the Ommiades, in Arabia, caused him to be put to death by thrusting his head into a bag of lime, a.d. 743.

IBRAHIM EFFENDI, a native of Poland, who attained by his courage and talents to the highest dignities in the Ottoman empire. He established the first printing-press in Turkey, in 1728. The Count de Bonneval furnished him with the types, the first work he produced being a treatise on the military art. He afterwards published the account of an expedition against the Afghans, a Turkish grammar, and a history of Turkey; b. 1744.

IBRAHIM MANSOUR EFFENDI, whose real name was Ceribere, was the son of a Jew at Strasburg. He had served in the French republican hussars, but became so violent a royalist, that he was imprisoned. In 1802 he went to Constantinople, embraced Mohammedanism, and instructed the Turkish troops in the European system of discipline. He subsequently travelled through the north of Europe, and, under the name of Medelshim, held a government office in Westphalia; afterwards became engineer to Ali Pacha; and, on quitting that employ, wandered through various parts of Asia, Africa, and America. He ultimately, being in a state of absolute destitution, shot himself at Paris, in 1826. He wrote a "Memoir of Greece and Albania during the Government of Ali Pacha."

IBRAHIM BEY, a famous Mameluke chieftain, who for some time governed Cairo, in conjunction with Mourad Bey, but afterwards became sole ruler, and head of the Mamelukes. The French, when they invaded Egypt, defeated him, in 1799, at Al-Arish. He escaped the general massacre of the Mamelukes in 1805, by refusing to accept Mehemet Ali's invitation to visit Cairo with the rest of his ill-fated followers. b. in Circassia, about 1735; d. in exile in Nubia, 1816.

IBRAHIM PACHA, viceroy of Egypt, step-son and successor of Mehemet Ali, was injured from infancy to the toils and turmoils of a camp, and at an early age displayed the adventurous spirit, high courage, and undaunted resolution, which distinguished his subsequent career. In 1819 he became generalissimo of the Egyptian army; and, charged with the task of remodelling and disciplining it after the French fashion, proceeded vigorously to work, and soon produced a marked change in the character of his troops. In the course of a few campaigns he completely defeated the Wahabees in Arabia, who from 1813 to 1824 had resisted all the efforts of the Egyptian forces to subdue them. During the struggle for Greek independence, Ibrahim was conspicuous as leader of the Turks. His army overran the whole of the Morea, and committed frightful devastations and cruelties; but the battle of Navarino, October 20, 1827, when the combined British, Russian, and French navies, under the command of Admiral Codrington, destroyed the Turco-Egyptian fleet, sent him back to Egypt, shorn of his conquests, and paved the way for the independence of Greece. In 1831 he marched to the conquest of Syria; and having completely routed the sultan's troops at Koniah in 1832, was only restrained from marching to Constantinople by the intervention of Russia; but his subjugation of Syria was complete, and a few abortive attempts made by the population to throw off the Egyptian yoke only ended in riveting their chains more firmly than before. In 1839, the sultan having made another effort for the recovery of Syria, was completely overthrown by Ibrahim at Nizil. But the European powers now interfered. An English fleet, under the command of Admirals Stopford and Napier, was sent to the Syrian coast, and having reduced Acre, forced Ibrahim to conclude a treaty, by which Syria was once more given up to the sultan. In 1846, Ibrahim visited England and France. On September 1st, 1843, he was nominated viceroy of Egypt, in the room of Mehemet Ali, whom increasing years had made unequal to the cares of government; but a severe attack of bronchitis, acting on a constitution already debilitated by youthful IBRAHIM OF SCHIRAZ, a Mussulman doctor o law, who wrote several works on jurisprudence in Arabic.—There was another of the same name, surnamed Merouzi, some of whose works are extant.

ICILIUS, Lucius, i-sil'-e-us, a Roman tribune, to whom Virginia was betrothed. When the latter was carried off by the decemvir Appius-Claudius, Icilius raised an army against the Decemvirs, and, having caused their fall, was created, by the people, tribune for the second time, B.C. 449. Sheridan Knowles has founded a tragedy, called "Virginius," upon these incidents; and Macaulay, in one of his ballads, commemorates the story of Virginius.

ICELIUS, ik-ti'-nus, an Athenian architect, who lived in the 5th century B.C., and was employed by Pericles in the erection of the Parthenon. He also built the temple of Ceres and Proserpine at Eleusis, and the temple of Apollo Epicurus in Areadida.

IDRIS GAWA, i'-dris-gour, a Welsh astronomer, who is ranked with Gwidion ab Don and Gwyn ab Nudd, as the three great astronomers of Britain. A high mountain in Wales is still called Cader Idris, or the "Seat of Idris." When he lived is unknown.

IERMAK, yer'-mak, hetman of the Cossacks of the Don, at the end of the 16th century, who, in 1630, undertook, at the head of six thousand men, the invasion of Siberia. After many fierce engagements, he penetrated with 500 horsemen as far as Sibir, the capital, which he took; very soon afterwards, the khans of the neighbouring tribes tendered him their submission. Iermak, fearing that he should not be able to retain his conquests, solicited the aid of Ivan IV., czar of Russia, promising to become his vassal. The czar sent him reinforcements, but he was slain by a Tartar chief, in 1583.

IFFLAND, Augustus William, if'-fland, a German author and actor, who became the leading comedian of Germany. He subsequently produced a great number of dramas, was appointed director of the theatre at Mannheim, and afterwards of the court spectacles at Berlin. He brought out several adaptations from the French, and from the Italian comedies of Goldoni. B. at Hanover, 1759; D. 1814.

IGNATIUS, St., ig'-nai-she-us, a father of the Church, and martyr, was a native of Syria, and a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, by whom he was made bishop of Antioch, A.D. 63. After discharging the episcopal office with great zeal for forty years, the emperor Trajan, passing through Antioch, in his Parthian expedition, sent for him, and endeavoured to prevail upon him to renounce his religion. Ignatius continued inflexible; on which the emperor sent him under a guard of soldiers to Rome, where he was exposed to wild beasts in the amphitheatre for the amusement of the people. The martyr joyfully heard his sentence, and endured his sufferings with fortitude. Two pious deacons of his church gathered up his bones, and conveyed them to Antioch, where they were carefully preserved. Seven of his genuine epistles are extant, and were published by Usher at Oxford in 1645. Some others have been attributed to him: but these are generally accounted spurious, though Whiston endeavoured to prove that they were genuine, and that the others were forgeries or abridgments. Suffered martyrdom between 107 and 118.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the emperor Michael Curoplates, and of Procopia, daughter of the emperor Nicephorus. When his father was deposed by Leo the Armenian, he and his brother were confined in a monastery. Ignatius, whose original name was Nicetas, took the religious vows, and in 847 was raised to the patriarchate; but having rebuked Bardas, one of the principal lords of the court, he was banished to the isle of Terebinthos, and Photius appointed in his stead. A council was called at Constantinople to compel Ignatius to resign, which he refused to do for some time; but close confinement and rigorous usage induced him to yield. When Basil became emperor, he restored Ignatius to his dignity; upon which he immediately excommunicated Photius, and caused the eighth general council to be called at Constantinople. B. 799; D. 878.

IGNATIUS-LOYOLA. (See LOYOLA.)

IGOR, e'-gor, grand-duke of Russia, succeeded his father Rurik, and, after making war a long time against his neighbours, proceeded to ravage the East, deluging with blood Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. He left his throne to his wife Olga, who, in her old age, embraced Christianity. D. 935.

ILIVE, Jacob, il'-iv, an English printer and letter-founder, who published some singular pieces, such as a pretended translation of the book of Jasher, an oration proving that this world is hell, that men are fallen spirits, and that the fire to destroy them at the day of judgment will be immaterial, &c. D. 1763.

ILLTYD VARCHOG, il'-tud var'-chog, or, "Ilutius the Knight," a saint who accompanied Garmon to Britain, and was placed at the head of the Congregation of Theodosius, so called from being established by that emperor. He introduced an improved method of ploughing among the Welsh. D. about 480.

IMBERT, Bartholomew, im'-bair, a French poet, who became a member of the Academy of Nismes, and cultivated literature, particularly poetry, with success. He wrote a poem entitled "The Judgment of Paris;" and also published a volume of fables, which, though excellent, cannot be compared with La Fontaine's. He was likewise the author of a novel entitled "The Mistakes of Love," and some other pieces. N. at Nismes, 1747; D. at Paris, 1790.

IMBERT, Jean, an advocate, who published "Enchiridion Juris scripti Gallia," 1559; "Institutiones Forenses," 1541. D. about 1590.

IMBERT, Joseph Gabriel, a French painter, who was instructed in his art by Vander Meulen and Le Brun. At the age of 34 he entered into the order of St. Bruno, but still continued to paint. B. at Marseilles, 1654; D. 1740.

IMHOFF, James William, ime'-hofs, a celebrated genealogist, of a noble family. He published—1. "De Notitiâ Procerum Germaniæ," 2 vols.; 2. "Historia Genealogica Italiæ et Hispaniæ;" 3. "Familiarum Italiæ, Hispaniæ, Galliæ, et Portugalliæ;" 4. "Magnæ Britanniæ cum appendice," 2 vols. folio; 5. "Recherches sur les Grandes d'Espagne." B. at Nuremberg, 1651; D. 1728.

INA, i-na, king of the West-Saxons, one of the kingdoms of the Heptarchy, famous for the laws he instituted and for his expeditions against neighbouring princes. In 728 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, where he is said to have erected an English college. He was a benefactor

English authoress, who, at the age of 16, ran away from her home in Suffolk, and tried ineffectually to obtain an engagement as actress in a London theatre. She subsequently found employment on the provincial stage, and, after a varied career, married Mr. Inebald, an actor, who died in 1778. In 1780 she obtained an engagement to play minor parts at Covent Garden Theatre, and remained in that position till 1789, when she retired from the stage. A few years before, she had written a farce, which, being successful, she continued to write for the theatre, and produced in succession 19 plays, receiving large sums for several of them. Between the years 1806 and 1809 she edited "The British" and "Modern" Theatres, and a collection of farces, in all 42 vols. But the works which cause her name to be remembered are two novels—"A Simple Story," and "Nature and Art." She had written her autobiography, for which £1000 had been offered and refused by her, and which was destroyed at her request after her death. Her maiden name was Simpson. B. in Suffolk, 1753; D. 1821.

INCHOFFER, Melchior, inck'-hofs'-er, a German Jesuit, who at first studied the law, but abandoned that profession and entered the Jesuits' college at Rome in 1607. In 1630 he wrote a book, entitled, "The Virgin Mary's Letter to the People of Messina Proved to be Genuine." Having quarrelled with his brethren, he wrote a satire against them, which was printed after his death, under the title of "Monarchia Polipserum." He also wrote the "Ecclesiastical History of Hungary." B. at Vienna, 1584; D. at Milan, 1648.

INCLEDON, Benjamin Charles, inck'-ul-don, a famous English singer, was born at St. Keverne, in Cornwall, where his father practised as a surgeon. When only eight years old, the astonishingly fine tones of his voice induced his parents to article him to Jackson of Exeter, under whose tuition he remained as a chorister in Exeter cathedral until he was 15. Not liking the restraints to which he was there subject, he quitted Exeter in 1779, and entered as a common sailor on board the Formidable, of 98 guns, and remained in the royal navy five years, during which time he went to the West Indies, and saw some service. His vocal abilities having attracted notice, he was advised to try his fortune on the stage. He accordingly joined a company at Southampton, in 1783, and next year accepted an engagement at Bath, where the manager introduced him to the acquaintance of Rauzinni, who did much towards perfecting him in the vocal art. In 1790 he made his début at Covent Garden Theatre, with great success, as Dermot, in "The Poor Soldier," and rose at once into popularity, which he continued to enjoy till the infirmities consequent upon advancing years, and an irregular mode of life, compelled him to quit the stage. His voice combined uncommon power, sweetness, and flexibility, both in the natural tones and in the falsetto, and his intonation was remarkably correct. His execution of "The Storm," "Black-eyed Susan," or any of the better sort of the old English ballads and hunting songs, was such as, once heard, was never forgotten. B. 1764; D. 1826.

INDIBILIS, in-dib'-i-lis, prince of the Ibergetes of Spain, entered into an alliance with the Carthaginians, and assisted to gain a victory over Publius Scipio, father of Scipio the Great, who was killed in the battle, 212 B.C. Subsequently, he became the ally of Scipio the Great (see Scipio), and fought under his banner against the Carthaginians, hoping thus to be allowed to retain his kingdom by the Romans. But being deceived in these expectations, he revolted, and, after various struggles, lost his life in battle, 205 B.C.

INDULPHUS, in-du'l'-fus, supposed to be the seventy-seventh king of Scotland, began his reign in 923. The first few years of his reign were peaceable; but afterwards his kingdom was several times invaded by the Danes, who were enraged against him for entering into an alliance with the English. On the Danes landing in great force in the north, Indulphus marched against them, and compelled them to fly to their ships; but, pursuing them too eagerly, he was slain by an arrow; D. 961.

INEZ DE CASTRO, e'-nais dai kas'-tro, a noble lady of Castile, famous for her beauty and her misfortunes. Don Pedro, son of Alphonso IV., king of Portugal, fell in love with and secretly married her. The king, on discovering their union, desired his son to abandon her, but on his refusing to do so, caused Inez to be assassinated, in 1355. On succeeding to the throne, in 1357, Don Pedro executed the most summary vengeance upon the murderers of his former wife, and causing her body to be disinterred, crowned her remains, and proclaimed her his queen. The Portuguese poet Camões (see Camões) founded a tragedy upon this incident, and an excellent play has been written upon the same subject by Mrs. Hemans.

INGEMANN, Bernhard Severin, in'-ger-man, a Danish poet and novelist, whose father, the Protestant pastor of Torkildstrup, in the island of Falster, died while his son was very young. His mother contrived, however, to send him to the university of Copenhagen, where, at the age of 23, he carried off the gold medal for his essay in answer to the question "What relation do poetry and eloquence bear to each other?" A year previously he published a volume of lyrics, and, in 1814, produced "The Black Knights," an epical and allegorical poem, on the model of Spenser's "Faerie Queena." Subsequently he wrote two tragedies, "Masaniello" and "Bianca," which became very popular on the Danish stage. A third drama, "The Shepherd of Tolosa," was unsuccessful; and, although he afterwards wrote several dramas, none were composed with a view to theatrical representation. After having travelled in Europe between the years 1818 and 1820, he wrote a volume of poems, and commenced a series of romances, embodying historical and traditional incidents in the mediæval history of his native country. These romances, several of which have been translated into English, were written in imitation of Sir Walter Scott, and became exceedingly INGENHOUSZ, Johann, ing'-en-hooz, an eminent Dutch physician and chemist. Going early to England, and learning the Suttonian method of inoculation, he went to Vienna, on the recommendation of Sir John Pringle, to inoculate the daughter of the emperor, for which he was made imperial physician, and obtained a pension. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote,—1. "Experiments upon Vegetables;" 2. A Latin Translation of Hultme's Treatise on the Stone, Scurvy, and Gout; 3. Several Chemical Treatises on Impregnating Water, &c., with Fixed Air; 4. Papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. b. at Breda, 1730; d. 1799.

INGHEX, William Van, ing'-hen, a Dutch historical painter, who, after being the pupil of Anthony Gribber, studied in Italy, and, on his return, settled at Amsterdam, where his works are held in great esteem. b. at Utrecht, 1651; d. about 1720.

INGHITRAMI, Cavaliere Francesco, in-ge-ra'-me, an eminent Italian archaeologist, who applied himself assiduously to the study of ancient art. His great work, entitled "Monumenti Etruschi," in six volumes, published in 1826, has been the source from which writers on Etruscan antiquities have derived their knowledge. He was also author of a number of other works on the art and remains of antiquity, and, for a long period, was keeper of the Laurentine library at Florence. b. at Volterra, in Tuscany, in 1772; d. 1846.

INGLIS, Sir James, in'-glis, author of a famous work, entitled the "Complaint of Scotland," published in 1543, was descended from an old family of Fifeshire. He was an adherent of the French faction against the English, the contentions of these two parties having distracted the Scottish councils of the period. He distinguished himself in some skirmishes which preceded the battle of Pinkie, and was knighted on the field. b. in the reign of James IV.; d. 1554.

INGLIS, John, D.D., a Scottish divine, who, in 1796, succeeded Principal Robertson as minister of Grayfriars parish, Edinburgh, and was for about 30 years the leader of the moderate party in the Scottish Establishment. Besides minor publications, he wrote two works of considerable importance, one being on the "Evidences of Christianity," and the other a "Defence of Church Establishments." b. in Perthshire, 1763; d. 1834.

INGLIS, Henry David, a writer of some eminence, whose earliest works were published in the name of Derwent Conway, was a native of Scotland, and, impelled by the ardent desire to visit foreign countries which distinguishes so many of his countrymen, and also by an eager love of literature, he travelled over most parts of the Continent, carefully recording his observations. His first work was entitled "The Tales of Ardenne," which was followed by "Solitary Walks through many Lands;" after which appeared his "Travels in Norway and Sweden," "Spain in 1830," "The New Gil Blas," &c. After his return from Spain, he made a tour through Ireland, the result of which was an excellent work entitled "Ireland in 1834." His literary labours impaired his constitution, and having been seized with a disease of the brain, he died in 1835. b. 1795.

INGLIS, Sir Robert Harry, an English politician, who for a long period represented the University of Oxford in the House of Commons. After an educational career at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1803, and subsequently became private secretary to Viscount Sidmouth. In 1824 he was returned to Parliament as member for Dundalk, and, two years later, sat for Ripon. When Sir Robert Peel introduced the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, in 1829, he resigned his seat for Oxford University, which Inglis henceforth represented, till his retirement from public life, in 1853. He was a steady supporter of church and state, opposed the Reform Bill, the emancipation of Catholics and Jews, and, throughout his career, exhibited a perfect example of the thorough Conservative. b. in London, 1786; d. 1855.

INGLIS, Sir John Eardley Wilmot, K.C.B., the "Hero of Lucknow," a designation conferred upon him in consequence of his gallant defence of the British residency in that city against the insurgents in 1857, having succeeded to the command there on the death of Sir Henry Lawrence. Sir John was the son of the Rev. Dr. Inglis, bishop of Nova Scotia, and entered the army as ensign in the 32nd regiment, in 1833, and continued in the same corps, passing through every grade from ensign to full colonel, which latter rank he held in it at his death. He first saw active service in the Canadian rebellion of 1837, afterwards passed through the campaigns in the Punjab in 1843-49; succeeded to the command of one of the columns of attack at the siege of Mooltan, and was made brevet lieutenant-colonel for his gallantry at the battle of Goojerat. He was afterwards appointed assistant to Sir Henry Lawrence at Lucknow; and after that distinguished officer's death, held the post till relieved by Lord Clyde and Sir James Outram. He was created a baronet, and made brevet major-general for his conduct on this occasion, and was subsequently placed in command of the troops in the Ionian Islands. His health, however, had been shaken by the terrible anxieties, privations, and fatigues he had undergone in defending Lucknow; and, notwithstanding every attention was bestowed upon him, he never recovered, and died at Homburg, where he had gone in the hope of reinvigorating his exhausted system, on the 27th of September, 1862. b. in Nova Scotia, 1814. Sir John was married to a daughter of Frederick Thesiger, Lord Chelmsford; and in him the British nation lost one of its most able, honest, and distinguished officers.

INGRAM, Robert, in'-gram, an English divine, who entered at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and took there his degrees in arts. His first preference was the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, in Kent; after which he obtained, successively, the small vicarage of Orston, in Nottinghamshire, and the vicarages of Wormington and Boxed, in Essex. He wrote a work called "Accounts of the Ten Tribes of Israel being in America, originally published by Manasseh Ben Israel; with Observations thereon." This was published in 1792. b. 1727; d. 1804.

INGRES, Jean Dominique Auguste, ángre, a distinguished French painter, whose father, a painter and musician, sought to inspire him with a love of the musical art. His predilection for painting was, however, so strong, that he was allowed to study it exclusively. After having spent some years in the atelier of David, he won, in 1801, the second great prize for painting. In 1802 he produced one of his most celebrated works—"The Bather." In 1804 he painted a portrait of Napoleon as first consul, and again in 1806 as emperor. He resided for fifteen years at Rome, and four years at Florence, in both of which cities he painted many of his best works. So great is the estimation of Ingres in France, that, in the great Exposition at Paris, in 1855, an entire department was allotted to him for the exhibition of his numerous paintings. He was made chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1831, and commander in 1845. n. at Montauban, 1781.

INGULPHUS, in-gul'phus, abbot of Croyland in the 11th century, and favourite of William the Conqueror, to whom he was secretary. He rebuilt his monastery, and obtained for it many privileges. His supposed work, the "History of Croyland Abbey," has been translated from the Latin, and published in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. n. about 1030; p. 1109.

INMAN, Rev. James, in-man, an eminent mathematician, many years professor of mathematics at the Royal Naval College, Portsmouth dockyard. He was the oldest of Cambridge senior wranglers, his degree dating as far back as 1800, and was long celebrated in naval circles for his application of science to navigation and ship-building. He laboured very many years unobtrusively, but zealously, in his country's service. He sailed round the world with Flinders, as astronomer, was wrecked with him, and took part with the late Sir John Franklin in that celebrated action in which a fleet of British merchantmen beat off the French Admiral Lincol. While professor of mathematics at the Royal Naval College, he reduced to system the previous ill-arranged methods of navigation, and published several valuable works now in general use in the naval service; but he was best known by his having been the first person in England who built ships on scientific principles, and by his having educated a class of men at whose hands the promised "reconstruction" of the British navy is to take place. Dr. Inman's translation of "Chapman," with his valuable annotations, is the text-book on which all subsequent writers on naval architecture have proceeded. n. 1772; p. 1859.

INNOCENT I., in-no-sent, pope, was a native of Albano, and elected to the pontifical chair in 402. He proceeded to Ravenna to request the emperor Honorius to make peace with Alaric; but during his absence the latter plundered Rome. n. at Ravenna, 417.

INNOCENT II. ascended the throne in 1130. He was elected by part only of the conclave, the rest choosing Peter de Leon, the son of a Jew, who took the name of Anacletus II., and was acknowledged by the kings of Scotland and Sicily, but Innocent was received by the other princes of Europe. Being driven from Italy, he fled to France, where he held several councils. On the death of his rival and the abdiction of his successor, Victor III., he returned to Rome, and held the second Lateran council in 1139. n. at Rome, 1143.

INNOCENT III. (Lothario Conti) came of a noble family. On account of his learning he was made cardinal, and, in 1198, elected pope. He encouraged the crusades to the Holy Land, promoted one against the Albigenses, laid the kingdom of France under interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England. He greatly extended his temporal dominions, and raised the papal authority to its highest degree of power. n. at Anagni, 1160; p. at Perugia, 1216.

INNOCENT IV. was a Genoese, and became chancellor of the Roman church. Gregory IX. created him a cardinal in 1227. He succeeded Celestine IV. in 1243, at which time the court of Rome was engaged in a contest with the emperor Frederick II. Innocent was obliged to retire to France, where he held the council of Lyons, in which Frederick was excommunicated. He is said to have been the first who gayered hats to the cardinals. n. at Naples, 1254.

INNOCENT V., a Dominican, became archbishop of Lyons, cardinal, and lastly pope, in 1276, but died five months after his election. Some religious pieces of his have been printed.

INNOCENT VI., cardinal bishop of Ostia, was advanced to the papacy in 1352. He was a man of great learning and liberality, and some of his letters are extant. n. at Avignon, 1362.

INNOCENT VII. was elected pope in 1404, but not without great opposition. n. at Abruzzo, 1336; p. 1406.

INNOCENT VIII., a noble Genoese, of Greek extraction, obtained the tiara, in succession to Sixtus IV., in 1484. He endeavoured to organize another crusade, but without success. n. 1431; p. 1492.

INNOCENT IX. ascended the papal throne on the death of Gregory XIV., in 1591, but died two months afterwards. n. at Bologna, 1519; p. at Rome, 1591.

INNOCENT X. (John Baptist Pamfilii), a Roman, succeeded Urban VIII., in 1644, at the age of 73. He condemned the doctrines of Jansenius, and prosecuted the Barberini family with great violence. n. 1571; p. 1655.

INNOCENT XI.—Innocent X. gave him a cardinal's hat and a bishopric. He was elected pope in 1676, and reformed many abuses in the ecclesiastical state. He had a contest with Louis XIV. of France about the right of disposing of benefices and church lands, claimed by that monarch, and confirmed to him by an assembly of his clergy, which nearly terminated in a separation of the French church from the Roman communion. This pope effected a coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks. n. at Como, 1611; p. 1689.

INNOCENT XII. (Antonio Pignatelli), a Neapolitan of a noble family, succeeded Alexander VIII. in 1691. He abolished the extraordinary distinctions paid to the nephews of popes, and condemned the "Maxims of the Saints," written by Fénelon. n. at Naples, 1614; p. at Rome, 1700.

INNOCENT XIII. (Michael Angelo Conti), a Roman, and the eighth pope of his family, was elected to the papal chair in 1721. He gave a pension to the grandson of James II., and is said to have died of chagrin for having been persuaded to bestow a cardinal's hat on Du n. 1655; p. 1724.

Intaphornes

INTAPHERNES, in-ta-fer'-nees, one of the seven lords of Persia who conspired to dethrone Smerdis the usurper, 521 B.C. He afterwards endeavoured to seize the crown, for which Darius condemned him to death, with all his family. The wife of Intaphernes presented herself before Darius in a suppliant posture, and not only obtained a pardon for herself, but for any one of her relations whom she might name. She chose her brother, saying she might have another husband and other children, but that, as her father and mother were dead, she could not have another brother. On this, Darius pardoned her brother and son; but Intaphernes was executed.

INWOOD, William, in'-wood, an English surveyor and architect, who, with his sons, designed many churches and private buildings in London. He and his son Henry were the architects of St. Pancras church, Euston Road, London, the lower portion of which is an adaptation from an Ionic temple named the Erechtheion, at Athens. The tower is also a copy of the Tower of the Winds at Athens. The Westminster Hospital was his design, in which he was assisted by his son Charles. b. about 1771; d. 1843.

INWOOD, Henry William, was educated for the architectural profession, and spent several years copying and executing plans of the most celebrated buildings at Athens, &c. The designs for St. Pancras church were prepared after some of these drawings. He published a splendid work, called "Fragments of Athenian Architecture," and commenced a second work on Grecian and Egyptian architectural art; but, owing to his unexpected death, the work remained unfinished. b. 1794; lost at sea, 1813.

INWOOD, Charles Frederick, brother of the above, assisted his father William in many of his works, and was himself architect of the church of All Saints, at Great Marlow, Buckinghamshire. b. 1798; d. 1810.

IOLO GOCH, e-o'-lo goch, a Welsh bard, who lived with Owen Glendower, by whom he was employed to compose warlike songs to rouse his countrymen against the English. Lived between 1370 and 1420.

IPHICRATES, i-fik'-ra-tees, a celebrated Athenian general, who, by introducing some novel improvements in warfare, defeated the Thebans and Spartans. He was the son of a shoemaker, and once, when reproached with the meanness of his origin, answered that he would be the first of his family, whilst his detractor would be the last of his own. He was at the height of his fame between 400 and 380 B.C.

IPHIGES, king of Elis, in Greece, if-e'-tus, memorable as the institutor of the famous Olympic games, about the year 881 B.C. These games, at first consisting only of athletic exercises, but afterwards including horse and chariot racing, and even the trials of skill among rival candidates in music, poetry, eloquence, &c., were celebrated every 4th year, in the month of July, near Olympia, a city of Elis.

IRAIL, Augustin Simon, e'-rail, a French ecclesiastic, who wrote a tragedy called "The Trumpet of Heroism," "Memoirs for a History of the Republic of Letters," and a "History of the Re-union of Brittany with France." b. at Puy, Upper Loire, 1719; d. 1794.

IRELAND, Samuel, ire'-land, a miscellaneous writer and publisher, was originally a mechanic in Spitalfields; but, having a taste for drawing and engraving, he established himself in business as publisher of illustrated books of home and continental travel. He produced "Picturesque Tours" in Holland, France, and on the Thames and Medway. But the affair which gained him notoriety was his publication of a volume purporting to contain letters and papers of Shakspeare. The whole collection was a forgery by his son; and the exposure of the fraud is said to have hastened the old man's death. d. in London, 1800.

IRELAND, Samuel William Henry, a novelist and miscellaneous writer, notorious for his forgeries of Shaksperian documents, and for producing a play purporting to be Shakspeare's, but which was soon discovered to be a gross forgery, was the son of the last-mentioned person. After receiving a fair education in London and in France, he was articled to a lawyer in New Inn. His father was an enthusiastic collector of Shaksperian relics; and it would seem that this first induced him to forge a legal document, to which the autograph of Shakspeare was attached. His simple-minded father was imposed upon; and he soon afterwards supplied him with several more papers, which were published in a volume. William Henry even went so far as to concoct a play called "Vortigern," and to palm it off upon the public as an original work of Shakspeare's. It was produced at Drury-lane Theatre, with John Kemble as Vortigern, and was most unequivocally condemned, being sorry trash. The whole of the forgeries were soon afterwards exposed by Malone and others, and he was expelled his father's house. He subsequently gained a livelihood by writing a number of indifferent novels and romances, and executing hack-work for booksellers. b. in London, 1777; d. 1835.

IRELAND, John, an ingenious writer on works of art, was brought up to the watchmaking business, but afterwards became a dealer in paintings and prints. He was the author of "Hogarth Illustrated," 3 vols.; and the "Life and Letters of John Henderson," the actor. b. at Wem, in Shropshire, in the same house as Wycherley the poet; d. 1808.

IRELAND, John, dean of Westminster, eminent for his learning and for his intimacy with some of the most distinguished men of his time, received the first rudiments of education at the free grammar-school of Ashburton, in Devon, along with Gifford, author of the "Mueviad" and "Baviad," and editor of the "Quarterly Review." Ireland completed his education at Oxford; and after holding a small curacy in Devonshire, travelled with the son of Sir James Wright, by whose interest he was in 1793 appointed to the vicarage of Croydon in Surrey. In 1802 he was made a prebend of Westminster, which promotion was followed by his succeeding to the deanery of Westminster on the death of Dr. Vincent in 1816. He was a voluminous author; besides writing some important papers in the earlier numbers of the "Quarterly Review," he published "Five Discourses containing certain Arguments for and against the Reception of Christianity by the ancient Jews and Greeks;" "Vindiciæ Regiæ, a Defence of the Kingly Office," "Paganism and Christianity compared," "Nuptiæ Sacrae, an Inquiry into the Scriptural Doctrine of Marriage and Divorce," and other works, exclusively theological. As his life had been distinguished by his patronage of literature, so his will evidenced that he was desirous that his fortune should benefit both religion and literature after his death. Besides many charitable bequests for the benefit of the various places with which he had been connected, he left £2000 to his college, Oriel, Oxford, for an exhibition; £5000 for a chapel in Westminster; and the munificent sum of £10,000 to the university of Oxford, for a "Professor of the Exegesis of the Holy Scripture." B. at Ashburton, Devon, 1782; D. 1842.

IRENÆUS, St., i-re-ne-us, bishop of Lyons, and the disciple of Polycarp, by whom he is said to have been sent into Gaul. He was at first a priest in the church of Lyons; and, on the martyrdom of Pothinus, succeeded him in the bishopric, in 177. He had a disputation with Valentinus at Rome, and held a council at Lyons, in which the Gnostic heresy was condemned. Irenæus was a great lover of peace, and laboured to allay the controversy, which then raged with violence, respecting the time of celebrating Easter. B. in Asia Minor about 140; D. at Lyons, about 202.

IRENE, i-re-ne, empress of Constantinople, and a saint of the Greek church, was the wife of Leo IV., after whose death she was acknowledged sovereign, in conjunction with her son, Constantine V. She displayed great talents, but committed some atrocious murders on the relatives of her husband; and, in order to insure her power, deprived her own son of sight. The people, irritated by her conduct, placed Nicephorus on the throne, who banished her to Lesbos. B. at Athens; D. at Lesbos, 803.

IRAZON, Henry, i-re-ton, a republican general, and son-in-law of Cromwell, greatly distinguished himself in the civil war, on the side of the Parliament. He studied at Oxford, in which university he took the degree of B.A., and subsequently became a student of the Middle Temple. When the revolution broke out, he entered the parliamentary army, and soon rose to the rank of colonel. At the battle of Naseby, he, after fighting very bravely, was taken prisoner by the royalists, but escaped. He was appointed to command in Ireland, where he died. His body was conveyed to England, and interred in Westminster Abbey; but, at the Restoration, it was taken up and hung at Tyburn, with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw. B. in Nottinghamshire, 1610; D. at Limerick, 1651.

IRVING, Rev. Edward, i-ving, a minister of the Scottish church, and founder of the sect called Irvingites. After finishing his education at the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.A., he is said to have led the life, for a short period, of a strolling player. In 1811 he became master of the mathematical school of Haddington, and, a year afterwards, was appointed head of the academy at Kirkcaldy, where he remained for seven years, being then ordained minister of the Scottish church. After having preached in several churches, he was appointed Dr. Chalmers's assistant at St. John's church, Glasgow, gaining so much reputation for eloquence that he was installed minister of the Scottish church in Hatton Garden, London. His tall figure, impressive style of preaching, and vigorous discourses, caused him to attain great popularity in this church; the most wealthy and accomplished Londoners crowding to hear him. Between the years 1823 and 1827 he published several discourses, lectures, and sermons. His church in Hatton Garden having been found too small for his congregation, a new building was erected for him by subscription, in Regent

Irving

Square, Gray's-Inn Road. This was opened in 1823, and he preached in this place with the same success as formerly. In November, 1830, he was charged with heresy by the presbytery of London, and a course of proceedings, extending over eighteen months, was instituted against him. About this time he introduced into his church what he termed "supernatural inspiration," but which his opponents called "the extravagances of the unknown tongues." In 1832 the London presbytery pronounced him unfitted for his charge, and the trustees of his church declared that "the Rev. Edward Irving had rendered himself unfit to remain a minister of the Caledonian church, Regent Square, and ought to be removed therefrom." On being suspended from his duties, he preached to small congregations in Gray's-Inn Road, and in Newman Street, Oxford Street. In 1833 the presbytery of Annan sentenced him to be deposed from the ministry. His health gave way soon afterwards. B. at Annan, 1792; D. at Glasgow, 1834. (See "Life," by Mrs. Oliphant, published in 1862.)

IRVING, Washington, a distinguished American author, whose parentage on both sides was British. His father, originally a petty officer in his Britannic majesty's naval service, was a native of Shapinsha, one of the Orkney Islands; and his mother, born at Falmouth, was granddaughter of an English clergyman. The descent of the Orcadian Irvings (or Irvines) has been traced, without a break, "through James the 'Lawman,' or chief judge of the Orkneys in 1560, and 'John off Erwyno' of 1438, mentioned in 'Wilson's Archaeological and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland,' to the first Orkney Irvine and earliest cadet of Drum, William de Erwin, an inhabitant of Kirkwall in 1369, while the islands yet owned the sway of Magnus V., the last of the Norwegian earls." Wm. Irving, having settled as a merchant in New York, where he was a deacon of the Presbyterian Church, became the father of eleven children of whom Washington (born in 1783) was the youngest. He was sent to school in his fourth year, and at a very early age evinced a passion for reading. He was particularly fond of voyages and travels, which produced such an effect on him that at the age of 14 he was on the point of cloping from home and engaging as a sailor. This predilection for the sea was probably inherited, as an inseparable part of his natural constitution, from his ancestors, the adventurous denizens of the "storm-swept Orcaades." His father having died while Washington was still young, his education, which thenceforth took place at home, devolved upon his elder brothers, young men of considerable attainments. His health, during youth and early manhood, was exceedingly delicate; and though his studies were retarded by this circumstance, his imagination and perceptive faculties gained by it; for, unable to sit closely to his books, he spent a great deal of his time in wandering about Manhattan Island, observing the picturesque aspects of nature in that place, and listening to the odd traditions of the old Dutch and other settlers. It is to these first impressions of his youth, that so much of the quaint piquancy of his writings is due. His literary career was commenced in 1802, with a number of sketches contributed to the "New York Morning Chronicle," entitled "Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle." His health was, however, so frail that he was compelled to travel, with a view to its renovation. He crossed the Atlantic, and visited France, Italy, Switzerland, Holland, and England. On his return to New York, he, together with Mr. Kirke Paulding, commenced a series of humorous and graphic sketches, which were published under the title of "Salmagundi." This work obtained a considerable degree of popularity, but was suddenly stopped at the end of 1807. After this he wrote a number of tales and essays for the magazines and newspapers, and about the same time began to study the law; but although he was admitted to the bar, he never practised as a barrister. In 1809 was published the humorous "History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker," which instantly made Irving one of the most popular of American writers. On the breaking out of war between England and the United States, a few years afterwards, he was attached, with the rank of colonel, to the staff of General Tompkins, governor of New York. On the establishment of peace, he went to Liverpool to represent the commercial house of Irving, Brothers, a firm which subsequently failed; whereupon Washington Irving occupied himself exclusively with literature. After having travelled over England, he commenced his "Sketch-Book," forwarding his manuscript in instalments to New York, where it was published. The very favourable manner in which the London critics spoke of this work induced Irving to seek a publisher for it in England. He was for a long time unsuccessful in this attempt, and having already met with an hospitable reception at Abbotsford, by Sir Walter Scott, he now sought that gentleman's advice. Although Scott could not help him to a publisher, he offered to procure him the post of editor for a periodical then about to be started in Edinburgh. Irving declined this kind proposal. "My whole course of life," he said, "has been desultory, and I am unfitted for any periodically-recurring task, or any stipulated labour of body or mind. I have no command of my talents, such as they are, and have to watch the varyings of my mind as I should those of a weathercock. Practice and training may bring me more into rule, but at present I am as useless for regular service as one of my own country Indians, or a Don Cossack." He afterwards purposed to issue an English edition of his "Sketch-Book," at his own risk, but his publisher failed when the first volume only had been produced. The book became so rapidly popular, however, on both sides of the Atlantic, that Mr. Murray resolved to become its English publisher, and henceforth Irving's reputation was made. A second volume of the "Sketch-Book," "Bracebridge Hall," and the "Tales of a Traveller," succeeded, the last work appearing in 1824; the author's residence during the interval of their composition being at London and Paris. In 1826 he set out for Madrid, for the purpose of examining some important documents relative to Columbus, which had just been discovered in a Jesuit college in that city. His researches in the Spanish archives, as well as his explorations of the old cities of Spain, resulted in the publication of several of his most popular books,—the "History of the Life and Voyages of Columbus," the "Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus," "The Conquest of Granada," and "Tales of the Alhambra." In 1829 he was appointed secretary of the American legation in London, the Royal Society of Literature awarding him one of its gold medals, and the university of Oxford conferring upon him its honorary degree of LL.D. about the same time. In 1832, "after an absence of seventeen years, he saw again the blue line of his native land," as he has said, and on landing, a most enthusiastic reception awaited him. Leaving New York soon afterwards in company with Mr. Ellsworth, the Indian commissioner, he travelled in the Far West, his knowledge of Indian and prairie life being reproduced in a series of entertaining works, the chief of which were "Tour on the Prairies," "Astoria, or Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains," and the "Adventures of Captain Bonneville." These were followed by a variety of sketches supplied to the American periodicals. In 1841 he was nominated minister plenipotentiary to the Court of Spain, representing his country with distinguished success at Madrid, till 1848, when he was, at his own wish, recalled. Washington Irving hereupon retired to his beautiful estate on the banks of the Hudson, about 25 miles from New York, which he had purchased a few years before. In this charming retreat he lived, engaged in literary labour, till his death; narrating the rise and progress of Mahometanism in his "Lives of Mahomet and his Successors," and the adventures of Oliver Goldsmith, in his biography of that poet and essayist. Besides these, he revised his complete works, and published a collected edition of them. His last productions were "Chronicles of Woolfert's Roost," a series of sketches in the style of the old "Sketch-Book," and the "Life of Washington," the first volume of which was published in 1855; and this, as well as the concluding volumes, was hailed with an enthusiastic reception in America, while in England it became as popular as the previous efforts of its author. B. at New York, 1783; D. at Sunnyside, 1859. (See "Life," by his nephew, published in 1862.)

IRWIN, Eyles, er'-win, a distinguished civil servant of the East India Company, was born of Irish parents in Calcutta, and received his education in England. He obtained an appointment in the E.I.C.'s civil service in 1767, but was suspended in 1777 for his adherence to Lord Pigot. He was afterwards restored, however, and in 1792 was appointed superintendent of the company's affairs in China, where he remained for several years. He was the author of "Adventures during a voyage up the Red Sea, and a journey across the Desert," "Eastern Eclogues," "Epistle to Mr. Hayley," "An Inquiry into the Feasibility of Bonaparte's Expedition to the East," "Ode on the Death of Hyder Ali," "Napoleon on the Vanity of Human Ambition," &c. B. 1738; D. 1817.

ISAAC COMMENUS, is'-ak com'-ne-nus, a Greek emperor, was proclaimed in 1057, in room of Michael Stratiotes, who was deposed. His conduct was marked by valour and prudence, till he meddled with the property of the ecclesiastics, who excited general discontent against him. He then retired to a monastery, and ceded the crown to Constantine Ducas in 1059. D. 1081.

ISAAC ANGELUS, an'-jel-us, a Greek emperor, who obtained the crown after putting to death Andronicus Comnenus, in 1185. He was a voluptuous prince, and his brother, Alexius, having gained over his officers, seized the throne, and threw him into prison, where he was deprived of his eyes in 1195. After the death of Alexius, he was released from confinement, and again placed on the throne. B. 1154; D. in 1204.

ISAAC KARO, ka'-ro, a Spanish rabbi, who was forced to quit Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand and Isabella, in 1499, which compelled the Jews to leave that country within four months, or turn Christians. He first went to Portugal, and thence to Jerusalem, where he led a retired life. He wrote a "Commentary on the Pentateuch," printed at Amsterdam, in 1708.

ISABELLA, is'-a-bel'-la, daughter of Philip le Bel, king of France, married in 1308, Edward II. king of England. Neglected by her husband, who gave himself up to the guidance of unworthy favourites, Isabella sought assistance on the continent, and returning at the head of 3000 men, took her husband prisoner, and confined him in Berkeley Castle, where he was shortly afterwards murdered. Isabella having given herself up to loose manners, her son, Edward III., seized and hanged her paramour, Mortimer, and committed his mother to a fortress, where she died in 1358. B. 1292. It was mainly in right of Isabella that Edward founded his pretensions to the French crown—a claim which led to the long and sanguinary wars of the Edwards and Henries in France.

ISABELLA OF CASTILE, queen of Spain, was the daughter of John II., and married, in 1469, Ferdinand V., king of Aragon. The conquest of Granada, and the discovery of America by Columbus, distinguished their reign. She was a woman of great abilities. B. 1450; D. 1504. (See FERDINAND.)

ISABELLA II., queen of Spain, succeeded to the crown in 1833, on the death of her father, Ferdinand VII., in accordance with a decree of the Cortes, made three years previously, by which the salic law, or law excluding females from the throne, was set aside. Her uncle Don Carlos, who would have succeeded to the throne had not the salic law been repealed, refused to take the oath of allegiance, and a civil war broke out in consequence. This was terminated in 1840, the Carlists being totally defeated, and the chiefs of the party expelled the kingdom. She did not attain her majority till the year 1843, her mother having been appointed queen-regent meanwhile; but, in 1840, she was compelled to resign in favour of Espartero, who was nominated regent in her stead. In 1846 the queen married her cousin, Don Francisco de Assis, her younger sister becoming the wife of the Duc de Montpensier, youngest son of the late Louis Philippe, king of the French. Her reign was troubled by repeated insurrections, and at last, in 1868, in consequence of the revolt of the army and navy, and a general rising of the people under Prim, Serrano, and Topete, she was compelled to quit Spain and retire to Paris. B. at Madrid, 1830.

ISABELLA OF ARAGON was the daughter of Alphonso, duke of Calabria, the son of Ferdinand, king of Naples. In 1499, she was espoused to John Galeazzo Sforza, then a minor under the guardianship of his uncle, Luigi Sforza, who, on seeing Isabella, fell in love with her. The lovers having been married by proxy only, Luigi contrived by divers means to keep them asunder, and declared his passion to Isabella, who repulsed him, and exhorted her husband to shake off his uncle's yoke. Luigi soon afterwards married Alphonsina, daughter of the duke of Ferrara, a woman of an ambitious and intriguing spirit, and, by their contrivance, John Galeazzo was poisoned. Luigi then assumed the sovereignty, and Isabella sought refuge at Naples, which soon after was taken by the French, and she had to lament the loss of all her family. She then retired to a small town in the kingdom of Naples, which had been assigned her for a residence. D. 1524.

ISABELLA, queen of Hungary, was the sister of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, and in 1539 married John Zapolski, king of Hungary. In 1540 she was delivered of a son while her husband was besieging the castle of Fogarras, and he was so delighted at the news, that he gave a splendid feast to his troops, and died of intemperance on the occasion. Isabella, unable to cope with the forces of Ferdinand of Austria, with whom her husband had engaged in war, called to her aid Solymán, sultan of the Turks, who treacherously seized the capital of her dominions, and obliged her to retire to Transylvania, which country she was afterwards forced to yield to Ferdinand. She was then obliged to retreat to Cassovia, and on the road wrote these Latin words on a tree,—Sic fata volunt.—"So fate decrees." In 1556 she recovered Transylvania; but, when her son came of age, she refused him a share in the government. D. 1561.

ISÆUS, is'-e-us, a Greek orator of Chalcis, who went to Athens and became the master of Demosthenes, who imitated his style in preference to that of Isocrates. Sir William Jones translated his ten orations in 1780, the remainder of his 64 great speeches having been lost.

ISÆUS, another Greek orator, who went to Rome about 97 A.D. Pliny the younger states him to have been a great master of eloquence and rhetoric.

ISCANUS, Josephus, or Joseph of Exeter, is'-k'-nus, a distinguished writer of Latin poetry, who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion to Palestine, and was the author of an epic poem entitled "Antiocheis," or the deeds of Richard which the poet had himself witnessed. This is unfortunately lost; but another, on the Trojan war, is still extant. Warton styles Iscanus "the miracle of his age in classical composition." D. 1224.

ISDEGERDES, is-de-ger'-des, king of Persia, succeeded his uncle Sapor, and was debauched, cruel, and avaricious. He made war on the Eastern emperors, who refused to pay him tribute, obliged Theodosius the younger to make peace, and persecuted the Christians with severity. D. 420.

ISHMAEL (or ISMAIL) I., ish'-ma-le, founder of the dynasty of the Sophis of Persia, was a descendant of Ali, son-in-law of Mohammed, and began his reign in 1505. He gained many victories, and established the Persian throne upon a solid basis. D. 1523.

ISHMAEL II. succeeded Thamas on the throne of Persia in 1576. He was a sanguinary prince, and murdered eight of his brothers. He was poisoned, in 1579, by his sister, out of zeal for the Turkish religion, Ishmael being of a sect held heretical by the other Mohammedans.

ISIDORE, Sr., is'-se-dor, bishop of Seville, a celebrated Spanish prelate, and one of the most learned men of his time, wrote a number of books on biblical and classical subjects, and some commentaries on the Old and New Testaments. B. at Carthage, 566; D. 636.

ISIDORE, Sr., surnamed of Pelusium, from his retiring to a cell near that place, was the disciple of St. Chrysostom, and, when young, embraced the monastic life. He wrote letters, and other pieces, some of which are extant. D. about 440.

ISIDORUS OF CHARAX, is-i-dor'-us, a Greek historian and geographer, who wrote a "Description of the Parthian Empire." He is said to have lived during the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, three centuries before the Christian era.

ISINGRINUS, Michael, i-sin-grin'-us, a celebrated printer of Bale, in the 16th century, who executed in Greek the works of Aristotle, with paper and types superior to those of Aldus Manutius. He published, also, with the same elegance and correctness, "The History of Plants," by Fuchs.

ISMENIAS, is-me'-ne-as, a Theban general, who was sent on an embassy to the king of Persia. No person being admitted to the royal presence without prostration, Ismenias was resolved not to commit an action so degrading to his country. At his introduction, he dropped his ring on the ground, and the act of taking it up was mistaken for submissive homage, in consequence of which he was favourably received.—A Theban musician, who being taken prisoner by the Scythians, and playing before their king, the monarch observed that he liked the music of Ismenias better than the braying of an ass.

ISOCRATES, i-sol'-ra-tes, a celebrated Greek orator, who, although master of a sweet and graceful style, was prevented by a certain weakness of voice from haranguing in public. It was to his power as a teacher of oratory that his reputation was due. His orations, 21 of which are extant, were intrusted to others for delivery. The defeat of the Athenians at Chæronea, by Philip of Macedon, so affected Isocrates' spirits that he refused to partake of food, and died after four days of fasting. D. at Athens, 436 B.C.; D. 338 B.C.

ITURBIDE, Augustin, e-toor'-id-de, emperor of Mexico, was a native of Valladolid, in New Spain, and entered the military service at the age of 17. In 1810 he was a lieutenant in the provincial regiment of his native city, but his military skill and valour becoming conspicuous, led to his further advancement; so that by 1816 he had risen to the command of the army which occupied the provinces of Guanajuato and Valladolid. He was, however, accused of want of fidelity to the royal cause; and, though acquitted of the imputation, the disgust which he felt in consequence of the charge led him to retire for a time from active service. Events subsequently opened a new career for his ambition. He was invited to take the command of an army destined for the South, and marched to Acapulco, in the latter part of 1819. There he matured a plan, the professed object of which was the emancipation of Mexico from the yoke of Spain, the independence of the country, the protection of religion, and the union of the Spaniards and Mexicans. On the strength of this project, Iturbide continued his march to Queretaro, and was soon joined by Victoria, the most devoted of the friends of liberty. The road to power was now fairly opened before Iturbide. He took possession of the capital in the name of the nation, and established a regency, consisting of members nominated by himself, and wholly under his control. Finding that the republicans saw through his intentions, and were opposed to his domination, he resolved to preserve his authority by boldly usurping the crown; and accordingly, through the devotion of his troops, and with the concurrence of a portion of the deputies, he was proclaimed emperor, May 18, 1822. It was decreed that the crown should be hereditary in the family of Iturbide; that a million and a half of dollars should be his yearly dotation; the title of prince was conferred on his sons, and an order of knighthood and other accessories of a monarchy, were established. The friends of free institutions, overawed and kept down by the power of the usurper, fled to their wonted retreats, or acquiesced until a fitting season should arrive for resisting with union and success. But they did not long submit to a state of things so adverse to their wishes. Iturbide was driven by his necessities to make fresh exactions, which exasperated the minds of the people, already disgusted with successive usurpations. Defection became general among the officers of the army, and in all the provinces, so that Iturbide saw that his cause was hopeless, and hastily assembling at the capital the dispersed members of Congress, he tendered to them his abdication of the crown, March 20, 1823. Congress agreed to grant him a large yearly pension, on condition of his leaving the Mexican territory for ever, and residing somewhere in Italy; they also made suitable provision for his family in case of his death. He proceeded to the coast, under the escort of General Bravo, and embarked, May 11, 1823, for Leghorn. He might have lived comfortably in a beautiful villa in Tuscany, had he not been impelled by ambition to attempt the recovery of his empire. With this object he left Italy for England, and embarked for Mexico, May 11, 1824, precisely a year after his departure from it, and arrived in sight of the port of Soto la Marina, July 14. During Iturbide's absence, the Mexicans had established a republican constitution, and the ex-emperor found no adherents or friends in the nation. The government having been informed of his leaving Italy, suspected his design, and a decree was passed, dated April 23, 1824, declaring him to be proscribed as a traitor, and enacting that, in case he landed in the country, the mere fact should render him a public enemy. Deceived in regard to the reception which awaited him, Iturbide landed at Soto la Marina, accompanied only by his secretary, Beneski, and was immediately arrested by order of La Garza, commander of the province of New Santander, to whom he had applied for passports, pretending that they were for persons who had visited Mexico on a mining speculation. La Garza conducted his prisoner to Padilla, the capital of the province, and demanded instructions how to act from the local legislature. Iturbide's fate was delayed only a short time; sentence of immediate death was pronounced; and while preparations for executing the sentence were making, he addressed the assembled people, protesting his innocence of treasonable purposes, and exhorting them to observe the duties of patriotism, religion, and civil subordination. This person is admitted to have possessed high military talents, and considerable force of character; and had he been less swayed by personal ambition, he might have won the fame of being the Washington of South America—a character and title which some were, at one time, inclined to accord to him. B. 1784; shot, July 19, 1824.

IVANOF, Feodor Feodorovitch, d'-van-ov, a Russian dramatist, first served in the army, from which he was afterwards removed to the commissariat department. He was the author of several comedies, and a tragedy called "Martha, or the Conquest of Novgorod." B. 1777; D. 1816.

IVAN (or JOHN) I., d'-ran, succeeded Jurie, or George II. in 1323, in the principalities of Vladimir, Moscow, and Novgorod, and reigned during twelve years, with the title of grand-duke of Moscow. He was succeeded by Simon, surnamed the Proud. D. 1340.

IVAN II. reigned between the years 1353-59. He was a mild and wise ruler, and warred with success against the Tartars.

IVAN III., Vasilivitch, reigned from 1462 to 1505. He delivered his country from the Tartars in 1481, brought all the provinces of Russia under his sway, and took possession of Novgorod after a seven years' siege. He introduced the arts of civilization into his dominions. His second wife was Sophia, niece of the last Byzantine emperor. Ivan was the first to adopt the title of czar, having for his arms the double-headed eagle of Constantinople.

IVAN IV., surnamed the Terrible, ascended the throne at the age of four years, 1533. His mother was appointed regent, and sustained, in his name, a great struggle against the nobles of the kingdom. He attained his majority in 1544, and made war against the Poles, the Swedes, and the Tartars, all of whom were in turn vanquished. He committed numberless cruelties upon these peoples, as well as upon his own subjects. He killed with his own hand his eldest son; but his reign was marked by a great advance in civilization. He definitely adopted the title of "czar," and added to it that of "autocrat." B. 1529; D. 1584.

IVAN V., Alexievitch, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother, Feodor Alexievitch, in 1682; but being of weak intellect, he was placed in a monastery, and the sceptre given to his brother Peter. The Princess Sophia, hoping to reign in the room of Ivan, excited an insurrection, which ended by the appointment of Ivan and Peter as joint sovereigns, and Sophia as co-regent. This government lasted six years, when Sophia having projected the death of Peter, that she might reign alone, the conspiracy was discovered, and the princess confined in a convent. From that time Peter reigned sole monarch. B. 1681; D. 1698.

IVAN VI., of Brunswick-Bevern, was declared czar when but three months old, after the death of his great-aunt, Anne Ivanovna, in 1740. Anne left him to the guardianship of the duke de Birén, who being deposed shortly after, the regency was transferred to the emperor's mother. In 1741 he was dethroned and confined in a fortress, whence he was carried away by a monk; but was retaken and placed in a monastery. B. 1740; murdered in prison, 1764.

published, in addition to works on heraldry and antiquities, "Remarks on the Garianonum of the Romans, the Site and Remains fixed and IVETAUX, Nicholas Vauquelin, Seigneur de, eed'-to, a French poet, who became preceptor to the duke de Vendôme, son of Gabrielle d'Estrées, and afterwards to Louis XIII. when dauphin; but his life was so irregular, that he was banished from court; on which he took a house in the Faubourg Saint-Germain, where he lived in luxury and debauchery. He wrote "The Institution of a Prince," and a number of stanzas, sonnets, and other poetical pieces. B. at Fresnaye, 1559; D. at Paris, 1649.

IVORY, James, i'-vo-re, an eminent mathematician, was the son of a watchmaker in Dundee, and was sent to the universities of St. Andrews and of Edinburgh, for the purpose of being educated for the Scottish church, but was engaged in 1786, as teacher in an academy at Dundee, and was subsequently a partner in a flax-spinning factory in Forfarshire. His unwearied pursuit of science, however, enabled him to undertake the duties of professor of mathematics at the Royal Military College in Buckinghamshire; and when that institution removed to Sandhurst, in Berkshire, he was continued in his post, and remained in it till his retirement into private life, in 1819. While professor at Sandhurst, and afterwards, he wrote a great number of very valuable mathematical books, besides contributing fifteen papers to the "Transactions of the Royal Society of London." An edition of Euclid; "A New Series for the Rectification of the Cube;" "A New Method of resolving Cubic Equations;" and a host of mathematical and astronomical treatises, were the result of his laborious life. He was fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, a member of the Royal Irish Academy and of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, and corresponding member of the learned societies of Paris, Berlin, and Göttingen. He enjoyed a pension of £300 per annum, from the year 1831 till his death, and was invested by William IV. with the Hanoverian Guelphic order of knighthood. B. at Dundee, 1766; D. in London, 1842.

IZAACKE, Richard, i'-zäk, an English antiquary, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and afterwards became chamberlain and town-clerk of Exeter, his native city, the history and memorials of which he wrote. This work was continued by his son. D. about 1723.

IAPHAB-EEN-TOFHAIL, ja'-a-fur-een-to-fail, an Arabian philosopher, supposed to have been the same with Averroes, who wrote a philosophical romance, called "The History of Hai-Ebn-Yokhdan," which was published in Latin by Pocock, at Oxford, in 1671, and in English by Ockley, in 1708. D. about 1193.

JABLONSKI, Theodore, ya-blons'-ke, counsellor of the court of Prussia, and secretary of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, published—"A French and German Dictionary," 1711; "A Course of Morality," 1713; and "A Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences." D. about 1740.

siastical counsellor at Berlin and president of the Academy. He was an able divine, and laboured earnestly, though without success, in endeavouring to promote a union between the Lutherans and the Calvinists. He wrote several theological works, and translated Bentley's "Boylean Lectures" into Latin. b. 1660; d. 1741.

JABLONSKI, Paul Ernest, nephew to the preceding, was the author of a very erudite treatise on the mythology of ancient Egypt, in 3 vols., and other able works, theological and antiquarian. d. 1757.

JACKSON, Thomas, jak'-son, a learned divine, who became president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and dean of Peterborough. His chief work was a "Commentary on the Apostles' Creed." b. at Durham, 1573; d. 1610.

JACKSON, Arthur, a nonconformist divine, who was ejected from the living of St. Faith's, in London, in 1662. He was fined £500 for refusing to give evidence against Christopher Love, and also imprisoned. At the Restoration he was chosen by the assembly of ministers to present a Bible to Charles II. He was also one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference. He wrote a judicious Commentary on the Bible. d. 1686.

JACKSON, John, an English divine, who became a prebendary of York, regius professor of Greek at Oxford, preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn, canon of Christchurch, and, in 1812, bishop of Oxford. He translated a tract on the "Siege" of Eratosthenes into Latin, published some sermons, and was a sound mathematician. b. 1750; d. 1815.

JACKSON, Robert, a physician, who, while in Jamaica, applied with success the affusion of cold water in fevers. He subsequently served as a regimental surgeon in the army, and finally settled at Stockton, near Durham. He wrote several treatises on the treatment of fever, particularly on the advantages of the application of cold water in that class of disorders. b. 1751; d. 1827.

JACKSON, John, an eminent English portrait painter, was apprenticed to his father, who was a tailor; but discovering a decided talent for the art in which he afterwards excelled, his abilities procured him the protection of Sir George Beaumont, through whose means he removed to London, and studied at the Royal Academy. At the time he entered the great theatre of art, Lawrence, Opie, Beechey, and other eminent masters, pre-occupied the particular branch he had chosen, and for a time Jackson contented himself with painting portraits in water-colours, in which he was very Wigston's Hospital, in Lancashire. He was an acute metaphysician, but a zealous advocate for Arianism, and wrote some tracts against the doctrine of the Trinity, and others against Collins and Tindal; but his best work is his "Chronological Antiquities," published in 2 vols. 4to, 1752. b. at Lensay, Yorkshire, 1686; d. 1763.

JACKSON, William, a musical composer and ingenious writer, who, having received a liberal education, was placed under the tuition of the organist of Exeter Cathedral, and afterwards with Mr. Travers, an eminent musician in London. In 1777 he was appointed organist in the cathedral of his native city, Exeter. He published many excellent songs, canzonets, hymns, and sonatas, of his own composition. His chief literary productions were, "Thirty Letters on various Subjects," "On the Present State of Music," and "The Four Ages," 8vo.—One of Mr. Jackson's sons was secretary to Lord Macartney in his embassy to China; another was ambassador to the king of Sardinia, and afterwards at Paris and Berlin. b. at Exeter, 1730; d. at the same place, 1813.

JACKSON, William, an Irishman, and a clergyman of the established church, who became notorious for his intrigues against the government towards the end of the 18th century. In early life he was chaplain to the duchess of Kingston, but going to France, became intimate with some of the revolutionary leaders, who sent him on a mission to revolutionize Britain. Failing in England, he went to Ireland, and was there detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with France. He was tried and convicted on this charge, April 23, 1795; and on being brought up for judgment on the 30th of the same month, he suddenly died in court, just as his counsel, Curran and Ponsonby, were about to move an arrest of judgment. On investigation, it was found that Jackson had taken poison.

JACKSON, Dr. William, bishop of Oxford, copied the works of the old masters surprised his contemporaries. He was elected royal academician in 1817; and in 1819 travelled through Italy, visited Rome with Mr. Chantrey, and was chosen a member of the Academy of St. Luke. Jackson "had an uncommon readiness and skill of hand, a rapid felicity of finish, which enabled him to dash off, at a few sittings, whatever he undertook; his colouring was deep, clear, and splendid; and in this he more resembled Reynolds than any artist since his day." b. in Yorkshire, 1773; d. 1831.

JACKSON, Andrew, an American general and president, was the son of an Irishman, who emigrated to America in 1765. At the breaking out of the War of Independence, he was studying theology in the Washaw Academy; but this event made himself and his two brothers soldiers. On the termination of the war with the mother country, he resolved to study the law, but abandoned it after a short time to resume his military career, fighting, on this occasion, against the Indians on the frontiers of the civilized settlements. In 1797 he was chosen senator, and shortly afterwards was appointed by the legislature of Tennessee major-general of the forces of that state. Up to the year 1812 he resided upon his farm at Nashville, on the Cumberland River; but on the renewal of hostilities between England and America in that year, he put himself at the head of some three thousand volunteers, and took up a defensive position in the lower country of the Mississippi. In 1814 the United States government conferred the rank of major-general upon him, and the next year he repulsed the British forces in their attack on New Orleans. For several subsequent years he commanded expeditions against the Indians, displaying both cruelty and recklessness in some of his proceedings. In 1821 he was nominated governor of the newly-acquired state of Florida; and, after holding it for a year, was again elected to represent the state of Tennessee in the senate. Jackson was elected president in 1823, and again in 1832. b. at Waxhaw, South Carolina, 1767; d. at Nashville, Tennessee, 1845.

JACKSON, Thomas Jefferson, better known as "Stonewall" Jackson, a general in the army of the Confederate States of America, was born in Virginia. In 1842 he entered West Point Military Academy as a cadet, and was breveted second lieutenant in the 1st corps of Artillery in 1846. When the Mexican war commenced he was attached to Magruder's Battery, and distinguished himself on several occasions. He obtained the rank of first lieutenant in 1847, and was breveted captain for his gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Chacabuso. He resigned his position in the national army in 1852, and subsequently officiated as professor of mathematics and military science in the State University of Virginia. When war broke out, in 1861, between the Federal and Confederate States, Jackson was appointed to a command in the Southern army, and proved himself an efficient and enterprising commander. He led the Southern troops at the battle of Ball's Bluff, where the Federals were completely defeated. He shortly afterwards made a dashing raid into the Shenandoah valley, then occupied by large numbers of Federal troops, carrying off considerable quantities of provisions and other stores, and completely baffling the efforts of General Fremont and others to intercept his retreat. In the series of battles which led to General McClellan's retreat to Harrison's Landing in July, 1862, Jackson played a distinguished part; and shortly afterwards made a forced march, with 40,000 men, carrying provisions for a few days only, and placed himself on the flank of General Pope's army at Manassas, the result of which daring manoeuvre was the complete defeat of the Federal army and its retreat to the lines around Washington. The Confederates now carried the war into Maryland, but not meeting with the support they expected, were retreating into Virginia, when attacked first at South Mountain, and afterwards at Antietam, where desperate battles were fought. Jackson was not engaged in these encounters, having gone to attack Harper's Ferry, a military store-station of considerable importance, which he reduced, captured large quantities of stores, which he scoured, and then rejoined the army in time to cover the retreat of General Lee across the Potomac, which was accomplished under Jackson's direction without the slightest loss either of men or material. In subsequent operations he continued to play a prominent part until May 2, 1863, when, after the battle of Chancellorsville, he was fired on by his own men by mistake, and died in hospital a week after. b. 1826.

JACOB, Ben Naphthali, jai'-kob, a learned Jew of the 5th century, was educated in the school of Tiberias, in Palestine. The invention of the Masoretic points and accents is ascribed to him and Ben Aser.

JACOB, Al Bardai, a disciple of Severus, patriarch of Constantinople, was one of the principal leaders of the Eutychians; on which account that sect gained the name of Jacobites.

JACOB, Ben Hajim, a rabbi of the 16th century, who published a collection of the Masora at Venice, in 1523, in 4 vols., with the text of the Bible, a work greatly esteemed by the Jews.

Jacob

JACOB, a Cistercian monk of Hungary, who quitted his order in 1312, under pretence of being called to deliver the Holy Land from the infidels. He gathered together a prodigious number of fanatics in Germany and France, who being chiefly peasants, obtained the name of the Shepherds. When St. Louis, king of France, was taken by the Saracens, Jacob pretended that the Holy Virgin had commanded him to preach a crusade for his deliverance. The queen for some time tolerated this extravagance, but at last caused the rabble to be dispersed, and Jacob was shortly afterwards slain by a butcher.

JACOB, Henry, jai'-kob, a learned divine, was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A., after which he obtained a living. He is said to have left the church, and to have established the first congregation of Independents in England. b. 1581; d. about 1625.

JACOB, Henry, son of the above, was educated under Erpenius, and acquired a considerable knowledge of the Oriental languages. On his return to England, he entered at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became fellow, but was deprived of this in the civil wars. He wrote some works, which were never printed; but Wood ascribes to him the "Dolphi Phœnicantes," published by Dickenson. b. 1603; d. at Canterbury, 1652.

JACOB, Giles, an industrious English lawyer, who published, among a great variety of works, a Law Dictionary, and the "Lives and Characters of English Poets." b. 1690; d. 1744.

JACOB, John, the distinguished commander of the Scinde Horse. His first appointment was to the Bombay artillery, which he entered in 1827, and with this corps, composed not of natives, but of Europeans, he passed his first seven years of service. At the expiration of this period, he was intrusted with a small detached command, comprising a company of native artillery and a field battery; after which essay of his powers, he proceeded, in the usual way of Indian promotion, to assume civil instead of military duties, and served for a short time in the provincial administration of Guzerat. From these employments, however, he was soon summoned by the outbreak of war; and participated, as an artillery officer, in the perils and glories of the Affghan campaign. He did not, however, accompany the expedition all the way to Cabul; for, before the disastrous retreat from that city had been consummated, he received his appointment in the peculiar sphere of duty with which his name was inseparably connected from that hour to the day of his death. In the year 1839, when all north-western India was in a ferment, it was determined to raise some squadrons of irregular horse for service in those parts; and the idea had been so far developed, that some 500 swarthy cavaliers stood enrolled, in 1841, as the Scinde Horse. This regiment was afterwards augmented, and Colonel Outram, perceiving Jacob's abilities, selected the young artillery lieutenant for the chief command. The campaigns and conquest of Scinde offered, of course, the most admirable opportunities for further distinction; and, on the field of Meanee, Jacob's Horse, and Jacob himself, established a name which was never afterwards sullied or obscured. After Scinde had been annexed, it became necessary to protect it as a frontier province, and in this service a prominent part was assigned to the Scinde Horse. Owing partly to the anomalous character of the territorial government, and partly, no doubt, to the confidence reposed in Jacob's personal abilities, the Seinde Horse were left almost entirely to themselves. The results soon became most remarkable. From a few troops, the force was gradually expanded till it included two strong regiments, and mustered 1600 of the best horse-men in India, the commander of the whole being Brigadier Jacob, assisted by four Europeans and a number of native officers. But, although formidable to those whose occupation was rapine and plunder, Jacob was a benefactor to the people over whom he virtually ruled. On the spot where his troops had encamped, which was a sterile waste for miles around, Jacob, in less than thirteen years, had built a town containing 30,000 people, and the district was transformed into one fertile garden. This city was called Jacobabad. It was here that he ruled, wrote, made experiments in gunnery, and invented the valuable rifle called after his name. But, although still a young man, he, in the year 1858, gave sudden signs of a break-up of constitution. The ardent soldier had exhausted even his iron frame; a brain-fever ensued, and in a few days he was carried off. b. 1813; d. at Jacobabad, 1858.

JACOBÆUS, Oliver, jū-ko-be-us, a Danish physician, who became professor of philosophy and physic at Copenhagen. He wrote a compendium of medicine, and a number of Latin poems. b. in the Isle of Jutland, 1650; d. at Copenhagen, 1707.

JACOBI, Frederick Henry, ya-ko-be, a German metaphysical philosopher, who occupied several distinguished posts under the government of Düsseldorf, and, in 1804, became president of the Academy of Sciences at Munich. He published a great number of literary and philosophical works, in some of which he combated the doctrines of Kant. His principal works are "Letters on the Doctrines of Spinoza," "Hume and Belief," or Idealism and Realism," and "Letter to Fichte." His complete works were published at Leipzig in 1820. b. at Düsseldorf, 1743; d. 1810.

JACOBI, John George, a German poet, was a native of Düsseldorf; studied at Göttingen; was professor of philosophy and eloquence at Halle; and, subsequently, of the belles lettres at Friburg, which he retained during his life. The style of Jacobi was formed on that of the lighter French poets, and possessed much ease and gaiety. b. 1719; d. 1814.

JACOBS, Lucas, ja-ls-ls, commonly called Lucas van Leyden, a painter, studied under his father, Hugh Jacobs, and next under Cornelius Engelbrecht. Many of his pictures in oil and distemper are to be found on the continent; but he is now best known by his engravings. b. at Leyden, 1594; d. 1583.

JACOBS, Jurian, a painter of the Flemish school, was the disciple of Francis Snyders, whose manner he imitated. In his historical pieces he introduced animals painted in a masterly manner. b. in Switzerland, 1610; d. 1664.

JACOBS, Frederic, an eminent philological writer, became, in 1785, a teacher in the gymnasium of his native city, Gotha, in Saxony, where he published a number of excellent works, of which, besides those of a critical or philological character, may be noticed his "School for Women," 7 vols., and "Tales," 5 vols. b. 1761; d. 1847.

JACOMBS, Thomas, jav-komb, a nonconformist divine, who was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and afterwards at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Trinity College. In 1647 he removed to London, and had the living of St. Martin, Ludgate, of which he was deprived for nonconformity in 1662. He was then taken into the family of the countess of Exeter. He wrote several theological works. b. in Leicestershire, 1622; d. 1687.

JACOPONE, or Jacopo da Todi, ya-co-po-nai, an Italian poet, famous for his "Sacred Canticles," and for being the author of the "Stabat Mater." His canticles were printed at Venice in 1617. b. 1306.

JACOTOT, Jean Joseph, zhak-o-to, originally a captain of artillery in Napoleon's army, and subsequently sub-director of the Polytechnic School, was deprived of his office at the Restoration for having been a member of the chamber during the "hundred days." Retiring to Belgium, he there conceived and put into partial practice a new system of education, on the principle that all intelligences are equal, the only difference between man and man being the result of circumstances more than of nature. He left several works upon the subject, which are interesting for frequency, if not for correctness. b. 1770; d. 1814.

JACQUAUD, Joseph Marie, jav-ar-l, a celebrated mechanician, and inventor of the Jacquard loom, was the son of a poor weaver, and is said to have had no school education, having taught himself to read and write. From an early age he evinced a great aptitude for mechanical studies. After having inherited his father's looms and stock in trade, he, for some time, worked as a weaver; but was subsequently compelled to sell all his working apparatus, having contracted many debts through his unfortunate experiments in weaving, cutlery, and type-founding. He served with the republican army in the defence of Lyons and on the Rhine; but afterwards returned to his native city, and applied himself energetically to perfect the splendid piece of mechanism which bears his name, and which is now extensively employed. b. at Lyons, 1752; d. at Oullins, near Lyons, 1834.

JACQUELOT, Isaac, zhak-ls, a learned French Protestant, was the son of a minister at Vassy. At the age of 21 he became assistant to his father; but, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he went to Heidelberg and thence to the Hague. The king of Prussia invited him to his capital, where he became his majesty's chaplain, and had a pension. He wrote "Dissertations on the Existence of God," three pamphlets against "Bayle's Dictionary," "Dissertations on the Messiah," "A Treatise on the Inspiration of the Scriptures," "Letters to the Bishops of France," sermons, a work against Socinianism, &c. b. 1647; d. 1708.

JACQUET, Louis, zhak-kai, a French writer and ecclesiastic, who wrote an ingenious parallel between the Greek and French tragic poets, and some prize essays, which were rewarded by the Academy of Besançon. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Rousseau, whom in disposition and manners he greatly resembled. b. at Lyons, 1732; d. 1793.

JACQUIN, Nicholas Joseph, ya-quín, a celebrated botanist, after having studied medicine at Antwerp and Louvain, was induced by his countryman, Van Swieten, to visit Vienna, when the emperor Francis I. sent him to the West Indies to collect plants for the botanical gardens of Vienna and Schoenbrunn; and after an absence of six years, he returned with a superb collection. Two years afterwards appeared his "Catalogue of Plants growing in the Neighbourhood of Vienna;" and in 1773 a magnificent work, entitled "Flora Austriaca," with 500 coloured engravings. He was appointed to various offices, and was created a baron in 1806. B. at Leyden, 1727; D. 1817.

Jaddus

JADDUS, jūd'-dus, high priest of the Jews, who, when Alexander the Great intended to pillage Jerusalem and the temple, went to meet him in his pontifical robes, and the sight so struck the victor, that he fell at the feet of Jaddus, declaring he had seen in a vision a man dressed in precisely the same garments, who had promised him the empire of Asia. This so altered Alexander's sentiments, that he offered sacrifices to the God of Israel.

JADELOT, Nicolas, zhad'-Jo, a French physician, who wrote "The Picture of Animal Economy," a "Complete Course of Anatomy," and a "Pharmacopœia for the Poor." B. at Nancy, 1736; D. same place, 1793.

JAEGER, John Wolfgang, yai'-jer, a Lutheran divine, who became preacher of the cathedral in his native city, chancellor of the university, and provost of the church of Tübingen. He wrote several works, the chief of which are,—"Ecclesiastical History compared with Profane;" "A Compendium of Divinity;" "The Life of Spinoza." B. at Stuttgart, 1647; D. 1720.

JAGELLONS, ja'-gel-lons, the name of an ancient dynasty of the grand-duchy of Lithuania, which afterwards gave monarchs to Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia. Its founder was the grand-duke Jagellon, who, in 1386, married Hedwige, daughter of the king of Hungary and Poland. He subsequently embraced the Christian religion, and became king of Poland, under the title of Ladislas V. His descendants reigned both in Lithuania and Poland, but Alexander Jagellon united both crowns in 1501.—Several Jagellons reigned at a later period in Hungary and Bohemia.

JACO, Richard, jai'-go, an English poet, was educated at University College, Oxford, entered into orders, and in 1724 obtained the vicarage of Snittersfield, in Warwickshire. In 1771 he was presented to the living of Kilmcote, in Leicestershire. His "Elegy on the Blackbirds," first published in the "Adventurer," was attributed to different writers. His principal performance is a descriptive poem, entitled "Edgehill." B. in Warwickshire, 1715; D. 1781.

JAJEN, Johann, yan, a learned German orientalist, who was professor of theology and of the Oriental languages at the university of Vienna; wrote grammars of the Arabian, Hebrew, Syriac, and Chaldean tongues; and, in 1800, published an important work on Biblical Archaeology, which has been translated into English. B. at Taswitz, Moravia, 1750; D. at Vienna, 1815.

JANN, Otto, a German writer and archaeologist, who was born at Kiel, in the now Prussian duchy of Holstein, and studied under Lachmann and Gerhardt, at Berlin. After lecturing in his native town on archaeology and philology, he was made professor of the latter science at Leipsic, but was deprived of his office for the part he took in the attempts to sever Holstein from Denmark in 1813 and 1849. He has written a life of Mozart. B. 1813.

JAILLOT, Hubert Alexis, zhai'-lo, geographer to the French king, was at first a sculptor; but having married the daughter of a map-colourer, he turned his attention to geography. He engraved many maps and charts, particularly the great maps of France, that of Lorraine being his best work. In 1669 he published a set of maps, drawn by Sanson, and engraved by himself. D. 1712.

JAMBlichus, jam'-ble-cus, (see IAMBlichus) a Platonic philosopher.

JAMES, St., of Compostella, jaims, the patron saint of Spain. This is the name given by the Spanish Roman Catholics to St. James the Great, the inhabitants of Compostella, in Spain, pretending to possess his body enshrined in their cathedral.

SOVEREIGNS OF SCOTLAND.

JAMES I., king of Scotland, the son of Robert III., was taken by the English on his passage to France, and kept in confinement 18 years. In 1423 he obtained his liberty on marrying Joanna Beaufort, daughter of the earl of Somerset, whom he had fallen in love with from seeing her walking in the royal gardens at Windsor while he was a prisoner there, and who is believed to be the lady alluded to in James's pleasing poem of the "King's Quhair." On his return to Scotland, he severely punished his uncle, the duke of Albany, and others, who had misgoverned the country in his absence, in consequence of which a conspiracy was formed, and he was murdered in his private apartments in 1437. B. 1394. James I. was a most accomplished gentleman, and a poet of no little merit. He invented a sort of plaintive melody, which was greatly admired and imitated in Italy, in which country he was, in consequence, long remembered with respect. He was one of the most skilful harpers of his time, and excelled all competitors in the use of that instrument. Three compositions of his have come down to us—"Christ's Kirk on the Green," the "King's Quhair," and "Peebles at the Play"—which exhibit no mean degree of intellectual power and literary skill.

JAMES II., king of Scotland, succeeded the preceding king, his father, at the age of seven years. He assisted Charles VII. of France against the English, and punished rigorously those lords who had revolted against him. B. 1431; killed by the bursting of a gun at the siege of Roxburgh, 1460.

JAMES III. was the son and successor of the above, and ascended the throne in 1460. He was a weak, priest-ridden king, and was charged with having committed so many cruelties, and being so entirely guided by favourites, that his subjects revolted, and defeated the king at Sauchie-Burn, near Stirling. James fled from the field, but fell from his horse, and was murdered in a mill near the battle-field. Some historians maintain that the character of James has been greatly misrepresented by his contemporaries, and consequently misunderstood by posterity. According to their view, James was more of a scholar and man of taste than was suited to the rude and turbulent times in which he lived, and that his patronage of art, particularly architecture, and the favour he bestowed on its professors, provoked the hostility of the barons, and led to his melancholy fate. (See COCHRAN, Robert; and DOUGLAS, Archibald, "Bell-the-Cat.") B. about 1453; killed, 1482.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

James IV.

JAMES IV. succeeded his father, the last mentioned, at the age of about 15 years. He had been made a tool of by the discontented and turbulent barons, who, having levied an army, placed the prince at the head of it, and the result was the defeat and death of the king near Sauchie-Burn, as mentioned above. James IV. never forgave himself for his share in this transaction, and, it is said, wore an iron belt round his waist as a penance for his filial disobedience. He afterwards defeated the rebellious lords, induced the barons to relinquish the gloomy isolation in which they lived on their estates during the reign of his father, introduced order in the administration of the law, and greatly encouraged the development of the industry and commerce of the kingdom. Under the advice of Sir Andrew Wood, of Largo, he formed a navy, which even then proved itself formidable to that of England. With the ruler of that country, however, Henry VII., James cultivated amity, and married his daughter, the Princess Margaret. But after the death of the first Tudor king, the relations between the two countries became less cordial; and, on Henry VIII. invading France, James gave assistance to Louis XII., and having raised an army, including almost every man capable of bearing arms, marched into England, but was defeated at Flodden Field, in 1513, by the earl of Surrey, and himself and nearly the whole of his army perished. b. about 1473. This monarch's character and tragic fate are strikingly depicted by Sir Walter Scott in "Marmion."

JAMES V., the son of the above, was only a year old at the time of his father's death. At the age of 17 he assumed the government, quelled the power, pride, and turbulence of the barons, particularly the Douglasses, who had long held him in tutelage, and assisted Francis I. of France against the emperor Charles V., for which the French king gave him his daughter Margaret in marriage. On her decease, he married Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. On his death, James left his crown to the beautiful and unhappy Mary queen of Scots, his daughter. b. 1512; d. 1542. James was of a romantic and adventure-seeking disposition, which he indulged by wandering in disguise through the country, both to gratify his own inclination and to see for himself how the people were treated, for his care and protection of whom he was called the "Commons' King." Many songs, ballads, poems, and plays have been founded on the adventures of James V.,—among which may be mentioned the "Lady of the Lake," by Sir Walter Scott; a drama called "The Laird of Ballancrieh," in which the late Mr. Mackay used to perform with great applause on the Scottish stage; and a humorous but somewhat indelicate ballad, the "Jolly Beggar, or We'll gang nae mair a roving," which, pruned of its objectionable passages, was occasionally sung by the late popular vocalist, Mr. John Wilson.

JAMES I. of England, and VI. of Scotland, was the son of Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, by Mary queen of Scots, daughter of James V. When only a year old, he was proclaimed king, on the forced resignation of his mother, and, in 1603, succeeded Queen Elizabeth on the English throne. A plot was soon after discovered to seize on him, and place his cousin, the James II.

Lady Arabella Stuart, upon the English throne in his stead, for which Lords Cobham and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh, were indicted. But, in 1605, the more desperate attempt to blow up the king, the prince, and both houses of Parliament, known as the Gunpowder Plot, was discovered, for which Guy Fawkes and many other persons were executed. In 1606 he established episcopacy in Scotland, and made peace with Spain. In 1612, his son, Prince Henry, by Anne of Denmark, died, and the same year his daughter was married to Frederick, the elector-palatine. One of the greatest blot of his reign was the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh, fifteen years after sentence. James was a man of learning, and affected to be a profound scholar, particularly in theology, being not indifferently acquainted with polemics, of which he was so fond as to found Chelsea College for the maintenance of learned men, who were to employ themselves in managing controversies, especially with the church of Rome. Charles II., however, applied it to the better purpose of affording a home for soldiers worn out in the service of their country. James wrote, among other books, a "Commentary on the Revelation," in which he calls the pope Antichrist; "Basilicon Doron; or, Advice to his Son;" "Daemonology; or, a Discourse on Witchcraft;" and "A Counterblast against Tobacco." James I. held very strong opinions as to the "divine right of kings," with which he imbued his son Charles I., a rigid adherence to which not only brought that unhappy monarch to the scaffold, but led to the expulsion of the Stuarts from the English throne. b. at the Castle of Edinburgh, 1566; d. in England, 1625.

JAMES II., king of England, was the second son of Charles I., and was declared duke of York soon after his birth. During the civil war he resided in France, where he imbibed the principles of popery. At the Restoration he returned to England, and secretly married Anne Hyde, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, who afterwards became queens of England: viz., Mary and Anne. In the Dutch war he signalized himself as commander of the English fleet, and showed great skill and bravery. On the death of his first wife, he married Mary Beatrix of Modena. He succeeded to the throne on the death of Charles II., in 1685; but his zeal for his religion leading him into measures subversive of the constitution, the Prince of Orange, who had married his daughter Mary, was invited to England by several of the nobility; and the king, finding himself abandoned by his friends, withdrew to France, 1688. b. in London, 1633; d. at St. Germain, 1701.—His son James, commonly called the Old Pretender, died at Rome, in 1766.

JAMES I., king of Aragon, called the Warrior, succeeded his father, Peter the Catholic, in 1213. He conquered the islands of Majorca and Minorca, Valencia, and other provinces, from the Moors. Before he expired, he resigned the crown to his successor, and took the habit of the Cistercian monks, in accordance with a superstition of the age. b. 1206; d. 1276.

JAMES II., king of Aragon, succeeded his brother, Alphonso III., in 1291. He carried on a long war against Navarre and the Moors, and united Catalonia to his crown. b. about 1260; d. at Barcelona, 1327.

THE DICTIONARY

James de Vitri

James

JAMES DE VITRI, a cardinal in the 13th century, attended the crusaders to the Holy Land, and was made bishop of Ptolemais; after which Gregory IX. raised him to the purple, and employed him as legate. He wrote an "Eastern and Western History." n. at Vitri, near Paris; d. 1244.

JAMES OF VORAGINE, a Dominican and bishop, who became provincial of his order, and archbishop of Genoa, compiled a Golden Legend, full of pious fables, which has been many times reprinted. B. at Genoa, about 1330; d. about 1398.

JAMES, Thomas, a learned divine, was educated first at Winchester school, and next at New College, Oxford, where he was chosen fellow, with the degree of D.D. He was chosen first keeper of the Bodleian Library, and made sub-dean of Wells. He collated MSS. of the ancient fathers, with a view to publish them, but failed in his design, for want of encouragement. He wrote several learned books, the chief of which is, "A Treatise of the Corruption of the Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers." n. at Newport, Isle of Wight, 1571; d. at Oxford, 1632.

JAMES, Richard, nephew of the above, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, whence he removed to Corpus Christi, of which he became a fellow. He travelled in Russia, and published a narrative of his journey in 1619. He was of great service to Selden and Sir Robert Cotton, being a man of extensive learning, and profoundly acquainted with ancient MSS. He published several books in Latin. n. 1592; d. in London, 1631.

JAMES, Thomas, an English navigator, who, in 1631 and 1632, attempted to discover a north-west passage. He wintered on Charleton Island, in Hudson's Bay, and next summer proceeded on his voyage, but was unable to penetrate farther than 65 degrees and a half north. He made some discoveries on the coast of Hudson's Bay; to the country on the western side of which he gave the name of New South Wales. On his return to England he published an account of his expedition, entitled "The Strange and Dangerous Voyage of Captain Thomas James, for the Discovery of a North-West Passage to the South Sea."

JAMES, Robert, an English physician, who received his education at St. John's College, Oxford. After practising in the country, he removed to London, and, in 1743, published his "Medical Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio, in which he was assisted by Dr. Johnson—a work of considerable merit in its day. He also published other works in connexion with his profession; but he is best known by a valuable medicine, universally celebrated under the name of "James's powder," which gave a fortune to his family. B. at Kinverstone, Staffordshire, 1703; d. 1776.

JAMES, Thomas, a learned divine, who was educated at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and proceeded to his degree of D.D. in 1780. He was, for many years, a public tutor in that college. In 1776 he became master of Rugby school, which station he filled, with great honour and satisfaction, till 1793, when he resigned. For his great services he was preferred to a prebend in Worcester cathedral, and the living of Harrington, in the same county. He published a "Compendium of Geography for the use of Rugby School," "An Explanation of the Fifth Book of Euclid by Algebra," and two Sermons. B. at St. Neots, in Huntingdonshire; d. at Harrington, Worcestershire, 1804.

JAMES, William, was the author of a valuable work, entitled "The Naval History of Great Britain, from the Declaration of War by France, in 1793, to the Accession of George IV.," &c. Every accessible source of authentic information was made use of by Mr. James in writing this history, which has gone through several editions, and has now become a standard work on the history of the British navy. The freedom with which he criticised the conduct of some of those engaged in the occurrences he had to relate, however, involved him in litigation, which considerably impaired the pecuniary success of his work. d. 1827.

JAMES, William, a land agent and surveyor, was the original projector of the Manchester and Liverpool railway; and may in some respects be regarded as the father of the railway system, having surveyed numerous lines at his own expense, and been an active promoter of these undertakings, at a time when they were considered to be mere speculative innovations. n. at Hemley-in-Arden, Warwickshire, 1770; d. 1837.

JAMES, John Thomas, D.D., bishop of Calcutta, was educated at Rugby School, and the Charterhouse, London; and, in 1804, entered at Christchurch College, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and for a time acted as a college tutor. In 1813 he left the university to make the tour of the north of Europe with Sir James Riddell, and on his return published an account of his travels, with illustrative sketches of scenery, engraved and coloured by himself. In 1816 he visited Italy, to study the works of art in that country; and the result of his observations appeared in an account of the Italian school of painting, which was followed by another on the French, Dutch, and German schools. He took orders soon after returning from Italy; and in 1826 published a tract, entitled "The Semi-Scripture, or the Common Sense of Religion considered." At this time he only held the small vicarage of Flitton, in Bedfordshire; but on the death of Bishop Heber, was nominated to the see of Calcutta, received the degree of D.D., and embarked for India in 1827, but did not long survive the deleterious influences of the climate and the anxieties attendant on his new position. n. 1766; d. 1829.

JAMES, George Payne Rainsford, a modern English novelist, historian, and poet, received the rudiments of his education at a school in Greenwich; but was sent, about the age of 15, to Paris, where he remained several years. When only 17, he wrote several Eastern tales, which were afterwards published for the benefit of the Literary Fund. From that period till the year 1825, he continued to contribute anonymously to the magazines and periodicals; but, encouraged by Sir Walter Scott and Washington Irving, he wrote and published an historical novel, in the style of the former, called "Richelieu." This met with a very decided success, and the young author rapidly produced a number of other works of the same character. During the succeeding quarter of a century, he wrote with great industry; novels, fairy tales, poems, and historical works issuing in quick succession from his rapid and fertile pen. Of his novels, it will be sufficient to enumerate a few of the best: these are, "Darnley," "Henry Masterman," "Philip Augustus," "The Gipsy," "The Smuggler," and "Morley Earnstein." The most successful of his historical works are, "The Life of the Black Prince," "The History of Charlemagne," and the Lives of some Foreign Statesmen, which he contributed to Lardner's Cyclopædia. During the period of his greatest popularity, he had been appointed historiographer of England by William IV.; but soon resigned the office. Mr. James was appointed British consul at Norfolk, Virginia, in 1852. He wrote and published several novels in America, besides sending three or four to be produced in England. He was afterwards sent to Venice as the British consul-general for the Adriatic ports. n. in London, 1801; n. in 1860, at Venice, where he was buried, and the following epitaph, written by Walter Savage Landor, placed upon his grave in 1862, "George Payne Rainsford James, British Consul-General in the Adriatic, died at Venice, aged sixty, on the 9th of June, 1860. His merits as a writer are known wherever the English language is, and as a man they rest on the hearts of many. A few friends have erected this humble and perishable monument."

JAMESON, George, Jaim'-son, a Scotch painter, termed by Waipole the Vandrek of Scotland, studied under Rubens, with Vandyeck, at Antwerp, and, on his return to his native country, painted the portraits of many of the most distinguished Scotch noblemen then living, as well as one of the English king, Charles I. n. at Aberdeen, 1588; n. 1614.

JAMESON, Robert, one of the most eminent naturalists of his time, studied for the medical profession, but soon abandoned the pursuit of the healing art, and devoted himself with ardour to geology, mineralogy, and the kindred sciences. In 1798 he published the "Geology of Arran and the Shetland Isles." This was followed in 1800 by the "Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles," in two volumes 4to; and shortly afterwards by the "Mineralogy of Dumfriesshire." With a spirit of enterprise rare at that time in Scotland, he went, in order to perfect himself in his favourite studies, to Friburg, in Saxony, where the celebrated Werner had established a school which attracted pupils from all parts of Europe. Jameson remained at Friburg two years, and shortly after his return was appointed professor of natural history in the University of Edinburgh on the death of Dr. Walker in 1804. From this period his publications were numerous, and his class-books in particular rose speedily into high reputation. We cannot afford space to give an entire list of his works, but the following will show the zeal and energy with which he devoted himself to the investigation of his favourite sciences: "The Characters of Minerals," 1805; "System of Mineralogy," two vols., 1806, to which a third volume was added in 1809, on Geology, then termed "Geognosy;" "Notes to Black's Translation of Von Buch's Travels in Norway and Lapland," 1813; "System of Mineralogy" enlarged, without the Geognosy, three vols. 1816; "Characters of Minerals," new edition, 1816; "Manual of Mineralogy, and Description of Mountain Rocks," 1821, one vol. In 1819 he commenced the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal," which he continued till his death. It extends to seventy volumes, and has attained to a European reputation. n. in Leith, 1773; n. 1853.

Jamieson

JAMESON, Mrs. Anna, a modern English authoress, was eldest daughter of Mr. Murphy, an artist of Dublin, who afterwards became painter-in-ordinary to the Princess Charlotte. A distinguished disciple of art himself, he early inculcated his talented daughter with its principles. As a young woman, Anna Murphy occupied the post of governess in two or three families of distinction; but, at the age of 27, she married Mr. Robert Jamieson, a barrister, who, several years afterwards, was appointed to an official post in Canada. Mrs. Jamieson joined her husband subsequently; but a separation eventually took place by mutual agreement; upon which she returned to London, and devoted herself henceforth to literature and the fine arts. She had already made her appearance as an authoress, having published the "Diary of an Ennuyée," in 1826, a work which was reprinted, with many additions, under the title "Visits and sketches at Home and Abroad." In 1829 appeared her "Loves of the" series of imaginative sketches; after that, "Female Biography," "Romance of Biography," "Beauties of the Court of Charles II.," "Female Sovereigns," and "Characteristics of Women," a work similar to the "Lives of the Poets," but of a higher and more ambitious character. In 1829 she published "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada," which contained a record of her visit to Canada; and, in 1840, she put forth a translation of "The Dramas of the Princess Amelia of Saxony." In all her works of former travel hitherto published, social and artistic criticisms were to be found; but, about this time, she commenced writing books of an exclusively artistic character; the first of these being her "Handbook to the Public Galleries of Art in and near London," which was published in 1842. Akin to this production were her "Companion to the most Celebrated Private Galleries of Art in London;" "Lives of the Early Italian Painters," a collection of essays, chiefly artistic, called "Memoirs and Essays;" "The Poetry of Sacred and Legendary Art;" "The Legends of the Monastic Orders," and "The Legends of the Mad," this last appearing in 1852. All these works displayed a profound acquaintance with the principles, and a refined appreciation of the great examples, of art. Indeed, her labours may be said to have been the precursor of that enlarged and discriminative fine-art criticism which has since sprung up in England. The "Handbook to the Courts of Modern Sculpture at the Crystal Palace" was written by her; but, in addition to her artistic criticisms, she was author of a few small works, in which she sought to ascertain "whether there was any hope or possibility of organizing, into some wise and recognised system, the talent and energy, the piety and tenderness of our women for the good of the whole community." For two years before her death she had been assiduously engaged upon "The Life of our Lord," and it was while prosecuting her researches for this purpose at the British Museum, that she caught a cold which caused her death. n. in Dublin about 1797; n. in London, 1860.

JAMIESON, John, D.D., jui'-me-son, a Scotch antiquarian and lexicographer, who was sent by his father, at the early age of nine years, to the university of Glasgow, and subsequently attended lectures at the university of Edinburgh. In 1779 he obtained a licence to preach from the presbytery of Glasgow, after which he acted as pastor to a number of congregations in many Scotch districts, although without any appointment. After having written several poems, sermons, theological works, and many anti-quearian researches, he produced, in 1808, his "Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language," and in 1818, "An Abridgement of the Scottish Dictionary," which last are valuable on account of the very large collection of old words, idioms, and customs, peculiar to his native country, contained therein. He had, for several years before his death, been in receipt of a pension, first from the Royal Society of Literature, and afterwards from the civil list. b. at Glasgow, 1759; d. at Edinburgh, 1833.

JAMYN, Amadis, zha'-neen, a French poet, and secretary to Charles IX., who, besides his poetical works, wrote academical discourses in prose, and completed the translation of Homer's "Iliad" into French verse, which was left imperfect by Sallé. b. about 1530; d. about 1585.

JANEWAY, James, juin'-a-way, a nonconformist divine, who was educated at Christ-church College, Oxford; and being deprived after the Restoration, opened a meeting-house at Rotherhithe, when the act of indulgence was passed. Among his works are, "Heaven upon Earth," "A Token for Children," which has gone through numerous editions; "The Saint's Encouragement to Diligence," and "A Legacy to my Friends." b. in Hertfordshire; d. 1674.

JANET-LANG, zha'-net-lanzh, commonly so called, his real name being Ange Louis Janet, a modern French painter and designer on wood. After having studied for several years in the ateliers of Ingres and Collin, he afterwards became a pupil of Horace Vernet, whom he assisted in making the designs for the illustration of the history of Napoleon I. Between the years 1836-46, he painted several pictures, which were hung in the Paris exhibitions; but about the latter year he was engaged by the proprietors of the French "Illustration" to undertake the artistic direction of that journal. During the ten subsequent years he made a very large number of designs for illustrated newspapers, and for French periodicals, and even for English publishers; but afterwards, returned to his oil-painting; and executed several historical pieces, which obtained considerable success in his own country. b. at Paris, 1818.

JANICOR, Francis Michael, zha'-ne-kawng, a French political writer, who settled in Holland, and was the author of "The present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and their Dependencies." b. at Paris, 1674; d. at the Hague, 1730.

JANIN, Jules-Gabriel, zha'-nä, a modern critic and author, who evinced in his earlier years a great aptitude for study, and acquitted himself so well at the college of St. Etienne, in the department of the Loire, that his father decided to send him to Paris, to finish, at the college Louis-le-Grand, an education thus auspiciously commenced. Shortly after leaving this college, he began to write squibs and political satires for the "Figaro," and continued to do so until that publication was suppressed by the government in 1825. His vivacious and fearless pen was next employed in the columns of the "Messager des Chambres," and so trenchant were his attacks upon the despotic Polignac ministry of Charles X., that, in 1829, the journal to which he contributed was subjected to a heavy fine. In this year appeared his first novel, "The Dead Donkey and the Guillotined Woman," which was nothing else than a satire upon the style of Victor Hugo, as head of the "romantic" school. So highly did his own party already esteem him, that, although only 25 years of age, he was styled by them "the Prince of Critics." During the three or four following years he published two novels,—"The Confession" and "Barnave," as well as a couple of volumes of short tales. In 1833 he commenced what has since proved to be the greatest of all his literary undertakings,—the dramatic notices and literary reviews for the "Journal des Débats." Every Monday morning, for upwards of a quarter of a century, appeared a witty, sparkling, and pointed criticism on dramatic literature and the stage. These feuilletons, or foot-articles (they being always inserted at the bottom of the newspaper columns), soon made a European reputation for their author, who throwing aside the dogmatic severity of his predecessors, quickly became a public favourite, by the grace, the polish, and the intuitive justice which characterized his articles. The monarch of critics met with one reverse, however: in 1841, on the occasion of his marriage with a young and beautiful heiress, he, instead of his usual literary feuilleton, supplied to the "Journal des Débats" a most complete and minute narrative of his happiness. This imprudence brought upon his head a slashing article in the "National," and for a long time Janin was never mentioned in the French newspapers but as the "married critic." He also wrote many introductions, biographies, and critical essays for republications of classic French authors. To the "Revue de Paris" he contributed two remarkable sketches, one of Mirabeau, the other of Lord Byron. He likewise composed, compiled, and edited more than a score of illustrated tours in France, novels, essays, and works of general literature; besides writing a series of letters on the Great Exhibition of 1851. A collection of his dramatic feuilletons has been published, under the pretentious title of "Dramatic and Literary History." b. at St. Etienne, in the department Loire, 1804.

JANSENIUS, Cornelius, jan-sen'-e-us, bishop of Ghent, took part in the Council of Trent, and became remarkable there for the modesty of his demeanour, as well as for his great learning. He was the author of a "Harmony of the Gospels," and other works. b. at Hulst, Flanders, 1510; d. at Ghent, 1578.

JANSEN, or JANSENIUS, Cornelius, jan'-sen, a celebrated Roman Catholic prelate, was educated at Utrecht, whence he removed to Louvain, where he was chosen principal of the college of St. Pulcheria. Being deputed by his university to go on a mission to the king of Spain, that monarch employed him to write a book against France, for which he was rewarded, in 1635, with the bishopric of Ypres, in Flanders. He wrote several books; but that by which he is best known is his "Augustinus," which was published after his death, and occasioned a fierce contest among the divines of the Romish church, which even the papal bulls could not suppress. In 1641 the inquisitors prohibited the perusal of the book; Urban VIII. censured it as heretical; and Innocent X., in 1653, condemned the following propositions extracted from it—That there are divine precepts which even good men cannot obey without the assistance of God: That no man can resist the influence of divine grace on his mind: That to render human actions meritorious, it is not necessary for them to be free from necessity but constraint: That the doctrine of free-will is a gross error: That Jesus Christ died not for all men, but only for the elect. These doctrines the pope declared heretical, and a violent persecution was excited against all who maintained them. Jansenism, notwithstanding, found numerous disciples in France and the Low Countries. b. near Leerdam, Holland, 1655; d. at Ypres, 1638.

JANSONIUS, Nicholas. (See JENSON.)

JANSSENS, Abraham, yan'-sens, a Dutch painter, whose colouring was so superior, that a picture of his, representing the descent from the cross, in the church of Ghent, has been taken for the work of Rubens, and is scarcely inferior to the works of that painter. b. at Antwerp, 1569; d. 1631.

JANSSENS, Victor Honorius, an historical painter, who was patronized by the duke of Holstein, who sent him to Rome for improvement. On his return to his own country, he adorned the churches and convents with his works. b. at Brussels, 1664; d. 1739.

JANSSENS, Cornelius, a Dutch painter, who resided in England many years, and, in several respects, was equal to Vandyck. He painted portraits of James I. and his family, and most of the English nobility. d. 1665.

JANUARIUS, St., jan'-u-air'-e-us, bishop of Benevento, who was beheaded at Puzznoli, in the persecution under Diocletian, about the end of the 3rd century. His body was removed to Naples, where a beautiful chapel was erected to his memory in the cathedral. What renders his name remarkable is a pretended miracle exhibited yearly by the priests, who have what they term his blood in a phial. On bringing out what is called the head of the saint, the blood, hitherto in a congealed state, liquifies. This mummery is always practised when Vesuvius shows signs of a convulsion, and the people devoutly believe that the influence of the saint will prevent an earthquake.

JAPIX, or JAPICKS, Gysbert, jas'-pix, a Frisian poet, of whose touching and simple lyrics Dr. J. H. Halbertsma, a distinguished Frisian writer, says, "For any one who has a feeling for true poetry, it is worth the trouble to learn Frisian, to enjoy the beauties of Gysbert Japix." He was the son of a poor carpenter of Bolsword, in Friesland, his family name being Hotelekana, which the poet changed into Japix, that word signifying "son of Jacob," which was his father's Christian name. Little is known of the poet's life, except that he was a schoolmaster and parish-clerk in Bolsword. His chief poems in manuscript are to be found in the Bodleian library. Boswell, on obtaining for Dr. Johnson JARCHAS, jar'-käs, the most learned of the Indian Brahmins, and a great astronomer according to Jerome. He is said to have given Apollonius Tyaneus seven magical rings called by the names of the planets.

JARCHI, Solomon-Ben-Isaac, jar'-ki, a celebrated rabbi, who spent thirty years in travelling through Europe and the eastern countries. He wrote "Commentaries on the Bible," which are highly esteemed by the Jews. b. at Troyes, France, 1104; d. 1180.

JARDIN, Karel de, yar'-dine, a Dutch landscape-painter, who studied and worked in Italy, where he acquired a great reputation; and so highly was he esteemed, that, though a Protestant, his remains were interred in consecrated ground. b. at Amsterdam, 1640; d. at Venice, 1673.

JARNAC, Guy de Chabot, lord of, zhar'-nak, a French gentleman of the chamber to Francis I. and Henry II., who fought a duel with a courtier named La Châteigneraine, in 1517. His adversary defeated him; but, as he stood over him, Jarnac gave him a mortal thrust under the thigh. The title comte de Jarnac has since been given to treacherous blows. d. about 1570.

JAROWICK, or GIORNOVICH, Giovanni Mame, yar'-no-vik, a celebrated violinist, the most accomplished pupil of Lulli, for several years resided in Paris, and was considered at the head of his profession; he afterwards went to England, where he was very popular; but on being invited to settle at Petersburg, he went thither. He was very irritable and eccentric, and many anecdotes illustrative of these traits are recorded of him. b. at Palermo, 1745; d. in St. Petersburg, 1804.

JARRY, Nicholas, zhar'-re, an eminent French calligraphist, who was appointed "Master Penman" to Louis XIV., and executed for that king, and for the chief lords of his court, many works which rank as masterpieces of the art of calligraphy. His "Garland of Julia," which he executed in 1611 for the duke of Montausier, consisting of 30 folio leaves, was sold, in 1714, for the sum of £580. He also completed the "Hours of Notre Dame," in 120 leaves, in 1647. b. at Paris, about 1620.

JARS, Gabriel, zars, a French mineralogist, who visited, with Duhamel, the mines of Saxony, Bohemia, Austria, Hungary, and Carinthia, also those of England, and other countries. In 1768 he became a member of the French Academy of Sciences. His brother published his observations, under the title of "Voyages Metallurgiques," in 3 vols. b. at Lyons, 1732; d. at Clermont, Auvergne, 1769.

JARVIS, John, jar'-vis, an artist, whose paintings on glass were famous in their day, was a native of Dublin, where he practised his art for some time, and then removed to London, where he soon made himself a high reputation. The west window of New College, Oxford, which he painted from designs by Sir Joshua Reynolds, is his most celebrated performance. b. 1749; d. 1804.

JASMIN, James, zhas'-mä, a Gaseon poet of great popularity in France, was the son of a tailor, and was himself early put to the trade of a hairdresser, which, despite his successful treatises of devotion, nor even any of the ballads and story-books which are so agreeable to country people." The literature of Friesland does not, even at the present time, include a translation of the Holy Scriptures: the "Merchant of Venice" and "Julius Cæsar" have, however, been reproduced in the Frisian tongue. In 1829, Sir John Bowring translated and published some poems of Japix in the "Foreign Quarterly Review." A bust of the poet was career as a poet, he always continued to practise. He wrote and published several collections of songs and poems, all of them written in the patois, or rural dialect, spoken on the banks of the Garonne. Soon after the publication of his collection of poems, "Les Papillotes,"—"the Curlipapers" he was elected member of the Academies of Agen and Bordeaux. Two of the most celebrated critics in France, Charles Nodier and Sainte-Beuve, have written critical comments upon Jamin's productions, which they state to be full of feeling and joyous grace. The poet usually recited his poems in his native town, and, having a fine voice and manner, the delivery of these lyrics, varying in dialect but little from those of the old troubadours of the 11th and 12th centuries, is said to have produced a very great effect upon his hearers. Jamin received many presents; Louis Philippe and the duke and duchess of Orleans bestowed upon him handsome gratuities; Toulouse gave him a golden laurel-wreath; Pau marked its sense of his worth by sending him a service of china. When he began to write poetry, all his family, he says, laughed at him; but, afterwards, his wife, selecting the best pen and paper for his use, would observe, "Every verse you write, Jacques, puts a fresh tile on the roof." n. at Agen, 1793; p. 1864.

JAUCOURT, the chevalier Louis de, zhô-koor, member of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academies of Berlin and Stockholm, furnished the French Encyclopædia with articles on medicine and natural philosophy. He also compiled a "Universal Dictionary of Medicine," in 6 vols., but the MS. was lost on board a ship, which foundered on her passage to Amsterdam. n. at Paris, 1704; p. at Compiègne, 1779.

JAULT, Auguste François, zholt, a French physician, and professor of Syriac in the Royal College of Paris, who translated into French, among other works, "Sharp's Surgery," "Ockley's History of the Saracens," and "Floyer on Asthma." n. 1707; p. 1757.

JAUREGUI Y AGUILAR, cha'-oo-rai-goi e a-goo'-el'-lar, a Spanish poet and painter, who resided for a long time at Rome, forming himself upon the best Italian models in both poetry and painting. On his return to his native land, he published some excellent translations of Tasso, and from the Latin. His pictures were distinguished for their beautiful colour, for their fine gradations of light and shade, and for the beautiful flesh-tints in them. n. near Toledo, 1566; p. at Madrid, 1641.

JAY, Gui Michel Le, zhai, an advocate of the parliament of Paris, who printed a polyglot Bible at his own expense, and thereby impoverished himself. Subsequently entering into holy orders, he was made dean of Vezeli. His polyglot Bible is elegantly printed in 10 vols., and has the Syriac and Arabic versions, which are not in that of Ximenes. p. 1675.

JAY, John, jai, an American jurist and statesman, who, after studying at Columbia (then King's) College, was admitted to the bar, and in 1774 was elected a delegate to the first American congress, at Philadelphia. In 1776 he was chosen president of the congress; in 1777 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of New York; and in the following year was appointed chief-justice of that state. He was next sent as minister plenipotentiary to Spain; and in 1782 was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. The definitive treaty having been signed in September, 1783, he returned to the United States; and in 1784 was sent as envoy extraordinary to Great Britain, and concluded the treaty which has been called after his name. In 1795 he was elected governor of New York State; this post he continued to occupy till 1801, when he declined a re-election as well as a re-appointment to the office of chief-justice of the United States, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement. n. at New York, 1715; p. 1829.

JAY, William, son of the preceding, a celebrated American slavery abolitionist, was designed for the profession of the law, but an affliction of the eyes forced him to relinquish its study; whereupon he retired to his father's country seat at Bedford, Massachusetts. From the year 1819 he was one of the most active advocates of the abolition of slavery in the United States, and wrote several works in aid of the same cause. These were collected and published at Boston in a complete form, with the title, "Miscellaneous Writings on Slavery," in 1854. He was one of the founders of the American Biblical Society, and served as president of the Peace Society. In 1832 he edited his father's correspondence, and wrote a biography of him, publishing the work under the title of "The Life and Correspondence of John Jay." n. 1779; p. 1858.

JAY, Rev. William, an eminent Independent preacher, was the son of a stonecutter, at which trade he himself worked during his early years; but, while still young, was placed in the Marlborough Academy, with a view of being educated for the ministry. At sixteen years of age he commenced preaching, and, before he had reached his twentieth year, was appointed minister of Argyle Chapel, Bath, where, for sixty-two years, he officiated. On completing the fiftieth year of his ministerial labours, in 1841, he was presented with a service of plate, and a purse containing £850, at a public meeting in Bath. His volumes of sermons met with considerable success, and passed through several editions. He wrote also an Essay on Marriage, "Lectures on Female Scripture Characters," and an Autobiography, which was published in 1854. All his works have been issued in a complete form, in twelve volumes, 8vo. n. at Tisbury, Wilts, 1769; p. 1853.

JAYADEVA, jai-a-de'-ra, a Hindoo poet, of whose life or pursuits nothing certain is known. Only one of his poems is extant, this being the "Gita Govinda;" or, Poem in Honour of Govinda," one of the names of the Hindoo god Krishna. It is an amatory and voluptuous lyric, and Sir William Jones, Colebrooke, and other commentators, assert that it is only to be interpreted in an allegorical sense. Sir William Jones published a translation of the "Gita Govinda," in the 3rd vol. of the "Asiatic Researches."

JEACOCKE, Caleb, je'-kok, a baker in High-street, St. Giles's, London, who for many years distinguished himself as president of a disputing society held at the "Robin Hood tavern," near Temple-bar. He had considerable powers as a speaker and is said to have often opposed with success the celebrated Burke, and other persons, who afterwards distinguished themselves at the bar and in the senate. Mr. Jeacocke published, in 1765, a pamphlet entitled, "A Vindication of the Moral Character of the Apostle Paul from the Charge of Insincerity and Hypocrisy brought against it by Lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Middleton, and others." He became a director of the Hand-in-Hand fire-office, and was enabled to retire from his business on a small fortune. b. 1786.

JEANNIN, Peter, zhân-nâ, a French statesman, who was educated for the law, and became president of the parliament of Paris. Henry IV. made him member of his council, and kept him at court, where no great enterprise was undertaken without consulting him. His memoirs were published in 1659. b. at Autun, 1540; d. 1622.

JEBB, Samuel, jeb, an English physician, was educated at Cambridge, and subsequently settled as physician at Stratford, in Essex, where he resided till a short time before his death. He edited an edition of Roger Bacon's works, and of several other learned authors. b. at Nottingham, 1690; d. 1772.

JEBB, John, a divine and physician, the son of Dr. John Jebb, dean of Cashel, studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and Peter-house, Cambridge; obtained church preferment, which, however, he resigned, and then commenced practice as a physician, in which he was very successful. He was a violent partisan in whatever he engaged; and, though conscientious in his religious opinions, their peculiar complexion, and the freedom with which he indulged in the political squabbles of the day, obstructed his professional progress, and greatly impaired his usefulness. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, a contributor to the "Philosophical Transactions;" and his works, theological, political, and medical, form three vols. b. in London, 1736; d. 1786.

ЖЕЗЕНДЖОУ, Sir Jamsetjee, Bart., je'-jeeb-koi, an eminent Parsee merchant of Bombay, was born of humble parents, and had to make his own way in the world; but by the time he was sixteen he was fully prepared to do so. That way was at first rough and hard; yet, undiscouraged, he went right on. The early life of the wealthy and honoured baronet was strongly in contrast with the calm which enveloped his later years. He made five mercantile voyages to China: in one of these, the ship in which he sailed formed one of the fleet which, under the command of Sir Nathaniel Dance, beat off a French squadron under Admiral Linois. In another voyage, the vessel on board which were himself and his fortune, was captured by the French, and he was carried to the Cape of Good Hope, whence, with the loss of all his property, and after enduring many privations, he found his way in a Danish vessel to Calcutta. Fortune smiled on him afterwards, however; and as his wealth increased, the tendency to share it with the needy, or to spend it for the benefit of the public, began to develop itself. In 1822 he released all the poor debtors confined by the Court of Requests from the Bombay gaol, by the simple process of paying their debts. From that time to the day of his death, the stream of his beneficence scarcely slackened in its flow. He dispensed in philanthropic services the vast sum of £300,000; his charity not being limited by the bounds of the community to which the munificent donor belonged. Parsee and Christian, Hindoo and Mussulman,—indeed, people of all classes and creeds, alike shared in his beneficence, the largest outlay being for the poor and for the public. For his great public services, no less than for his philanthropic efforts, he was created a baronet. b. at Bombay, 1733; d. same place, 1859.

JEFFERIES, or JEFFREYS, George, Lord, jeff'-fres, an English judge, notorious for his cruelty and injustice, was educated at Westminster school, after which he removed to the Inner Temple, where he studied the law with great application. By attaching himself to the duke of York, he obtained the appointment of Welsh judge, the honour of knighthood, and the chief-justiceship of Chester. In 1683 he was appointed chief-justice of the King's Bench, and, in 1685, lord chancellor. His cruelties on the western circuit towards the deluded followers of the duke of Monmouth were excessive; yet they gave great satisfaction to James II., who, with heartless mirth, called this "Jefferies's campaign." He supported all the arbitrary acts of the court, and rendered himself so obnoxious to the people, that, when James abdicated the throne, he attempted to leave the kingdom in the disguise of a sailor, but was recognised while drinking in a cellar in Wapping. Perceiving himself discovered, he feigned a cough, and turned to the wall with his pot of beer in his hand; but information of his presence being communicated to the mob, they rushed in, and carried him before the lord Acton, Denbighshire, about 1610; d. in the Tower, 1689.

JEFFERSON, Thomas, jeff'-er-son, third president of the United States, after receiving his education at the college of William and Mary, at Williamsburg, which, at the end of the 18th century, was the capital of Virginia, he studied the law under Mr. Wythe, a celebrated barrister of that day, and, at the age of twenty-four, began to practise at the General Court in 1767. In the stirring events that preceded the American revolution, he took a foremost and distinguished part, though he was never engaged in any military operations. He was governor of Virginia between 1779-81; three years afterwards, he was appointed minister to France, and remained at that post during five years. Shortly after his return to America, in 1789, he became secretary of state under the presidency of General Washington. He had lived some time in retirement previous to the year 1796, when he was elected vice-president of the United States. In 1801 he became president, and, after being elected a second time, retired, in 1809, to his estate near Monticello, in Virginia. Mr. Jefferson was author of a book called "Notes on Virginia." b. at Shadwell, Virginia, 1743; d. in Virginia, 1826.

JEFFERY, John, jeff'-fre, an English divine, educated at Catharine Hall, Cambridge. Archbishop Tillotson appointed him archdeacon of Norwich, in 1694. He published a volume of sermons, and was the editor of "Christian Florals," a posthumous work, by Sir Thomas Browne, and the sermons of Dr. Whichcote. b. at Ipswich, 1647; d. 1720.

JEFFERYS, George, jeff'-fres, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, who was educated at Westminster school and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He afterwards studied the law, and was called to the bar, but never practised. His "Miscellanies" in prose and verse contain, among other pieces, Review," was the son of Mr. George Jeffrey, a clerk-depute of the Court of Session, and at eight years of age was sent to the High School of Edinburgh, where he was remembered by a fellow-pupil as "a little, clever, anxious boy, always near the top of his class, and who never lost a place without shedding tears." At fourteen years of age, he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where, in the debating societies of the college, he soon distinguished himself above his fellow-students by his fluent speech and severe criticisms on the efforts of his opponents. While at Glasgow, he formed a habit of making notes and abstracts from books, and writing essays, which had its advantage in his after-career. This practice was continued when he returned to Edinburgh, in 1789; and his biographer, Lord Cockburn, was a pupil in the law classes of the Edinburgh university, and attended them till 1791, when he went to Queen's College, Oxford, to finish his studies. He left the English college in nine months; and very pleased to do so he appears to have been; for, "except playing and drinking," he wrote, "I see nothing that it is possible to acquire in this place." On his return to his native city, his friends perceived a great change in him: instead of speaking his thoughts in his broad native Doric, he had a way of uttering a sentence in a high mining tone. Lord Holland said afterwards, "Jeffrey had lost his broad Scotch at Oxford; but he had only gained the narrow English." His great intellectual powers, however, and kindness of heart, soon caused his friends to overlook what they had at first regarded as a piece of affectation. His father seems to have been, for some time, undecided whether to make a lawyer or merchant of his son. The former was eventually resolved on, and, in 1792, he was once more sent to the law classes of the Edinburgh university. In 1793 he became a member of the Speculative Society, and there formed the acquaintance of Scott, Brougham, Horner, and other young men who afterwards came to be distinguished. In 1794 he was called to the Scottish bar; but, being unknown, and, above all, a Whig, there was small chance of his obtaining briefs. About this time he began writing for the "Monthly Review" and other Magazines. His income in 1801 was about £100 per annum; he, however, entered into matrimonial bonds, and took an upper story in a house in Edinburgh, where, one evening, Sydney Smith suggested to Jeffrey and the other guests, Horner and Brougham, the idea of starting a new journal, to be called the "Edinburgh Review." The first number appeared in October, 1802, under the editorship of Sydney Smith; but, after the third number, Jeffrey was placed at its head. During the subsequent twenty-six years, Jeffrey continued to edit and contribute to this celebrated review. It will be unnecessary to enter here into the many political and literary controversies which arose out of the criticisms of Jeffrey and his colleagues in this organ. His contributions were unquestionably dictated by honesty; but many of them were eminently unjust—to Wordsworth and his kindred authors most especially. Throughout Jeffrey's editorship, he was the main support of the Review; but although his contributions, like those of Macanlay, Sydney Smith, Carlyle, and others, have been published, in four volumes, they have not obtained an equal success with those authors' productions. In the interval he had won for himself a place almost at the head of the Scottish bar. Once, when making a speech for the prosecution in a libel case, the defendant, pulling out his watch, said, Jeffrey "had actually spoken the English language twice over in three hours." This was in allusion to his rapid and fluent style of eloquence. His income had increased with his practice, and on the death of his first wife, in 1805, he was in easy circumstances. In 1806 he visited London, and, while there, fought the famous duel with Moore, at Chalk Farm, which Byron, in his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," has thus immortalized:—

'Can none remember that eventful day,
That ever glorious, almost fatal fray,
When Little's leadless pistol met his eye,
And Bow Street myrmidons stood laughing by?"

Though this meeting had arisen out of Jeffrey's severe treatment, in the Review, of some of Moore's early poems, both the criticism and the duel were afterwards forgotten, and the poet and essayist became the best of friends. In 1813 he went to America to marry Miss Charlotte Wilkes, an American lady, but the grandniece of the celebrated English politician Wilkes. (See WILKES.) Soon after his return, he took up his residence at Craigcrook, a delightful little estate at the foot of the Corstorphine Hills, some two miles from Edinburgh. Here, till his death, he gave hospitable reception to every visitor to the Modern Athens who was distinguished in literature, in art, or in science. In 1821 he was chosen lord rector of the university of Glasgow, and, eight years afterwards, dean of the Faculty of Advocates; upon which he resigned the editorship of the "Edinburgh Review." He was returned to Parliament for the Perth, Forfar, and Dundee burghs in 1830; but, losing his seat the next year, he was, through the influence of Earl Fitzwilliam, chosen as the representative of the borough of Malton. He sat for this borough, and for his native city, till 1834, when he was made a Scotch judge, with the courtesy title of lord. He sat upon the Scottish bench until a short time before his death. The biography of Jeffrey, with his correspondence, was published by Lord Cockburn, in 1852. n. at Edinburgh, 1773; n. at Craigcrook, 1850.

JEHANGHIR, Abul Muzaffer Nouredin Mohammed, jam-sher, emperor of Hindostan, son of the famous Akbar, succeeded his father on the Delhi throne in 1605, and, unlike most Eastern rulers, was affable, generous, and easy of access to his subjects; he was, besides, a liberal patron of learning and the arts. He composed memoirs of the first seventeen years of his reign, and made additions to the historical commentaries of the famous Sultan Baber. His wife, Nourjehan, was equally celebrated for her wit and her beauty, and has been the theme of numerous Oriental romances and poems. n. 1627.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Jekyl

JEKYL, Sir Joseph, je'-kil, an English lawyer and patriot, who distinguished himself in the reign of William III. by his attachment to the Whigs, and was one of the managers on the trial of Dr. Sacheverell. At the accession of George I. he was knighted, made master of the rolls, and a privy councillor. He successfully maintained the independence of his office against lord-chancellor King, in a pamphlet entitled "The Judicial Authority of the Master of the Rolls Stated and Vindicated." B. in Northamptonshire about 1664; p. 1738.

JEKYL, Thomas, D.D., brother of the above, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became vicar of Rowd, in Wiltshire, lecturer at Newland, in Gloucestershire, and minister of St. Margaret's chapel, Westminster. He wrote and published a number of sermons, all very popular in their day, and an Exposition of the Church Catechism.

JEKYL, Joseph, an eminent barrister, was the son of a captain in the navy, and a scion of the same family as the preceding. He was called to the bar in 1778; was returned as M.P. for Caine in 1787, and retained his seat during several successive Parliaments. He was appointed solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales in 1805; and, at the time of his death, was senior king's counsel, senior bench of the Inner Temple, F.R.S., and F.S.A. He enjoyed a fair reputation for forensic power; but his fame was chiefly acquired by his ready talent in epigram and repartee, his bon-mots often convulsing the bar with laughter, and his ever-sparkling wit delighting all who came within his convivial sphere. B. 1752; D. March 8, 1837.

JELLACHICH VON BUZIM, Baron Joseph, jel'-la-chik, the ban, or military commander-in-chief of Croatia, was the son of an Austrian general, by whom he was sent to the military academy of Vienna, on leaving which he entered the Austrian army as sub-lieutenant of dragoons, in 1810. Six years afterwards, he was a lieutenant, and occupied his leisure with the composition of a small volume of poems, which was printed for private circulation. In 1830, he went to Italy, as captain in a regiment of Husars, and remained there four years; in 1837 he obtained the commission of major of infantry, and afterwards became, first, lieutenant-colonel, and then colonel, of the 1st Banat frontier regiment. In 1848 the Court of Vienna secretly induced the Croats, the Dalmatians, and the Servians to attack the Hungarians, whose constitutional form of government was distasteful both to the Austrian emperor and to the more despotically ruled Servians and Croats. These latter requested that Jellachich might be appointed their ban, and this being complied with by the Austrian emperor, an army of irregular, but well-armed troops, to the number of 40,000, was assembled. Jellachich, as ban, put himself at their head, and led them across the Drave, at Zegrád, in September, 1848. In less than a month he was met by the Hungarians and defeated; but, having arranged an armistice with his opponents, he made good his retreat to Raab, and by this movement secured the high road to Vienna for his line of operations. Shortly afterwards, he went to reinforce, with 18,000 picked troops, Prince Windischgratz, who was then besieging Vienna, which was defended by the insurgents. He then commanded the Austrian centre at the battle of Schwechat, in which the Hungarians were worsted. Throughout the remainder of the campaign he fought under General Haynau's orders, but did not exhibit any extraordinary talent for war. An illustrated edition of his poems was published at Vienna in 1851; the proceeds of which were applied towards an invalid fund he had founded in that capital. B. at Peterwardein, Austrian Slavonia, 1801; p. 1850.

JELLINGER, Christopher, jel'-lin-ger a Presbyterian divine, who studied at Bâle and Leyden, was some time a soldier; after which he went to Geneva, whence he was invited to England, where he acquired a perfect knowledge of the language, and obtained the living of Brent, in Devonshire, of which he was deprived for nonconformity in 1682. He wrote, "Fifteen Conferences with Christ," "A New Way of Living and Dying," "The Spiritual Merchant," and other works of a like nature.

JEMSHID, jum'-shed a Persian sovereign, who reigned about 800 B.C., and is said to have founded, or at least greatly embellished, the famous city of Istakhar, called by the Greeks Persepolis. He is also celebrated for instructing his subjects in astronomy, and the mysteries of Sabeism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies. Being unfortunate in war, he was dethroned by Zohak, an Arabian king, and spent the latter part of his life in obscurity.

JENISCHIVS, Paul, je-nis'-ke-us, a learned Dutch author, who was persecuted and banished for writing a book entitled "Theatrum Animarum." B. at Antwerp, 1558; p. at Stuttgart, 1647.

JENKIN, Robert, jen'-kin, a learned English divine, educated at the king's school at Canterbury. In 1674 he was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow in 1690. In 1711 he became master of the college, and Lady Margaret professor of divinity. Dr. Jenkin wrote some theological works, the best known of which is entitled, he "Reasonableness and Certainty of the Christian Religion." B. in the Isle of Thanet, 656; p. 1727.

JENKIN, William, a nonconformist divine, was the son of a puritan minister, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1641 he was chosen minister of Christ Church, near Newgate, London, of which he was deprived for nonconformity a year afterwards. He was sent to the Tower for being concerned in Love's plot, but was released on petitioning Cromwell. In 1684 he was committed to Newgate under the Conventicle Act, and died there four months afterwards. He wrote a great many theological works, and "An Exposition on the Epistle of Jude." B. at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1612; p. in London, 1685.

JENKINS, Henry, jen'-kins, an Englishman, remarkable for longevity, having lived to the age of 169 years. He remembered the battle of Flodden Field, and gave evidence at the assizes to a circumstance within his recollection which occurred one hundred and forty years before. He retained his faculties to the last; but as he was born before parochial registers were kept, no parish would support him; so that he subsisted by begging. In the parish church of Bolton, Yorkshire, to which in reality he belonged, is a monument recording these particulars. B. in Yorkshire, 1501; p. 1670.

JENKINS, Sir Leoline, an English statesman, who was educated at Cowbridge school, whence he was sent to Jesus College, Oxford, where he continued till the death of King Charles I. He afterwards became tutor to a young gentleman, with whom he travelled through France, Holland, and Germany. At the Restoration he returned to his college, of which he was chosen fellow, and in 1662 elected principal. In 1668 he was appointed judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and in 1670 received the honour of knighthood. He had a principal share in negotiating the peace of Nimeguen, and, on his return to England, was chosen one of the representatives of the university of Oxford in Parliament, where he opposed the bill for the exclusion of the duke of York from the succession to the crown. He was soon after made secretary of state and a privy councillor. He bequeathed to charitable uses all his property. His letters and papers were printed in 1724. B. in Glamorganshire, 1823; p. 1685.

JENKINSON, Anthony, jen'-kin-son, an English traveller in the 16th century, who, between the years 1546-70, travelled in Russia, and was one of the first Englishmen who penetrated into the interior of Asia, where he lived for some time with the Uzbek Tartars. On his return, he was sent to represent Elizabeth, queen of England, at the court of the czar of Russia. His travels are included in Purchas's collection; but the truth of many of his statements has been questioned. p. 1534.

JENKINSON, Charles. (See LIVERPOOL, Earl of).

JENKINS, David, jen'-kins, an English judge, who commenced his university education by being admitted a commoner of Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1597. After taking his bachelor's degree, he removed to Gray's Inn, and became eminent as a barrister. Charles I. appointed him a Welsh judge. In 1645 he was taken prisoner at Hereford for his activity in the royal cause, and sent to the Tower. Being brought to the bar of the House of Commons, he denied their authority, and refused to kneel; for which he was fined £1000, and remanded to prison. In 1650 an act was passed for his trial; but Harry Martin, it is said, prevented the measure by a droll speech. Jenkins, who expected to be hanged, declared that he would die with the Bible under one arm and Magna Charta under the other. In 1656 he obtained his liberty. B. at Hensol, Glamorganshire, 1586; p. at Cowbridge, 1667.

JENKINS, Charles, jen'-nem, an English gentleman, who, being very rich and fond of display, was called by his friends "Soliman the Magnificent." He affected to be thought learned, and wrote the words of some of Handel's oratorios, particularly the "Messiah," and published part of an intended edition of Shakspeare. p. at Gopsal, Leicestershire, 1773.

JENNER, Edward, M.D., jen'-ner, a celebrated English physician, who ranks among the great benefactors of the human race, as the discoverer and propagator of vaccination. He was the son of a vicar in Gloucestershire, and after receiving his school education in Cirencester, was apprenticed to a surgeon at Sudbury. At the expiration of his apprenticeship, he went to London, and became a student of medicine at St. George's Hospital, living for two years as pupil with the celebrated John Hunter. In 1773, he returned to Gloucestershire, and established himself as a surgeon in the village of Berkeley. In 1792, desiring to practise as physician, he obtained a degree of M.D. from the university of St. Andrew's. Many years before, while he was a surgeon's apprentice at Sudbury, Jenner was one day much struck at being told by a milkmaid that she could not take the small-pox. He made inquiries, and discovered that this was a common belief in the district. When he went to London, he mentioned the circumstance to Hunter and many other distinguished medical men, but they all regarded it as a popular error. Jenner, however, never forgot the subject, and when he set up as a surgeon in Berkeley, made several experiments, which proved that in some instances it was impossible to give small-pox to persons who had had cow-pox: while in others, although certain individuals had had cow-pox, they nevertheless, took small-pox. The result of long study and careful experimentation, was that Jenner found that, while the udder of the cow was subject to several eruptions, there was but one true cow-pox, which, farther, could only be taken by the milkers at a particular period of its course. About the year 1749 he conceived the idea of propagating the cow-pox, from the cow, in the first instance, and then from one person to another, and, consequently, secure to every individual so treated immunity from small-pox. For sixteen years he followed up this grand conception, and endeavoured to enlist the sympathy and aid of the eminent practitioners of the healing art in its favour; but they only replied by ridiculing the idea as an absurdity. Jenner persevered, however, and, in 1796, had the good fortune to make an experiment which could not be gainsaid: he vaccinated a boy, eight years old, with the matter taken from a milkmaid's hand. The child recovered from the infection in a satisfactory manner, and was immediately afterwards inoculated for small-pox, without the slightest effect. Many similar experiments were subsequently made, all ending successfully; and, in 1798, Jenner put forth his first work on the discovery, "An Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ (Cow-pox)." Although the author successfully demonstrated the soundness of his views, they met with great opposition from medical men at the outset. In about a year, however, some seventy leading physicians and surgeons signed a declaration stating their entire concurrence with him. An attempt was now made to rob Jenner of the merit of his discovery; but it proved signally abortive, and henceforth fame and fortune were within reach of the retired country surgeon; but Jenner refused every offer; and as a desire to benefit his fellow-creatures, and not an ambition of worldly honours, had been his endeavour, he would not quit his native village, where he practised as physician. "Shall I," he wrote to a friend, "who, even in the morning of my life, sought the lowly and sequestered path of life—the valley, and not the mountain—shall I, now my evening is fast approaching, hold myself up as an object for fortune and for fame? My fortune, with what flows from my profession, is amply sufficient to gratify my wishes." The grand discovery rapidly spread over England, France, and the other continental nations, and throughout the world. The House of Commons, by way of recompensing the long and disinterested labours of Jenner, voted him, in 1802, £10,000, and £20,000 in 1807. He wrote several works

JENNINGS, David, jen'-ings, a learned dissenting minister, was the author of "An Appeal to Reason and Common Sense for the Truth of the Holy Scriptures," "An Introduction to the Use of the Globes and Orrery," "Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals," "Jewish Antiquities," 2 vols. 8vo. n. at Kibworth, Leicestershire; p. 1762.

JENNINGS, Henry Constantine, an antiquary and virtuoso of most eccentric habits and chequered fortune, was the only son of a gentleman of considerable property at Shiplake, in Oxfordshire. He was educated at Westminster School, and at seventeen became an ensign in the foot-guards; but resigned his commission, and travelled on the Continent, where he collected, while in Italy, a number of statues and other antiques, with which he decorated his seat at Shiplake. He now led the life of a man of fashion and fortune, indulging in the most expensive follies; the consequence of which was that he became an inmate of the King's Bench. Freed at length from his pecuniary embarrassments, he settled on an estate he had in Essex, where he gave himself up with enthusiasm to the collection of scarce books, pictures, and curiosities. He was, however, again unfortunate. Having borrowed a sum of money from a person who was indebted to the crown, his museum was hurriedly sold for a small sum, to satisfy the claim of government. For many years afterwards, Jennings was a prisoner in Chelmsford gaol; but on regaining his freedom, resumed his former habits, and settled at Chelsea; where, to use the words of a gentleman who visited him in 1813, and who graphically described his singular appearance, he sat "enthroned in all the majesty of virtue amidst his books, his pictures, and his shells." In consequence of fresh embarrassments, these precious relics were all sold in 1816, and Jennings was once more a prisoner within the rules of the Bench, where he died in 1819. n. 1731.

or JANSONIUS, Nicholas, zhen'-sawing, a celebrated French printer and letter-founder in the 15th century. He was the first who fixed the form and proportion of the Roman character; and his editions of books, printed between the years 1470 and 1481, are highly valued on account of the beauty of the typography. The first book which came from his press was a volume in 4to, entitled "Decor Puellarum," 1471. n. about 1431.

JENYNS, Soame, jen'-ins, an English writer on religious subjects, who was educated at a private school, whence he was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1728 he published a poem on the Art of Dancing. He was elected member of Parliament in 1741, and sat in the House till 1780. In 1755 he was appointed one of the lords of trade, which place he held till that board was abolished. His works are,—"Poems;" "A Free Enquiry into the Origin of Evil;" "A View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion." n. in London, 1704; p. 1787.

JEHSON, Robert, jeff'-son, a dramatic writer, was an officer in the army, and many years master of the horse to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He was also for some time a member of the Irish House of Commons. His first dramatic piece, "Braganza," was read with success at Drury-lane, and printed in 1775. "The Law of Lombardy," a tragedy, was performed nine nights at Drury-lane, in 1779. "The Count Narbonne" was well received. He wrote also "The Campaign; or, Love in the East Indies," an opera; "Julia; or, the Italian Lover," a tragedy; "Two Strings to your Bow," a farce; "The Conspiracy;" and "Roman Portraits," a poem in heroic verse, with historical remarks and illustrations. n. in Ireland, 1736; p. in Dublin, 1803.

JERDAN, William, jer'-dan, a modern English littérateur, was the son of a small landowner of Kelso, in Roxburghshire, and was educated at a Scotch parochial school, afterwards receiving some instruction from Dr. Rutherford, author of the "View of Ancient History." His family designed him for the law; but, at his own request, he was allowed to go to London, where, in 1801, he entered a merchant's counting-house, at a salary of £50 per annum. He quitted this employment the next year, and went to Edinburgh to attend the law classes of that university; but abandoned this study in less than a year, returning once more to London, where he became embarrassed by debts, was released by his uncle, a naval officer, and taken on board his ship at Portsmouth as surgeon's clerk. While serving in this capacity, some verses of his were inserted in a Portsmouth paper; upon which he borrowed a sum of money and went to the metropolis, resolved to push his fortunes as a literary man. In 1805 he obtained an engagement on a newly-started paper,—the "Aurora;" and, after being employed as contributor to several journals, he, some years afterwards, joined the staff of the "Sun," of which he eventually became editor. In 1817 he was engaged by Mr. Colburn to edit the "Literary Gazette," of which paper he was subsequently the proprietor, but ceased to have any connexion with it in the year 1850. Soon afterwards, a subscription of nearly £700 was raised for him, and Lord Aberdeen granted him a pension of 100 guineas a year. Mr. Jerdan published his autobiography in 1853, and "Men I have Known" in 1866. p. 1782; p. 1869.

JEREMIE, Sir John, jer'-e-mie, an eminent colonial judge and anti-slavery advocate, who, after receiving his education at Blandell's grammar school, Tiverton, returned to Guernsey, his native place, and began to study the law, which he afterwards continued at Dijon, in France. In 1815 he attracted the notice of the government, by his evidence before the royal commissioners sent to Guernsey to investigate the administration of justice in that island. In 1824 he was nominated chief justice of St. Lucia, West Indies, and, from what he observed in that office, became an energetic advocate for the abolition of slavery, and published his views in our essays on Colonial Slavery. In 1832 he was made advocate-general of the Mauritius; but his abolitionist views being known to the planters, his appointment was the signal for almost open insurrection, the colonial Assembly petitioning the governor not to allow him to land upon the island. The entire naval and military force was required to protect him when he did so, after two days' delay. So general was the discontent during his short term of office, that the governor was compelled to order his return to England. On his arrival in London, he declared his willingness to return and resume his appointment, and the government acceding, he went to the Mauritius once more, and remained, notwithstanding every opposition, till 1835. This year he was appointed puisne judge of the supreme court of Ceylon, an office he resigned to assume the governorship of Sierra Leone in 1840, in both of which countries he never ceased to labour for the amelioration of the condition of liberated negroes. He published several works against slavery. n. at Guernsey, 1795; n. at Sierra Leone, 1841.

JERNINGHAM, Edward, jer'-ning-ham, a poet and miscellaneous writer, descended from an ancient Roman Catholic family of Norfolk, was educated at Douay and at Paris, but on returning to England, abjured popery and entered the communion of the Anglican Church. He wrote the tragedy of "Margaret of Anjou," the "Siege of Berwick," and other plays and poems, in four volumes, besides an "Essay on the Mild Tenour of Christianity;" "The Dignity of Human Nature;" "The Alexandrian School," &c. n. 1727; n. 1812.

JEROME, St., jer'-ome. (See HIERONYMUS.)

JEROME OF PRAGUE, so called from the place of his birth, was the disciple of John Huss (see HUSS), and a man of considerable learning. The Council of Constance cited him to appear before it with his master; but, finding that Huss was thrown into prison, he retired to Oberlingen, where he applied for a safe-conduct, which was refused. On his journey to his own country, he was arrested, and sent to Constance in chains. After being cruelly tortured, he was consigned to the flames, which he endured with great fortitude, in 1416. n. 1378.

JEROME OF ST. PETER, a Spanish Jew, named, before his conversion to Christianity, Joshua Larchi, became physician to Peter de Luna, the anti-pope Benedict XIII., in whose presence, and that of many cardinals and prelates, he disputed with some learned rabbins at Tortosa, in 1414. The result of that conference, and of a treatise on the errors of the Talmud by him, is said to have been so deeply felt, that about 5000 Jews were converted. Jerome's book was printed at Frankfort in 1602.

JERROLD, Douglas, jer'-rold, a modern English novelist, dramatist, and essayist, was the son of the manager of the Shewnness Theatre during the latter years of the war between France and England. Shewnness was, in those days, a very busy arsenal; ships of war were constantly arriving and departing, and young Jerrold was enabled to hear many a stirring "yarn" about the Nile and Trafalgar. On the other hand, there was the strange life of the strolling player, in the midst of which he was being reared. The drama and the sea were thus the two great circumstances of his earliest years; and with one or other of these his life was afterwards connected. While still a boy, his father obtained for him an appointment as midshipman in a ship of war commanded by Captain Austen, brother of Miss Austen, the celebrated novelist. In this capacity he served till the termination of the war, when, coming ashore, he was sent to London, and apprenticed to a printer. For several years, while working as a compositor, he devoted his leisure hours to the task of intellectual improvement, acquired several languages, and the habit of expressing his thoughts in writing. One night, after he had witnessed a performance of "Der Freischütz," he sat down, wrote a criticism of the play, and inclosed it to the editor of the paper upon which he was working as a compo-sitor. The "copy" was handed over to him to be put into type, and further, an editorial notice was inserted, asking the anonymous correspondent to continue his contributions. This event fixed the vocation of Douglas Jerrold. Before he was twenty-one years of age, he had written his play of "Black-eyed Susan," the most popular of all modern nautical dramas, Mr. T. P. Cooke, the original William, having acted in it upwards of seven hundred times. This first success induced Jerrold to produce, during a quarter of a century, a succession of original, witty, and thoroughly English plays, which in these respects presented a marked contrast to the works of other English playwrights; they, for the most part, depending upon the French for their plot, dialogue, and sentiment. The best of these dramas are,—"The Rent-day," "Nell Gwynne," "The Housekeeper," and "The Prisoner of War." "Time works Wonders," and "The Bible of the Day" are two of his most popular comedies, and deservedly so, for they sparkle throughout with wit, humour, and keen satire. As a novelist, he gave to the public—"Cloverbrook," "St. Giles's and St. James's," "The Man made of Money," and "The Story of a Feather." He was infinitely connected with that most successful of all humorous periodicals, "Punch," having regularly written for it, from its second number till within a year or two of his death; and nothing that ever appeared therein, even in its best days, when Thackeray and Gilbert & Sullivan were among its contributors, was more popular than the famous "Candle Lectures" of Jerrold. In the same periodical also appeared "Punch's Letters to his Son," besides a constant succession of terse, epigrammatic, short articles, directed against the follies of the day. His novels, plays, and most important miscellaneous writings, were collected and published, in 8 vols., a few years since; "Men of Character," which originally appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine," being included in the number. During the last three or four years of his life, Jerrold had been the editor of "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper." n. 11 London, 1803; n. at the same place, 1857.

JERUSALM, J. Frederick William, a Lutheran theologian and preacher, who was charged by the duke of Brunswick with the education of his son, and appointed preacher to his court. During his successful career as a teacher of youth, he founded the Caroline College, at Brunswick. He wrote "Letters on the Mosiac Religion," "Considerations on the Truth of Religion," and a great number of sermons. n. at Osnabruck, 1703; n. 1739.—His son Charles William, a young man of great promise, killed himself in a fit of melancholy in 1773. He is said to have been the original of Goethe's "Werther."

JERVAS, Charles, jer'-vas, an English portrait-painter, who studied for a short time under Sir Godfrey Kneller. By the generosity of a friend, he was enabled to continue his studies at Paris and Rome. On his return, he obtained considerable employment, more, perhaps, from the friendship of Pope and other celebrated men than from his own merit. He published a translation of "Don Quixote" to which Dr. Warburton added an appendix on the "Origin of Romances and of Chivalry." n. in Ireland, about 1675; n. 1739.

minister. He joined the Independents, for which he was imprisoned in 1641, but was released by the Parliament. In the civil war he officiated at St. George's, Southwark, but was ejected at the Restoration, and sent to prison. He wrote "The Glory and Salvation of Judah and Israel," a "Description of Jerusalem," and "The English Greek Lexicon." B. at West Rowton, Yorkshire, 1627; D. 1663.

JESTYN AB GWRGANT, jes'-tin, prince of Glamorgan, who was rejected by his countrymen as their sovereign, on the death of his father, in 1030, in consequence of his violent temper, his uncle Howell being chosen in his stead; but, on the death of the latter, in 1043, he succeeded him. Having made war on Rhys-ap-Tudor, a neighbouring prince, he sent Einion, his ally, to invite the English to his assistance, who defeated Rhys; but Jestyn refusing to give his daughter to Einion, as he had promised, the latter applied to the English, who turned their arms against Jestyn, and obliged him to quit his dominions, which they divided among themselves.

JESUA, Levita, chai-soo'-a, a Spanish rabbi in the 15th century, who wrote a curious book called "Halichot Olam," or the Ways of Eternity, an edition of which, in Hebrew and Latin, appeared in Hanover in 1414.

JESTEROX, R. V., choo'-froi, an eminent gem and medal engraver, whose taste and genius for the art were such, that while he was at Rome, as an assistant to Pichler, his employer was in the habit of selling the productions of the young artist as antiques. On his return to Paris, he was made director of the school of gem engraving, at the institution of the deaf and dumb. B. at Rouen, 1749; D. 1826.

JEWELL, John, je'-el, a learned prelate, and a father of the English Protestant church. In the reign of Edward VI. he avowed the Protestant religion, and became an admired preacher; but, in the succeeding reign, his doctrines brought him into imminent danger. Finding that Bishop Bonner was devising means to apprehend him, he went abroad, and resided with Peter Martyr at Strasburg, and afterwards at Zurich. On the death of Mary he returned home, and was appointed one of the sixteen Protestant divines to dispute with as many Romanists before Queen Elizabeth. In 1559 he was preferred to the bishopric of Salisbury, and, in 1565, received the degree of D.D. from the University of Oxford. His conduct as a bishop was exemplary, and he paid great attention to the work of reformation in his diocese. His application to study was so intense as to lay the foundation of an illness, which ultimately proved fatal. His learning and abilities were celebrated over Europe by his admirable "Apology for the Church of England," which was attacked by his countryman and schoolfellow, Thomas Harding, and defended by the author. His works were collected into one volume folio, and deemed of so much importance as to be placed in churches for the edification of the people. It is said these writings are sometimes to be met with, chained to the reading-desk in churches, even in the present day. B. at Berrynarbor, Devonshire, 1522; D. at Monkton Parleigh, 1571.

JEWSEBURY, jus'-ber-e, Miss Geraldine Endor, a modern English novelist, whose education was directed by Mrs. Fletcher, herself an authoress of some mark. Miss Jewsbury's first work was "Zoe, or the History of Two Lives," a novel full of passion and finely-graduated character, the success of which fixed her vocation as an authoress. This work, which appeared in 1845, was followed by a second three years afterwards, called "The Half-Sisters," a novel superior even to the first. In 1850 appeared her "Marian Withers," in 1852 the "History of an Adopted Child," and in 1856, the "Sorrows of Gentility," each of which was an advance in art upon its predecessor. Indeed, this lady, by her steady progress towards a high standard of perfection as a novelist, established for herself a sound and lasting reputation. B. at Measham, Warwickshire, about 1820.

JEZDIL I., je'-zil, the seventh caliph, or successor of Mohammed, and the second of the race of Ommiades, began his reign in 680. The Arabs, in the second year of his reign, elected Hussein, son of Ali, to the caliphate; but Jezid caused him to be assassinated. He also persecuted the whole house of Ali, and put a number of persons to death. Jezid, though a cruel tyrant, had a taste for poetry, and wrote some amatory verses of merit. D. 693.

JEZZAR, jed'-zar, surnamed The Butcher, whose real name was AHMED, was the famous pacha of Saïda and Acre, who defended the latter place against Bonaparte. In his youth he was purchased by the celebrated Ali Bey, at that time master of Egypt; and from being a common mameluke, Ahmed, in a few years, became governor of Grand Cairo. In consequence of a variety of occurrences, which need not be detailed here, Jezzar was appointed pacha of Acre and Syria, on the death of Daher; and for his zeal in opposing a redoubtable sheik, who had long defied the power of the grand seignor, he was made a pacha of three tails, with the title of vizier. This advancement gave him an opportunity of extending the boundaries of his government, and in spite of the efforts of the Turkish court to displace him, he retained his authority to the last. After Bonaparte had vanquished the mamelukes, he made friendly overtures to Jezzar, but they were indignantly rejected by him, and with the aid of the English squadron, under Sir Sidney Smith, he valiantly defended the city of St. Jean d'Acre against the incessant attempts of the French to take possession of it; so that, after a siege of sixty-one days, the "conqueror of Egypt" was obliged to withdraw his forces, and leave Acre in undisputed possession of its brave defenders. Jezzar died, at an advanced age, in 1804, possessed of immense treasures; and, it is said, particularly pleased with the sanguinary title which he had acquired by his numerous acts of ferocity.

JOACHIM, jo'-a-kin, a celebrated Italian monk, surnamed the Prophet, who went barefoot on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and, on his return, entered into the order of Cistercians. He founded several monasteries, which he governed with discretion. He wrote many predictions, which were printed in a book entitled "The Everlasting Gospel." His followers pretended that miracles were wrought at his tomb, and applied to the pope to canonize him, but this was rejected on account of some supposed errors in his works. B. at Colico, near Cosenza, 1180; D. 1202.

JOACHIM, George, a mathematician, otherwise named Reticus, obtained the mathematical chair at Wittenberg, where he zealously espoused and defended the astronomical system of Copernicus. He was the author of several astronomical works. B. 1514; D. 1576.

THE DICTIONARY

Joan of Arc

JOAN OF ARC, properly Jeanne Darc, the Maid of Orleans, joan, a French heroine, whose parents were peasants. She was servant at an inn, when she imagined that St. Michael, the tutelary angel of France, had commanded her to raise the siege of Orleans, then closely pressed by the English under the duke of Bedford. Her pretended visions made a great noise, and she was introduced to Charles VII., whom she is said to have discovered amidst his courtiers, though he was dressed like them. She promised to relieve Orleans, and to procure the coronation of Charles at Rheims. Her offers were accepted, though the Parliament treated her as an impostor. Clad in armour, she headed the troops, who were animated by her professions and example. The siege of Orleans was raised, after which she marched to Rheims, and assisted at the coronation of the king, who ennobled her family, to which he gave the name of Du Sys, with large grants of land. Joan, after heading a sortie, was taken prisoner at the siege of Compiègne, by the English, who, to their disgrace, tried and condemned her for sorcery. The story of Joan of Arc's life has furnished a theme to many writers. A large work, called the "History of Joan of Arc," in four volumes, was published in Paris in 1817. Schiller has composed a tragedy, Casimir Delavigne a touching elegy, Southey a fine poem on her life and death; Voltaire, with bad taste, wrote a burlesque and immoral poem on the heroine. b. at Domremy, in Lorraine, 1412; burnt at Rouen in 1431.

JOAN, Pope, a fictitious character, though the contrary is asserted by Platina, who calls this pope John VIII. There are several versions of the story. In one it is said that, about the middle of the 9th century, a woman named Joan, born at Mentz, and who had long worn men's clothing, obtained so great a reputation as a doctor, as to be elected to the papal chair on the death of Leo IV. It is further stated, that having become pregnant, she was taken in labour, as she was going in procession, between the Colosseum and the church of St. Clement, and died in the street. In order to avoid the like disgrace, it was said that every new pope was placed in a perforated chair to be examined. The whole of this ridiculous story, however, is now abandoned as fabulous by Catholics as well as Protestants. David Blondel, in particular, published, in 1649, an able refutation of it in a work called "Familiar Explanation of the Question, Was a Woman seated on the Papal Throne, between Leo IV. and Benedict III.?"

JOAN I., queen of Naples, was the daughter of King Robert of Naples. At the age of sixteen she assumed the government, being at the time married to her cousin, Andreas of Hungary. She was a very handsome and accomplished young woman; but she evinced little sympathy with her husband's tastes and temper. She allowed a number of conspirators, who were all nobles of the court, to murder Andreas, in 1345. Soon after this event she married her relative, Prince Louis of Tarantum; whereupon Louis of Hungary, brother of Andreas, marched with an army to avenge his brother's death. Joan's troops were worsted, and the queen fled to Avignon, where she appeared before Pope Clement VI., and protested her innocence of her husband's murder. The pope and his cardinals acquitted her; and Joan, out of gratitude, presented the pontiff with the see and county of Avignon. A pestilence breaking out soon after at Naples, Louis and his Hungarians fled; upon which Joan returned to her capital, where herself and husband were crowned in 1351. Up to the death of her second husband, which took place in 1362, Joan reigned in peace over her subjects. In the same year she married the prince of Majorca, who died in 1376; after this she married her fourth husband, Otho, duke of Brunswick. Having no issue by any of these matrimonial unions, the queen gave her niece Margaret in marriage to Charles, duke of Durazzo, whom she further nominated to be her successor. A schism, between Clement VII. and Urban VI., breaking out soon after, Joan embraced the cause of the former; whereupon Urban excommunicated her, and proclaimed Charles Durazzo king. Charles, ungrateful to his benefactress, marched against, defeated, and took her prisoner. After vainly endeavouring to induce Joan to abdicate in his favour, he shut her up in the castle of Muro. Joan, notwithstanding, would not accede; but named Louis of Anjou, brother of Charles V., king of France, as her successor on the throne of Naples. Shortly afterwards Charles caused her to be smothered in her prison. b. 1327; d. 1382.

JOAN II., queen of Naples, was daughter of Charles Durazzo, and sister of Ladislaus, whom she succeeded in 1414, being at the time forty-four years of age, and notorious for her scandalous life, which became still more open and disgraceful after her gaining the crown. She married James, count de la Marche, who, however, was soon compelled to retire from the court, proceeding, it is stated, to France, where he took a religious habit and died. A succession of paramours next divided the throne with this weak and wicked queen; murders, court intrigues, and barefaced profligacy reigning supreme at the court. At her death, her kingdom was left in a most miserable condition. b. 1370; d. 1435.

JOANES, or JUANES, Vicente, yoo-a'-nes, a celebrated Spanish painter, who studied in Italy, and, as appears by his works, principally followed the Roman school. He was one of the best artists Spain has produced, and is sometimes termed the Spanish Raphael. His drawing is correct, and exhibits numerous instances of successful foreshortening; his draperies are well arranged; his colouring generally sombre (he was very fond of chocolate colour); and his expression mostly in perfect keeping with his themes, which were generally those of devotion or impassioned resignation, such as in his "Baptism of Christ," which is in the cathedral at Valencia. He painted religious subjects exclusively, and it is said was so pious that he always took the sacrament before beginning an altar-piece. His best works are in the cathedral of Valencia, where he principally resided, and had many pupils; some good specimens of his style, however, are in the Prado at Madrid. b. in the province of Valencia, 1523; d. 1579.

JONAT, Louis, zhoh'-ba, a French Jesuit, remarkable for his knowledge of ancient coins and medals, upon which subject he wrote an elaborate treatise, printed in 1730. b. 1617; d. 1718.

JONZ, Pieter de, zhoh'-da, a celebrated engraver of Antwerp, was instructed in his art by Golzius, after which he studied in France and Italy. His engraving of Cousins' "Last Judgment" occupied twelve sheets, altogether about sixteen feet square. D. at Antwerp, 1634.—Pieter de, junior, was taught his art by the above, his father. He excelled him in some respects, and many of his prints, after portrait by Vandyck and Rubens, are regarded as very valuable by connoisseurs. B. at Antwerp, 1606 D. unknown when.—Arnold de, son of the above, was also an engraver. He is said to have engraved a print, "Mercury instructing Cupid," for Charles I. B. at Antwerp about 1636; D. unknown when.

JODELLE, Stephen, zhô-dêl, lord of Lymodin, a French poet, was the first who wrote tragedies on the Greek model in the French language; but one of them was so long that it occupied ten mornings in its representation. He also wrote sonnets, elegies, odes, &c. B. at Paris, 1532; D. 1573.

JÖCHNER, Christian Theophilus, zh(e)r'-ker, an erudite German lexicographer, who first studied medicine, but subsequently applied himself to theology and the art of oratory, and delivered courses of lectures on rhetoric between 1715 and 1720. He afterwards filled the chair of philosophy and of history at the university of Leipsic, and became, in 1742, librarian of the same institution. His principal work is the "Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon" (Universal Dictionary of Learned Men), which contained upwards of 60,000 names, and was published in 4 vols. at Leipsic, in 1750. This dictionary has since been re-edited and enlarged on several occasions. B. at Leipsic, 1694; D. 1758.

JOFFREUX, GREGOIRE, or JOUFFROY, Cardinal, zhôf'-froi, a celebrated dignitary of the Romish church. At an early age he entered upon a religious vocation, and rapidly rose to the highest posts in his church. On the accession of Louis XI. to the throne of France, in 1461, he was bishop of Arras; but, desiring to obtain a cardinal's hat, Pope Pius II., who was anxious to procure the abolition of the "Pragmatic Sanction" promised him the cardinalship if he could induce Louis to repeal that act. He accomplished this task, and obtained the bishopric of Alby and was created cardinal, in recompence for so doing. He also filled many high political posts under Louis XI. B. at Franche Comté, about 1420; D. 1473.

JOFFRID, zhôf'-rid, abbot of Croyland, in the 12th century. In the continuation of Ingulph's account of Croyland, by Peter de Blois, he says that abbot Joffrid sent a deputation of three learned French or Norman monks, named Odo, Terriek, and William, to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge, to teach the people in that neighbourhood grammar, logic, and rhetoric; and that these three monks went every day from Cottenham to Cambridge, where they hired a barn, in which they taught those sciences to a great number of scholars, who resorted to them from all the country round. If De Blois can be relied on, Joffrid may therefore be considered as the original founder of the university of Cambridge.

JOHANNOT, Alfred, zhô-han'-no, a French painter, who designed many excellent pictures, and made a large number of sketches and drawings on wood, in illustration of books. B. 1800; D. 1837.—Tony, a French artist and designer of book-engravings. He was brother of the above, like whom, he also painted many superior pictures; the best of which are—"The Battle of Fontenoy," "The Siesta," and "The Pillage." His designs upon wood were marked by great skill, refinement, and fancy, and were all in correct drawing. His principal illustrations were to "Werther," "Manon Lescaut," "Jerome Paturot," the "Vicar of Wakefield," and the novels of George Sand, many of which have been reproduced in England. B. at Offenbach, 1803; D. 1852.

JOHN I., king of England, jon, surnamed Sanslerre, or Lackland, was the fifth son of Henry II. He deprived his nephew Arthur of the throne, to which he was heir, and confined him in prison at Rouen, where he was murdered. The French Court of Peers demanded justice from Philip Augustus of France against the murderer, who was condemned to lose all his lands in that country. The pope also excommunicated him, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. He for some time resisted the papal authority, but in 1213 made his submission. The English barons invited over Louis, the son of Philip, and crowned him at London in 1216; but he did not continue long in England. John signed the great charter, confirming the national liberties, commonly called Magna Charta, in 1215: his

JOHN I., king of France and Navarre, was the posthumous son of Louis X. At his birth he was proclaimed king, but died when only a few days old, upon which the crown devolved upon his uncle, Philip V. D. 1316.

JOHN II., surnamed the Good, king of France, succeeded his father, Philip of Valois, in 1350. He obtained a victory over the English in 1355; but the year following he was defeated and taken prisoner at Poitiers by Edward the Black Prince, who sent him to London, where he remained till the peace of Bretigny, in 1360. His ransom was three million crowns of gold and eight provinces; but, before the sum could be raised, John died suddenly in the Savoy in London, aged forty-five. He was a prince of great courage and virtue. D. 1319; D. 1364.

JOHN I., Pope, was a native of Tuscany, and ascended the papal chair on the death of Honorius, in 523. Theodoric, king of the Goths, a violent Arian, threw him into prison at Ravenna, where he died in 528.

JOHN II. was a Roman, and succeeded Boniface II. in 532. He opposed the Eutychians and Nestorians, and died in 535.

JOHN III., a Roman, succeeded Pelagius I. in 590. D. 574.

JOHN IV., a native of Dalmatia, was elected to succeed Severinus in 640. D. 612.

JOHN V. was a native of Syria, and ascended the papal throne, in succession to Benedict II., 655. D. the next year.

JOHN VI., a Greek, succeeded Sergius I. in 701. He held a council at Rome, to consider the charges by the English clergy against Wilfred, archbishop of York, who was acquitted. D. 705.

JOHN VII. was also a Greek, and succeeded the above. D. 707.

JOHN VIII., a Roman, was elected to the pontificate on the death of Adrian II., in 872. He crowned the emperor Charles the Bald in 875, and, three years after, went to France, where he held a council at Troyes. In his time Italy was ravaged by the Saracens, who obliged the pope to pay tribute. He corresponded with JOHN IX. became pope in 893. p. about 900.

JOHN X., archbishop of Ravenna, was elected to the papacy in 915. He was a turbulent prelate, and defeated the Saracens, who had desolated Italy a long time; but he was himself driven from Rome by Guy, duke of Tuscany, who was supported by the Roman people. He was put to death in 927.

JOHN XI. was made pope at the age of twenty-five, in 931, through the influence of his mother Marozia, wife of Guy, duke of Tuscany; but his brother Alberico afterwards threw both him and her into the castle of St. Angelo, where John died, in 936.

JOHN XII., a Roman of noble birth, named Octavianus, was elected pope in 954, and was the first who changed his name on that occasion. At that time Berenger tyrannized over Italy, and the pope implored the assistance of the emperor Otho I., who delivered the country. John crowned Otho at Rome, and promised him fidelity, which, however, was of short duration, for he united with the son of Berenger against his deliverer. Otho returned to Rome in 963, and called a council, in which the pope was accused of adultery, sacrilege, and other crimes, which, being proved, he was deposed. On the departure of the emperor, John entered Rome, and exercised dreadful cruelties on his enemies. He was assassinated in 964, by a man whose bed he had defiled.

JOHN XIII. was elected pope in 965, through the instrumentality of the emperor Otho, against the will of the Roman people. Peter, prefect of Rome, drove him thence in 966; but the emperor restored him, and Peter became an exile in his turn. p. 972.

JOHN XIV., bishop of Pavia, and chancellor to the emperor Otho II., obtained the papal chair after Benedict VII., in 983; but three months after his election he was sent to the castle of St. Angelo by the usurper, Pope Boniface. p. of poison, 984.

JOHN XV. became pope in 985. p. 996. This pope is styled XVI. by those that maintain he succeeded one of the same name who died a few days after his election.

JOHN XVII. was a Calabrian, and nominated to the papal chair by Crescentius, the Roman consul, in 997. Otho III., however, went to Rome, and put to death Crescentius, and imprisoned John.

JOHN XVIII. was elected pope, in succession to Sylvester II., in 1003. p. four months after his election.

JOHN XIX. succeeded the above. p. about 1009.

JOHN XX., son of Count Gregory of Tuscany, became pope after his brother Benedict, in 1024. p. 1034.

JOHN XXI. was a Portuguese, and the son of a physician. He became pope in 1277, but died eight months after his election. Some works of his on philosophy, medicine, and divinity, are extant.

JOHN XXII. was elected pope, at Lyons, in 1316. He founded several abbeys and bishoprics, but his pontificate was disturbed by irrels with the emperor and the Cordeliers, in order the pope endeavoured to suppress. y his works he seems to have been better fitted for a physician than a pope. They are—"Thesaurus Pauperum;" or a Collection of Remedies for the Poor; "Treatise on Disorders of the Eyes;" "On the Formation of the tus;" "On the Gout;" "Advice for Preserving Health." p. at Avignon, 1334.

JOHN XXIII., Cardinal Cossa, a Neapolitan, studied at Bologna, and became chamberlain to Boniface IX., who made him cardinal. He was elected pope in 1410, after the death of Alexander V., during the great schism, and promised to renounce the pontificate, if Gregory XII. and Peter de Luna would drop their pretensions. Not fulfilling his engagements, he was deposed by the council of Constance, in 1415, and imprisoned at Heidelberg, where he remained three years, and was then released at the request of Martin V. p. 1419.

JOHN I., surnamed Zimisces, emperor of Constantinople, was of an illustrious family. He stabbed the emperor Nicephorus Phocas, in 969, and obtained many victories over the Russians, Bulgarians, and Saracens. He was poisoned by Basil, the Eunuch, in 976.

JOHN II. (COMMENES) succeeded Alexis Comnenus, his father, in 1118. He gained several battles over the Turks and Servians, and governed with great prudence and liberality. He died in 1143, of a wound which he received from a poisoned arrow.

JOHN III. (DUKAS) was crowned at Niceus, in 1222, at the time when the Latins were in possession of Constantinople. He was a prince of great virtue, gained many battles, defeated the Scythians, Tartars, and Bulgarians, and extended his empire on all sides. p. 1255.

JOHN IV. (LASCARIS) son of Theodore the Young, whom he succeeded in 1259, at the age of 6 years; but, in the same year, the despot Michael Palaeologus deprived him of his crown and his eyes, and imprisoned him for life. p. 1244.

JOHN V. (PALAEOLOGUS) succeeded his father, Andronicus the Younger, in 1341, but his throne was for a long period usurped by John Cantacuzenus, whose daughter he married, after recovering his throne. His son Andronicus revolted against him, the Genoese made themselves masters of the isle of Lesbos, and Amurath I. took the city of Adrianople. p. 1391.

JOHN VI. (CANTACUZENUS) was the minister and favourite of Andronicus Palaeologus, who made him guardian of his children John and Emanuel, with whose mother, Jane of Savoy, he governed for some time with great wisdom and moderation. But, in 1345, he assumed the imperial title in Thrace, and, in 1347, took Constantinople, compelling John Palaeologus, who had been crowned in 1341, and who had married his daughter, to retire to Salonica. The exiled monarch, however, with the help of the Genoese, defeated the fleet of the usurper, and obliged him to quit his throne and capital. He then retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he devoted himself to literary studies, and wrote a valuable history of the empire, and a defence of Christianity against the Mohammedans. p. 1411.

John

JOHN VII. (PALÆOLOGUS) succeeded his father Emanuel, in 1425. His reign was very unfortunate, and the Turks made such progress in his dominions, as to reduce him to the necessity of imploring the succour of the Latins. He consented to a union between the two churches, which was performed at the council of Ferrara, in 1439, at which John assisted in person. b. 1448.

JOHN I., king of Portugal, was the natural son of Peter, and, in 1383, ascended the throne, to the prejudice of Beatrice, daughter of Ferdinand I., his brother. John I., king of Castile, the husband of that princess, disputed the crown, but was defeated at the battle of Aljubarrota, in 1385. He then turned his arms against the Moors of Africa, and took Ceuta and other places. b. 1433.

JOHN II. succeeded his father, Alphonso V., in 1481. He discovered several plots that were formed against him at the beginning of his reign, and put the principal conspirators to death. He gained some places in Africa, and distinguished himself in the battle of Toro, against the Castilians, in 1476. His acts procured him the titles of the Great and the Perfect. He encouraged navigation; and it was during his reign that Bernal Diaz sailed round the Cape of Good Hope; he also despatched colonies to India. b. 1455; d. 1495.

JOHN III. succeeded his father Emanuel on the throne of Portugal in 1521. He greatly encouraged navigation, commerce, and the arts. His navigators discovered Japan; and he sent Francis Xavier to India as a missionary. During his reign a terrible earthquake occurred at Lisbon, by which 30,000 persons perished. b. 1557.

JOHN IV., called the Fortunate. The Spaniards rendered themselves masters of Portugal in 1580, and kept possession of it till 1640, when the Portuguese revolted, and placed the crown on the head of the duke of Braganza, John IV., who held it till his death, in 1656.

JOHN V., successor of Peter II., was crowned king of Portugal in 1708. He entered into an alliance with Charles of Austria, who laid claim to the crown of Spain, and fought against Louis XIV. b. 1760.

JOHN VI., second son of Peter III., was appointed regent when his mother, Maria I., lost her reason, in 1793. In 1807 he was driven by the French from Portugal; whereupon he took up his residence in Brazil, with the title of emperor. On the death of his mother, in 1816, he was proclaimed king, but did not return to Portugal till 1821. b. 1826.

JOHN I., king of Castile and Leon, succeeded his father, Henry II., in 1379, at the age of twenty-one years. He made war in Portugal, for the purpose of placing his son on the throne of that country, but was unsuccessful. He was surnamed "father of his country," for his generous and just rule of his kingdom. b. 1390.

JOHN II., king of Castile and Leon, was son of Henry III., and was proclaimed king when less than two years of age, his uncle Ferdinand being appointed regent. He made war successfully against the kingdoms of Aragon and Navarre, and the Moors of Granada. He greatly assisted in the restoration of Spanish literature, and was father of the celebrated Isabella and of Henry IV. b. 1405; d. 1454.

JOHN I., king of Aragon, succeeded his father, Peter IV., in 1387. Throughout his reign he was continually at hostilities with his subjects, whom he governed with great injustice and severity.

JOHN II., king of Aragon and Navarre, was son of Ferdinand the Just, and ascended the throne of Navarre on marrying Blanche, daughter of Charles the Noble, in 1425, and that of Aragon in 1458, after the death of Alphonso, his brother. He was for a long time at war with his son Don Carlos, to whom Blanche, his mother, had left the crown of Navarre at her death, in 1441. He died in 1479, leaving the kingdom to his son, Ferdinand the Catholic.

JOHN I., king of Navarre. (See JOHN I., king of France.)

JOHN II., king of Navarre. (See JOHN II., king of Aragon.)

JOHN III., king of Navarre, married, in 1484, Catherine of Navarre, the heiress to the crown, and through this marriage he obtained the crown of that kingdom in 1494; but being a prince without any energy, lost all his possessions with the exception of Bearn. He died in France, in 1516, leaving a son, Henry II., titular king of Navarre, whose daughter, Jeanne d'Albret, was mother of Henry IV. of France.

JOHN, king of Bohemia, the son of the emperor Henry VII., was elected to the throne in 1310, at the age of fifteen. He was a warlike prince, and, after defeating the Lithuanians, assumed the title of king of Poland. He lost an eye in that expedition, and a Jew doctor, who pretended to be able to restore him to sight, deprived him of the other. His military spirit, however, continued unabated, and he accompanied Philip of France, in 1346, to the battle of Cressy, where he was guided between two brave knights, each holding his bridle. He fell in that action, and was buried at Luxembourg. He was succeeded in his kingdom of Bohemia by one of his sons, who became emperor under the title of Charles I.

JOHN I., king of Poland, was the second son of Casimir IV., whom he succeeded in 1492. He was the friend of letters and of peace, and during his reign there were few military events of importance. He was succeeded by his son Alexander, grand-duke of Lithuania. b. 1450; d. 501.

JOHN II., or JOHN CASIMIR. (See CASIMIR V.)

JOHN III., John Sobieski, king of Poland, was youngest son of James Sobieski, governor of Cracow, and was educated at Paris. In 1685 he was made grand marshal and general of the Polish armies, after which he was appointed master of the royal house, and prelate of Cracovia. He retook several cities from the rebellious Cossacks of the Ukraine, and distinguished himself in many gallant actions. In 673 he gained the memorable battle of Choczim, upon the Dniester, in which the Turks lost 28,000 men. The year following he was elected king of Poland, on the death of Michael, and likewise compelled the Turks to sue for peace. In 1683 he forced them to raise the siege of Vienna, which otherwise would inevitably have been taken. b. at Warsaw, 1696.

JOHN I., or JOANNCIS, king of Bulgaria, usurped the throne to the prejudice of his brother's son. The emperor, Baldwin I., having refused the alliance of John, he marched against, defeated, and took him prisoner at Adrianople. Baldwin was kept in close confinement, and shortly afterwards died. John subsequently turned his arms against Boniface, marquis of Monferrat, and king of Thessalonica, but was compelled to beat a retreat. He again resorted to arms on the death of Boniface, in 1207, and had almost reached Thessalonica, when he was assassinated by one of his generals, in 1207.

JOHN I., king of Sweden, was son of Swerker II., and successor of Eric II. He organized, with small success, an expedition into Esthonia, for the propagation of Christianity in that country. He was the last of the royal race of Swerker. d. 1222.

JOHN II., king of Sweden and Denmark. (See JOHN I., king of Denmark.)

JOHN III., king of Sweden, was son of Gustavus Vasa. He dethroned his brother, Eric XIV., in 1568, on account of his tyranny and cruelties. He terminated the war against Denmark that had been commenced under the previous reign, and endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to banish Lutheranism from his dominions, between the years 1570 and 1580. He afterwards made war against Ivan Vasilvitch, and gained over him many advantages, but signed a peace in 1593. He named Sigismund, his son, king of Poland, in 1587. b. 1537; d. 1592.

JOHN I., king of Denmark and Sweden, succeeded, on the throne of Denmark, Christian I., his father, in 1481, dividing the duchy of Holstein with Frederik, his brother. He became king of Sweden in 1483, but the Swedes revolted against him in 1501. He reigned in Denmark till 1513.

JOHN I., duke of Brittany, reigned between the years 1237 and 1286.

JOHN II. was successor of the above, and ruled from 1286 to 1305.

JOHN III., called the Good, reigned from 1312 till 1341. Being without issue, he nominated, to the prejudice of his own brother, John de Montfort, Charles de Blois, to whom he gave his niece in marriage, an act which led to many sanguinary conflicts.

JOHN IV., more commonly known as John de Montfort, was brother of the preceding. He had already secured from his rival, Charles de Blois, the greatest part of Brittany, when the Court of Peers of France adjudged the duchy to his rival, Charles, in 1341. John surrendered to the duke of Normandy, whom Philip de Vellois had sent against him at the head of an army. He was confined for four years at the Louvre. At the end of that time he contrived to make his escape, and rejoined Joan of Flanders, his wife, who had continued the war with heroic courage. He, however, died a few months afterwards, leaving Brittany under the rule of Charles. d. 1345.

JOHN V., surnamed the Valiant, termed John IV. by those who exclude de Montfort from the dukes of Brittany. He was son of the preceding, and brought up at the court of Edward III. of England, whose daughter he married. He attacked Charles de Blois, who had dispossessed his father of the duchy of Brittany, and defeated him at Auray in 1364, whereupon Charles acknowledged him to be the rightful duke. d. 1399.

JOHN VI. was son of the above, and attained his majority in 1414, being then only fourteen years of age. He assisted the English in their expeditions against the French king, and, in return, Charles VII. aided his rival, the duke de Penthièvre, who, in 1419, drew John into an ambuscade, and kept him prisoner for five years, when he was released by his barons. Inconstant and feeble, he allied himself in turn with Charles VII. and with Henry VI. of England, who, at that period, was master of almost the whole of France. d. 1422.

JOHN, duke of Burgundy and count of Nevers, succeeded his father in 1404, at the age of thirty-three. The houses of Burgundy and Orleans at that period disputed the government of France, during the insanity of Charles VI. In 1407 he caused the assassination of the duke of Orleans, and, by that act, became absolute master in Paris; but it was also the commencement of the fearful internal struggle between the Burgundians and the Armagnacs. He was driven from Paris, but re-entered it in 1418, committed many horrible massacres, possessed himself of the king's person, usurped all authority, and favoured, by the troubles he excited, the conquests of the English in France. He was invited by the dauphin, afterwards Charles VII., to a conference on the bridge of Montereau, and there assassinated by a favourite of Charles, in revenge of the assassination of the duke of Orleans, in 1419.

JOHN, secretary to the emperor Honorius, usurped the empire of the West, on the death of his master, in 423, and overran Italy, Gaul, and Spain. Valentinian III., to whom the throne belonged, attacked him, at the head of a large army, and defeated him: he was afterwards taken by treason at Ravenna, where he was put to death, in 455.

JOHN, surnamed Philoponus, "the lover of study," a learned grammarian of Alexandria, in the 7th century. It is said he was appointed conservator of the celebrated Alexandrian library, and he retained the post till Omar ordered the destruction of the whole by fire. He wrote a treatise on the creation of the world, and edited several of Aristotle's works. d. about 600.

JOHN OF ARRAS, secretary of the duke de Berry, composed, in 1357, by order of Charles V., and for the amusement of the duchess de Bar, the romance of "Melusine," which was printed for the first time in 1500.

JOHN OF AUSTRIA, Don, natural son of the emperor Charles V., was brought up without the knowledge of his birth till his father, on his death-bed, had revealed the secret to his son Philip II., king of Spain, who caused John to be brought to his court, and publicly acknowledged him as his brother. In 1570 he was sent into Granada against the Moors, where he terminated the war with great glory. The year following, he was appointed by the Christian princes commander of the fleet against the Turks, and gained the celebrated battle of Lepanto, where the Turks lost 30,000 men and 200 vessels. In 1573 he took Tunis, and in 1576 was made governor of the Low Countries, then in a state of revolt. After taking Namur, Charlemont, and Marienburg, he was vigorously opposed by the archduke Matthias and the prince of Orange.

presented to Michael Angelo a statue, finished with all the care of which he was capable, the latter destroyed it, saying that he should learn to carve before he finished. This caused John to work with redoubled ardour, and soon he became one of the best sculptors in Italy. He took up his residence at Bologna, and there executed a great number of works, one of the most celebrated of which is the group, "Rape of the Sabines," exhibited at Florence. The bronze horse in the statue of Henry IV., on the Pont Neuf, at Paris, is also his work. b. at Douai about 1530; d. 1608.

JOHN OF BRUGES. (See BRUX, John van.)

JOHN OF GAUNT, or GHEWT, duke of Lancaster, was the fourth son of Edward III., king of England. He took, for his second wife, Constance, a natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile and Leon, and, on the death of that monarch, laid claim to the throne in right of his wife, in opposition to Henry of Trastamare, but without success. He served with great glory in France, with his brother the Black Prince, and, on the latter's death, had the management of affairs during the life of his father. On the accession of Richard II., he retired; but the envy of the courtiers, particularly the ecclesiastics, who hated him for protecting Wickliffe, followed him with false accusations of a design to usurp the throne, from which he satisfactorily cleared himself. In 1388 his only daughter was married to the heir-apparent of the king of Castile, and John renounced his claim to that crown, in consideration of a considerable sum and a pension. He took for his third wife, Catharine Swynford, sister to the wife of his friend Chaucer, the poet. John of Gaunt was a man of great valour, prudence, and generosity. His son afterwards became king, by the title of Henry IV. b. at Ghent, 1340; d. 1399.

JOHN OF LEYDEN. (See BOCCOLD.)

JOHN OF PARIS, a learned professor of theology in the 13th century. In the dispute between Pope Boniface VIII. and Philip the Fair, king of France, he took the part of the latter, and defended his cause with zeal and ability. He also started objections to the doctrine of transubstantiation, for which he was cited to Rome. He wrote,—"De Regia Potestate et Papali;" "De Modo existendi Corporis Christi in Sacramento Altaris." d. 1304.

JOHN OF SALISBURY, a learned English monk of the 12th century, became bishop of Chartres, in France, about 1161. He studied at Oxford, but also visited Paris, where he attended the lectures of Abelard. He likewise went to Italy, and, at Rome, lived some time under the patronage of Pope Adrian IV. On his return to England, he became secretary to Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, whom he accompanied in his exile to France. After the tragical death of à Becket, he became bishop of Chartres. In learning he is said to have had no living superior, and wrote several valuable works on theology, politics, and philosophy. b. at Salisbury, about 1119; d. at Chartres, 1182.

JOHN, St., CHRYSOSTOM. (See CHRYSOSTOM.)

JOHNES, Thomas, Jons, an English gentleman distinguished for his attachment to literary pursuits, was educated at Eton and Jesus College, Oxford; and was member of parliament for Cardigan, and afterwards for Radnorshire. At an estate he possessed at Hafod, in Cardiganshire, he built a splendid mansion, furnishing it with a magnificent library, and a complete typographical establishment, where his literary works were printed. He translated the Chronicles of Froissart and Monstrelet, "Joinville's Memoirs of Louis X. of France" (St. Louis); "Bertrand de la Brocquiere's Travels in Palestine," and St. Palaye's "Life of Froissart." His original writings were not numerous or important. b. at Ludlow, Shropshire, 1743; d. 1818.

JOHNSEX, Thomas, Jon'-son, an English botanist, became an apothecary in London, and, according to Wood, was the best herbalist of his age. He wrote the first local catalogue of plants published in England. But his great work was an improved edition of Gerard's "Herbal." In this civil wars he entered the royalist army, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.D. At the siege of Basing House, he received a wound of which he died. Besides the above, he wrote a treatise on the hot springs of Bath, and other pieces. b. at Selby, Yorkshire, 1611; d. 1644.

JOHNSEX, Samuel, an English divine, who was educated at St. Paul's School, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1676, he obtained the living of Corringham, in Essex, but resided in London, where he made himself conspicuous in opposing the succession of the duke of York, afterwards James II., and the measures of the court. Having written a book against the doctrine of passive obedience, under the title of "Julian the Apostate," in which the duke was attacked, he was condemned to pay a fine of five hundred marks. When the army was encamped on Hounslow Heath, he published a remonstrance to the soldiers in behalf of the Protestant religion, for which he was sentenced to stand twice in the pillory, to pay a heavy fine, to be degraded from his function, and whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. This sentence was rigorously inflicted, but at the Revolution the Parliament declared the proceedings illegal. He was also rewarded with a pension, and was offered the deanery of Durham, which he considered as inadequate to his merits, b. in Warwickshire, 1640; d. 1708.

JOHNSEX, Martin, a landscape-painter of great merit in the reign of James II., whose views in England being scarce and valuable, are only to be found in the collections of connoisseurs.

JOHNSEX, Richard, an English grammarian, who was head-master of the New School at Nottingham from 1707 to 1720. He published, "Noctes Nottinghamiæ," and "Grammatical Commentaries." He was a Master of Arts, but of what university does not appear. He drowned himself in a fit of despondency in a rivulet near Nottingham, in 1720.

JOHNSEX, John, a learned divine, was educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of Corpus Christi College. Archbishop Sancroft gave him two livings in Kent, and archbishop Tenison presented him to that of Margate. He had also the vicarage of Cranbrook. He was twice chosen proctor in convocation for the diocese of Canterbury. On the accession of George I. he refused to take the oaths, but afterwards submitted. He wrote,—"The Clergyman's Vade-Mecum;" "A Collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, Canons, &c.;" "The unbloody Sacrifice and Altar unveiled and supported,"

JOHNSON, Charles, a lawyer and dramatic writer, who acquired some wealth by his plays, and having married a wealthy widow, set up a tavern in Bow Street, Covent Garden. Pope ridiculed him in his "Dunciad" on account of his unusual size. n. 1679; n. 1718.

JOHNSON, Thomas, a learned Englishman, who for some time was engaged at Eton, and afterwards set up a school at Brentford. He produced editions of Sophocles and other ancient authors. n. about 1675; n. about 1750.

JOHNSON, Maurice, an English antiquary, who was educated as a barrister. He established a literary society at Spalding, in 1712, and, in 1717, was one of the revivers of the Antiquarian Society, to which he sent numerous contributions. n. at Spalding, Lincolnshire, about 1697; n. 1753.

JOHNSON, Samuel, first president of King's College, New York, was educated at the college of Saybrook; first preached at West Haven, then became an episcopalian, and went to England to obtain ordination. On his return to America he settled at Stratford, where he preached to an episcopalian congregation; received the degree of D.D. from Oxford, in 1743; and was chosen president of the college at New York on its establishment in 1754. He held this situation with much credit, until 1763, when he resigned and returned to his pastoral charge at Stratford, where he continued till his death. n. at Guildford, Connecticut; p. 1772.

JOHNSON, Samuel, a dramatic writer and performer of eccentric character, was the author of "Hurothrambo, or the Supernatural," and various other laughable extravaganzas. n. 1773.

JOHNSON, Samuel, a learned English critic, lexicographer, and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a bookseller at Lichfield. His education was commenced at the free school of Lichfield, and in 1728, he was admitted of Pembroke College, Oxford; but being too poor to remain at the university, he, in 1731, quitted it without a degree. He soon afterwards lost his father, who left him in such poor circumstances that he sought the post of usher of a school at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, where, however, he did not continue long. He next resided with a printer at Birmingham, where he translated Lobo's account of Abyssinia. In 1735 he married Mrs. Porter, a widow lady of that town, who was possessed of the sum of £900; and with this capital he the same year opened a school at Edial, near Lichfield; but he obtained only three scholars, one of whom was David Garrick. About this time he began his tragedy of "Irene." In 1737 he set out for the metropolis, accompanied by Garrick. On fixing his residence in London, he formed a connexion with Cave, the publisher of the "Gentleman's Magazine," for which work he wrote during several years, his principal employment being an account of the parliamentary debates. At this period he contracted an intimacy with Richard Savage, whose name he has immortalized by one of the finest pieces of biography ever written. In 1749 appeared his "Vanity of Human Wishes," an imitation of Juvenal's tenth Satire. Two years previously, he had printed proposals for an edition of Shakspeare, and the plan of his English dictionary addressed to Lord Chesterfield. The price agreed upon between himself and the book-sellors for the last work was £1575. In 1749 Garrick produced his friend's tragedy upon the stage of Drury Lane Theatre, but it was unsuccessful. In 1750 he commenced his "Rambler," a periodical paper, which was continued till 1752. In this work only five papers were the production of other writers. About the period of his relinquishing the "Rambler," he lost his wife, a circumstance which greatly affected him, as appears from his "Meditations," and the sermon which he wrote on her death. In 1754 he visited Oxford. The next year appeared his dictionary, which, instead of three, had occupied eight years. Lord Chesterfield endeavoured to assist it by writing two papers in its favour in the "World;" but, as he had hitherto neglected the author, Johnson treated him with contempt. The publication of his great work did not relieve him from his embarrassments, for the price of his labour had been consumed in the progress of its compilation, and the year following we find him under an arrest for five guineas, from which he was released by Richardson, the printer. In 1753 he began the "Idler," which was published in a weekly newspaper. On the death of his mother, in 1750, he wrote the romance of "Rasselas," to defray the expenses of her funeral, and to pay her debts. In 1762, George III. granted him a pension of £300 per annum. In 1763, Boswell, his future biographer, was introduced to him, a circumstance to which we owe the most minute account of a man's life and character that has ever been written. Boswell, though a very ordinary mortal, has immortalized himself by this performance. In his book, everything about Johnson is supplied to us; in Lord Macaulay's words, we have "his coat, his wig, his figure, his face, his scrofula, his St. Vitus's dance, his rolling walk, his blinking eye, the outward signs which too clearly marked the approbation of his dinner; his insatiable appetite for fish-sauce and veal pie, with plums; his inextinguishable thirst for tea; his trick of touching the posts as he walked; his mysterious practice of treasuring up scraps of orange-peel; his morning slumbers; his midnight disputations; his contortions; his mutterings; his gruntings; his puffings; his vigorous, acute, and ready eloquence; his sarcastic wit; his vehemence; his insolence; his fits of tempestuous rage; his queer inmates—old Mr. Levett and blind Mrs. Williams, the cat Hodge, and the negro Frank—all are as familiar to us as the objects by which we have been surrounded from childhood." Johnson had the honour of a conversation with the king in the royal library, in 1765, when his majesty asked if he intended to publish any more works. To this he answered, that he thought he had written enough; on which the king said, "So should I too, if you had not written so well." About this time he instituted the Literary Club, consisting of some of the most celebrated men of the age. In 1773 he went on a tour with Boswell to the western islands of Scotland, of which journey he shortly afterwards published an account, which occasioned a controversy between him and Macpherson, relative to the poems of Ossian. In 1775⁺ university of Oxford sent him the degree of LL.D., which diploma, ten years before, had been conferred on him by the university of Dublin. In 1779 he began his "Lives of the English Poets," which was the last of his literary labours. After a long illness, during part of which he had fearful apprehensions of death, his mind became calm, composed, and resigned, and he died full of that faith which he had so vigorously defended and inculcated in his writings. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey and a statue, with an appropriate inscription has been erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral. A complete list of his works is prefixed to Boswell's "Life." As a writer, few have done such essential service to his country, by fixing its language and regulating its morality. In his person he was large, robust, and unwieldy; in his dress he was singular and slovenly; in conversation positive, and impatient of contradiction. But with all his singularities he had an excellent heart, full of tenderness and compassion, and his actions were the result of principle. He was a stout advocate for truth, and a zealous champion of the Church of England. b. at Lichfield, 1709; d. in London, 1781.

JOHNSON, Andrew, a self-educated man, who became president of the United States from April, 1865, to March, 1869, served his apprenticeship to a tailor in early years, and worked as a journeyman for a long period of his life. After holding various offices of minor importance, he was returned to Congress for Tennessee in 1843, becoming governor of this state in 1855 and 1857, and a member of the United States Senate in 1863. In 1894, when Abraham Lincoln was elected president for the second time, he was chosen vice-president, and succeeded to the presidency on the murder of Lincoln in 1895. b. 1808.

JOHNSON, Reverdy, a distinguished American statesman, and member of the American bar, who succeeded Mr. C. F. Adams as United States ambassador to England in 1868, and arranged with Lord Stanley a treaty for the settlement of the "Alabama" claims. b. about 1800.

JOHNSTON, George, a modern English naturalist, commenced his medical education as the apprentice of Dr. Abercrombie; and subsequently practised as surgeon at Berwick-upon-Tweed. While at Edinburgh he was an attentive student of natural history, and continued afterwards to follow up the pursuit. In 1838 he published his "History of British Zoophytes," and four years afterwards his "History of British Sponges" appeared. He contributed many valuable articles, chiefly on the lower forms of animal life, to the Transactions of various provincial scientific societies, to the "Magazine of Zoology and Botany," and to the "Annals of Natural History." In 1850 he produced one of his best works—the "Introduction to Conchology, or Elements of the Natural History of Molluscous Animals," and soon afterwards put forth an interesting work "On the Botany of the Eastern Borders." The latter portion of his life was visited with some severe trials, under which his mind gave way. b. 1798; d. 1855.

JOHNSTON, or JOHNSON, Charles, an ingenious writer, and a native of Ireland, was bred to the bar, and went over to England to practise; but being afflicted with deafness, was compelled to quit that profession. His first literary attempt was the famous "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea," a political romance, in which the leading characters were drawn from real life, and from their being generally known, produced a great sensation. This work having been exceedingly well received, the author produced others of a similar class, viz., "The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools," 2 vols.; "The History of Arabaces, Prince of Beiliss," 2 vols.; "The Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life," 2 vols.; and the "History of John Juniper, Esq., alias Juniper Jack," 3 vols. In 1782 he went to India, where he engaged in literary and other speculations, and obtained considerable wealth. p. 1800.

JOHNSTON, Jas. J. F. W., an eminent modern chemist. Under circumstances by no means favourable, he succeeded in obtaining an education that enabled him to gain his livelihood by giving private instruction to pupils of the university of Glasgow. Removing to Durham, in 1825, he opened a school there. Five years later he married a young lady, whereby his circumstances were so much improved that he was enabled to retire from teaching, and give himself up entirely to chemistry, in pursuit of which intention he went to Sweden, where he became the pupil of the great chemist Berzelius. In 1833, upon the establishment of the Durham University, he was invited from abroad, to assume the readership of chemistry and mineralogy in the new seat of learning. Shortly afterwards he went to Edinburgh, and was appointed chemist to the Agricultural Society of Scotland, but eventually resided exclusively at Durham, where he commenced a series of works on chemistry as applied to agriculture, which have become famous throughout the world. His "Catechism of Agricultural Chemistry" has passed through thirty-six editions, and has been translated into every European language. A similar work was his "Lectures on Agricultural Chemistry and Geology." Having travelled in the New World, he published "Notes on North America," in which much valuable information is given as to the agriculture of that country. He was peculiarly qualified to make scientific knowledge attractive to the ordinary reader, as was evidenced by the vast circulation of his "Chemistry of Common Life," one of his latest works. He also wrote scientific articles for the "Edinburgh Review," and contributed to the Transactions of many learned societies. He was fellow of the Royal Society, and member of many other learned bodies. b. at Paisley, 1796; d. at Durham, 1853.

JOHNSTON, Alexander Keith, an eminent modern geographer, whose first studies were directed towards fitting him for the pursuit of medicine; but a strong predilection for design caused him to become apprenticed to an engraver. From early youth he was an attentive student of geography, and, in order to make himself master of all that was to be learned with respect to it, he acquired, in succession, French, Italian, Spanish, and German. The result of so much well-directed industry, was the publication, in 1843, of his first great geographical work, "The National Atlas," in folio, which procured for him election as fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and the appointment of geographer to the queen in Scotland. A close study of the writings of Humboldt, and other great German and French writers on his favorite art, enabled him to produce, in 1848, his "Physical Atlas," a splendid work, characterized by the "Bulletin of the Paris Geographical Society," as "one of the most magnificent monuments which the scientific genius of the 19th century has raised." He was soon afterwards made honorary member of the Geographical Societies of Paris and Berlin. He was completed the new edition of his superb 'Physical Atlas.' The publication of the first edition of this great work, ten years since, had the effect of introducing in this country almost a new era in the popular study of geography, through its attractive and instructive illustration of the prominent features of science. The second edition is, to some extent, an entirely new work, owing to the additions and improvements which have been introduced. . . . and the addition of a large general index adds materially to the utility of this extensive compendium of natural geography." In addition to the above great works, he produced an "Atlas of the Historical Geography of Europe;" a smaller "Physical Atlas," in 4to; a number of educational works on classical, general, and physical geography; an "Astronomical Atlas," assisted by Mr. Hind; the "Royal Atlas of Modern Geography," and the "Handy Royal Atlas," a reduced copy of the preceding. n. at Kirkhill, in Mellothian, 1804.

JOHNSTONE, George, a naval commander, was the son of a Scotch baronet, and devoted himself to the sea-service. After passing through the subordinate ranks, he was, in 1760, made master and commander, and, in 1762, post-captain. He was subsequently appointed governor of West Florida, and, on his return to England, took an active part in the affairs of the East India Company, particularly in opposition to Lord Clive. In 1771 he wrote "Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies." He sat in Parliament first for Cookermouth and afterwards for Appleby, and had a duel with Lord George Germaine, through some reflections which fell from him in the House respecting his lordship. He was one of the commissioners sent to treat with the Americans. n. 1787.

JOHNSTONE, Chevalier de, an adherent of the Pretender, was the son of a merchant at Edinburgh, and having at an early age evinced an inclination for a military life, and having been brought up in Jacobite principles, he left Edinburgh privately on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1746, and joined the insurgents. He was appointed aide-de-camp to Prince Charles Edward; fought at the battle of Preston Pans; and raised an independent company, with which he served throughout the campaign. After the battle of Culloden, he sought safety in flight; and, disguised as a pedlar, travelled through England, and at length escaped to the Continent. He subsequently entered into the service of France, and acted in the capacity of aide-de-camp in Canada; on the conquest of which by the British he returned to France, and died there at an advanced age. n. 1720. His "Memoirs of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746," which occupied his latter years, is a very interesting work.

JOHNSTONE, James, a physician and physiological writer, studied at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1750; and settled at Kidderminster, where he acquired considerable reputation by his successful treatment of a malignant fever then raging there, and by having discovered the good effects arising from the use of mineral acids, in counteracting contagion; his claim to the merit of this discovery, however, has been disputed. Dr. Johnstone subsequently removed to Worcester. He was the author of "Medical Essays and Observations," "Disquisitions relating to the Nervous System," and also several medical papers in the "Philosophical Transactions." n. at Annan, Dumfriesshire, 1730; n. at Worcester, 1802.

JOHNSTONE, Dr. Bryce, an eminent Scotch divine, was a son of John Johnstone, Esq., a highly respectable magistrate of Annan in Dumfriesshire. He entered the university of Edinburgh in 1702; in 1771 he was appointed minister of Holywood; and in 1786 the degree of D.D. was conferred on him. He was the author of a "Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine," 2 vols. 8vo; an "Essay on the Influence of Religion on Civil Society and Civil Government;" and some valuable sermons. He also assisted Sir John Sinclair in drawing up the statistical account of Scotland; and greatly contributed towards the improvement of the agricultural and social condition of his native country. n. 1717; n. 1805.

JOHNSTONE, John Henry, a celebrated comic actor and vocalist, was born in Tipperary, Ireland, where his father was a small farmer. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in a regiment of Irish dragoons, and soon attracted the notice of his comrades by his fine voice and good-humoured liveliness. The colonel of the regiment having had proofs of Johnstone's vocal powers, and hearing that he had an inclination for the stage, granted him his discharge, and gave him a recommendatory letter to Mr. Ryder, then manager of the Dublin theatre, who engaged him for three years, at two guineas per week, which was soon raised to four. His fame as a vocalist increased rapidly; and having married a Miss Pottier, who possessed a thorough knowledge of the science of music, he profited by her instructions, and soon became a finished singer. Macklin, the famous actor, advised him to try the London boards, and wrote a letter to Mr. Harris, of Covent Garden, so strongly in his favour, that he engaged Johnstone and his wife, for three years, at a salary of £14, £16, and £18 per week. He accordingly made his appearance at Covent Garden Theatre, in October, 1783. There were, however, other aspirants for vocal fame at that time on the stage; and though Johnstone continued to sing for several seasons with undiminished success, he perceived that a better field was open for him in the personation of Irish characters. His utmost efforts were therefore directed to that end; and it was soon found that his native humour, rich brogue, and fine voice carried him to a pitch of excellence in the path he had chosen which left every competitor far behind. He quitted Covent Garden for Drury Lane, in 1803, and in the summer of that year visited Dublin, where, martial law being then in force, the company performed in the daytime. On his return from Ireland his wife died; and he married Miss Boulton, by whom he had a daughter, who afterwards became Mrs. Wallack. Few public performers have passed a long career with such uninterrupted success as John Henry Johnstone. As an actor, he stood alone in his peculiar path, personating his buoyant and blundering country-

JOHNSTONE, John, M.D., a distinguished physician of Birmingham, who acquired a high reputation for his success in treating fevers, and for the sparing use he made of medicine. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and was the intimate friend of Dr. Parr, whose life he wrote, a performance which shows that Dr. Johnstone was as distinguished for literary ability and fearless advocacy of what he believed to be truth as he was for his professional skill. He also wrote several treatises on medical subjects; was a member of the Royal College of Physicians, and was held in high estimation for his professional ability, general acquirements, and amiable character. He was the son of Dr. James Johnstone of Worcester, in which city he was born, in 1768; D. 1838.

JOINVILLE, John, Sire or Lord de, a French historian, was counsellor and friend to Louis IX., king of France, whom he accompanied in his first crusade in 1248, sharing his captivity after the battle of Massoura, in which Louis and his army were taken prisoners. On the king's return to France, Joinville received a pension, and was constantly retained near his majesty's person. His "History of St. Louis IX., King of France," is a valuable and interesting work, wherein the simple grandeur of the good king's character is minutely painted. The best French edition is that by Ducange, which was translated into English by Johnes, in 1807. B. about 1224; D. about 1319.

JOLIVET, Jean Baptiste Moysse, Count de, zhô-le-vai, previous to the great French revolution was an advocate, and having been elected to the Legislative Assembly, he, in 1793, had the boldness to denounce the Jacobin club, and was fortunate enough to escape the perils of that dangerous epoch. He was made a member of the Council of State after the rise of Napoleon, and was charged with the organization of four new departments created on the left bank of the Rhine. Having successfully performed this duty, he was, on his return to Paris, made a commandant of the Legion of Honour, and continued to hold the office of Councillor of State till 1814. He was the author of several works on statistics and finance. B. 1754; D. 1818.

JOLY, Claude, zhô-le, a French political writer, was at first a lawyer; but was afterwards made precentor of the cathedral at Paris. He wrote a book entitled "Maxims for the Education of a Prince," which, speaking too boldly of the rights of the people, was burnt by the hangman, in 1655. B. at Paris, 1607; D. at the same place, 1700.

JOLY, Guy, nephew of the preceding, was, for some time, the secretary and confidential friend of Cardinal de Retz; but, quarrelling with him, attached himself to the court party. He wrote some "Historical Memoirs" about 1665, which were intended to give the opposite view of the questions referred to in the memoirs of Cardinal de Retz.

JOLY, Marc Antoine, a French comic author, who became, in 1753, censor-royal. He wrote, among other plays, the "School of Lovers," and "The Jealous Wife." B. at Paris, 1672; D. 1758.

had already established himself as a stockbroker in Paris, when he became acquainted with General Ney, who, discovering his great qualifications for military study, obtained for him an appointment which allowed him leisure to pursue it. When only 25, he wrote the early portion of his "Traité des Grandes Opérations Militaires," upon which Ney obtained a post for him in the army, and soon afterwards appointed him his aide-de-camp, and he accompanied his patron through his campaigns during the few ensuing years, distinguishing himself by his bravery and skill. At the battle of Jena, in particular, he rendered good service to Ney, for which he was made a baron. In 1808 he marched with Ney into Spain, but fell under the displeasure of that general in the following year, and was superseded. Intending to enter the Russian army, he now applied to be discharged; but Napoleon refused, and made him a brigadier instead. Soon afterwards, he was appointed to write the history of the grand army then about to invade Russia, and throughout the campaign exhibited such great talent, that Ney, after the battle of Bautzen, requested the emperor to make him general of division; but Napoleon found some cause for displeasure in his conduct, and again superseded him. Mortified at this treatment, Jomini resolved to enter the Russian service, and soon afterwards was made lieutenant-general therein, but never took an active part against Napoleon. Meanwhile, he was tried by court-martial, and, in his absence, condemned to death by the French. In 1815 he went to Paris, where he strove, by every possible means, to prevent the execution of his old benefactor, Marshal Ney. He subsequently went to reside in Russia, and occupied himself with the composition of military works, which have since become great text-books of the science of war. The czar of Russia allowed Jomini to settle in Brussels in 1855. His chief works are, "History of the Wars of Frederick II.," "Principles of Strategy," "Political and Military Life of Napoleon," "Treatise on the Art of War," and "The Military Atlas." n. at Payerne, in the canton of Vaud, 1779; n. 1860.

JONAS, Arngim, jo'-nas, a native of Iceland, and a writer of some philosophical and historical works, was confessor to Gundebrand, bishop of Holum, who was a disciple of Tycho Brahe. Jonas refused the see of Holum after the death of his friend. n. 1515; n. 1610.

JONAS, Justus, a learned Protestant, who became principal of the college of Wittenberg, assisted Melancthon at Marburg, and zealously defended the doctrines of Luther. n. in Thuringia, 1493; n. 1555.

JONES, John, jones, an English physician, who wrote "The Dial of Ages," 1550; "A Discourse of the Natural Beginning of all Growing and Living Things," and translated Galen's four books of Elements. n. about 1680.

JONES, John, a Welsh antiquary, who continued transcribing old manuscripts for about forty years, as appears from some of his volumes dated from 1590 to 1630. Of his collection above fifty large volumes are still in existence.

JONES, Richard, a Welsh divine, who compiled, in his native language, a curious work, called "Gemma Cambriæ," containing a summary of all the books and chapters of the Bible. He matriculated at Jesus College, Oxford, in 1621. n. in Ireland, about 1652,

Jones

JONES, Inigo, a famous English architect, of whose youth very little is known, till he attracted, by his skill in drawing, the notice of William, earl of Pembroke, who sent him to Italy, where he acquired a great knowledge of architecture. James I. appointed him surveyor-general of the works, and, in the succeeding reign, he had charge of the rebuilding of St. Paul's cathedral. He was also made manager of the mansions and interludes at court, which brought upon him the satire of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him in his comedy of "Bartholomew Fair," under the name of Lantern Leatherhead. He sailed reluctantly for his loyalty in the time of the great civil war. In 1655 he wrote "A Discourse on Stonehenge," in which he attempted to prove that it had been the Roman temple of G. M. T. He designed the palace of Whitehall and the banqueting-house, the church and piazza of Covent Garden, and other buildings. Most of his works were published in 1727, folio, and others in 1725, folio. n. in London about 1573; n. 1671.

JONES, Sir Thomas, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. When it is last monarch consulted him on his disposition of power, and said that he could soon have twelve judges of his opinion, Sir Thomas answered, "Twelve judges you may possibly find, sire, but not twelve lawyers."

JONES, William, an English mathematician, settled in London as a schoolmaster, and, having instructed Lord Macclesfield's son in mathematics, that nobleman made him his secretary, and appointed him deputy-teller of the Exchequer. He was very intimate with Sir Isaac Newton, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote "A Compendium of the Art of Navigation," "A New Introduction to Mathematics," some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," and an analysis of several of Sir Isaac Newton's papers. n. in the Isle of Anglesea, 1680; n. 1719.

JONES, Jeremiah, a learned dissenting divine, who became minister of a congregation at Avening, in Gloucestershire. He wrote, in 1719, "A Vindication of St. Matthew's Gospel," "A new and full Method of setting the Canonical Authority of the Old Testament," which works were reprinted at the Clarendon press, Oxford.

JONES, Henry, a dramatic writer, was originally a bricklayer. Some of his poetical attempts attracting the notice of Lord Chesterfield, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he took him under his patronage, and brought him to London, where he published his poems by subscription, and produced his tragedy of the "Earl of Essex," which gained him wealth and reputation. n. in Ireland, about 1720; n. 1770.

JONES, Griffith, was many years editor of the "London Chronicle," and other papers. He was proprietor of the "Literary Magazine," and, with his brother, projected those useful publications for children, which were so successfully printed by that Mr. Newberry to whom Dr. Johnson introduced Goldsmith. n. 1721; n. 1786.

JONES, David, a Welsh poet, who edited two volumes of Welsh poetry, and collected a large number of ancient MSS. in that language. n. about 1785.

JONES, Paul, a naval adventurer, who had been a common sailor in some vessels that left the port of Kircubright, but settled in America in 1773, and subsequently obtained the command of an American ship under Commodore Hopkins, and distinguished himself in several engagements, for which he received his commission as captain of the marine. He then sailed to France, and being well acquainted with the Scotch coast and the northern part of England, he conceived the design of effecting a descent. He accordingly landed at Whitehaven, and, having dismantled a fort, set fire to some shipping in the harbour. Thence he sailed for the opposite coast of Scotland, where he landed on the estate of the earl of Selkirk, and plundered his lordship's house of all the plate. He next took the Drake sloop of war, with which he returned to Brest. He afterwards sailed round Ireland to the North Sea, with three ships—the Richard, Pallas, and Vengeance. Having committed great mischief on that coast, he fell in with the Baltic fleet, convoyed by the Scarpis frigate and the Countess of Scarborough armed ship, both which, after a severe action, he captured off Flamborough Head. For these services the king of France conferred on him the order of Merit, and gave him a gold-hilted sword. His active career finished with the American war, and some private affairs calling him to Europe, he resided at Paris till his death. b. in Scotland, 1747; d. 1792.

JONES, Sir William, an Indian judge and learned Oriental writer. Losing his father in his infancy, his education devolved on his mother, a woman of great virtue and understanding, from whom he learned the rudiments of knowledge, and was then removed to Harrow school, where he made such great progress in his studies, that Dr. Sumner, the master, affirmed that his pupil knew more Greek than himself; a previous master having said, "If Jones were left naked on Salisbury plain, he would nevertheless find the road to fame." In 1764 he was entered at University College, Oxford, where to his classical pursuits he added the study of the Persian and Arabic languages, also the Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese. At the age of nineteen he became tutor to Lord Althorp, and, during his residence at Wimbledon, in Earl Spencer's family, he greatly enlarged his acquirements in Oriental literature. In 1769 he made a tour in France, and about the same time undertook, at the request of the king of Denmark, to translate the history of Nadir Shah from Persian into French. In 1770 he entered on the study of the law at the Temple, but continued his application to Oriental learning and general literature. In 1774 he published his "Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry," dedicated to the University of Oxford. In 1783 he obtained the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, a post which had been the object of his anxious wishes. The honour of knighthood was on this occasion conferred on him, and he soon after married a daughter of the bishop of St. Asaph. In April of that year he embarked for India, from which he was destined never to return. On the voyage his active mind projected the establishment of a society in Bengal for the purpose of illustrating Oriental antiquities and literature. This scheme he saw carried into effect; and under his auspices, and by his direction, the society acquired a high reputation. The volumes of its "Transactions" are inestimable, and are enriched by several valuable productions from Sir William's pen.

As a judge he was indefatigable and impartial. He studied the native laws of the country, and became so versed in the Sanscrit and the codes of the Brahmins, as to gain the admiration of the most learned men in that country. In 1799 his works were collected and published in 6 vols., and his life written by Lord Teignmouth, in one volume, 1801. A beautiful monument has been erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral by the East India Company. b. in London, 1746; d. at Calcutta, 1794.

JONES, Rice, an eminent Welsh poet, who in 1770 published a "Welsh Anthology," in quarto, containing selections from the poets of different periods. b. in Wales, 1716; d. 1801.

JONES, William, an English divine, received his education at the Charterhouse, whence he removed to University College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and, in 1749, entered into orders. He wrote an answer to Bishop Clayton's "Essay on Spirit," "The Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity," "Essay on the First Principles of Natural Philosophy," in which he espoused the Hutchinsonian system. This work he completed in 1781, by his "Physiological Disquisitions; or, Discourses of the Natural Philosophy of the Elements." When Dr. Horne became bishop of Norwich, he appointed Mr. Jones his domestic chaplain, and he embalmed the memory of his patron by an excellent memoir of his life. When the French revolution broke out, and democratic principles began to spread in England, he wrote some pamphlets, and published a collection of tracts, entitled "The Scholar Armed." b. 1726; d. 1800.

JONES, Ernest, was educated in Germany, and having kept his terms as a law-student of the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1844. In the following year he joined the Chartist movement, and soon became one of the most conspicuous and active leaders of the party, remaining so until Chartism expired in 1868. During this period he edited the "People's Paper," and other Chartist periodicals. In 1848 he was tried for making seditious speech, and condemned to two years' imprisonment. He stood for Halifax in 1847, and Nottingham in 1853 and 1857, without success. In January, 1869, when it was supposed that Mr. Hugh Birley would lose his seat for Manchester through being a Government contractor at the time of his election, Mr. Jones was chosen by ballot to fill the expected vacancy against Mr. Milner Gibson, but died a few days after. He was an honest politician, for he refused a large fortune rather than give up his principles. He wrote the "Revolt of Hindostan," "The Battle Day," and other poems. b. about 1820.

JONES, John Gale, was by profession an apothecary, but is far better known as a political orator. At the breaking out of the French revolution he became a leading member of the London Corresponding Society; and, until a few years before his death, was known as a popular declaimer at the various political meetings held in the metropolis. The part he took in advocating republican doctrines subjected him to a trial at the Warwick assizes, when he obtained a verdict of acquittal, mainly through the skilful advocacy of his counsel, Sir Samuel Romilly. Having subsequently rendered himself obnoxious to the government by his violence, and impugned the proceedings of the House of Commons, he was committed to Newgate in February, 1810, and there remained till his liberation was effected by the prorogation of Parliament, June 21. As a public speaker Jones was fluent, energetic, and impressive; in private life he is said to have been an unassuming and instructive companion. n. 1771; n. 1838.

JONES, Colonel Leslie Grove, was, in early life, a midshipman; but having humanely, though very insubordinately, interfered respecting the punishment of one of the seamen, he was so severely censured, that he quitted the navy in disgust. Shortly afterwards he was presented with an ensign's commission in the 1st Foot Guards, served throughout the Peninsular war, and was a favourite aide-de-camp of the Duke of Wellington, an idea of whose high opinion of his zeal, discretion, and gallantry may be formed from the fact that, previous to the battle of Waterloo, the honourable and responsible office of commandant of Brussels was intrusted to him. Being put on half-pay at the peace, Colonel Jones engaged in literary composition, and occasionally produced some essays, &c. In the great struggle for the Reform Bill he appeared before the world as a political writer, and contributed a series of letters to the "Times," which had all the violence of those of Junius, without being always characterized by their redeeming vigour, sarcasm, and eloquence. b. 1779; d. 1839.

JONES, Owen, a modern English architect, distinguished for his skill as an ornamental decorator, who, after studying under Mr. Valliamey, an architect of some celebrity as an ornamental designer, travelled for four years in Egypt, Turkey, and Spain, where, in conjunction with M. Jules Gouzy, a French artist, he made numerous designs from the Alhambra. On his return to London, he, after considerable pains and expense, succeeded in producing an elaborate work, in lithography and colours, on the Alhambra. This great work was published in parts, and concluded in 1842, from which time Mr. Owen Jones was an authority on the subject of chromatic decoration. A work on "Mosaic Pavements" was next published by him. Upon the organization of the official staff of the Great Exhibition of 1851, he was appointed one of the superintendents of the works, being charged with the internal decoration of the structure. The plan he pursued was a novel one, and though generally admitted to be successful, was, nevertheless, opposed in principle by other architects and decorators. In advocating his own views, Mr. Jones gave lectures on decoration at the London Institution, the Society of Arts, and other places, besides having published a number of works on the subject. When the Crystal Palace Company was formed, he was appointed, with Mr. Digby Wyatt, to select, on the continent, the valuable collection of casts and works of art, for which the People's Palace at Sydenham is so deservedly celebrated. The Egyptian, Greek, Roman, and Alhambra courts of the same structure were completed under his superintendence. But, in the case of the Egyptian and Greek departments, some controversy was aroused by his mode of decoration. In answer to the objections made as to the latter, he published "An Apology for the Colouring of the Greek Court," assisted by Mr. G. H. Lewes and Mr. Watkiss Lloyd. He subsequently published his great work called "The Grammar of Ornament." The St. James's Hall, completed in 1858, was built after his designs. n. in Wales, about 1800.

JONES, Thomas Rymer, an eminent English anatomist and writer on medicine, was educated for the profession of surgery in London and Paris, and passed at the College of Surgeons in 1833; but an affliction of deafness manifesting itself, he resolved to abandon the practical for the theoretical departments of medical science. He began his literary career by contributing to the proceedings of the Zoological Society some papers on comparative anatomy. In 1833 he produced "A General Outline of the Animal Kingdom," which was the first complete treatise on the subject in the English language. Subsequently he was appointed Pulerian professor of physiology in the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and examiner in comparative anatomy and physiology in the London University. His "Natural History of Animals" was commenced in 1845: he also lectured, and contributed articles to scientific publications, on natural history, with considerable success. In 1844 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society.

JONSON, Benjamin, jon'-son, commonly known as Ben Jonson, an English poet and dramatist. His father was a clergyman, and died about a month before the birth of the poet, who received his education at Westminster school; but his mother marrying again, his father-in-law, who was a bricklayer, compelled him to work at his business. On this, he enlisted for a soldier, and went to the Netherlands, where he distinguished himself by his courage. After his return, he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, but did not remain there long, owing to his extreme poverty. He then turned his attention to the stage, and became a player and dramatic writer, with indifferent success. During this part of his career, he was so unfortunate as to kill a man in a duel. His first printed play was the comedy of "Every Man in his Humour;" after which he produced a new piece annually for several years. He engaged with Chapman and Marston in writing a comedy commonly called "Eastward Ho;" which being deemed a satire on the Scotch nation, had nearly brought its authors to the pillory. At the accession of James I. Jonson superintended a spectacle for his entertainment in his passage from the Tower to Westminster Abbey, and continued to have the management of all the masques and public shows during that and the succeeding reign. In 1619 he was made poet laureate; the salary of which, during his term of office, was raised from a hundred marks to as many pounds, with a butt of Canary wine. In 1617 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. Notwithstanding his pension and the profits of his plays, he was generally poor, and was frequently relieved by the king's bounty. He was buried in Westminster Abbey; on his gravestone is the following inscription:—
"O rare Ben Jonson."

Mr. Gifford's edition of his works is the best, on account of the rich store of elucidatory notes which it contains. b. at Westminster, 1574; d. 1637.

JORDÆNS, James, yor'-dans, a celebrated Flemish painter, was the disciple of Adam van Oort and of Rubens. He painted with extraordinary freedom and expedition. Many of his pictures are in the churches of Antwerp and other cities of the Netherlands. There is a JORDAN, Thomas, yor'-dan, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He wrote two comedies and a masque, mentioned by Langbaine with respect.

JORDAN, Sir Joseph, a gallant English admiral, who, by his presence of mind and valour, gained the battle of Solebay, in 1673. The advantage was long on the side of the Dutch fleet, the English being overpowered by numbers; but Sir Joseph dashed into the midst of the enemy, and throwing them into confusion, the fortune of the day was reversed, and the English gained the victory.

JORDAN, John Christopher, an antiquary, was privy councillor to the king of Bohemia. He wrote several chronological works, and annotated some of the ancient historians. n. 1740.

JORDAN, Charles Stephen, yor'-dan, a Prussian writer, of French origin, became vice-president of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin. Frederick the Great caused a monument to be erected to his memory with this inscription: "Here lies JORDAN, the friend of the muses and of the king." That monarch also composed a eulogy upon him, in which he bestowed a great encomium upon his talents and virtues. He wrote, "Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes;" a "Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, and History;" and the "Life of De la Croze." n. at Berlin, 1790; n. at the same place, 1746.

JORDAN, Dorothea, or Dorothy Bland (Jordan being only an assumed name), yor'-dan, an actress, and mistress of the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., made her theatrical début on the Dublin stage, in 1777, in the part of Phæbe, in "As You Like It." In the following season she appeared at Cork, where she was much admired for her archness and sportive simplicity. In 1782 she went to England, and first appeared at the Leeds Theatre as Calista, in "The Fair Penitent." From Leeds she proceeded to York, where she first played under the name of Mrs. Jordan, by which, though never married, she was subsequently known. In 1785 she made her first appearance before a London audience at Drury Lane, as Peggy, in "The Country Girl;" and immediately became such a decided favourite, that her salary was doubled, and she was allowed two benefits. At the close of the season, she made a provincial tour, and visited nearly all the large towns in England, everywhere receiving the most enthusiastic welcome. When the duke of Clarence first made overtures to her, she was the mistress of a Mr. Ford; who refused to make her his wife, through fear of offending his father. Mrs. Jordan then entered into that connexion with the duke, which continued in an almost uninterrupted state of domestic harmony, until it was suddenly broken off in 1811. She was the mother of 10 children by his royal highness. A yearly allowance of £4100 was settled on her for the maintenance of herself and daughters; with a provision that if Mrs. Jordan should resume her profession, the care of the duke's four daughters, together with £1500 per annum allowed for them, should revert to his royal highness. In a few months afterwards she expressed a wish to return to the stage; and the four children, with the specified allowance for their maintenance, were surrendered to their royal father. Shortly after this she retired to France, under circumstances of great embarrassment. She gradually sank under the weight of her afflictions; and, in a state of extreme mental misery, died at St. Cloud, July 3, 1816. n. at Waterford about 1762. Hazlitt, speaking of Mrs. Jordan's attractions on the stage, says: "Her face, her tones, her manner, were irresistible. Her smile had the effect of sunshine, and her laugh did one good to hear it. Her voice was eloquence itself; it seemed as if her heart was always at her mouth. She was all gaiety, openness, and good-nature. She rioted in her fine animal spirits, and gave more pleasure than any other actress, because she had the greatest spirit of enjoyment in herself." The last surviving daughter of Mrs. Jordan and William IV. was Lady Augusta Gordon Hallyburton, who died at Hallyburton House, Cupar-Angus, Scotland, at the age of 62, in 1865. She held for some years the post of state house-keeper at Kensington Palace.

JORDAN, Camille, zor'-dā, a brave Frenchman, who was one of the leaders in the rising of Lyons during the Reign of Terror. He was exiled, but subsequently returned to France, where he wrote several valuable works on religious and political questions. n. at Lyons, 1771; n. 1821.

JORDANO, Luca. (See GIORDANO.)

JORDEN, Edward, yor'-den, an English physician, who took his doctor's degree at Padua, and afterwards settled in London, whence he removed to Bath. He wrote "A Brief Discourse of a Disease called the Suffocation of the Mother," and "Discourse of Natural Baths and Mineral Waters." n. in Kent, 1569; n. at Bath, 1632.

JORGENSEN, Jorgen, yor'-gen-sone, a Dane, who, for a time, usurped the professorship of Iceland. He was the son of a watchmaker, and is said to have served as midshipman in the English navy during his early years. In 1809 he sailed in an English ship to Iceland, and forthwith proceeded, by proclamation and various extraordinary measures, to assume the position of protector. After a life full of adventure, he was at length confined in Newgate for robbing his lodgings, and, in 1825, was sent to New South Wales, dying, it is supposed, soon after his arrival. n. at Copenhagen, 1779.

JORNANDES, yor-nāw'-dees, a Goth, who embraced Christianity, and became bishop of Ravenna about 552. He wrote the "History of the Goths."

JORTIN, John, yor'-tin, an eminent English divine, who, while undergraduate of Jesus College, Cambridge, translated for Pope some of Eusebius's notes on Homer. In 1727 he published Latin poems, in 4to., under the title of "Lusus Poeticus," which went through three editions. In 1730 he published four sermons on the truth of the Christian religion, and, the year following, "Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern." In 1734 appeared his "Remarks on Spenser's Poems, and on Milton." In 1751 he produced the first volume of his "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History," which he continued to 5 vols. His "Life of Erasmus" was published in 1758. n. in London, 1693; n. at the same place, 1770.

JOSEPH, Ben Gorion, jo'-sef, a Jewish historian, whom the rabbins falsely confound with Josephus. He lived in the 5th century, and wrote, in Hebrew, a history of the Jews, which bears evident marks of being an abridgment of Josephus's larger work. It was published in a Latin version by Gagnier, at Oxford, in 1706, and in Hebrew and Latin, at Götting, in 1707.

JOSEPH OF PARIS, a famous Capuchin, commonly called Father Joseph, who was employed by Cardinal Richelieu in most of his political intrigues. Louis XIII. procured him a cardinal's hat, but he died of apoplexy before he received it, in 1639.

JOSEPH, FATHER, an apostate monk of Hungary, who, about 1678, headed a numerous banditti, whom he called the people of God, assuming to himself the name of Joshua. He entered the Austrian dominions, where he committed dreadful outrages, burning churches, putting priests to death, and defiling nuns, under pretence of zeal for true religion. The motley crew were at last dispersed, on the sudden death of their leader.

JOSEPH I., twelfth emperor of Germany, of the house of Austria, was the son of the emperor Leopold I., and ascended the imperial throne on the death of his father in 1705. He engaged in his interests Savoy, England, and Holland against France, in support of the claim of the archduke Charles to the crown of Spain. In the war which ensued, the allies, under Eugene and Marlborough, were successful, gaining the battles of Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. He made himself master of Italy, and levied contributions on Mantua, Parma, Modena, Lucca, Genoa, and other places. His armies also defeated the revolted Hungarians, headed by Prince Bagotzki, who was forced to take refuge in Turkey. In the midst of these successes Joseph was taken off by the small-pox, in 1711.

JOSEPH II., emperor of Germany, was the son of Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, and archduchess of Austria, and Francis of Lorraine. He was crowned king of the Romans in 1764, and the year following became emperor. He early displayed great talents and activity, by remodelling the army and reforming all the departments of government. He also travelled through his dominions, and visited Prussia, Italy, France, and Russia. Among other excellent regulations which he adopted, was the setting apart one day every week to receive petitions and to hear complaints. In 1780, on the death of his mother, he succeeded to the crown of Hungary and Bohemia. The year following he issued a decree in favour of the liberty of the press, which was followed by others equally liberal, particularly one of religious toleration; he also abolished the system of vassalage. This measure was followed by an imperial edict, disclaiming all secular jurisdiction to the court of Rome, the suppression of many monasteries, and the regulation of others. On this occasion Pope Pius VI. made a journey to Vienna, to induce the emperor to alter his designs; but, though pompously received, he was completely unsuccessful. In 1786 the emperor followed up his attack on the papal authority by an assembly of the ecclesiastical princes at Ratisbon, in which it was resolved to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the pope. In 1786 a declaration of war was issued against the Turks, and the same year the emperor in person reduced Schabatz: but this was followed by a defeat. Soon afterwards, a bloody battle was fought between the Imperialists and the Turks, on the heights of Rohadin, in which neither could claim the victory. Joseph next made an attempt to possess himself of Belgrade, but without success. Marshal Laudohn, however, assumed the command of the army, took Dubicza and Novi, and, in 1789, reduced Belgrade. Soon after, a peace was concluded, chiefly occasioned by the discontented spirit in Germany, at such a waste of men and treasure. Joseph was succeeded by his brother, Peter Leopold, grand-duke of Tuscany. B. 1741; D. 1790.

JOSEPH EMANUEL, king of Portugal, was son and successor of Charles V., and ascended the throne in 1750. The great earthquake at Lisbon, in 1755, and the expulsion of the Jesuits from the kingdom in 1759, were the principal events of this reign, during which Joseph was assisted by his clever minister the marquis de Pombal. Learning was encouraged, commerce and industry received a fresh impulse, and the power of the Inquisition was diminished. B. 1715; D. 1777.

JOSEPHINE, jo'-se-phen, empress of France, was the daughter of Count Tascher de la Pagerie, and was married, at the age of 15 years, to the viscount de Beauharnais, by whom she had two children,—Eugene and Hortense de Beauharnais. After her husband had fallen by the guillotine, she was herself imprisoned, but was released through the intervention of Tallien. She was subsequently introduced to General Bonaparte, who, struck by her beauty and grace, became her husband in 1796. She shared the high destinies of her husband, ascended the throne with him, and received the title of empress, in which dignity she gained universal attachment; but, being childless, Napoleon divorced her. Josephine retired to Malmaison in 1803, where she died in 1814, soon after the fall of the emperor. B. at the island of Martinique, 1763.

JOSEPHUS, jo'-se-fus, a Jewish historian, who came of distinguished ancestors, and received a liberal education among the Pharisees, after which he went to Rome, where he cultivated his talents to great advantage. On returning to his own country, he commanded the troops employed to defend Jotapata against Vespasian and Titus, and maintained the place bravely during seven weeks. Vespasian took him into his favour, and he was held in great esteem by Titus, whom he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem, at the taking of which, Titus told him to ask for anything he wished. He requested that the sacred books might be given to him, and that the lives of his brother and fifty of his friends might be spared. When Vespasian became emperor, he gave Josephus a palace, with a pension, the freedom of the city, and a grant of lands in Judæa. Titus added to these favours, and Josephus, out of gratitude, assumed the name of Flavius. During his residence at Rome he wrote his "History of the Wars of the Jews," first in Syriac, and afterwards in Greek. Its style approaches nearest to that of Livy. He also wrote the "Antiquities of the Jews," in which it is supposed are some interpolations by modern transcribers, particularly with regard to what is said of our Saviour. He wrote likewise two books in defence of the Jews against Apion, and his own life. B. at Jerusalem, A.D. 37; D. at Rome, about the beginning of the 2nd century.

of 1814-15, retired, in 1816, to his estate in Transylvania, where he occupied himself with literature. He wrote "Abafi," a national and historical tale; "The Last Batori," "The Bohemian in Hungary," "Zrinyi the Poet," and "Stephen Josika." He also translated into Hungarian the English novel, "A Marriage in High Life." After the revolution in Hungary, in 1818, he resided at Brussels. b. at Torda, Transylvania, 1796; d. 1865.

JOSQUIN, Deprez, zhô'-guene, a native of Belgium, an ecclesiastic, and called the father of modern harmony, from his great ability as a composer, was a singer in the pontifical chapel in the time of Sixtus IV., but afterwards went to France, and was appointed chapel-master to Louis XII. The king having promised Josquin a benefice, but forgetting to give it, the chapel-master, on being commanded to compose a march, chose a portion of the 119th Psalm, "Memor esto verbi tui servo tuo," the setting of which was greatly admired by the king, who soon after granted Josquin's petition; on which the latter composed a hymn of thanksgiving from the same Psalm, "Bonitatem fecisti cum servo tuo, Domine." He was a giant among the musicians of his time, and was universally esteemed. b. about 1450; the date of his death is unknown.

JOUBEAT, Laurence, zhô'-bair, physician to Henry III., king of France. On the death of Rondelet, in 1562, he became regius professor of physic at Montpellier. b. 1520; d. 1583.

JOUBEAT, Bartholomew Catherine, a French republican general, who was educated for the law, but quitted it for the army, and in 1789 commenced his military course as a grenadier, and rose by degrees to the rank of general. He was second in command to Bonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and signalized himself at Millesimo, Montebaldo, and Rivoli, and in the Tyrol. He was opposed to General Suwarrow, but was slain at the battle of Novi, in 1799, at a time when the Directory was about to ouster him the supreme power. b. 1769.

JOUFFROY, Marquis de, zhô'-froi, who disputes with Fulton and others the honour of having been the first to apply steam to the purposes of navigation, made his first attempt on the Doubs in 1776, and renewed it with more success on the Saône in 1783; but failed to carry it out, through want of means and support. He was equally unsuccessful at Paris in 1810; but the Academy of Sciences acknowledged his claim to the discovery in 1840; a distinction with which, whether merited or otherwise, he could not fail to be gratified. b. in Franche-Comté, 1751; d. 1832.

JOUFFROY, Theodore, a distinguished writer on philosophical subjects, and professor of philosophy at Paris, was the author of numerous original works, which are in great repute for clearness and depth, and also translated into French the writings of Reid and Dugald Stewart. His "Cours du Droit Naturel" is an excellent work, and deserving of attentive perusal. b. 1796; d. 1842.

JOURLAIN, Amable Louis Michel Brochillet, zhô'-duin, a distinguished orientalist, was the son of a surgeon-dentist at Paris. He was designed for the law, but hearing the splendid eulogies bestowed on Anquetil du Perron, the orientalist, he determined on cultivating the same branches of learning for which that scholar had been distinguished. This he pursued with such success, that the office of adjutant-secretary of the School of Oriental Languages was created in his favour, and he held it till his death. He was a contributor to the "Biographie Universelle," and other extensive publications; and author of "La Perse, ou Tableau de l'Histoire, du Gouvernement, de la Religion, de la Littérature, &c., de cet Empire;" besides some others. b. 1788; d. 1818.

JOURDAN, Jean-Baptiste, zhôor'-dâ, marshal of France, served in the war of American independence at the age of 16 years, and in 1791 was appointed to the command of a battalion of volunteers. He fought under Dumouriez in Belgium, and became a general of division in 1793. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Hondschoote, and two days afterwards was named general-in-chief, but was deprived of his command by the Committee of Public Safety. Subsequently he was placed at the head of the army of the Moselle. He took Duraat and Charleroi, and gained the celebrated battle of Fleurus, in 1794. Opposed by the Archduke Charles, he crossed the Rhine a second time; but, being defeated, was superseded in 1799. Named a member of the Council of Five Hundred, he proposed the law of conscription. A sincere republican, he opposed the usurpation of Bonaparte, and, after the 18th Brumaire, was excluded from the Legislative Corps. He was, however, nominated by Napoleon marshal of France in 1804; but he was never again employed in any important capacity. He accompanied Joseph Bonaparte to Spain, in command of the 7th military corps. b. at Limoges, 1762; d. in Paris, 1833.

JOUSSE, Daniel, zhoo'-se, a French lawyer, who wrote many works connected with his profession. b. at Orleans, 1704; d. 1781.

JOUVENET, Joseph, zhô'-van-ee, a French Jesuit, who published an apology, in which he defended Chastel, who attempted to assassinate Henry IV., and called him a martyr. He continued the "History of the Jesuits," and wrote some other works. b. at Paris, 1643; d. at Rome, 1719.

JOUVENET, Jean, zhôor'-nai, a French painter, was descended from an Italian family of that profession. His first instructions were derived from his father, but he improved himself under Le Brun. He passed through all the offices of the Academy, and became one of the perpetual rectors. b. at Rouen, 1644; d. 1717.

JOYE, Joseph Etienne de, zhô'-ai, a facile and graceful writer, served in the French army in America and India, and took part in the first campaign of the Revolution. But he soon abandoned the sword for the pen; and rose to great popularity by his vaudevilles and the librettos which he wrote for Spontini, Cherubini, and Rossini. He was also distinguished as a political writer; but is best known in England by his amusing and satirical work called the "Hermit of the Chaussée d'Antin," translated into English many years ago. In 1830, Louis Philippe appointed him librarian at the Louvre. b. 1764; d. 1846.

GOVELLANOS, Don Gaspar Melchior de, yo'-vail-lan'-os, one of the most distinguished Spaniards of modern times, born at Gijon, in the Asturias, of an old and noble family, was endowed with splendid talents; and not only acquired, while at college, an extensive knowledge of jurisprudence, his more especial object, but also made great progress in archæology, languages, and the belles lettres. He became a member of the criminal branch of the audiencia in Seville; and advancing rapidly in his professional career, was appointed to the dignified station of member of the council of the military orders at Madrid. About the same time he was entrusted with some important affairs, and nominated counsellor of state, by Charles III. When, in 1794, Spain found herself loaded with debt, Jovellanos proposed, for the relief of the national difficulties, a tax on the property of the higher order of the clergy; for which he was exiled to the mountains of Asturias, though his project was afterwards carried into execution. In 1799 he was recalled, and made minister of justice for the interior; but before twelve months had passed, he was dismissed, and banished to the island of Majorca, where he was confined in the convent of the Carthusians. After the fall of Godoy, the Prince of Peace, in 1808, he recovered his liberty, and subsequently became a member of the Supreme Junta. He was, however, suspected of favouring the French; and at length, being denounced as a traitor for endeavouring to promote their plans for the subjugation of Spain, he was put to death in 1812, during a popular insurrection. n. 1744. He wrote "Lyric Poems;" "Pelayo," a tragedy; "The Honourable Delinquent," a comedy; several works on subjects connected with political economy; and translated Milton's "Paradise Lost."

JOVIANUS, Flavius Claudius, jo-ve-ai'-nus, a Roman emperor, was elected by the Roman soldiers, after the death of Julian, but refused the dignity unless they turned Christians, to which they consented. He made a disadvantageous peace with Persia, shut up the heathen temples, and recalled the banished clergy. He died, after reigning seven months, owing to the suffocating vapour of burning charcoal in his room, 364. n. 331.

JOVINTAN, jo-vin'-i-an, a monk of Milan in the 4th century, who, after leading a life of great austerity, debauched a number of women, and procured many disciples. He held that the body of our Saviour was not real flesh, but a phantom, and that it was lawful to indulge in sensual pleasures, with other tenets equally offensive to good morals; on which account the emperor Honorius ordered him and his followers to be scourged and banished. He wrote several books, which were refuted by Jerome. n. in Dalmatia, 406.

JOVIUS, Paul, jo'-vi-us, an eminent historian of the 16th century, who received a pension from Francis I., king of France, and Clement VII. gave him the bishopric of Nocera, which dignity he disgraced by his course of life. His greatest work is a "History of his Own Time," in folio.—He also wrote the "Lives of Illustrious Men." n. at Como, 1483; n. at Florence, 1552. His brother Benedict wrote the "History of Switzerland."

JOWETT, Rev. Benjamin, M.A., jou'-et, Regius professor of Greek in Oxford university, was educated at St. Paul's school, and was elected to a scholarship in Balliol college, Oxford, in 1835, and to a fellowship in 1838. In 1855 he was appointed to the Regius professorship on the recommendation of Lord Palmerston. Professor Jowett wrote a "Commentary on the Epistles of Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans," and subsequently contributed an "Essay on the Interpretation of Scripture" to the well-known volume entitled "Essays and Reviews," in connexion with which his name made a great noise. n. 1817.

JOY, Right Hon. Henry, an eminent Irish judge, was called to the bar in 1783, and after acquiring great fame as a counsel, filled the office of attorney-general, and in 1831 succeeded Lord Guillemore as chief baron. Among the "sayings" of Lord Norbury, the following is related:—Being once requested by Mr. Hope, an attorney, to wait a few minutes for Mr. Joy, the leading counsel in a nisi prius case just called, his lordship did so until his small stock of patience was exhausted; and, then, exclaiming "Hope told a flattering tale, that Joy would soon return," ordered the next case in rotation to be proceeded with. n. 1787; n. 1833.

JOYCE, Jeremiah, joyce, an ingenious and industrious writer, who was by profession a dissenting minister, first attracted public notice as one of the persons included in the state prosecution with Hardy, Horne Tooke, Thelwall, and others for treason. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Gregory in the compilation of his "Cyclopædia," and subsequently produced another on a similar plan, which goes by the name of Nicholson. He was also the author of "Scientific Dialogues," "Dialogues on Chemistry," "Letters on Natural Philosophy," &c. n. 1764; n. 1816.

JOYEUSE, Anne de, chro'-a-(v)-se, a French duke, favourite of Henry III., and admiral of France, who distinguished himself by many gallant exploits. He was killed in an expedition against the Huguenots in 1567. n. in France, 1561.

JOYNER, William, joy'-ner, otherwise Lyde, became fellow of Magdalen College, but, on turning Roman Catholic, went abroad. He returned at the Restoration, and retired to a village in Buckinghamshire, where he led a life of devotion. He wrote the "Roman Empress," a comedy, 1670; "Observations on the Life of Cardinal Pole," and "Miscellaneous Poems, English and Latin." n. at Oxford, 1622; n. 1706.

JUAN, Don, a natural son of Philip IV. of Spain, and of Maria Calderona, an actress, was made grand prior of Castile; commanded the Spanish army in Italy in 1647, and took the city of Naples; subjugated Barcelona in 1652, but being afterwards unsuccessful, was exiled. Under Charles II. he was recalled to Madrid, and made prime minister. n. 1629; n. 1679.

JUAN Y SANTACILIA, Don George, juan e san-ta-seel'-ya, a learned Spanish mathematician and naval officer, whose progress in mathematics was so great that, while a student in Cartagena, he obtained the appellation of Euclid; and, entering the naval service early, his reputation as a scientific man occasioned his appointment, with Antonio de Ulloa, to accompany Bonguer and Coudannin to Peru, in 1735, to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator. He afterwards directed much of his attention to marine architecture, and his exertions to improve the Spanish navy were highly successful. He published his "Observations on Astronomy and Physics, made in Peru," and treatises on navigation and ship-building. n. 1712; n. 1774.

JUAREZ, Benito, ju-ar'-ez, a Mexican, whose ancestors belonged to one of the many Indian tribes of Mexico, born near Oaxaca, in 1802, at the village of Ixtlan. After filling various offices, he became governor of Oaxaca from 1848 till 1852, when he was banished by Santa Anna.

Joining in the insurrection which overthrew Santa Anna's government in 1855, he became first minister of justice, then secretary of state and president of the high court of justice, and finally president of the republic in 1868. A protracted civil war ensued, but ultimately the French entered Mexico, caused Juarez to withdraw from the capital, and placed the Austrian archduke Maximilian on the throne, after proclaiming the empire. On the withdrawal of the French troops in 1866, Juarez, who had used every means to resist foreign invasion, renewed his attempts against the government of Maximilian, and having captured this unfortunate prince, by the aid of treachery, at Queretaro, in 1867, ordered him to be shot. On his return to power, he put to death hundreds of his opponents.

JUEL, Nicholas, joo'-al, a Danish admiral, who received his professional training in the Dutch navy under Van Tromp and De Ruyter. He then returned to Denmark; and, in 1659, greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Copenhagen. He captured Gotland in 1676, and again, in 1677, he defeated the Swedes in several engagements. He was a brave and gallant officer, and was as much esteemed for his modesty as for his naval skill. D. 1697.

JUGURTHA, ju-gur'-tha, the illegitimate son of Manastabal, the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Manastabal were the sons of Masinissa, king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal; but, as Jugurtha was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His designs were frustrated; Jugurtha proved brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons; but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators. Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha, and his firmness soon obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law, Bocchus, and was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger, 106 B.C.

JUIGNE BROISSINIERE, De, sieur de Molière, zhew-ee brois-sin-ee-air, a French gentleman, and an advocate in parliament, who wrote, in 1647, a "Theological, Historical, Poetical, and Chronological Dictionary."

JULIA, ju'-li-a, a virgin martyr of Carthage. When that place was taken by Genserik, she was sold to a heathen merchant, and carried into Syria. Refusing to take part in some of the festivals instituted in honour of the female deities, she was put to death about 440.

JULIA, the daughter of Cæsar and Cornelia, was one of the most virtuous of the Roman ladies. She married first Cornelius Cæpio, and afterwards Pompey. D. about 63 B.C.

JULIA, the daughter of Augustus. Her beauty and accomplishments were very great, on which account she was her father's favourite, till her licentious conduct alienated his affections. She was successively the wife of Marcellus, Agrippa, and Tiberius. Augustus sent her into banishment, and when Tiberius came to the throne, he suffered her to perish of want. She had a daughter of the same name, who was as vicious as her mother.

JULIA DOMNA, a native of Syria, and the wife of Severus, emperor of Rome, was a woman of great accomplishments, and well acquainted with philosophy and the sciences. On the death of Severus, her sons Caracalla and Geta succeeded to the imperial throne; the latter of whom was murdered by his brother in the arms of his mother, who was wounded in defending him. After the death of Caracalla, she is said to have starved herself to death on finding that Macrinus had assumed the imperial title, 217.

JULIAN, St., archbishop of Toledo, ju'-li-an, was a man of learning and piety. He wrote a treatise against the Jews. D. 690.

JULIAN, Cardinal, was deputed by Pope Eugene IV. to counsel Ladislas, king of Hungary, to break the peace concluded with Amurath II. A long and disastrous war was the result, during which the Christian army was in the reign of Edward III., who assumed the prophetic character. She was the author of a singular book, entitled, "Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love, showed to a Devout Servant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana, an Anchorite of Norwich, who lived in the days of King Edward III.," published by F. R. S. Cressy, 1610. She led a life of remarkable austerity, immuring herself between four walls during many years.

JULIANUS, Flavius Claudius, ju'-li-ai-n-us, emperor of Rome, surnamed "the Apostate," was the younger son of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. In the massacre of his family by the sons of Constantine, he and his brother Gallus narrowly escaped. The two princes were educated in the principles of Christianity, under Mardonius, a learned eunuch, but with different effects; for, though Gallus posessed a strong inclination to paganism, being sent to Athens at the age of twenty-four, he evinced this disposition by his application to astrology, magic, and other illusions. He attached himself particularly to a philosopher named Maximus, who flattered his ambition by promising him the empire. He commanded with reputation in Gaul during the reign of Constantius, who, jealous of his success and popularity, recalled him. This gave so much offence to his soldiers, that they proclaimed him emperor, and, on the death of Constantius, in 361, he found himself in full possession of the imperial throne. He afterwards marched to the East, where his title was recognised as readily as it had been in the West. He then threw off the mask, publicly renounced Christianity, and opened the temples of the gods, in which he offered sacrifices; on this account he is called the Apostate. Soon after his accession, he resolved to chastise the Persians, who had frequently made inroads on the empire in the preceding reigns. When he crossed the Tigris, he burned his ships, that his soldiers might proceed with firmness and resolution. On his return, after marching through Assyria without opposition, his army encountered that of Sapor, king of Persia, and Julian was mortally wounded. Theodoret asserts that he took some of the blood from his wound, and, casting it towards heaven, exclaimed, "Thou hast conquered, Galilean!" a story which is hardly credible. Julian was virtuous and modest in his manners, and liberal in his disposition. He abolished the luxurious and indecent practices of the court of Constantinople, and was averse to public amusements. His "History of the Cæsars" is the most celebrated of his writings, though it is very partial. His own life has been many times written, but on no occasion so well as by Gibbon, in the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." n. at Constantinople, 331; n. 363.

JULIEN, Pierre, shool'-le-ain, a distinguished French sculptor, many of whose productions adorn the metropolis of France and whose chef-d'œuvre is "The Dying Gladiator." n. 1731; n. 1804.

JULIUS I., ju'-li-us, pope and saint of the Roman calendar, succeeded Marcus in 337. He strenuously supported the cause of Athanasius, and was a man of great learning and piety. Some of his letters are extant. n. 352.

JULIUS II. (Julian della Rovere) succeeded Pope Pius III. in 1503. Sixtus IV., his uncle, made him cardinal and commander of his troops, a post which suited his enterprising genius. The emperor Maximilian, with the kings of France and Aragon, endeavoured to depose him; but he frustrated their design, and formed an alliance with them at Cambrai in 1508. He then demanded from the Venetians the territories of Faenza and Rimini, which had been originally taken from them by Alexander VI., and on the death of that pontiff recovered by the Venetians, who, for refusing Julius's unjust claim, were put under an interdict. At last, being reduced to the greatest extremities, the state of Venice was obliged to submit. The pope then turned his arms against France, and besieged La Mirandola, which he entered in triumph in 1511; but, fortune turning, he was driven to Rome, and the council of Pisa declared him suspended. He was the patron of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Bramante. n. 1513.

JULIUS III., an Italian, obtained the tiara in succession to Paul III. in 1550. He had formerly presided at the council of Trent under Paul III., and, on being elected to the papacy, joined the emperor against Octavius Farnese, duke of Parma. n. 1487; n. 1555.

JUNOT, or GIUNTI, Francis, joon'-te-no, a mathematician of Florence, was for some time a Carmelite, but quitted his order, went to France, and abjured the Roman Catholic religion. He became a corrector of the press, and afterwards a manufacturer of paper and a banker, by which means he gained a large fortune. He wrote some arithmetical works, commentaries on the Sphere of Sacroboscus, on the Reformation of the Calendar, and on the Age of the Loves of Petrarch. n. about 1539.

JUNG, Joachim, yoong, a philosopher of the 17th century, who distinguished himself by his opposition to the Aristotelian philosophy, and, like his famous contemporary, Bacon, substituted experiment in the place of antiquated theories. He is ranked by Leibnitz as the equal of Copernicus and Galileo, and as little inferior to Descartes. Among other works he wrote "Geometria Empirica," "Doxoscopia Physica Minores," and "Isagoge Phytoscepe," from the latter of which it is believed that Linnaeus and Ray derived some useful hints. n. at Lubbeck, 1587; n. 1657.

JUNIA, ju'-ni-a, a niece of Cato of Utica, who married Cassius, and died sixty-four years after her husband had killed himself at the battle of Philippi.

JUNILUS, Sr., ju'-nil'-i-us, bishop of Africa, in the 6th century. He wrote two books on the Divine Law.

JUNIUS, Adrian, ju'-ni-us, a learned Dutchman, who studied physic, and took his doctor's degree at Bologna, after which he went to England, where he wrote several works, particularly a Greek and Latin lexicon, which he dedicated to Edward VI. He afterwards returned to his own country, and practised physic. He wrote "Commentaries on various Latin Authors," "A Poem on the Marriage of Philip II., king of Spain, with Mary, Queen of England," "Translations from the Greek," &c. n. at Hoorn, 1512; n. 1575.

JUNIUS, Francis, professor of divinity at Leyden. He studied at Geneva, and, in 1503, became minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp, and afterwards chaplain to the prince of Orange; at last, he was made theological professor at Leyden. He is chiefly known by a Latin version of the Bible, with notes, in which he was assisted by Tremellius. n. 1543; n. at Leyden, 1602.

JUNUS, Francis, son of the preceding, in 1620 visited England, and was taken into the family of Thomas, earl of Arundel. There he studied the northern languages, in which he attained to considerable proficiency. He left a valuable collection of MSS. to the library of Oxford. n. at Heidelberg, 1559; n. at Windsor, 1678.

JUNIUS BRUTUS, (See BRUTUS, I. Junius.)

JUNOT, Andoche, duke of Abrantes, shoo'-no, a French general, entered the army as a volunteer during the Revolution, and attracted the attention of Bonaparte at the siege of Toulon, in 1793. This was the origin of his fortune: he was appointed aide-de-camp, and went with the army to Egypt, where he so greatly distinguished himself that, on his return, he became general of division, and, in 1804, governor of Paris. In 1805 he was appointed ambassador to Lisbon, and two years afterwards assumed the command of the army sent into Portugal. Junot rapidly made himself master of that kingdom, and was created governor, with the title of duke of Abrantes, but the next year he was defeated at Vimeira by the duke of Wellington, and compelled to sign the capitulation of Cintra, and obliged to abandon his conquest. This reverse brought him under the displeasure of Napoleon; he nevertheless took part, in 1810, in the Spanish campaign, and in that of Russia in 1812, becoming governor of the Illyrian provinces. His reason suddenly failing, he was compelled to return to France. n. in France, 1771; n. 1813.—His widow, a woman of great accomplishments, wrote some "Memoirs on the Empire," which are full of interest. n. 1833.

printers in the 15th and 16th centuries. They printed, at Lyons, the "Letters of Leo X. by Bembo," and the works of Santo Pagnino. They had also printing-offices at Genoa, Venice, and Florence. Philip began printing at Genoa, in 1497. p. about 1519. Bernard was either his brother or cousin. Philip printed some excellent editions of Greek authors, as Plutarch, Xenophon, Aristophanes, Sophocles, and Homer.

JUNTA, Thomas, a Venetian physician, who published, in 1554, a learned book on the "Battles of the Ancients."

JURIEU, Peter, zhoo-re-e(r), a French Protestant divine, was the son of Daniel Jurieu, pastor of the reformed church at Mer, in the diocese of Blois. His mother was sister to the famous Peter du Moulin. He received his education partly in Holland and partly in England, and while there received episcopal ordination. On his return home, he became assistant to his father, and professor of divinity and Hebrew at Sedan, where he gained great reputation by his lectures and preaching. He wrote against Bossuet's "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church," and defended the moral character of his sect against the accusations of Arnauld. On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes he retired to Holland, and was chosen pastor of the Walloon church at Rotterdam. He there applied so assiduously to the study of the Revelation, as to fancy he had discovered most of the mysteries therein; and particularly with regard to Antichrist. He addressed William III., king of England, as the instrument appointed to destroy the kingdom of the beast. He embroiled himself in controversy with Bayle and others, who had objected to the extravagance of his opinions. His chief works are, "The History of Calvinism and Popery, with a Parallel between them;" "Pastoral Letters;" "On the Unity of the Church," "Treatise of Nature and Grace," and "Critical History of the Doctrines and Worship of the Church, and those of the Pagans." p. at Mer, in France, 1637; p. at Rotterdam, 1713.

JURIN, James, ju'-rin, secretary to the Royal Society of London, and president of the College of Physicians, wrote papers on philosophical and medical subjects in the "Philosophical Transactions," and had a dispute with Michelotti on the motion of currents; with Keill and Senae on the motion of the heart; with Robins upon distinct vision; and with the partisans of Leibnitz on the active forces. p. 1694; p. 1750.

JUSSIEU, Antoine de, zhoo'-ve-u(r), a French botanist and physician, who, after travelling over Europe, settled at Paris, where he became a member of the Academy of Sciences, and professor of botany in the Royal Garden. He enriched the memoirs of the French Academy with several valuable papers on botany and mineralogy, the result of observations made during his travels. He also wrote the appendix to Tournefort's "Institutions of Botany," and abridged Barrelier's work upon the plants of France, Spain, and Italy; he was likewise the author of a "Discourse on the Progress of Botany." p. at Lyons, 1686; p. 1758.

JUSSIEU, Bernard de, brother of the above, distinguished himself as an able physician and botanist. He became professor and demonstrator in the Royal Garden, and was chosen a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of several foreign societies. He published an edition of Tournefort's "History of Plants in the Environs of Paris," and was the author of a book entitled "The Friend of Humanity; or, the Advice of a Good Citizen to the Nation." p. at Lyons, 1699; p. at Paris, 1777.

JUSSIEU, Joseph de, brother of the preceding, was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and accompanied Condamine to Peru in 1735. He was not only a good naturalist and physician, but an excellent engineer. He published a journal of his voyages. p. at Lyon, 1704; p. 1773.

JUSSIEU, Antoine Laurent de, a celebrated French botanist, nephew of the preceding, was the greatest philosopher of his family, and author of the "Natural System of Botany." He went to Paris, in 1765, to complete his studies, under the direction of his uncle Bernard. In 1770 he took the degree of doctor of medicine, and was soon afterwards chosen professor of botany in the Royal Garden. In 1780, he published his great work, the "Genera Plantarum" in which, for the first time, the whole vegetable kingdom was arranged according to a natural classification. He subsequently filled many important scientific posts in Paris, and continued till his eighty-eighth year to dictate valuable memoirs on the science of botany. The great work of Jussieu, in an improved and amended form, is one of the chief text-books on botany, not only in France but in England. p. at Lyons, 1749; p. at Paris, 1836.

JUSSIEU, Adrien de, son of the above, was educated for the medical profession, but devoted himself to the science which his father had so greatly benefited. In 1826 he succeeded his father as professor of botany; and, although he wrote no large work on the science, he contributed a great number of valuable memoirs relative to it to the scientific annals of France. He also contributed to the "Natural History" of Milne-Edwards. He was a member, and afterwards president, of the French Academy of Sciences. p. at Paris, 1797; p. at the same place, 1853.

JUSTEL, Christopher, zhoo'-tel, counsellor and secretary to the king of France, published "The Code of Canons of the Universal Church," and the "Councils of Africa, with Notes;" and "The Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne." p. at Paris, 1680; p. 1649.

JUSTEL, Henry, son of the above, and his successor as counsellor and secretary, was a man of learning and liberality, and so partial to England that he sent his father's MSS. to the university of Oxford, which learned body complimented him in return with the degree of LL.D. On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he went to London, and was appointed keeper to the king's library. p. 1620; p. 1693.

JUSTI, John Henry Gottlieb von, yoos'-te, a German mineralogist, who devoted himself with assiduity to the study of mineralogy, and acquired such knowledge therein as to be named member of the Council of Mines. He afterwards became professor of political economy and natural history at Göttingen. He wrote treatises on Mineralogy and on Money, for some free remarks in which, on the states of Prussia and Wirttemberg, he was confined for a considerable time in the castle of Breslau. He had projected a German Encyclopædia, and wrote some pamphlets against eminent naturalists. p. about 1705; p. 1771.

of France, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In 1474 he was made procurator of St. Mark, the second dignity of the republic of Venice. He wrote a "History of Venice" and other works. b. 1408; d. 1489.

JUSTINIANI, Augustin, bishop of Nebio, in Corsica. Francis I. of France made him his almoner and royal professor of Hebrew at Paris. He perished in a shipwreck in sailing from Genoa to Corsica, in 1536. b. at Genoa, 1476.

JUSTINIANI, Fabio, bishop of Ajaccio, wrote a Commentary on Tobit, and an index of all the authors who had written commentaries on the whole or any part of the Bible.

JUSTINIANUS I., ius-tin-e-us, emperor of the East, succeeded his uncle Justin I. in 527. He was the protector of Christianity, and carried his arms with success against his enemies, for which he was chiefly indebted to his general Belisarius, who also preserved him from a formidable conspiracy. Peace being restored, Justinianus formed into a body all the Roman laws, which was executed under the title of "Digests," or "Pandects." After this great work was finished, the laws of modern date were collected into one volume, called the "Novella." He exerted himself against the ecclesiastical encroachments of Popes Silverius and Vigilius. He built many churches, particularly the famous Saint Sophia at Constantinople, and abolished the consulate. b. 483; d. 565.

JUSTINIANUS II. was the elder son of Constantine II., whom he succeeded on the throne of Constantinople in 685. He recovered several provinces from the Saracens, and made an advantageous peace with them; but his exactions, cruelties, and debaucheries tarnished the glory of his arms. He formed the design of destroying all the inhabitants of Constantinople, which being discovered, the tyrant was deposed in 694, and banished to the Crimea. Leo the Patrician gained the throne, but he was displaced by Tiberius. About 704, Justinianus, being aided by the Bulgarians, regained his crown, but was slain, with his son Tiberius, in 711, by Philipppicus Barlaanes, his successor.

JUSTINIANUS, St. Lawrence, the first patriarch of Venice, was canonised by pope Alexander VIII. in 1690. He was the author of several devotional works, which were printed in 2 vols. folio, with a life by his nephew. b. 1381; d. 1455.

JUSTINUS I., ius-ti-nus, emperor of the East, rose to the rank of general from being a private soldier, before which, he was a swineherd. The soldiers of the pretorian band forced him to accept the imperial dignity on the death of Anastasius, in 518. He recalled the bishops who had been banished by the Arians, and published several severe edicts against that sect. Hearing of the destruction of Antioch by an earthquake, he laid aside the imperial robes, clothed himself in sackcloth, and passed several days in fasting and prayer, to avert Divine judgment. He rebuilt Antioch, and other places which were destroyed by the same calamity. b. 470; d. 527.

JUSTINUS II. was the nephew and successor of Justinianus I. in 565. He caused his cousin Justinus to be strangled, and put to death some of his senators from a suspicion of their being disaffected. He made war against Chosroes, king of Persia, who, being defeated at the head of a numerous army, was obliged to sue for peace. Justinus married Sophia, niece of Theodora, wife of the emperor Justinianus, a woman of high spirit, who, taking advantage of her husband's weakness, governed the empire in conjunction with Tiberius. b. 678.

JUSTINUS, a Latin historian of the 2nd century, who made an abridgment of the "Universal History" written by Trogius Pompeius. This work remains, but the original is lost.

JUSTINUS, commonly called Justin Martyr, a Christian philosopher and martyr in the 2nd century. His parents were heathens, and himself a zealous adherent to the Platonic philosophy; but, disputing with a Christian in 132, he was converted to that faith, though he still continued to wear the pallium, or cloak of the Grecian philosophers. He was an equal honour to Christianity by his knowledge, his firmness, and the purity of his life. A persecution breaking out against the Christians under Antoninus, Justinus presented to that emperor an admirable apology in their behalf, which had the desired effect. He afterwards addressed another apology to Marcus Aurelius, in which he defended his co-religionists against the calumnies of Crescentinus, a Cynde philosopher. This last is said to have gained him the crown of martyrdom, about 165. Besides these apologies, his dialogue with Trypho, a learned Jew, and some other pieces in the Greek language, are extant. The best edition of his works is that of Jena, 1844.

JUVARA, Philip, yo-o-ra'-ra, an Italian architect, who was employed by the king of Sardinia to build some fine structures at Turin. In 1734 the royal palace at Madrid being burnt, Philip V., king of Spain, sent for him to erect another, more magnificent; he made a design, which was approved of, but the commencement of the work being delayed from day to day, it is supposed the architect died of chagrin in 1735. b. at Messina, 1663.

JUVENCUS, Caius Veetius Aquilinus, ju-ven'-us, one of the earliest Christian poets, was a native of Spain, and flourished in the reign of Constantine. His principal performance was a life of Christ, entitled "Historia," written in Latin verse.

JUVENAL, Decius Junius, ju-ve'-nal, a Roman satirical poet. He went to Rome when young, and was for some time a pleader, after which he applied himself to writing satires with great success. Domitian sent him into honourable exile, by appointing him to a military command on the frontiers of Egypt. The best translations of his works are those of Dryden, Gifford, and Hodgson. b. about 40; d. 120.

JUXON, William, jus-on, archbishop of Canterbury, studied at St. John's College, Oxford, of which, in 1621, he was elected president. In 1633 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and the year following nominated to the bishopric of Hereford, but, before consecration, he was advanced to the see of London. In 1635 he was appointed lord high treasurer, which excited great indignation against Archbishop Laud, as the means of it; but the conduct of Bishop Juxon in that dignity was irreproachable. He suffered, in the civil war, the loss not only of his ecclesiastical revenues, but a great part of his temporal estate. In 1643 he attended the king upon the scaffold, after which the regicides caused him to be taken into custody, to make him reveal what Charles I. had secretly intrusted to him. At the Restoration, he was made archbishop of Canterbury, b. 1582; d. 1663.

KAAAB, Kaab, a celebrated Arabian poet, contemporary with Mohammed, whom he strenuously opposed, but afterwards, as a reward for writing a poem the prophet gave him his green mantle, which a descendant of Kaab sold for 10,000 pieces of silver. b. 682.

KAAAS, Nicholas, Kaas, an eminent Danish statesman, studied in the universities of Germany during the minority of Christian IV. Being attacked with a mortal disease previous to the coronation of that prince, he sent for him, and telling him that he had promised his father, in his last moments, to do all he could to see the crown placed on the head of his son, he gave him the key of the place where the crown and other regalia were kept, saying, "Take it in the name of God, and wear the crown with glory, sway the sceptre with wisdom and clemency, bear the sword with justice, and keep the globe with judgment." d. 1594.

KABRIS, Joseph, Kab're, a French seaman, who, being taken prisoner by the English, obtained permission to enter on board a South Sea whaler, and being wrecked on the coast of the island of Noukahiva, in the Pacific Ocean, fell into the hands of the cannibal inhabitants. While preparations were making for sacrificing him, and his doom appeared inevitable, he was saved by the intercession of the king's daughter, who shortly afterwards became his wife, and he was made chief judge of the island, which office he exercised with reputation and comparative ease, owing to the simplicity of the legal institutions of the savages. Nine years had thus passed away when Kabris was carried off, as he stated, while asleep, by the Russian navigator, Captain Krusenstern. On returning to France in 1817, Kabris exhibited himself to the public at Paris and elsewhere, his face being tattooed in the New Zealand style. His object was to raise money, to enable him to return to his wife and family at Noukahiva, where he had enjoyed much happiness, but while travelling for this KADIJAH, Ku-as-ja, the first wife of Mohammed, who, at the period of her marriage with the prophet, was the widow of two husbands, and forty years of age, Mohammed being only twenty-five. She had four sons and four daughters by the prophet, among whom was the beautiful Fatima. d. 621.

KÄMPFER, Engelbert, Kame'pfer, a German physician and traveller, who, in 1683, accompanied, as secretary, the Swedish ambassador to Moscow and Ispahan. He afterwards embarked in a Dutch vessel, visited India, and then proceeded to Japan, making many valuable observations relative to the natural history of that country. He returned to Europe in 1693, and published a volume of valuable manuscripts, which Sir Hans Sloane published in English in 1697, under the title of "History of Japan." This work was afterwards translated into German and French. b. at O, 1651; d. 1716.

In 1770 he espoused the cause of the Americans, and, after a voyage to France, returned with a number of men, among the rest the distinguished Lafayette. He was appointed general, and was killed at the battle of Camden in 1780. b. at Nuremberg; 1753.

KALKREUTH, Frederic Adolphus, Kalk'-roef, count of, a Prussian field-marshal, entered the army in 1751; served with distinction in the seven years' war; arrived, step by step, at the rank of general, and was made a count in 1783. His courage and ability were often conspicuously shown in the war with France; he took Mayence in 1793; had the chief command of the troops in Pomerania in 1795; was appointed governor of Thorn and Dantzic, and made inspector-general of cavalry, in 1800; concluded with Berthier, at Tilsit, the truce between Prussia and France, in 1807; after which, in conjunction with Goltz, he concluded a peace with Talleyrand. He was then made field-marshal, and appointed governor of Berlin in 1810. b. 1737; d. 1818.

KANARIS, Constantine, kant'-a-ris, a celebrated Greek mariner, who, in the Greek war of independence, signalized himself by conducting the fire-ships into the Turkish fleet. In 1824 he burnt a Turkish frigate at Samos, and a corvette in the port of Mitylene; after which he served under the Greek admiral as captain. In 1825 he attempted to destroy the squadron of Mehmet Ali, as it lay in the port of Alexandria preparing to embark troops for the Morea; but the fire-ships, driven back by a contrary wind, burnt themselves out open sea, doing no injury to the enemy. In 1827 he represented Ipsara in the Greek National Assembly; subsequently he commanded the Greek fleet, but on the assassination of the president in 1831, he resigned, and retired into private life. He was nominated minister of marine and president of the council in 1818-19, but again retired in 1855. He has been called the "Themistocles of Modern Greece," and Victor Hugo has popularized his daring deeds in verse. At the revolution in 1862, he became a member of the provisional government formed after the expulsion of King Otto.

KANDLER, John Joachim, kant'-dler, master modeller in the porcelain manufactory at Meissen, executed many beautiful figures, particularly of the apostle Paul and the Death of St. Xavier. b. in Saxony, 1706; d. 1776.

KANE, Elisha Kent, kain, an American traveller, who, after condensing his education at the medical college of Pennsylvania, was appointed, in 1843, assistant surgeon in the United States navy, and accompanied the first American embassy to China. He afterwards visited the Philippines, Ceylon, and travelled into the interior of India. At Java his travelling companion, Baron Loeb, a Prussian, died of fatigue. Dr. Kane subsequently visited Egypt and explored the Nile as far up as the frontiers of Nubia; he walked completely over Greece, and, after a short sojourn in the United States, set out for the coast of Africa, penetrating to the slave-markets of Whydah. Prostrated by fever, caught in that country, he returned in an enfeebled condition of health to his native land. He next served with the American army against Mexico, and experienced many fatigues and dangers throughout the campaign. In 1850 he accompanied the first American expedition, despatched by Mr. Grinnell, a merchant of New York, in search of Sir John Franklin, and four years afterwards published "A Personal Narrative of the Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin." In 1853 he was appointed to the command of a second expedition to the Arctic regions, for the same purpose, and was absent two years. In 1856 he published the results of his second voyage, under the title of "Arctic Explorations." The Royal Geographical Society of London bestowed upon him its large gold medal. b. at Philadelphia, 1822; d. at Havana, 1857.

KANE, Sir Robert, M.D., a distinguished Irish chemist and writer on medicine, after being educated for the profession of medicine, became professor of chemistry to the Apothecaries' Hall of Dublin, and was subsequently elected member of the Medico-Chirurgical Society of the same city, and of the Paris societies of Pharmacy and Medical Chemistry. In 1830-31 he published an essay on the "Pathological Condition of the Fluids in Typhus Fever," which gained the prize offered by Dr. Graves; and the "Elements of Practical Pharmacy." The following year he received the degree of M.D. from Trinity College, Dublin; and in 1841 became fellow of the Irish College of Physicians. In 1844 he published a work on "The Industrial Resources of Ireland," which excited considerable interest at the time. He was subsequently employed by government, in conjunction with Professors Lindley and Taylor, to investigate the cause of the potato disease in Ireland; but the labours of these gentlemen have been pronounced unsuccessful. The lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in 1818, bestowed upon him the order of knighthood. He afterwards aided in the formation of the Museum of Irish Industry, and published several works on the application of chemistry to agriculture and manufactures. In 1818 he became president of Queen's College, Cork. b. at Dublin, 1810.

KANG-HI, kang'-hi, emperor of China, succeeded Chum-tchi, founder of the Manchou dynasty, in 1649. He had a great love for the arts and sciences of the Europeans, and liberally patronized the missionaries; but, though he was fond of geography, and directed the construction of maps and charts, he would suffer none to be laid before him unless China was represented therein as the middle of the world. He was a voluminous writer, and composed, among other works, "Maxims for State Government," and "Moral Instructions for my Son." d. 1683.

KANT, Immanuel, kant, an eminent Prussian philosopher. His father, who was a saddler, was descended from a Scotch family, the name of which was spelt Kant; but it was altered by the philosopher to Kant. He received his education at the Gynnasium, and afterwards at the university of Königsberg. On the completion of his studies, he became tutor in a clergyman's family, and afterwards in that of a nobleman, on quitting which he returned to the university, and subsisted by teaching private pupils. In 1755 he obtained the degree of M.A., and, commencing as public lecturer, obtained a number of scholars. He then became so prolific a writer, that it is impossible, within these limits, to give a complete list of his publications in Natural and Metaphysical Philosophy. Among his chief productions may be named, a treatise on the "Theory of the Winds;" "Sketch of Physical Geography;" "New Principles of Motion and Rest;" "Examination of the Prize Question, whether the Earth, in turning round its Axis, by which the Succession of Day and Night was produced, had undergone any Change since its Origin? what were the Causes of it, and how we could be assured of it?" and on Volcanoes in the Moon. But it was in metaphysics that he chiefly excelled, and upon which he published a prodigious number of works, which are extremely refined and obscure. His principles attracted considerable attention in Germany, obtained many followers, and, although attacked by several writers, continue to exercise great influence still. One of his best known works is the "Critique of Pure Reason," which has been translated into English. b. at Königsberg, 1724; d. 1804.

KARAJICH, or KARADSCITSCH, Vuk Stepanovitch, ka'-ra-jik, an eminent Serbian writer, the collector of the national ballads of his country, and compiler of a Serbian dictionary. During the attempt of the Servians to throw off the Turkish yoke, he acted as secretary to several chiefs of his country, but, after 1813, devoted himself to collecting the ballads of Serbia, writing a grammar of the language, and otherwise benefiting literature. His collection of Serbian national songs is said not to be inferior to the Scottish or Spanish. These have been published at Vienna in several volumes; and Dr. Bowring has translated a small portion of them, under the title of "Serbian Popular Poetry." He compiled a Serbian grammar, translated the New Testament into Serbian, made a collection of Serbian proverbs, and edited a volume of "National Tales." He was a member of the Societies of Göttingen, Berlin, and Vienna, and received a pension from the emperor of Russia. b. at Trshich, in Turkish Serbia, 1787.

KARAMSIN, Nicholai Michaelovitch, ku'-ram-sin, an eminent Russian author, who, after completing his education at Moscow, served as an officer in the Russian guards; but, between the years 1789-91, travelled in Germany, France, and England, an account of his tour being published, with the title, "Letters of a Travelling Russian." Returning to Russia, he commenced his literary career by establishing the "Moscow Journal," and afterwards published several works, original and translated. His great work, the "History of the Russian Empire," he left incomplete at his death; but the book had an unprecedented popularity, being found everywhere throughout the empire, from the noble's palace to the peasant's hut. He also wrote several poetical pieces of great merit. The emperor Alexander I. made him a state councillor, and conferred upon him the order of St. Anne. b. 1765; d. 1826.

KARA-YOUSOUF, yoo'-soof, the first prince of the Turcoman dynasty, called the "Black Sheep," because they bore an effigy of that animal on their banners, conquered Armenia; but was forced by Tamerlane to flee into Egypt. After Tamerlane's death, Yousouf returned, and overran part of Mesopotamia and Georgia. He was pursuing his conquests when he died near Tauris, in 1420.

KARR, Jean Baptiste Alphonse, kar, a distinguished French novelist, who, after being employed as teacher in the Collège Bourbon, at Paris, commenced his literary career, in 1832, with the publication of a novel entitled "Sous les Tilleuls," which at once became exceedingly popular. He subsequently wrote "An Hour too Late," "P Sharp," "The Alain Family," and many other works, all excellent, and extensively read. He is best known in England by his "Tour round my Garden," which has been translated, and several times reprinted. He was also editor and proprietor of various periodicals. In 1844, having published some sarcastic remarks upon a certain poetess, the lady waited in concealment near the critic's house, and, on his emerging into the street, wounded him with a poniard. The affair created much excitement at the time, but Karr took no steps to gain redress for the outrage. The poniard was afterwards hung up in his study, with the following inscription under it:—"Presented by Madame —, to Alphonse Karr—in the back."

Kaulbach

Latterly he almost exclusively devoted his time to horticultural and rural pursuits. b. at Paris, 1808.

KARSLAKE, Sir John Burgess, kars'-lak, was called to the bar in 1843, and became solicitor-general under Lord Derby, in 1866, and attorney-general in 1867. b. near Northmolton, North Devon.

KATER, Captain Henry, kai'-ter, an English mathematician, who, although holding a military commission, devoted his life to science. He commenced his researches in physical science with two papers "On the Light of the Cassagrainian Telescope compared with that of the Gregorian." He subsequently made several valuable experiments on pendulums and other astronomical apparatus, and published two essays on the "Construction and Adjustment of the New Standard of Weights and Measures of Great Britain." A large number of scientific treatises were also contributed by him to the "Transactions" of the Royal and other learned Societies. b. at Bristol, 1777; d. in London, 1833.

KATONA, Stephen, ka-to'-na, an Hungarian historian, who was professor of poetry and rhetoric in the university of Buda, and wrote the "History of Hungary," in Latin, in forty-one volumes. This work is the standard authority on the subject, and its value is greatly enhanced by the bibliographical notices it contains of Hungarian authors. b. in Hungary, 1732; d. 1811.

Maria, Angelica, kouf'-man, an eminent female artist, was the daughter of a Swiss painter, who from her earliest years instructed her in his art. At eleven years of age she drew portraits; after wandering in Italy for several years, she went to London, in 1761, where she was made one of the original thirty-six members of the Royal Academy. A story, which does not appear to be authentic, relates that she was, while at the height of her reputation in England, cheated into a marriage with an impostor, who represented himself as Count Horn, a Swedish nobleman. She returned to Italy in 1782, after her marriage to Zuechi. Her paintings, characterized by nobleness and grace, are somewhat deficient in drawing. There is a large allegorical painting by her in the National Gallery, called "Religion attended by the Graces." b. at Chur, in the Grisons, 1742; d. at Rome, 1807.

KAULBACH, Wilhelm, koul'-bak, a celebrated German artist, was the son of a goldsmith, and was at first apprenticed to that trade, but evincing great talent for drawing, he was, after some opposition, allowed to study in the Düsseldorf Academy, under Cornelius, who was so delighted with his pupil, that when he was himself solicited to paint a grand series of frescoes in Munich, he requested the assistance of Kaulbach. The young artist went to Munich in 1825, and painted there six allegorical frescoes. He exhibited his first unaided work of art, "Irrenhaus," in 1820. When his great ability became recognised, he was employed to decorate the new palace of Munich with designs in fresco and encaustic. He embellished the throne-room, the queen's apartment, the drawing-room, and the state bed-room. His greatest work in oil is "The Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus." In his later years he worked almost exclusively at portrait-painting. Kaulbach also drew a very large number of thoughtful and elegant designs for books, and his illustrations to Gothe's "Reynard the Fox" have become celebrated, not alone in Germany, but also in England. b. at Aachen, in Waldeck, 1804.

KAUNITZ, Wenceslas, Prince of, Kon-nitz, an eminent German statesman, who during forty years was chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He commenced his political career as minister of state for Hungary, in 1744, and enjoyed successively the confidence of Maria Theresa, Joseph II., Leopold II., and Francis II. Under his prudent administration the cabinet of Vienna obtained great influence with the other courts of Europe. b. at Vienna, 1710; d. 1794.

KAVANAGH, Julia, Kiss-a-ni, a modern English novelist, was of an Irish family, and received her education in Paris. She commenced her literary career in 1814, by contributing small stories and sketches to the periodical press. Her first separate work was a tale for young people, called "The Three Paths," which was produced in 1817. She afterwards published—"Nathalie," "Women in France of the 18th Century;" "Women of Christianity;" "Daisy Burns;" "Rachel Gray;" and other works. b. at Thurles, Tipperary, 1824.

KAY, William, Kai, a portrait and historical painter, whose death was occasioned by grief, caused by the duke of Alva's sentencing counts Egmont and Horn to death while the duke was sitting to him for his picture. b. at Breda, 1620; d. 1669.

KAYE, Dr. John, Bishop of Lincoln, a learned prelate, received his early education under Dr. Charles Burney, and afterwards proceeded to Cambridge, where he had the distinction of being highest at once in classics and mathematics. In 1814, he was elected Master of Christ's College; in 1815 was created D.D. by Royal Mandate; and in 1816, on the death of Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, was appointed his successor, as Regius Professor of Divinity. Some of the lectures delivered by him from this chair have been published under the title of "Ecclesiastical History, as illustrated by the writings of Tertullian and Justin Martyr." In 1820 he was nominated to the see of Bristol, and in 1827 advanced to that of Lincoln. Ecclesiastical history was his favourite study, and his "Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria," and his "Athanasis and the Council of Nice," attest his learning and research. His publications on occasional topics include sermons, charges, and some controversial pamphlets. b. 1783; d. 1843.

KAYE, KAY, or CAIUS, Dr. John. (See CAIUS.)

KEACH, Benjamin, keech, a Baptist teacher, who wrote an allegorical piece, entitled the "Travels of True Godliness," in imitation of Bunyan; but his greatest work is a folio volume on the Scripture Metaphors, reprinted in 1777. b. about 1700.

KEAN, Edmund, kene, a celebrated English actor, was the son of a stage carpenter and an actress at minor theatres and in showmen's booths. Both his parents neglected him during his infancy, and he owed whatever small stock of education he obtained during his early years, to the care of Miss Tidswell, an actress at the London theatres, who generously took charge of him. This lady instructed him in the actor's art; but, when he was about twelve years of age, his mother took him away, and employed him to assist her in hawking about perfumery and flowers, and occasionally to play in showmen's booths over the country. So clever was "Master Carey," as he was termed, that, when performing with his mother in Richardson's booth at Windsor, George III. summoned him to the Castle, for the purpose of giving recitations. His majesty was greatly pleased at the boy's efforts, and dismissed him with a handsome present. After leading the life of a strolling player for about fifteen years, he, in 1814, made his first appearance at Drury-lane Theatre, the playbills announcing the performance of "The Merchant of Venice; Shylock, Mr. Edmund Kean, from the Exeter Theatre." The house, on the first night, was only poorly attended, but the extraordinary merits of the provincial actor soon became known throughout the metropolis, and Drury-lane Theatre rapidly became the crowded resort of the most fashionable circles. Kean's fame was fixed. He was universally acknowledged to be the greatest English actor since Garrick. His success remained unabated till the year 1823, when his connexion with the wife of Alderman Cox led to a lawsuit, on the termination of which Kean was compelled to pay £500 damages. He was then banished from the stages of Drury Lane and Edinburgh; whereupon he paid a visit to the United States. After two seasons he returned; but, though favourably received once more, his career was near its end. He had always been a loose liver, and he now indulged in constant intoxication; his constitution was weakened, and his memory so impaired that he could not study a new part. In 1833 he was announced to play the part of Othello, his son Charles being cast for Iago. Kean struggled through the opening scenes of the play, but when he came to the speech, "Villain, be sure," he sank exhausted upon his son's shoulder, and was led off the stage. This was his last appearance. His performances of Othello, Shylock, Richard III., and Sir Giles Overreach, are set down in the annals of the stage as inimitable efforts of the actor's art. b. in London, about 1787; d. at Richmond, 1833.

KEAN, Charles, second son of the preceding, was educated at Eton, where he won distinction both in the school exercises and the athletic sports indulged in by the youths at the school. On his father's affairs getting deranged in 1827, he was recalled from Eton, and was offered a cadetship in the service of the East India Company; but this he declined, in consequence of his desire to be near his mother, to whom he was warmly attached, and who was then separated from his father. He determined, therefore, to embrace his father's profession, and having been offered an engagement at Drury-lane Theatre, by Mr. Price, he then lessee, he made his first appearance there on the 1st of October, 1827, in the character of Norval in Home's tragedy of "Douglas." He had not yet reached the age of seventeen, was a mere stripling, and with the disadvantage of a faulty voice—a defect which he was never able entirely to overcome—he was but partially successful, and was even severely "written down" by the press. In these circumstances he offered to relieve the manager from the engagement, but this Mr. Price declined, and Mr. Kean continued to linger on at Drury-lane till the end of the season, appearing in a variety of youthful characters (while acting one of which, Frederick, in "Lover's Vows," he made the acquaintance of Miss Ellen Tree, afterwards his wife,) but obtained no change in the verdict which had been pronounced against him. He now went on a tour in the provinces, and while acting in Glasgow became reconciled to his father, then residing in the Isle of Bute, a disagreement having occurred between the father and son in consequence of the latter persisting in going upon the stage against the former's wish. The elder Kean acted a night in the western Scottish capital for his son's benefit, which produced a crowded house and receipts amounting to nearly £300. Mr. Charles Kean returned to Drury-lane in January, 1829, and made his first decided "hit" in the character of Sir Edward Mortimer. He now visited America, and returned to England in 1833, and appeared at Covent-garden, where he again, and for the last time, played in the same piece with his father. After his father's death, Mr. Kean played in Knowles's "Wife," with Miss Ellen Tree and Knowles himself. The piece was very successful, and had a considerable run both at Covent-garden and at the Olympic. About this time Mr. Kean was offered a comparatively low salary at Drury-lane, when he replied that he would never set foot upon the London boards at less than £50 a night. "Then," said the theatrical treasurer, Mr. Dunn, "I fear you may bid a long farewell to London, for the days of such salaries are gone for ever." This prophecy, however, was soon falsified, for within five years, during which he had realized £20,000 by acting in the provinces, Mr. Kean entered Drury-lane with an engagement in his pocket at £50 a night, and was paid that sum for fifty nights by the very man who had declared such a thing impossible. He now took a leading part in his profession, and was offered an engagement by Mr. Maeready, at Covent-garden, in 1837, but declined it, and appeared again at Drury-lane, and with Mr. Webster at the Haymarket, in both houses with eminent success. On the 30th of March, 1830, Mr. Kean was entertained at a public dinner in Drury-lane Theatre, and was presented with a magnificent silver vase, worth £200. He was now the most eminent actor, Mr. Maeready alone excepted, in England, royally itself having condescended to approve his performances. He now paid a second visit to America, and returning to England in 1840, resumed his old place at the Haymarket, and also "starred" in the provinces. In 1812, while in Dublin, he married Miss Ellen Tree, who proved a valuable coadjutor to him in his professional pursuits. After once more visiting the New World, along with his wife, Mr. Kean, in 1819, was entrusted with the management of the royal Christmas theatricals at Windsor Castle. He had now become lessee of the Princess's Theatre, where he revived the plays of Shak-

KEAN, Mrs. Charles, wife of the above, but better known by her maiden name of Ellen Tree, was born in the south of Ireland, and made her first appearance at Covent-garden in Olivia, in "Twelfth Night," for the benefit of her sister, Miss Maria Tree, afterwards the wife of Mr. Bradshaw, a gentleman of fortune, and some time M.P. for Canterbury. She afterwards acted in the provinces, and appeared at Drury-lane as Violante in the "Wonder." She then, in 1829, went to Covent-garden, where she met with great success in Miss Kemble's play of "Francis the First," and in playing Romeo to Miss Kemble's Juliet, in Serjeant Taltourd's "Ion," and in Byron's "Sardanapalus." She visited America between 1836 and 1839, and in 1842 married Mr. Charles Kean, and was subsequently always associated with that gentleman in his various professional enterprises, contributing not a little to the success which attended his efforts. b. 1805.

KEANE, John, Lord, a British military commander, who entered upon his career as ensign at the age of thirteen years. In 1790 he became captain in the 41st regiment, after which he served in Egypt and the Mediterranean. In 1812 he joined the duke of Wellington's army in Spain as brigadier, in which capacity he took part in the battles of Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Orthes, and Toulouse. In 1814 he was sent, with the grade of major-general, to the West-India station, afterwards acting in the attack on New Orleans, where he received two severe wounds. In 1833 he went to Bombay as commander of the forces; and five years afterwards led the army which invaded Seinde. In 1839 he reduced the hitherto impregnable fortress of Ghuznee, after a desperate defence; and for this service was rewarded with a peerage, being created Baron Keane, of Ghuznee, in Afghanistan. The East India Company settled upon him and his two next successors the sum of £2000 annually, both Houses of Parliament voting him their thanks. b. 1781; d. at Burton Lodge, Hampshire, 1844.

KEATS, George, keets, a miscellaneous writer. Having completed the tour of Europe, during which he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, at Geneva, he returned to England, became a student in the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar; but, not meeting with much encouragement in the law, he abandoned that profession for literature. His first performance was "Ancient and Modern Rome," a poem published in 1750. His publications after this were very numerous; the principal being "An Account of the Pellew Islands," compiled from the papers of Captain Wilson, and a translation of the "Semiramis" of Voltaire. b. at Trowbridge, Wiltshire, 1729; d. 1797.

KEATINGE, Jeffrey, keet'-ing, an Irish ecclesiastic of the Roman church, and doctor of divinity, who wrote a history of the poets of Ireland, and the genealogies of the principal families. b. 1650.

KEATS, John, keets, an eminent English poet, was the son of a livery-stable proprietor in Finsbury, and was sent, when about the age of five years, to Mr. Clarke's school, at Enfield. While there, that intellectual ambition which formed so large a portion of his character, became suddenly awakened. The amusements and games of youth were abandoned for study; and on the half-holidays, when all his companions were at play, he was busy translating Virgil and Fénelon. The old Grecian mythology, which he afterwards reconstructed and reanimated by his feeling and fancy, was his especial study. In 1810 he left school. His father dying about the same time, he was left the sum of £2000, and was apprenticed to Mr. Hammond, a surgeon at Edmonton. From the outset, however, the youth showed that it was not in physis, but in poetry, that his name was to become pre-eminent. In 1817 he published a volume of Juvenile Poems, and shortly afterwards "Endymion." "Lamia," "Isabella," "The Eve of St. Agnes," and "Hyperion," were produced during the three or four succeeding years. On the appearance of "Endymion," the "Quarterly Review" attacked the poet, and his kindred writers, in a most violent manner. The poet's health, always delicate, became greatly weakened by his attentions upon a dying brother; and his own decease occurring soon afterwards, it was for some time erroneously attributed to the attacks of the "Quarterly" reviewer. Byron, in his "Don Juan," gave one version of the story in the following lines:—

"John Keats, who was kill'd off by one critique,
Just as he really promised something great
If not intelligible, without Greek,
Contrived to talk about the gods of late,
Much as they might have been supposed to speak.

Poor fellow! his was an untoward fate:
'Tis strange, the mind, that very fiery particle, Should let itself be snuff'd out by an article."
This was quite untrue; the young poet was predisposed to hereditary phthisis. He went to Italy for the purpose of regaining strength, and had reached Rome when his malady assumed a most alarming form, and he was soon carried off by consumption. The career of the young poet was too suddenly brought to a close, or he would have redeemed the promises of his poetical genius. Although he left behind only three volumes of verse, his rich and luxuriant fancy, his seeming brilliant imagery, his stimulating and suggestive diction, have been an honour and a glory to English literature. The circumstances of his short life, and the character of his writings, compel our love and veneration; and to that which he has given us we may justly apply his own line:—
"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

KEATS, Sir Richard Godwin, a British naval officer—one of the gallant band of sea warriors who made the British navy so renowned in the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries—was the son of the Rev. Dr. Keats, rector of Bideford, Devon, and entered the navy at the age of thirteen, on board the Belkora, 74. After serving in several ships, he became lieutenant in the Ramilies in 1771, and was present in the action fought by Keppel against D'Orvilliers, July 27, 1778, on which occasion the Ramilies led the fleet on the larboard tack into action. Keats behaved so well in this affair, that he was invited by Admiral Digby to accompany him into the Prince George, 98, in which Prince William Henry, afterwards William IV., began his naval career, and Lieutenant Keats was selected as an able and skilful officer to whom the professional instruction of the prince might safely be intrusted. Accordingly, he was for three years the officer of the watch in which Prince William was rated. Keats was

He afterwards served in the Bonetta, Southampton, and Niger; and on the breaking out of the French revolutionary war, was appointed to the Galatea, 32, in which vessel, in the unlucky expedition to Quiberon, in 1795, Captain Keats did good service in rescuing a portion of the force from the clutches of the sanguinary Le Moine. In August 1796 he was transferred to the Spanish and Spanish fleets. He was next, in February, 1806, in the action off St. Domingo, under Sir J. Duckworth, where Captain Keats greatly distinguished himself. In the attack on Copenhagen, under Lord Gambier, in 1807, Captain Keats was employed as commodore of a division of the fleet, and after blockading Stralsund, was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and in the Superb, joined Sir J. Saumarez in the Baltic. In 1808 he accompanied the expedition under Sir John Moore to Spain, and in August of the same year, relieved the Marquis de la Romana and 10,000 Spanish troops from Nyburg, in Denmark, whom Napoleon had sent to Hanover from their own country, preparatory to carrying out his designs against it. For his services on this occasion, Keats was created a knight of the Bath. He was second in command of the fleet which accompanied the disastrous expedition to the Scheldt, in 1809. He next commanded the naval forces employed in the defence of Cadiz against the French; and, in the conclusion of 1811, in the Libertie, 120, joined Sir Edward Pellew off Toulon, as second in command of the Mediterranean fleet. In October, 1812, ill-health compelled him to return to England, and in the following spring he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief at Newfoundland. He became major-general of marines in 1818, and governor of Greenwich Hospital in 1821. In this post he continued till his death, from a paralytic stroke, in 1834, when his obsequies were performed with all martial honours by express command of William IV. b. 1757.

KEBLE, John, M.A., ke'-bel, a highly popular writer of sacred poetry, for many years vicar of Hursley, in Hampshire. Soon after taking his B.A. degree, he was chosen fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and from 1831 to 1841 was professor of poetry at his university. His chief works are the "Christian Year," of which thousands of copies have been sold, and "Lyra Innocentium." b. 1782; d. 1866.

KEILL, John, kile, a British mathematician, who, after taking his degree of M.A. at Edinburgh university, entered of Balliol College, and is said to have been the first who taught Sir Isaac Newton's principles by experiments. In 1698 he published an "Examination of Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth," to which he subjoined gambours in one of the Jersey rivers, that he was rewarded with a commander's commission, and was appointed to the Bala

"Remarks on Whiston's Theory." The year following he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy. In 1708 he defended Newton's claim to the invention of fluxions, which brought him into a dispute with Leibnitz. In 1709 he went to America with some German exiles, sent thither at the expense of the British government. In 1710 he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and the year following became decipherer to the queen. In 1714 the university conferred on him the degree of M.D., and, in 1715, he published an edition of "Commandine's Euclid." In 1718 appeared his "Introductio ad veram Astronomiam," which treatise he translated into English. b. at Edinburgh, 1671; d. 1721.

KIRKE, James, younger brother of the above, obtained the degree of M.D. at Cambridge, and settled as a physician at Northampton. His works are: "The Anatomy of the Human Body," "An Account of Animal Secretion, the Quantity of Blood in the Human Body, and Muscular Motion." b. in Scotland, 1673; d. at Northampton, 1719.

KIRKEN, Reinhard, Ki-ser, an eminent German musician and composer, who wrote no less than 119 operas, of which his "Circé," brought out at Hamburg, in 1734, was the last and most beautiful. He possessed a most fertile imagination, and is considered as the father of German melody. b. 1673; d. 1735.

KEITH, James, keeth, field-marshal in the Prussian service, was the younger son of George Keith, earl-marshal of Scotland. He attached himself to the Pretender in 1715, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir. He, however, escaped with his brother to Spain, and served as an officer of the Irish brigade for ten years. He afterwards went to Russia, and was made a general. He signalized himself in all the battles between the Russians and Turks, and was the first who entered the breach at the taking of Otchakov. He also displayed great military skill against the Swedes, and, on the restoration of peace, was appointed field-marshal, and sent on several embassies. But conceiving that his services had not been properly compensated, he accepted an invitation from the king of Prussia, who gave him a large pension, and made him governor of Berlin, and field-marshal. That monarch also took him into his confidence, and made him the companion of his travels. He was killed at the battle of Hochkirchen, in 1758. b. at Kincardine, 1696.

KEITH, George, a native of Aberdeen, where he was a fellow-student with Bishop Burnet, and took his degree of M.A.; but quitted the Presbyterian church to become a Quaker, and went to Pennsylvania. At length becoming dissatisfied with this sect, he founded a new one of his own; and subsequently entered into the Church of England, took orders, and obtained some preferment. He wrote several books both for and against the Quakers; was a believer in the transmigration of souls, the millennium, &c.; and is described as an eloquent speaker, and an acute disputant. b. about 1715.

KEITH, George Keith Elphinstone, Viscount, a famous British admiral, was a native of Dumbartonshire, received his education at Glasgow, and entered the navy in 1762, in the Gosport, then under the command of Captain Jervis, afterwards earl St. Vincent. He subsequently served at home, in China, and in India, till, in 1775, he attained post-captain's rank, and hoisted his flag on board the Marlborough, at Portsmouth, and afterwards in the Pearl and Perseus frigates, in the latter of which he served on the American station under Admirals Hood and Arbuthnot, and while absent was elected M.P. for Dumbartonshire. He commanded a detachment of seamen on shore in the reduction of Charleston, was present at the attack on Mud Island, November 17, 1777, and, being sent home with despatches from Admiral Arbuthnot, was appointed to the Warwick, 50. He was again returned for Dumbartonshire in 1780; and in 1781 took the Dutch 50-gun ship Rotterdam. He now served again on the American station, and assisted in the capture of the French ship L'agle and 600 men, commanded by Count de la Touche. On the conclusion of the American war, in 1783, he returned home; and, in 1786, was elected M.P. for Stirlingshire. Soon after war broke out with France, Captain Elphinstone was, in 1793, appointed to the Robust, 74, joined Lord Hood in the Mediterranean, assisted in the reduction of Toulon, on the 28th of August, 1793, and ably superintended the re-embarkation of the troops on the 18th of the following December. He was made rear-admiral of the Blue, April 12, 1794; was created a knight of the Bath on the 4th of May; and was advanced to rear-admiral of the White on 4th of July, hoisting his flag in the Dartfleur, 93. In January, 1795, he removed to the Monarch, 74, on hostilities occurring between England and the Batavian Republic, sailed to the Cape of Good Hope, and, in conjunction with General Alured Clarke, compelled the Dutch commander to surrender on the 16th of September following. He had, in the meantime, been promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, and, on the completion of the service at the Cape, Admiral Elphinstone proceeded to the Indian Seas, and in a brief period captured Ceylon, Cochin, Malacca, and the Molucca Islands; and, on August 18, 1796, captured a Dutch squadron, under Admiral Lucas, which had been sent to recover the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to England in January, 1797, and in May following was made an Irish peer by the title of Baron Keith. He next aided in the suppression of the mutiny at the Nore, and then proceeded to the Mediterranean in the Foudroyant, as second in command to earl St. Vincent. He was promoted to vice-admiral of the Red in 1799; and in November of that year took the command in the Mediterranean, which ill-health had compelled Lord St. Vincent to resign. He here had Nelson under his orders, and, by the judicious arrangement of the forces, secured the capture of the harbour of Leghorn, in co-operation with the Austrians, and was mainly instrumental, by the rigid blockade maintained, in reducing the French troops under General Massena to great straits for provisions, which resulted in the surrender of that officer and his army in the beginning of June; and on the 4th of September following, Malta capitulated to a detachment of Admiral Keith's fleet. His next service was in command of the fleet which accompanied Sir Ralph Abercromby to Egypt, and he greatly distinguished himself in the important operations which followed. In 1801, he was made admiral of the Blue, received the thanks of Parliament, was made a peer of the United Kingdom by the title of Baron Keith of Banbath, Dumbartonshire, was presented with the freedom of the city of London, and had the order of the Crescent bestowed upon him by the Sultan. When hostilities recommenced in 1803, he was appointed to the command in the Channel and in the North Seas, and made an experiment with a new mode of attack on the gunboats at Boulogne, which to a certain extent succeeded. In November, 1805, he was raised to the rank of admiral of the White, again assumed the command of the Channel fleet in 1812, was made a viscount in 1814, and, in 1815, after the battle of Waterloo, arranged his cru-

This closed the long and valuable services of Lord Keith. b. 1746; d. March 10, 1823.

KEITH, Thomas, a famous mathematician, and author of several excellent works, was a native of Brandsburton, near Beverley, in Yorkshire. Having lost his parents when he was only fourteen, he became tutor in a private family; and in 1781, settling in London, soon acquired distinction as a mathematician. In 1804 his reputation as an accountant led to his being appointed professor of geography and the sciences to the Princess Charlotte of Wales; and in 1814 the situation of accountant to the British Museum was conferred upon him, a post which he held to his death. His principal works are, "The Complete Practical Arithmetician," "An Introduction to Geography," "Plane and Spherical Trigonometry," "a Treatise on the Use of the Globes," and "Elements of Geometry." b. 1759; d. 1824.

KELLER, John Balhasar, kel'-ler, a skillful founder in brass. He cast the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., which was set up at Paris in the Place Louis the Great. He was subsequently made inspector of the foundry at the arsenal. b. 1702.—His brother, John James, also excelled in the same art. b. at Colmar, 1700.

KELLERMANN, François Christophe, kel'-ler-man, marshal of France, and duke of Valmy, served with distinction during the Seven Years' War, and when the revolution burst forth, in 1793, was a brigadier in the French army. In 1792 he was named commander of the army of the Moselle, and fought, along with Dumouriez, the battle of Valmy, in which the greatly superior Prussian army was defeated and compelled to evacuate French territory. He was, nevertheless, incarcerated as a suspected person in 1793, but was afterwards set at liberty. In 1795, he became commander-in-chief of the armies of the Alps and Italy, resisting, with 47,000 men, the attacks of an army mustering 150,000 soldiers. In 1804 Napoleon created him marshal of the empire, duke of Valmy, senator, &c., and he was afterwards charged with several commands in chief, in all of which he acquitted himself with great distinction. At the Restoration he was created peer of France. b. at Strasburg, 1735; d. at Paris, 1820.

KELLERMANN, François Etienne, son of the above, served with distinction in the campaigns in Prussia, Germany, Italy, and Spain, and signalized himself at the battles of Marengo, Austerlitz, Vimiera, Bantzen, and Waterloo. He was general of division in 1814, and was created a peer during the Hundred Days. Excluded from the Chamber by Louis XVIII., he did not return to it till 1830. b. 1770; d. at Paris, 1835.

Kelly

KELLY, Edward, kel'-le, an English alchemist, received his education at Oxford, which he quitted without taking a degree; and, while rambling about the country, for some offence or other lost his ears at Lancaster, after which he became assistant to Dr. Dee, whom he accompanied abroad. The emperor Rodolphus II. was so much deceived by Kelly's pretensions to making gold, that he conferred the honour of knighthood on him. He afterwards sent him to prison at Prague, whence, in endeavouring to make his escape by tying his bed-sheets together, he fell, and broke both his legs. He wrote a poem on chemistry, and another on the philosopher's stone. b. at Worcester, 1535; d. 1595.

KELLY, Hugh, kel'-le, an Irish dramatic writer, who, after gaining a livelihood, first as a staymaker and afterwards as an attorney's clerk, turned author with considerable success. He wrote four comedies, called "False Delicacy," "A Word to the Wise," the "School for Wives," and the "Romance of an Hour," together with "Clementina, a Tragedy," "Thespis," a poem in imitation of Churchill's "Rosalind," "Memoirs of a Magician," a novel, and the "Babbler," a collection of essays. b. 1777.

KELLY, John, a learned English clergyman, a native of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, who, having paid particular attention to the vernacular dialect of the Celtic tongue which was spoken in that island, was introduced to Bishop Hildesley, who employed him in translating the Bible into the Manx language, and ordained him a minister of the episcopal congregation of Ayr, in Scotland. Through the patronage of the duke of Gordon, to whose son, the marquis of Huntley, he was tutor, Mr. Kelly obtained the rectory of Copford, in Essex; and having entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, was there honoured with the degree of LL.D. In 1803 he published "A Practical Grammar of the Ancient Gaelic, or Language of the Isle of Man;" and in 1805 issued proposals for publishing "A Triglot Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue," which was nearly completed when the sheets were destroyed by a fire on the premises of the printer, Mr. Nichols. b. 1750; d. 1809.

KELLY, Michael, a composer and singer, was the son of a wine merchant in Dublin, who for many years acted as master of the ceremonies at the castle. Michael, at an early age, having given proofs of a genius for music, his father placed him under Rauzzini, at that time in Dublin, who induced his friends to send him to Naples. He there found a patron in Sir William Hamilton, the British minister; studied under Fineroli and April; and subsequently performed at most of the Italian theatres and in Germany. He contracted a close intimacy with Mozart during his stay at Vienna; was for a period in the service of the emperor Joseph; and at length returning to Britain, made his first appearance, in 1787, at Drury-lane Theatre, London, in "Lionel and Clarissa." He soon acquired the position of first singer at that theatre, the musical performances of which he directed till his retirement from the stage. He set to music upwards of sixty pieces, most of which were successful, and amongst these are the once highly popular compositions in Colman's musical romance of "Bluebeard." A few months previous to his death appeared his "Reminiscences," a very amusing work, replete with anecdotes of his contemporaries and familiar associates. b. 1763; d. 1826.

KEMBLE, John Philip, kem'-bel, an eminent English actor, was the son of Roger Kemble, the manager of a provincial theatre; and although, while young, he was employed to play children's parts in the theatre, was not intended for the stage. He was educated at a Roman Catholic seminary in Staffordshire, and afterwards at Douay College, in France; but having a natural inclination for the actor's profession, he returned to England at the age of nineteen, and made his début on the stage at Wolverhampton. After playing with great success in various provincial theatres, he made his first appearance at Drury-lane Theatre in 1783, became a great favourite, and, in 1803, purchased a share in Covent-garden Theatre, and assumed the management of that establishment. During the subsequent fourteen years, he continued to play the leading tragedy parts with the greatest success; indeed, in the characters of Brutus, Coriolanus, Cato, King John, Wolsey, and Macbeth, he is said to have been without an equal. In 1817 he retired from the stage, and soon afterwards went to reside in the south of France, and later, at Lausanne, in Switzerland. b. 1757; d. at Lausanne, 1833.

KEMBLE, Charles, brother of the preceding, was also a distinguished actor, but excelled chiefly in comedy. After receiving his education at the Roman Catholic college at Douay, in France, his brother John obtained for him an appointment in the General Post-office; but, resigning this situation, he made his first appearance on the stage as Orlando, in "As you Like it," at Sheffield. After playing in the provinces, he appeared in London, in 1794. At first he was cast for secondary characters only, but in a few years he had so improved himself by study, that he became the first English actor in the walk of high comedy, and, like his brother, had certain characters in which he was unrivalled,—such as Orlando, Falconbridge, Cassio, Benedick, Mercutio, Petruccio, and Charles Surface. He also produced on the English stage a number of adaptations from the French and German. He retired from the stage in 1840, having been a short time previously appointed examiner of plays. He afterwards appeared on several occasions as a reader of Shakspeare. Like many other members of his family, he was an educated and accomplished man. b. at Brecon, South Wales, 1775; d. 1854.—Mr. Charles Kemble had two daughters, Frances Anne Kemble, who became a well-known actress, and who, in 1833, visited the United States, where she married a gentleman of property, named Butler. The union, however, proved unhappy, and they were divorced in 1840. She afterwards published a volume of poems, a drama, called "The Star of Seville," and some account of her travels, both in America and in Italy. She afterwards gave readings from and lectures on Shakspeare. The other daughter, Miss Adelaide Kemble, appeared with the greatest success as an operatic singer; but, on her marriage with Mr. Sartoris, she quitted the stage.

KEMBLE, George Stephen, brother of the above, was also an actor of ability. He was born at Kingstown, Herefordshire, and it is stated that his mother performed the part of Anne Boleyn in Shakspeare's Henry VIII. on the night of Stephen's birth. He was originally designed for the medical profession, and was apprenticed to a surgeon in Coventry; but soon followed the bent of all his family, and went upon the stage. He made his first appearance at Covent-garden Theatre in 1783; and was subsequently manager of the theatres at Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Newcastle. Stephen Kemble was exceedingly stout in the latter part of his life, so much so, as to be able to perform the part of Falstaff without stuffing. b. 1822.

KEMBLE, John Mitchell, son of Charles Kemble, one of the most distinguished Anglo-Saxon scholars of his age, after receiving his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1833 commenced his labours by the publication of "The Anglo-Saxon Poems of Beowulf," which were followed by several volumes of translations and collections of the same early literature. In 1849, he produced "The Saxons in England, a History of the English Commonwealth till the period of the Norman Conquest," which is the most important of all his works. He had been editor for many years of the "British and Foreign Quarterly Review," and continued to act in that capacity till the periodical ceased to exist in 1845. Mr. Kemble held the office formerly filled by his father,—that of examiner of plays under the lord chamberlain. b. 1807; d. 1857.

KEMP, Joseph, kemp, a distinguished musical composer, was a native of Exeter, where he was a chorister, and studied under William Jackson. He was appointed organist of Bristol cathedral in 1802, and the same year composed his anthem, "I am Alpha and Omega," one of his best pieces. He left Bristol for London in 1807, and took the degree of M.B. at Cambridge in 1808, and in 1809 that of doctor, when his "Crucifixion" was performed. He then adopted the profession of lecturer on music, and invented a new method of teaching the science. He composed "The Siege of Isehia," an opera; "Twenty Psalmical Melodies," numerous songs, duets, glees, &c.; and was the author of a work entitled "A New System of Musical Education, being a Self-Instructor." b. 1778; d. 1824.

KEMP, George Mickle, a self-educated architect, who designed the Scott monument at Edinburgh, was the son of a shepherd, and apprenticed to the trade of a millwright, at which he worked for several years in Scotland, London, and Manchester. From early youth he is said to have evinced a great inclination for the study of architecture, and while working as a journeyman at his trade, he contrived to visit the abbey of Melrose and Jedburgh, the cathedral of Glasgow, and several cathedrals in England; he was also an ardent lover of poetry, and of the works of Sir Walter Scott. In 1824 he set out for the continent, intending to travel over Europe, but was compelled to return in a year; he had, nevertheless, seen most of the cathedrals of France and the Netherlands. He attempted, without success, to establish himself in business at Edinburgh; after this he studied drawing and perspective with so much zeal, that, in 1830, he was enabled to make three splendid drawings of Melrose Abbey. He was next employed to make a large model for a palace to be erected by the duke of Buccleuch; he subsequently travelled over Scotland, taking sketches for a proposed work on the ecclesiastical antiquities of that country. When the design for the Scott monument was announced for competition,

Kemp entered the lists, and obtained one of the three premiums of £50. He was again successful on the second competition, and his design was adopted; the architect, however, did not live to see his work finished. In 1841 his body was found in the Forth and Clyde canal: into which it is supposed he had accidentally fallen on a dark night. His remains were followed to the tomb by the members of the Royal Scottish Academy and most of the other public bodies in Edinburgh. b. at Newhall, on the Esk, 1791; drowned 1814.

KEMPLEN, Wolfgang, Baron de, kemp'-len, an Hungarian mechanician, who manufactured a chess-playing automaton, about 1782, which attracted considerable attention when exhibited in Paris and London. It is supposed that a boy was concealed within the figure. He also constructed a speaking figure. b. at Presburg, 1734; d. 1801.

KEMPEIS, Thomas à, kem'-pis, a pious writer of the 14th century. At the age of 19 he entered the monastery of Mount St. Agnes, of which his elder brother was prior. He led a life of strict devotion, occupying himself in copying the Bible and the writings of the Saints. The treatise "De Imitatione Christi," or "Of the Imitation of Christ," so universally known under his name, was compiled and copied by him from the older writers. He wrote, also, the history of his monastery. b. at Kempen, near Cologne, 1350; d. 1471.

KEN, Thomas, ken, an English bishop, was educated at Winchester school, whence he removed to New College, Oxford, where he was elected fellow. About 1680 he was appointed chaplain to the Princess of Orange, whom he accompanied to Holland. He afterwards went with Lord Dartmouth to Tangier, and, on his return, was made Chaplain to Charles II., whom he attended in his last illness, but was hindered from exercising the duties of his function by the Romish priests. That monarch, who had a great regard for him, nominated him to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, which was confirmed by James II. The bishop governed his diocese in an exemplary manner; he opposed the endeavours of James to introduce popery, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower for resisting that monarch's dispensing power. He refused, however, to take the oaths at the Revolution, for which he was deprived. Queen Anne granted him a pension of £200 a year; and he was universally esteemed for his amiable manners and unaffected piety. He published some pious manuals, and wrote several hymns and an epic poem, entitled "Edmund." b. at Berkhamstead, Hertis, 1637; d. in Wiltshire, 1711.

KEN, George, ken'-dal, a Nonconformist divine, in 1647 became rector of Bilsland, in Cornwall, whence he subsequently removed to London. He wrote a "Vindication of the Doctrine generally received in the Churches concerning God's Intentions of Special Grace and Favour to his Elect in the Death of Christ," folio; the "Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints, against John Goodwin," folio, &c. p. in Devonshire; d. 1683.

KENNAWAY, Sir John, ken'-a-wai, a brave officer and able diplomatist, whose sphere of service was India, where he negotiated treaties with Hyder Ali and Tippoo Sultan. The treaty with the latter involved the cession of half his dominions, paying £3,800,000 as expenses of the war, and giving his two sons as hostages. Kennaway was knighted in 1788, returned to England in 1791; and died in 1828. b. 1738.

KENNEDY, James, ken'-ne-de, bishop of St. Andrew's, Scotland, was the founder of the college and church of St. Salvador, and also of the abbey of the Observantines. He filled the office of lord chancellor for a time; and, in the minority of James III., was one of the lords of the regency. b. 1405; d. 1481.

KENNEDY, John, a learned Scotch physician, who resided at Smyrna during several years. He had a valuable collection of pictures and coins, which, after his death, was sold by auction. He wrote a dissertation on the Coins of Carausius. d. 1700.

KENNEDY, John, rector of Bradley, in Derbyshire, was a good mathematician, and the author of "Scripture Chronology," "The Doctrine of Commensurability," &c. d. 1770.

KENNEDY, William, "the annalist of Aberdeen," received the rudiments of his education at the grammar school, and his academical studies were subsequently completed at the Marischal College, there. He was admitted a member of the Aberdeen bar in 1783. Kennedy early showed a predilection for antiquarian pursuits; and about the year 1813, at the request of the magistrates, spent a considerable portion of time in drawing up an index to the voluminous city records, which had been accumulating for centuries, and which extend to a more remote antiquity, and are more complete, than those of any other Scottish burgh. His chief title to fame, however, rests on his justly esteemed work, in 2 vols. 4to., "The Annals of Aberdeen." b. 1759; d. 1846.

KENNET, Basil, ken'-net, an English writer, who, in 1696, published "The Antiquities of Rome." The year following he was chosen fellow of his college, and published the "Lives of the Greek Poets." In 1706 he was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, where he narrowly escaped falling under the power of the Inquisition. He published several translations of foreign writers. b. at Postling, Kent, 1674; d. in London, 1711.

KENNET, White, an English prelate and antiquarian, and brother of the preceding, was educated at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he distinguished himself by his abilities. In 1684 he took his degree of M.A., and was presented to the vicarage of Amersden, in Oxfordshire. While shooting, his gun burst, by which accident his skull was laid open, so that he was ever afterwards obliged to wear a patch of black velvet. In 1701 he engaged in the controversy on the rights of convocation, against Dr. Atterbury. In 1707 he was made dean of Peterborough, but he was at this time very unpopular, owing to his Whig principles, and his opposition to Dr. Sacheverell, Dr. Welton, rector of Whitechapel, presenting an altar-piece representing the Last Supper to his church, caused the figure intended for Judas Iscariot to be drawn like the dean of Peterborough, with a black patch. This giving great offence, the Bishop of London ordered the picture to be taken down. In 1718 Kennet was preferred to the bishopric of Peterborough. He published a collection of English historians, under the title of "The Complete History of England," in 3 vols. folio, the last of which was written by himself. He also edited Somner's "History of Gavelkind," with a memoir of the author, and wrote "The Case of Impropriations," and several sermons and miscellaneous tracts. The British Museum library of manuscripts contains a voluminous collection of his unprinted works. B. at Dover, 1669; D. 1728.

KENNETH I., ken'-neth, king of Scotland, reigned for one year only, 605-6.

KENNETH II., king of Scotland, succeeded Alpin, his father, in 834. He made war upon the Picts, and subdued their dominions beyond the Forth, which he divided among his soldiers. He removed the stone chair to Scone, where his successors were crowned till it was removed to England by Edward I. D. 854.

KENNETH III., the son of Malcolm, subdued the Britons of Strathclyde, and was equally successful against the Danes, who had invaded his dominions; but attempting to alter the succession of the crown in favour of his family, the people assassinated him in 994.

KENNEY, James, ken'-ne, an English dramatist of considerable reputation in his day, and many of whose works still maintain their position on the stage. The farce of "Raising the Wind," in which the inimitable Jeremy Diddler is a prominent character, was his first performance, and was followed by "Love, Law, and Physic," "Matrimony," "The World," "The Illustrious Stranger," and others. B. in Ireland, about 1770; D. in London, Aug. 1, 1849, the day which had been fixed for his benefit at Drury-Lane Theatre.

KENNYCOTT, Benjamin, ken'-ni-kot, a learned English divine, who, by the liberality of some gentlemen, was sent to Wadham College, Oxford, where he applied himself to his studies with such diligence, that, while an undergraduate, he published two dissertations on the "Tree of Life in Paradise, and on the oblations of Cain and Abel, for which the university presented him his bachelor's degree, without fees, and before he had completed his terms. He next undertook to publish a correct edition of the text of the Hebrew Scriptures, collated from ancient manuscripts. In this great work, for which he was admirably fitted by patience, industry, and learning, he met with extensive encouragement, and many sovereigns and other illustrious personages appeared in his list of subscribers. To enable him to perfect his design, he was made keeper of the Radcliffe Library, and canon of Christ Church. The first volume was published in 1776, and the eighth, and last, in 1780. B. at Totnes, Devonshire, 1718; D. at Oxford, 1783.

KENRICK, William, ken'-rik, an English writer, who published, in 1759, "Epistles, Philosophical and Moral," in verse. In 1766 appeared his comedy of "Falstaff's Wedding," an imitation of Shakspeare. He was some time a writer in the "Monthly Review," but differing with the proprietors, he set up another journal in opposition to it, called the "London Review." He was also editor of the "Morning Chronicle;" but a quarrel with the proprietor induced him to start a paper against it, without success. He translated Rousseau's "Emile" and "Eloise," and other works, from the French, and published several original pieces. B. at Watford, Herts; D. 1779.

KENT, William, kent, an English painter and architect, who at first worked at coach-painting, but abandoned it for the higher branches of the art. In 1710 he went to Italy, where he became acquainted with the earl of Burlington, through whom he gained considerable employment, and was appointed principal painter and architect to the king. Although only an indifferent artist, he yet takes rank as the great improver of modern English landscape-gardening; indeed, he is regarded as the founder of the art. He also carved Shakspeare's monument in Westminster Abbey. B. in Yorkshire, 1684; D. 1748.

KENT, James, an English musical composer. In his youth he was chorister in Winchester Cathedral, and afterwards in the Chapel Royal. He subsequently became organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Winchester Cathedral. He greatly assisted Dr. Boyce in the production of his "Collection of Cathedral Music," and also wrote many anthems, several being familiar to the congregations of our cathedrals at the present time. He was admitted to be the best player on the organ in his day. B. at Winchester, 1700; D. 1776.

KENT, James, a distinguished American lawyer, who was elected professor of law in Columbia College in 1794; in 1800 he assisted in revising the legal code of New York; and, in 1804, was nominated chief justice of that city. His great work, "Commentaries on American Law," was concluded in 1830, and remains the standard work on the constitutional law of the United States. He was an industrious man and excellent judge. B. at Fredericksburg, New York, 1763; D. 1847.

KENT, His Royal Highness Edward, Duke of the fourth son of George III., received the rudiments of his education in England, but completed it at Göttingen and Hanover. Entering the army at an early age, he became an enthusiastic admirer of military discipline; and having obtained the rank of colonel, he served during the years 1790 and 1791, under General O'Hara, at Gibraltar, where he rendered himself so unpopular by his strictness, that his regiment repeatedly mutinied. On quitting Gibraltar, he was sent to Canada as commander of the forces, after which he was ordered to join the expedition under Sir Charles Grey, against the French West India Islands. During the campaign that ensued, the duke's impetuous bravery was so conspicuous at the head of the flank division, particularly when storming several strong and important posts in Martinique and Guadaloupe, that "the flank corps" became a standing toast at the admiral's table, as well as that of the commander-in-chief. In 1802 his royal highness was appointed governor of Gibraltar; but his determination to repress irregularities, and enforce subordination, led to very disagreeable consequences. Having refused to allow the soldiers to celebrate Christmas Eve as a holiday, and put the deputation who brought the petition under arrest, the men in the garrison became mutinous, and proposed placing General Barnet in command. Christmas Day passed in confusion; and on the following night the prince headed his regiment, and marched against the mutineers. It was some time before they gave up the contest; at length, after blood had been shed, discipline was restored, and the ringleaders were tried by a court-martial; but it was thought prudent to recall the duke, and he accordingly soon after returned to England. On the 20th of May, 1818, the duke of Kent married Victoria Maria Louise, widow of the prince of Leiningen and sister of Leopold, king of the Belgians. The royal pair soon after arrived in England, and on the 24th of May, 1819, the duchess gave birth to a daughter, Victoria, the popular and justly-beloved sovereign of the British Empire. Having accompanied the duchess to Sidmouth, in Devonshire, where he had gone with a view to the re-establishment of her health, the duke caught a violent cold, which, being followed by fever and inflammation, the symptoms increased so rapidly as to defy every effort of medical skill; and after an illness of one week, his royal highness died, Jan. 23, 1820; n. Nov. 2, 1767.

KENTIGERN, or St. Mungo, ken-ti-ger-n, a Scotchman, was the disciple of Palladius, in the 6th century. Camden says he was bishop of Glasgow, and a member of the university of Oxford. He is also said to have founded the monastery of St. Asaph.

KENYON, Lloyd, ken-yon, an eminent English judge, received his education at Ruthin school, in Denbighshire, after which he was articled to an attorney at Nantwich, in Cheshire. After serving his clerkship, he became a member of the society of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761. Having practised as a conveyancer some years, his reputation as a sound lawyer brought him into great notice at the Chancery bar; but his first great rise in the profession took place in 1780, when he led the defence, with Mr. Erskine, for Lord George Gordon. In 1782 Mr. Kenyon was made attorney-general and chief justice of Chester. He was also returned to Parliament for Hindon, in Wiltshire. In 1784 he was appointed master of the Rolls; and on the resignation of the earl of Mansfield in 1783, by the interest of Lord Thurlow, he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, and created Baron Kenyon. As a judge, his lordship conducted himself with strict integrity, and though he was occasionally warm, it was never from petulance, but from his ardent love of justice. Lord Kenyon was correct in his mode of living, and resolutely punished gambling and other fashionable vices, whenever they came before him. Though a stern man, he possessed a kindly nature. One day he passed sentence of death upon a young woman guilty of theft:—she fainted; Lord Kenyon, greatly agitated, cried out, "I don't mean to hang you; will nobody tell her that I don't mean to hang her?" He passed the severest sentences upon duellists. As an English judge, Lord Kenyon was distinguished for his strict administration of justice according to the known laws of the land. His legal learning was exact and profound, and the greater portion of his adjudications are at the present time regarded as of the highest value. He was in private life temperate and frugal, even to parsimony; and, although enormously wealthy, was usually attired in shabby costume; while his equipage was unpretending, even to meanness. At his death he left a fortune of £300,000. n. at Greddington, Flintshire, 1732; n. 1802.

KEPLER, John, kep'-ler, a celebrated German astronomer, received his education at Tübingen, and in 1593 was appointed professor of astronomy at Gratz. In 1600 he went to Bohemia, on a visit to Tycho Brahe, who introduced him to the emperor Rudolph, who appointed him his mathematician. Kepler completed the tables left unfinished by Tycho, who died in the same year, and which he called the Rudolphine Tables. In 1604 he produced the "Supplement to Vitellion," in which appears his theory of dioptries. He was the author of numerous works on astronomy, all of them invaluable contributions to science, besides his Tables and Ephemerides; among others, the "New Astronomy," which contains the great treatise on the Motion of Mars. His fame rests upon his discovery that the planets' orbits are elliptical. The character and career of this magnate of science are thus criticised by Delambre, an eminently reliable authority:—"Kepler," he says, "was ardent, restless, burning to distinguish himself by his discoveries. He attempted everything; and, having once obtained a glimpse, no labour was too severe for him in following or verifying it. All his attempts had not the same success, and, in truth, that was impossible. Those which have failed seem to us only fanciful; those which have been more fortunate appear sublime. When in search of that which really existed, he has sometimes found it; when he devoted himself to the pursuit of a chimera, he could not but fail; but even there he displayed the same qualities, and that obstinate perseverance that must triumph over all difficulties but those which are insurmountable." n. at Wied, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, 1571; n. 1630.

KEPPEL, Augustus, Viscount, kep'-pel, a celebrated English admiral, was the second son of William, earl of Albemarle. He accompanied Commodore Anson in his voyage round the world, and afterwards raised himself to the first honours of his profession. In 1773 he commanded the Channel fleet, and in the same year fell in with the French under Count d'Orvilliers, off Ushant. A partial action ensued, which the English admiral intended to renew on the following morning, but when day dawned the enemy had retired. This affair gave great dissatisfaction to the nation, which was aggravated by Sir Hugh Palliser, second in command, preferring a charge against Admiral Keppel, who was honourably acquitted by a court-martial at Portsmouth. Sir Hugh was then tried and censured. In 1782 Admiral Keppel was raised to the peerage; he subsequently acted on two different occasions as first lord of the Admiralty. n. 1725; n. 1736.

KERN, Conrad, kern, a Swiss statesman, who when the French government insisted on the extradition of Louis Napoleon, now Napoleon III., who was then residing with his mother, Queen Hortense, in the canton of Thurgau, declared that no power had the right to interfere with the exercise of the hospitality that his country thought fit to extend to refugees from other lands. Dr. Kern was the Swiss plenipotentiary for the settlement of the dispute between Prussia and Switzerland, in 1857, and soon after was sent as ambassador to Paris. n. at Berlingen, 1803.

KETTEL, Cornelius, ke'-tel, a Dutch artist, who came to England during the reign of Elizabeth, whose portrait he painted, as well as the portraits of many of the nobility. On his return to Holland he discontinued the use of pencils, and painted with the tips of his fingers, and even with his toes. n. 1602.

KETT, Henry, a divine and an accomplished scholar, was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became Bampton lecturer in 1780, rector of Charlton, &c. He wrote "History the Interpreter of Prophecy," "Elements of General Knowledge," "A Tour to the Lakes," "Emily," a moral tale, &c. n. at Norwich, 1761; drowned, while bathing, 1825.

Kett

KETT, William, ket, a tanner of Norfolk, who, in the reign of Edward VI., excited a revolt against the government. The insurgents, amounting nearly to twenty thousand, marched to Norwich, which they took, and Kett formed a tribunal under a large oak, called the Tree of Reformation. They first protested only against inclosures and the exactions of the nobility and gentry, but they afterwards inveighed against innovations in religion, and demanded the restoration of popery. After defeating the marquis of Northampton, they were routed by the earl of Warwick, and Kett, with several others, was hanged upon the tree of reformation in 1549.

KEULEN, Ludolph van, koi'-len, a Dutch geometrician, who acquired great celebrity by his calculation of the approximate correspondence between the diameter of a circle and its circumference. He taught mathematics at Breda and Amsterdam. d. 1610.

KEULEN, Jansson van, a portrait-painter, who, before Vandeyk came to England, was in great favour with Charles I. Though the latter great painter supplanted him in his profession, a warm friendship subsisted between the two artists. d. 1665.

KER, Thomas Hewitt, ke, a modern English philologist, who, after completing his education at St. John's College, Cambridge, studied medicine at Guy's Hospital, London; but went out to Virginia in 1824, as professor of pure mathematics in the university of that state. Returning to London in 1827, he became Latin professor at the university of London, on the opening of that seat of learning. He afterwards contributed articles on language to the "Journal of Education," the "Penny Cyclopædia," and other works. In 1842 he became head master of the junior school of University College, and was also elected to the chair of comparative grammar. He subsequently wrote articles for Dr. Smith's "Dictionary of Classical Antiquities," and, in 1846, published his Latin Grammar. He was subsequently engaged in writing a "Latin Dictionary" and a "Dictionary of Roots of Languages." n. in London, 1790.

KHERASKOV, Michael, ker'-as-kov, a Russian poet, who published a poem on the use of science, and an epic called the "Rossinda," the subject of which is the conquest of Casan by Ivan Vasilievitch II. He was vice-president of the college of mines, councillor of state, and curator of the university of Moscow. He was also the writer of some tragedies and dramatic pieces. d. 1733; d. 1807.

KILKOR, Prince, kil'-kof, a Russian nobleman, and ambassador to Charles XII., by whom he was thrown into prison when war broke out between Russia and Sweden. In his confinement he wrote an abridgment of the Russian history. He died as he was about to be restored to liberty, after an imprisonment of eighteen years. His work was published in 1770.

KHOSROU, or KHOSRU. (See CROSOUS.)

KIDDER, Richard, kid'-der, a learned English prelate, was a native of Sussex, or, according to some authorities, of Suffolk, and was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship. In 1631 he was made prebend of Norwich; and, in 1639, dean of Peterborough, on which occasion he took his doctor's degree. On the deprivation of Dr. Ken, Kidder was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells and preached the "Boyle lecture" in 1693. He and his wife were killed in their bed at Wells, during the night of the great storm, Nov. 28, 1703. Besides several sermons and religious tracts, he published a valuable work, entitled "The Demonstration of the Messiah," a "Commentary in the Pentateuch," &c.

KIEN-LOONG, ke-en-loong, emperor of China, who succeeded his father, Yung-Tching, in 1735. He wrote some poetical pieces, and when Lord Macartney went to China as ambassador, he gave him some of his verses to present to the king of England. He favoured the missionaries, and was in all respects a very amiable monarch. n. 1709; abdicated 1796; d. 1799.

KIEKINGES, Alexander, kee'-rings, a landscape-painter of Utrecht. His views were copied from nature, and he finished them with amazing patience, even the bark and the fibres of the trees being distinctly marked. n. 1590; d. 1646.

KILBURN, Richard, kil'-burn, an English topographer, who wrote a Survey of the county of Kent, published in 1659.

KILBYE, Richard, kil'-be, an English divine, who, in 1590, was elected rector of Lincoln College, Oxford, and was afterwards made Hebrew professor and prebendary of Lincoln. He was one of the translators of the authorized version of the Bible. d. 1620.—There was another divine of this name, who was minister of Allallows in Derby, and wrote the "Burthen of a sad Conscience," which book went through several editions. d. 1645.

KILLIGREW, Catharine, kil'-li-gru, the wife of Sir Henry Killigrew, of Cornwall, was a lady of great accomplishments, being mistress of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages. She also wrote some poems. n. in Essex, about 1530; d. about 1600.

KILLIGREW, Anne, a beautiful and accomplished English lady, who received a liberal education, distinguished herself in painting, and drew the portraits of the duke and duchess of York; she was also eminent for her piety. Her poems were published in 1638, with an elegiac ode by Dryden prefixed. n. in London, 1660; d. 1635.

KILLIGREW, William, an English dramatic writer, was the son of Sir Robert Killigrew. He received his education at St. John's College, Oxford, after which he went on a course of travel. On his return, he was made governor of Falmouth and of Pendennis Castle. For his adherence to the cause of Charles I. he suffered considerably in his fortune. At the Restoration he was ceding, was the bedchamber to Charles II. He wrote nine plays. He was commonly called King Charles's jester; and had more wit in conversation than in writing. n. 1611; d. 1682.

"Ormasdes; or, Love and Friendship," he wrote "Midnight and Daily Thoughts," in prose and verse, and "The Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court." n. at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605; d. 1693.

KILLIGREW, Henry, brother of the above, in 1642 was made prebendary of Westminster. He suffered much for his loyalty to Charles I. in the civil war, but at the Restoration recovered his prebend, and was appointed master of the Savoy, and rector of Wheathamstead, in Hertfordshire. He wrote "The Conspiracy," a tragedy; and "Pallantus and Eudora," a tragedy. B. 1612; D. 1660.

KILMAINSH, Charles Joseph, kil'-main, an Irishman, who became general in the armies of the French republic. He fought against the English in America, under Lafayette, and was employed as brigadier in the French army sent into La Vendée. He signalized himself in Italy, at Mantua, and at Castiglione, and was nominated commander-in-chief of an army that was to have made a descent upon Ireland; but the expedition was abandoned. He was subsequently placed at the head of the army of Helvetia; but, being unsuccessful, was superseded by General Massena. B. at Dublin, 1754; D. at Paris, 1799.

KILWARDEN, Arthur Wolfe, Lord, kil'-war'-den, chief justice of the King's Bench, in Ireland, was called to the bar in 1766; was afterwards appointed king's counsel, and sat in Parliament. In 1787 he was made solicitor-general, and two years later attorney-general. On the death of Lord Clonmel he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, in which dignity he conducted himself with impartiality and moderation. Notwithstanding this, he fell a victim to a ferocious mob, who dragged him from his coach, with his nephew, the Rev. Richard Wolfe, and barbarously killed them in Thomas Street, Dublin, in 1803. Miss Wolfe, his lordship's daughter, was in the coach, but one of the mob took her under his protection, and conveyed her to a place of safety. The death of the old judge has been portrayed in a popular picture called the "Assassination of Lord Kilwarden."

KIMBURN, Isaac, kim'-ber, an English dissenting divine, who was editor of the "London Magazine" for many years, and wrote the "Life of Oliver Cromwell," the "Life of Bishop Beveridge," the "History of England," and twenty posthumous sermons. B. at Wantage, Berks, 1692; D. in London, 1753.

KIMBURN, Edward, son of the above, was brought up a bookseller, but entered the army, and served in America with some reputation. He succeeded his father as editor of the "London Magazine." B. 1719; D. 1769.

KIMBERLEY, John Wodehouse, Earl of, kim'-ber-le, succeeded his grandfather as Baron Wodehouse in 1846, became under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1852, and was sent as ambassador to St. Petersburg in 1856. In 1858 he resumed his former post in Lord Palmerston's ministry, which he held till 1861. In 1861 he succeeded the Earl of Carlisle as lord-lieutenant of Ireland, retaining office until the fall of Earl Russell's ministry in 1866. On the accession of Mr. Gladstone to office in 1868, he became lord privy seal. B. 1826.

KING, Hon. Peter John Locke, king, a collateral descendant of the eminent John Locke, and an earnest reformer, represented East Surrey from 1847 to 1869. He carried the "Real Estate Charges Act" through parliament in 1854, and in 1856 procured the repeal of about 120 useless statutes. In 1861 he introduced the "Religious Worship Act" for obtaining greater freedom for clergymen of the Church of England in the exercise of their calling, and for several years he has been seeking to alter the law of succession to landed property, making it similar to that which is in force with reference to personal property. B. at Ockham, Surrey, 1811.

KING, Sir Edmund, an English physician and chemist. Charles II. used frequently to amuse himself in his laboratory. He attended that monarch in his last illness, and was ordered one thousand pounds, which he never received. In the "Philosophical Transactions" are some observations by him on ants and the animalcule in pepper; also a paper on transfusing blood from a calf to a sheep. D. unknown when.

KING, Peter, Lord Chancellor of England, His father was a greaser, and intended him for the same business; but a love of learning rendered him superior to trade, and he was suffered to follow his inclination. The philosopher John Locke, who was his maternal uncle, left him half his library at his death, which was of great service to him. By the advice of the same great man he went to Leyden, and, on his return, entered of the Inner Temple, where he applied himself to the study of the law with great assiduity. He also devoted some time to other studies, particularly theology, and in 1691 published anonymously, "An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church, that flourished within the first 300 years after Christ." This work was well received, and soon reached a second edition. In 1699 he was chosen member of parliament for Herekston, in Devonshire. In 1702 appeared his "History of the Apostles' Creed," a book of considerable information. In 1708 he was chosen recorder of London, and knighted. In 1709 he was appointed one of the managers of the House of Commons on the trial of Dr. Sacheverell. At the accession of George I., in 1714, he was made chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and, in 1725, created Lord King, baron of Ockham, in Surrey, and shortly after was appointed lord chancellor. He resigned the seals in 1733. B. at Exeter, 1680; D. 1734.

KING, William, an English writer. In 1718 he was chosen principal of St. Mary Hall, but, on offering himself as a candidate to represent the university, he resigned that place. Being disappointed, he went to Ireland; but how long he remained there is not known. While in Ireland he wrote a satirical poem, entitled "The Toast." In 1749 he spoke the oration in the theatre at Oxford, on the dedication of Radcliffe's library. He was a zealous Tory, and generally considered as disaffected to the Brunswick family, which brought him into discredit. He published several curious tracts of his own, and five volumes of South's Sermons. B. in London, 1685; D. 1763.

KING, John Glen, an English divine, and chaplain to the English factory at St. Petersburg, became medallist to the empress of Russia. He wrote the "Hites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church, containing an account of its Doctrine, Worship, and Discipline;" "Observations on the Climate of Russia and the Northern Countries," and some "Observations on the Barberini Vase." D. 1787.

KING, Thomas, an eminent comedian, received a good education, and was intended for trade, which he renounced for the stage before he was 20. He first rose to fame in Dublin, after which he appeared at Drury-lane Theatre with great success. The principal character which stamped his reputation was that of Lord Ogleby. In dry sarcastic humour no man excelled him. His performance of Sir Peter Teazle, in the "School for Scandal," was admirable. By an unfortunate propensity to gaming, he lost the fruits of many years' professional toil. n. in London, 1730; p. 1805.

KING, Edward, an antiquary, studied at Lincoln's Inn; was called to the bar, and became recorder of Lynn. He was F.R.S. and F.S.A. and produced an excellent work, entitled "Munimenta Antiqua." n. at Norwich, 1735; p. 1807.

KING, Rufus, an American statesman and diplomatist, was entered at Harvard College in 1773; studied the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1778; and was elected a member of Congress in 1784. In 1796 he was appointed by Washington minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James's, the functions of which office he continued to discharge till 1803, when he returned home. In 1813 he was a third time sent to the senate by the legislature of New York; and his speech on the burning of Washington by the English was a most brilliant display of senatorial oratory. In 1816 he lost his election; but in 1820 was once more returned to Congress, and continued a member of that body until the expiration of the term in 1825. He then accepted the appointment of minister plenipotentiary at the court of London; but was taken ill, returned home, and died soon after. n. in Maine, 1755; p. 1827.

KINGLAKE, Alexander William, king'-lake, an English barrister, and author of "Eothen," a celebrated book of Eastern travel. He received his education at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1837. He supplied several articles to the newspapers, during the Crimean war, descriptive of the military and naval operations; he also wrote a short biography of the Hungarian hero, General Gyon, and some papers for the "Quarterly Review." He is now writing a "History of the Crimean War," of which 4 volumes have appeared. n. at Taunton, Devonshire, 1802.

KINGSBOROUGH, Edward, Viscount, kings'-bur-ro, a nobleman distinguished for his literary tastes and attainments, was the author of an excellent work on "The Antiquities of Mexico." He was the eldest son of the third earl of Kingston, and a fellow of the Antiquarian Society. n. 1795; p. 1837.

KINGSLEY, Rev. Charles, king'-le, a distinguished modern novelist and essayist. At 14 years of age he became the pupil of the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, son of the poet: he afterwards went to Cambridge university, where he distinguished himself both in classics and mathematics. He was at first intended for the law, but the church was afterwards chosen. In 1842 he was appointed curate of Eversley, in Hampshire; two years later he succeeded to the same living. He married, about the same time, a daughter of Mr. Grenfell, who represented Truro and Great Marlow in Parliament for many years, and whose other daughter became the wife of the eminent historian J. A. Froude. His first acknowledged contributions to literature were a volume of "Village Sermons," and "The Saint's Tragedy," a drama in verse, published in 1848. "Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet," was his third essay, and, from its first appearance, it commanded the greatest attention. The bold and earnest views of its author—"the Chartist clergyman," as he was called—sank deeply into the public mind. This novel has been several times reprinted; its treatment of social and political questions remaining as fresh and valuable as when the book first came before the public. A second novel,—"Yeast, a Problem," was first published in "Fraser's Magazine," and afterwards reprinted, in 1851: this is a philosophical rather than a political novel. His subsequent works were "Hypania; or New Foes with an Old Face," a beautiful descriptive fiction, illustrating the times of the early Christian church in the East; "Westward Ho! or, the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Amyas Leigh in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth;" and "Two Years Ago." These novels, by their great excellence, have placed their author among the foremost of recent writers. Mr. Kingsley also produced a volume for juvenile reading, called "The Heroes," in which the deeds of some great chiefs of the Grecian mythology are narrated in a captivating manner. Among the more important of his religious writings may be enumerated, "The Message of the Church to Labouring Men," "Sermons on National Subjects, preached in a Village Church," and "Sermons for the Times;" all of these being inspired by a pure, generous, and enlightened Christian feeling. He expounded mental philosophy in his "Phaethon;" or, Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers," and his "Alexandria and her Schools;" while, for natural philosophy and the observation of nature, he contributed his "Glauceus;" or, the Wonders of the Shore." He likewise wrote for "Fraser's Magazine," the "North British Review," and the "Encyclopædia Britannica." His last works of importance are "The Roman and the Teuton," lectures delivered at Cambridge in 1864, and a novel entitled "Hereward the Wake;" or, the Last of the English." A bold, independent, and earnest thinker, Mr. Kingsley, in every one of his popular and excellent works, contributed to elevating the tone of modern society, and to giving it a more enlarged and refined appreciation of the good, beautiful, and true, whether in art or nature. He succeeded Sir James Stephen as professor of modern history in the university of Cambridge in 1859. n. at Holne Vicarage, Devonshire, 1819.

KINGSLEY, Henry, brother of the preceding, was educated at King's College, London, and at Oxford. In 1852 he went to Australia, from which he returned in 1858. He contributed to "Fraser's" and "Macmillan's" magazines; "Ravenshoe," "Geoffrey Hamlyn," and "The Hillyars and the Burlions," being the best known of his productions. n. 1810.

KINGSTON, Elizabeth Chudleigh, duchess of, a celebrated English adventuress, was at first maid of honour to the Princess of Wales, and carried on an intrigue with the duke of Hamilton. She afterwards secretly married Captain Hervey, but separated from him in a short time. Going abroad, she was well received by Frederick the Great at Berlin. On her return to England, she married the Duke of Kingston, who left her a widow, with immense wealth; but the relatives of the duke prosecuted her for bigamy, and stripped her of her title; they could not, however, recover the great wealth which her second husband's will had given her. She went abroad a second time, and succeeded in inspiring Prince Radziwill with a lively impression. n. in Devonshire, 1720; p. near Paris, 1758.

KINKEL, John Godfrey, kin'-kel, a German poet and politician, who, when the revolution of 1848 burst forth on the continent, was professor of philosophy at Bonn, and, declaring himself a partisan of the republicans, was in a few months compelled to fly from Prussia; but, being taken prisoner in Baden, was tried and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He was confined in the celebrated fortress of Spandau, but contrived to effect his escape, and reached England. In 1851 he visited America, but in a short time returned to London, where he established himself as a teacher of the German language and literature. His poetical works are exceedingly popular in Germany. He also wrote several volumes of tales and sketches, a history of painting, sculpture, and architecture, and many other philosophical and historical works. n. at Obercassel, 1815.

KINNAIRD, the Hon. Douglas, kin'-aird, received his early education at Eton, and afterwards passed some time at Göttingen, where he made himself master of the French and German languages. On leaving Göttingen he went to Cambridge, and there became the associate of the first characters of the day. In 1813 he accompanied Mr. Hobhouse (Lord Broughton) in a tour through Sweden, and to Vienna, and was present at the battle of Culm. He became an active partner in the banking-house of Ransom and Morland; and after the old partnership was dissolved, took the principal management of the business. He possessed great energy of mind, was a lover of literature, a liberal patron of the arts, and an intimate friend of Lord Byron. n. 1786; p. 1830.

KIRKPATRICK, Henry, kir'-ping'-tus, a learned German Lutheran, who, after completing his education at the university of Rostock, was pressed for a soldier; but a Swedish councillor of state observing him with a Latin book in his hand, took him from the army, made him his librarian, and procured him the place of sub-rector of the university of Bremen. He wrote a supplement to the "History" of John Pappus; a "Treatise on Roman Antiquities;" and another on the Creation. p. 1678.

KIRKES, Andrew, kir'-pis, an English Unitarian divine and biographical writer, who was educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. His first settlement as a minister was at Boston, in Lincolnshire, in 1746; thence he removed to Dorking, in Surrey, in 1750; and in 1753 became pastor of a congregation in Princes Street, Westminster. He was a writer in the "Monthly Review" for some time, and in 1761 had a share in a periodical work called the "Library." In 1777 he became the editor of the new edition of the "Biographia Britannica," in which capacity he greatly distinguished himself. Five volumes of this work were published in his lifetime, and the greatest part of the sixth was prepared before his death. In 1788 he published the "Life of Captain Cook," in one volume, and the same year, a "Life of Dr. Lardner." Dr. Kippis also wrote the "History of Knowledge," and a variety of other pieces, particularly sermons and tracts. He received the degree of D.D. from the university of Edinburgh, and was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He was an intelligent and industrious writer, and his style is pure and perspicuous. n. at Nottingham, 1725; p. 1795.

KIRBY, John Joshua, kir'-be, an artist, who, though originally only a house-painter, had a good knowledge of art; and on settling in London was introduced by Lord Bute to George III., and in consequence became clerk of the works at Kew, and had the honour of teaching the queen the principles of perspective. He was F.R.S. and F.S.A., and published, at the expense of the king, "The Perspective of Architecture." The celebrated Mrs. Trimmer was his daughter. n. in Suffolk, 1716; p. 1774.

KIRBY, Rev. William, an eminent English naturalist, whose first lessons in natural history were received from his mother, who came of a good Suffolk family, by name Meadows. This estimable woman laid before her youthful son a collection of shells and field-plants, and the early love for nature thus imbibed, lasted throughout Mr. Kirby's life, and led him to become one of the first English naturalists. He received his education at Caius College, Cambridge, and entered upon holy orders in 1782. Up to this period, although he had been a diligent botanical observer, he had paid scarcely any attention to entomology. To this science his notice was attracted by accident. In 1835 he thus described the circumstance in a letter to a friend:—"About half a century since, observing accidentally, one morning, a very beautiful golden bug creeping on the sill of my window, I took it up to examine it, and finding that its wings were of a more yellow hue than was common to my observation of these insects before, I was anxious carefully to examine any other of its peculiarities; and finding that it had twenty-two beautiful clear black spots upon its back, my captured animal was imprisoned in a bottle of gin, for the purpose, as I supposed, of killing him. On the following morning, anxious to pursue my observation, I took it again from the gin, and laid it on the window-sill to dry, thinking it dead; but the warmth of the sun very soon revived it; and hence commenced my further pursuit of this branch of natural history." From this period he became an earnest student of entomology. In 1798 he was nominated one of the original members of the Linnean Society, to which, in 1793, he forwarded his first paper, entitled, "A Description of three New Species of Hilaria." He furnished to the "Transactions" of the same learned body a succession of valuable papers during the ensuing four years. In 1802 he published his first separate work, "A Monograph concerning English Bees," which, from the novelty of its observations, and the lucid style in which they were conveyed, excited the liveliest interest in the entomological world. In 1805 he made the acquaintance of Mr. Spence, and the friendship subsisting between these two gentlemen led to the production of a work on natural history, which ranks among the best contributions to popular science in the English language. This was the celebrated "Introduction to Entomology," which model scientific work was completed in 1826. In 1830, when 70 years of age, he wrote his "Habits and Instincts of Animals," one of the well-known Bridgewater treatises. Mr. Kirby also wrote the descriptions of insects contained in Captain Parry's "Voyage for the Discovery of the Northwest Passage," and likewise those found in the "Zoology of the Northern Parts of British North America." In addition to these, he, throughout his long life, furnished many of the learned societies with papers on his favourite study. He was honorary president of the Entomological Society, fellow of the Royal and Geographical Societies, and corresponding member of many scientific bodies on the continent and in the United States. His life, written by the Rev.

Kirch

John Freeman, was published in 1852. n. in Suffolk, 1759; p. 1850.

KIRCH, Mary Margaret, keersh, a learned German lady, distinguished for her skill in astronomy. She married M. Godfrey Kirch, an astronomer, and assisted him in his observations, and in the calculation of his Ephemerides. When the king of Prussia founded the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, in 1700, M. Kirch was appointed astronomer, with a pension. There his lady acquired the friendship and admiration of many learned men. In 1702 she discovered a comet, of which her husband published the observations. In 1707 she made a discovery of a remarkable aurora borealis, of which mention was made by the Academy of Sciences at Paris. In 1711 she published a discourse on the approaching conjunction of Saturn, Jupiter, &c. n. near Leipsic, 1670; p. at Berlin, 1720.

KIRSCH, Conrad, keersh'-er, a Protestant divine of Augsburg, who, in 1602, published a Greek Concordance of the Old Testament, inserting therein the Hebrew words alphabetically, and under them the corresponding Greek words.

KIRCHMAN, N., keersh'-man, a Russian professor of philosophy, celebrated for his electrical experiments, and particularly for the manner of his death. Being engaged near St. Petersburg in attracting, with apparatus, the electric fluid from the clouds, a ball of fire struck him on the head and killed him on the spot, in 1763.

KIRK, Colonel, kirk, an English officer, notorious for his brutality. Being sent against the followers of the duke of Monmouth in 1685, he committed great barbarities in the west of England. James II. solicited him to turn Catholic, but Kirk roughly replied, "that when he was at Tangiers he had promised the dey that, if he ever changed his religion, he would turn Mohammedau." He afterwards served in the army of William III. n. at the close of the 17th century.

KIRKALDY, Sir William, of Grange, kir'-ka-de, a distinguished military leader in the time of Mary Queen of Scots. He originally adhered to the party known as the Lords of the Congregation, but subsequently attached himself to secretary Maitland, the leader of the partisans of queen Mary. Kirkaldy, after a chequered career, having learned the military art on the continent, where he gained the reputation of being one of the most skilful leaders of the day, and taken a prominent part in the troubles in his native country consequent on the Reformation, was ultimately executed at Edinburgh, in 1573.

KIRKLAND, Thomas, kirk'-land, an eminent physician, who published an "Enquiry into the State of Medical Surgery," a "Treatise on Child-bed Fevers," "Thoughts on Amputation," and a "Commentary on Apoplectic and Paralytic Affections." n. 1771; p. at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, 1798.

KIRKLAND, Mrs. Caroline Stansbury, an American novelist, and the wife of Mr. William Kirkland, a critic of some celebrity in the United States, was engaged, in 1847, to edit "Sartain's Magazine," which was published first at New York, and afterwards at Philadelphia. Subsequently, Professor Hart became her assistant in the direction of that periodical. Her principal works, for the most part characterized by an acute perception, richness of observation, and a light and somewhat sarcastic turn of thought, are "The New Home," published in 1839; "Forest Life," published in 1842; "Western Clearings;" "Essay on the Life and Writings of Spenser;" "Holidays Abroad, or Europe from the West;" and "The Evening Book;" these latter appearing at intervals of about two years. She was also the authoress of a volume designed for youthful reading, entitled "A Book for the Home Circle." n. at New York, about 1815.

KIRKPATRICK, James, kirk'-pa-trik, a skilful orientalist, was a major-general in the British service, and passed a great part of his life in India. He published a "Description of the Kingdom of Nepal," a "Biography of Persian Poets," and the "Letters of Tippoo Saib." p. 1812.

KIRSTENIUS, Peter, ker'-ste'-ni-us, an eminent physician, and professor of medicine at Upsal, in Sweden. In addition to his native tongue, he is said to have understood twenty-five other languages. n. at Breslau, Silesia, 1577; p. 1641.

KIRWAN, Richard, kir'-wan, a chemical philosopher, who shortly after concluding his education at the Jesuits' College of St. Omer's, inherited his family estate, and thenceforth devoted his life to chemical science. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1780, and was subsequently nominated president of the Royal Irish Academy. He was also a member of nearly all the learned societies in Europe. His chief works were "An Essay on the Constitution of Acids," "Geological Essays," and "An Essay on the Analysis of Chemical Waters." n. in Ireland, about 1750; p. 1812.

KIRWAN, Walter Blake, an Irish divine, eminent for his popularity as a preacher, was educated at St. Omer's and Louvain; took orders as a Catholic priest; and, in 1773, was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy in London. In 1787 he became a convert to the principles of the Anglican church, and obtained successively the prebendary of Howth, the living of St. Nicholas, in Dublin, and the deanery of Killala. As a pulpit orator he excelled all his contemporaries; so great, indeed, were his attractions, that we are told it was often necessary to keep off the crowds, by guards and palisades, from the churches in which he was preaching. It was natural, therefore, that his exertions in favour of charitable institutions should be in great request, and that he should succeed in an astonishing manner in augmenting their funds. A volume of his sermons was published after his death. n. at Galway, 1754; p. 1805.

KISS, Augustus, kiss, a German artist, who studied under Rauch, the eminent sculptor, and first attracted notice by his colossal group, the "Amazon attacked by a Tiger," which was cast in bronze by public subscription in Germany. A copy of this work formed one of the chief attractions in the Great Exhibition of 1851. He was professor of sculpture in the Royal Academy of Berlin; his fame as an artist, however, is greater in that city than elsewhere. n. at Pless, Upper Silesia, 1802; p. 1865.

KITCHENER, William, kid'-che'-er, a physician and miscellaneous writer, the son of a respectable coal-merchant in London, who left him a large fortune, was educated at Eton, and settled in London as a physician; but he distinguished himself far more by his precepts on the art of gastronomy, than by the practice of medicine. He wrote a book, under the title of "The Cook's Oracle," in which the laws of the culinary art, professedly founded on his own practice, were promulgated; and, by appointing a "committee of taste" among his friends, who had regular invitations to his dinner-table, the fame of this epicure spread far and wide, while his evening conversaciones were the resort of privileged wits and literary bon vivants. He was a great stickler for punctuality; and, for the regulation of these meetings, a placard was fixed over the chimney-piece, with this inscription, "At seven come, at eleven go," to which the factious George Colman once added the word "it," making the last sentence, "at eleven go it!" He strongly condemned many of the ordinary methods of cooking, preserving, &c.; and in one instance, after giving an elaborate recipe for preparing pickles, finished by advising that the "whole mess should be thrown out of the window"—a recommendation which, considering how such preparations are usually got up now-a-days, was not an injudicious one. Optics and music were also particular objects of Kitchener's study; and on these and other subjects he displayed a very commendable amount of research. Besides "The Cook's Oracle," which was his most popular work, he published "The Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life," "The Economy of the Eyes," "The Traveller's Oracle," "Observations on Vocal Music," and "The Loyal and National Songs of England." n. about 1775; p. 1827.

KITTO, John, kit'-to, a modern English writer, chiefly known as the editor of "Knight's Pictorial Bible," who in his earlier years displayed great aptitude for acquiring knowledge. His father had been a respectable builder, but was reduced to the condition of a journeyman mason, in which labour young Kitto assisted him. In his thirteenth year, he had the misfortune to fall from a high scaffold, and, after suffering for some time from the injuries received, remained permanently deaf. Owing to the intemperate habits of his parent, some years were spent by Kitto in great destitution. He contrived to acquire knowledge, however, and, in 1823, contributed some essays to the "Plymouth Journal;" and in the following year Mr. Grove, a dentist of the town, took him into his service. He was afterwards sent out, as a printer, to Malta, having previously been taught the trade in the Missionary College at Islington. His constitution being too weak for this work, he returned to England in 1829, and, in the same year, accompanied Mr. Grove in an extensive Eastern tour. He visited St. Petersburg, Astrakan, the Calmuck Tartars, the Caucasus, Armenia, Persia, and Bagdad, returning home in 1833. In that year he obtained an introduction to Mr. Charles Knight, by whom he was subsequently engaged to edit the "Pictorial Bible," the "Pictorial History of Palestine," and other works. He also wrote for the same publisher, "The Lost Senses—Deafness and Blindness," &c. He likewise wrote for Messrs. Oliphant, of Edinburgh, a work entitled "Daily Bible Illustrations," in 8 vols., being readings on passages of Scripture for each day for two years, in which he displayed a minute acquaintance with the manners, customs, and antiquities of the East. He was attacked by a paralytic stroke in 1854, and became greatly embarrassed in his means. A pension of £100 per annum was accorded him in 1850, whereupon he retired to Germany to recruit his health. n. at Plymouth, 1804; p. at Cannstadt, Wirtemberg, 1854. A "Memoir" of the military college of Vienna, and served, in various grades, with the Austrian army; but, on the outbreak of the Hungarian revolution, in 1848, he offered his sword to his countrymen. In 1849 he distinguished himself in the Hungarian defence of the fortress of Comorn, before which the Austrian army was defeated, with the loss of 30 pieces of artillery, 3000 muskets, large stores of ammunition, and 2000 head of cattle. General Klapka communicated the news of his victory to Kossuth and Görgei, but the latter had by that time capitulated, while the former had fled into Turkey. He, however, made terms with Haynau, the Austrian general, by which all the gallant defenders received a safe-conduct to go whither they pleased. He went first to England, and afterwards to Switzerland. He published, in 1850, "Memoirs of the War of Independence in Hungary." On the outbreak of the Crimean war, Klapka went to the East; and on his return, after the taking of Sebastopol, he produced a work, entitled "The War in the East, from the Year 1853 to July, 1855." n. at Temeswar, in Southern Hungary, 1850.

KLAPROTH, Martin Henry, klap'-rot, an eminent German chemist, who greatly advanced the science of mineralogy by his discoveries; and, for his distinguished services as an analytical chemist, was, in 1778, elected member of the Berlin Academy of Sciences; he had previously been appointed professor of chemistry in the Royal Mining Institute. In addition to 207 treatises on mineralogy and chemistry, he published a "Chemical Dictionary," in conjunction with Professor Wolff. n. at Wernigerode, Upper Saxony, 1743; p. at Berlin, 1817.

KLAPROTH, Julius Heinrich von, a distinguished German Oriental scholar, was the son of the preceding, who desired to educate him for his own profession; but he evinced little inclination for chemistry, or, indeed, for any science. When about fifteen, he was examined with his fellow-pupils of the college of Berlin; but was found so backward in his studies, that one of the professors cried out, "Why, you know nothing at all!" "Beg your pardon," he answered, "I know Chinese." It was subsequently discovered that he had learnt Chinese without any assistance whatever; and his father becoming reconciled to his son's pursuing his favourite studies, he was sent, in 1801, to the university of Halle to acquire the classical languages. His fame as an Oriental scholar led to his being employed by the emperor Alexander of Russia. He went to St. Petersburg in 1805, and, after receiving several marks of favour, was sent as interpreter in the suite of the ambassador to China. The embassy had not proceeded more than 200 miles across the Chinese frontier, when they were detained, and finally informed by messengers from Peking, that the court did not wish to see them. Klaproth did not return direct to the Russian capital with the other members of the embassy, but travelled alone through Southern Siberia. In 1807 he arrived at St. Petersburg, and was soon afterwards sent to the Caucasian provinces on a scientific mission. He came back, with a large store of knowledge, in 1809. He went to Berlin in 1811, avowedly for the purpose of superintending the casting of types for the printing of his Chinese books; but it was generally known at the time, that he had incurred the displeasure of the czar. The following year he resigned his Russian appointments. After wandering about Germany for some time, he visited Napoleon, for whom he had great admiration, in exile at Elba. The emperor promised him an appointment, which he afterwards forgot to fulfil. Klapproth was after this reduced to straitened circumstances, but, through the influence of Wilhelm von Humboldt, he became royal professor of Oriental languages and literature to the king of Prussia, a post which was accompanied by a liberal pension. Klapproth was, moreover, allowed to live in Paris: there he commenced the publication of a long list of works on Oriental learning, of the greatest possible value, which it is said would fill more than thirty volumes. At his death, he left behind, "A Geographical, Statistical, and Historical Description of the Empire of China," intended to be published in French and English. Klapproth was one of the greatest linguists that ever existed. b. at Berlin, 1733; d. at Paris, 1835.

KLEBER, Jean Baptiste, Klaiv'-bair, a French general, was educated as an architect, and sent to Paris for improvement in his profession. Being in a coffee-house where some strangers were insulted, he took their part with so much spirit, that they prevailed on him to accompany them to Munich, where Kaunitz, son of the Austrian minister, gave him a lieutenancy in his regiment. After eight years' service, he returned to his own country, and became inspector of public buildings in Upper Alsace. The revolution in France rekindled his military ardour, and he obtained a commission in the republican army. He displayed great skill and bravery at the siege of Mayence, after which he was employed in La Vendée; but the sanguinary scenes enacted there so disgusted him, that he obtained his recall, and was engaged in the north, where he defeated the Austrians, took Mons, and drove the enemy from Louvain; he also captured Maestricht, and contributed to the taking of Düsseldorf and Frankfort, and to the victory of Butzbaeh. Discontented with the Directory, he left the army, and returned to Paris, where he led a private life, writing his "Military Memoirs," till Bonaparte, being appointed general of the army of Egypt, chose Kleber as his companion. At the siege of Alexandria he was wounded in the head, while scaling the ramparts, but did not retire till he received a second wound. He defeated the Turks in several actions, and Bonaparte, on quitting Egypt, left Kleber in the chief command. Soon afterwards he signed the treaty of El-Arish with Sir Sidney Smith, by which the French agreed to leave Egypt; but it was annulled by the British government, and hostilities were renewed. Kleber, though greatly reduced, opposed to his unfavourable circumstances a determined mind, and defeated the Turks at the obelisk of Heliopolis. He next took Cairo by storm, and formed an alliance with Murad Bey; but was assassinated by a Turkish fanatic at Cairo in 1800. b. at Strasburg, where there is a statue to his memory, 1754.

KLEIN, Johann Theodor, kline, a German naturalist, who published a "Natural History of Fishes and of Birds." He was also secretary to the senate of Dantzic. b. at Königsberg, 1635; d. 1750.

KLEIST, Ewald Christian de, kliste, a Prussian officer and poet, who served under Frederick II.; and, although he only cultivated literature during the leisure allowed by his military employments, acquired a great poetical reputation. He published, in 1758, a collected edition of his poems. He likewise wrote some reflections on the art of war, which appeared in 1750. b. at Zeblin, Pomerania, 1715; killed at the battle of Kunnersdorf, 1759.

KLEIST, Henry, a German dramatic author, who served for some time in the Prussian army, but was afterwards employed at Berlin in a civil capacity. His most celebrated play is "Catherine of Heilbronn;" he also wrote poems and a collection of stories. b. 1777; d. 1811.

KLEIST, Emilius Frederick, Count, a distinguished Prussian officer, who, having risen by ability and courage to the rank of general, commanded a corps of Prussians, in 1812, as auxiliaries to Napoleon's grand army; and afterwards, when Prussia threw off the domination of Bonaparte, signalized himself in the battle of Bautzen, May 20, 1813; and was one of the plenipotentiaries who concluded the armistice. After the retreat of the allied troops from Dresden into Bohemia, Kleist gave battle to the army under Vandamme, and by his victory at the village of Nollendorf saved Bohemia, against which Napoleon had directed his best energies. He was afterwards known by the affix of "von Nollendorf." b. at Berlin, 1762; d. 1821.

KLENZE, Leo von, Klaiv'-tse(r), a distinguished German architect, studied his profession at Berlin, and afterwards went on a tour in France and Italy. While at Genoa he became acquainted with a distinguished lover of art, who introduced him to Jerome, king of Westphalia, whose court architect he became. In 1813 he went to Munich, and there attracted the notice of Ludwig, crown prince, and afterwards king, of Bavaria, who invited him to stay in that city, and appointed him court architect. Ludwig was a great lover of classical architecture, in which Klenze excelled, and he commissioned his protégé to prepare designs for the Walhalla, or Hall of Heroes, and for the Glyptothek; these works however, were not commenced till after Ludwig had ascended the throne of Bavaria. This event took place in 1825, and from that time Klenze was constantly employed in designing one great structure after another, to adorn the great art-capital, Munich. The Glyptothek was finished in the year 1830, the Walhalla being commenced immediately afterwards. He was about the same time appointed president of the council for buildings, a privy councillor, and raised to noble rank. He subsequently built the War Office, the Odeon, the palace of Prince Maximilian, and two new wings to the palace of the king, the street in Munich called "Linden-strasse," and many edifices, public and private. He was likewise the architect of the New Imperial Museum at St. Petersburg. In 1834 he was invited to Athens to improve King Otho's capital. On his return he published a series of designs of Greek architecture. He was a member of almost every artistic academy in Europe. b. at Hildesheim, 1784; d. 1864.

KLINGENSTIERNA, Samuel, kling'-en-ste-air'-na, a Swedish mathematician, who was intended for the profession of the law, but abandoned that pursuit for mathematics. He made a tour of study in Germany and France, between the years 1727 and 1730, and, soon after his return, was appointed professor of mathematics, and tutor to the prince-royal of Sweden. In 1762 was published, at St. Petersburg, a treatise on the means of correcting the aberration of light in achromatic telescopes, a valuable scientific contribution which the Swedish astronomer had sent to the Russian capital. He afterwards made a number of experiments on the same subject, transmitting an account of them to England. These papers enabled Mr. Dollond to discover a combination of flint and crown-glass lenses, which, by correcting the aberration of light in the chromatic telescope, greatly improved that valuable philosophical instrument. He published an edition of Euclid's "Elements," a Swedish translation of Muschenbroek's "Treatise on Physics," and two scientific discourses. He was a member of the Royal Societies of Upsal, of Stockholm, and of London. n. at Tollfors, near Linköping, 1689; p. at Stockholm, 1795.

KLINGER, Frederick Maximilian von, kling'-er, an officer in the Russian service, and a literary character, commenced his career as a dramatic writer; but, in the war of the Bavarian succession, entered the military service, and was made a lieutenant in the Austrian army. In 1780 he went to St. Petersburg, and was appointed an officer and reader to the czarévitch Paul, with whom he afterwards travelled through Poland, Austria, Italy, France, &c., and, in the reign of Catherine, rose to the rank of colonel. He was made major-general, and director of the corps of cadets by his former pupil; and, when Alexander ascended the throne, received other offices and further promotion; and spent 40 years in the Russian service. His works, which are of a peculiar character, and written in an exaggerated style, form 12 volumes. n. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1758; p. 1831.

KLINGSTADT, kling'-stat, an eminent miniature painter, who excelled in making designs for snuff-boxes, for which he received extravagant prices. n. at Aliga, 1657; p. at Paris, 1734.

KLOPPSTOCK, Frederick Gottlieb, klop'-stok, a distinguished German poet. While at school, during his earlier years, his poetical talents were evinced, and he formed the idea of writing a long epic poem. He received a classical education at Naumburg, and studied theology at Jena, in 1745. Three years afterwards, he commenced his epic poem, the subject being "The Messiah." He at first published only three cantos of the work, and the reception they received was very extraordinary: while they were universally read, the author was regarded by some as a modern type of the old prophet, and by the rest as an irreverent and presumptuous writer upon a sacred subject. In 1760 he went to Switzerland, where he was received as a great poet. The Danish minister Bernstorff having read the three cantos of Klopstock's poem, invited the poet to Copenhagen, offering him a pension of 400 dollars, in consideration of his residing in that city and there finishing his epic. In 1751 he set out for Copenhagen, and was received with the greatest respect; subsequently, he accompanied the king, Frederick V., on his travels. In 1754 he settled in Hamburg, where he married. He resided in several parts of Germany during the remaining years of his life, and completed his "Messiah" at Hamburg, in 1771. Besides that epic poem, he wrote odes, dramas, and other poetical pieces; but his writings are not now held in that extraordinary estimation which was formerly the case. n. at Quedlinburg, 1724; p. 1803.

KMETZ, George, met'-e, a Hungarian general, who studied at the Protestant college of Presburg; but, by a mistake, lost a German scholarship it had been his ambition to obtain. Thereupon he entered the Austrian army as a private soldier; and when the Hungarian revolution broke forth, in 1848, he had attained the grade of commissioned officer. Throughout the great struggle maintained by his countrymen in their efforts to gain independence, he figured as a brave and scientific officer; but when Görgei surrendered, with the entire corps under his command, Kmetz fled into Turkey, where he became a Mussulman, and adopted the name and title of Ismail Pacha. At the memorable defence of Kars he commanded the Turkish army; and his bravery and skilful dispositions contributed in a great measure to the repulse which the Russian army at first sustained. n. in Hungary, 1810; p. in London, 1865.

KNAPTON, George, nup'-ton, an English portrait-painter in crayons, was the pupil of Richardson, and surveyor and keeper of the king's pictures. n. 1693; p. at Kensington, 1778.

KNELLER, Sir Godfrey, nell'-er, an eminent painter, was educated at Leyden for the military profession, but having a strong inclination for drawing, resolved to apply himself to painting. He studied first under Rembrandt, and afterwards went to Rome, at which place he greatly improved himself, and then visited England, where he soon acquired unrivalled distinction as an artist, becoming state painter to Charles II. and James II. William III. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and the university of Oxford the degree of LL.D. He painted a prodigious number of portraits of illustrious personages, and to a striking likeness he always added grace and elegance in his subjects. He was created a baronet by George I., and the emperor Leopold gave him a patent of nobility. n. at Lubbeck, 1618; p. in London, 1726.

KNIBB, Rev. William, nib, a distinguished Baptist missionary, was originally apprenticed to a printer at Bristol, but offered, on the death of his brother, to supply his place as a teacher of a Baptist school in Jamaica; and having repaired thither in 1824, was in 1829 appointed pastor of the mission church at Falmouth, where his efforts to ameliorate the condition of the negroes were rewarded by their gratitude towards him. But these very efforts excited such hostility among the planters, overseers, and others in the slave-holding interest, that when in 1832 a formidable slave insurrection was threatened, Mr. Knibb was not only compelled, despite his sacred calling, to serve in the militia, but was treated with marked indignity, and shortly afterwards arrested for having instigated the threatened rebellion. He was, however, released, there being no evidence against him; but his chapel and mission premises having been burnt down during the disturbances, Knibb resolved to proceed to England to explain all the circumstances connected with his mission, and in a series of harangues all over the country, boldly advocated the entire and immediate abolition of slavery; and had no unimportant share in bringing about the Emancipation Act of 1833. In 1834 he once more returned to Jamaica, where he vigilantly watched the operation of the new act, exposed the evils of the apprenticeship system, raised subscriptions for building new churches, founded schools, and after ten years spent in these and similar undertakings, he was suddenly seized with yellow fever, and died at the village of Kettering, in Jamaica, Nov. 15, 1845. B. at Kettering, Northamptonshire, near the opening of the 19th century.

Knight, Samuel, mite, a learned English divine, who was educated at St. Paul's School, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge. He obtained several church preferments, and was chaplain to George II. He wrote the lives of Dr. Colet and Erasmus. D. 1748.

Knight, Edward, an eminent comic actor, whose Tim, in "Wild Oats," was esteemed a chaste and natural delineation. He ^{long} performed at Drury-lane Theatre and at the Lyceum, but was ultimately compelled by ill-health to quit the stage. B. in Birmingham, 1774; D. 1826.

Knight, Gowin, an English physician and philosopher, was educated at Oxford, and practised in London. He did not, however, succeed well in his profession, at least it would appear so, as it is said that, having fallen into distress, he applied to Dr. Fortingale, who, after hearing his statement, gave him a cheque for a thousand guineas and told him to go home, and set his heart at rest. Dr. Knight published "An Attempt to demonstrate that all the Phenomena in Nature may be explained by Attraction and Repulsion."

Knight, Thomas, an actor and dramatic writer, was intended for the profession of the law, but having received lessons in oratory from Macklin, he imbibed a taste for the stage, became an actor, and was a favourite with the public, particularly in rustic characters and flippant coxcombs. He wrote "The Honest Thieves," "The Turnpike Gate," and several other dramatic pieces. B. in Dorsetshire; D. 1820.

Knight, Richard Payne, an English philologist and writer on art. In his earlier years, his health being very delicate, his father would not allow him to be sent to school, but instructed him in the rudiments of knowledge at home. He was not allowed to study either Latin or Greek, but on the death of his father he went to a grammar-school near his native place, and there made considerable progress in the former language. When he had attained to the age of 18, he began to learn the Greek language, and this pursuit, combined with the investigation of Grecian plastic art, became his chief occupation throughout his after years. He subsequently visited Italy, where he imbibed a strong taste for the fine arts. On the death of his grandfather, he inherited a considerable estate near Ludlow. In 1780 he was sent to Parliament as member for the borough of Leominster, and in 1784 was returned for Ludlow. He became a trustee of the British Museum in 1814; ten years afterwards, he bequeathed his magnificent collection of antique art, estimated to be worth £50,000, to the Museum. Mr. Knight wrote many works on Greek literature, some of which were devoted to the task of proving that the Homeric poems are the production of a single individual. (See HOMER.) He also published "An Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste," and a great number of volumes on fine-art subjects. B. at Wormesley Grange, Hereford, 1750; D. 1824.

Knight

Knight, Henry Gally, M.P., a distinguished traveller and accomplished virtuoso and antiquary, who, soon after succeeding to his father's estates in Nottinghamshire, in 1808, set out on a course of extensive travel in Spain, Sicily, Greece, the Holy Land, &c.; and on his return published an account of his tour. In 1814 he gave to the world a poem, entitled "Europa Rediviva;" which was followed at different intervals by "Phrosyne, a Grecian Tale," "Alastor, an Arabian Tale," and "Hannibal in Bithynia." Mr. Knight's chief title to fame consists, however, in the zeal with which he devoted himself to the investigation of architectural history both at home and abroad; and the fruits of which he published in an "Architectural Tour in Normandy," "The Normans in Sicily," and his last and greatest work, the "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy," &c. He was a member of the commission for the advancement of the fine arts, and his best encouragement was always given to the cultivation of literature and art. In 1824 he was for a short period M.P. for Aldborough; in 1830 he represented Malton, and from 1835 to 1846 sat for the northern division of Nottinghamshire. B. 1766; D. 1846.

Knight, Charles, a modern English author and publisher, distinguished for his services as a projector and producer of cheap and valuable literature. His father had for many years conducted business as a bookseller at Windsor, and on his death Charles Knight succeeded him. He for some time published the "Etonian," a periodical which contained the contributions of the best scholars educated in the great public school of that town. The success of this work encouraged Mr. Knight to establish in the metropolis a magazine on a more ambitious plan. This was the origin of "Knight's Quarterly Magazine," to which Macaulay, then a young man fresh from college, contributed. Mr. Knight next published the "Penny Magazine," "Penny Cyclopædia," in 1827, and other works, unique in their day for extensive, exact, and generally excellent contents, no less than for the lowness of price at which they were issued to the public. An exceedingly large circulation was obtained for these productions, which were admirably suited at once to gratify the intellectual appetite of thousands of readers, and to stimulate their minds into a desire for more of the same character. Mr. Knight also published many more works of a like value; such as the "Pictorial History of England," the "Pictorial Bible," the "Pictorial Shakspeare," and the "English Cyclopædia." Lord Brougham, Mr. Lane, Professor Long, and many other eminent men, wrote treatises, &c., for "Knight's Shilling Volumes," which, for some time, appeared weekly. Mr. Knight was himself an agreeable writer, and reprinted his contributions to various periodicals, under the title of "Once upon a Time," "The Old Printer and the Modern Press," &c. His Life of Shakspeare is without a superior in English literature; while the notes to his edition of the same poet are generally admired for their good sense and learning. Among his numerous works we must not omit to men-

Mr. Knight is also the editor of the "British Almanac and Companion." n. 1791.

KNOLLER, Martin von, not-ler, a distinguished German artist of the eighteenth century, was the son of a painter of some sort, but in a very humble position, and who designed his son for a like pursuit, but had to use him in a menial capacity, which, not being agreeable to the boy, he ran away, but was compelled to return to his native village of Steinach, in the Tyrol. Here he continued to assist his father, practise his art, and aid in household duties till about twenty years of age, when the painter, Paul Troger, happened to see some of his performances, and took him with him to Vienna. His progress was very rapid, and in 1763 he obtained the prize of the Austrian Academy for historical painting. He visited Rome in 1755, where he spent three years, and greatly improved his style. He then went to Naples, where he was employed by the Austrian ambassador in decorating his palaces there and at Milan. Knoller paid several other visits to Rome, and contracted a close intimacy with Winkelmann and Mengs; but he finally settled at Milan, where he married, and had a large family. He was ennobled at Vienna, by Maria Theresa. His works are very numerous, and are to be found in most of the leading towns in Germany, the Tyrol, and Austrian Italy. He was gay in colouring, correct in design, and his works are distinguished for their dramatic and effective composition, strong expression, and vigorous and uncommon attitudes. He painted history, sacred subjects, portraits, &c., and worked both in oil and fresco. n. 1725; p. 1804.

KNOLLIS, Richard, nole, an English historian, who in 1664, became fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, and afterwards master of the grammar-school at Sandwich, in Kent. He wrote the "History of the Turks," of which there have been several editions and continuations, particularly by Nicaut. Knollis also wrote the "Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings," a "Discourse of the Greatness of the Turkish Empire," and a "Compendium of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Grammar." n. about 1510; p. in Kent, 1610.

KNOLLIS, Sir Robert, an English commander in the reign of Edward III., was of a humble family in Cheshire, but being of an enterprising disposition, obtained the rank of general and the honour of knighthood. His name was formidable in France, where he took several places. He was made grand-seneschal of Guienne, and by his prudence quelled an insurrection in that province. At the close of life he retired to his estate in Kent, where he built Rochester bridge. n. 1317; p. 1407.

KNOLLIS, Sir Francis, not-lie, an English statesman, who received a university education, went to court, and became a zealous partisan of the Reformation in the reign of Edward VI., at whose death he went abroad. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned, and was made a privy councillor, and vice-chamberlain of the household. He was also employed in several important matters of state. He was one of the commissioners who sat in judgment on Mary queen of Scots; was appointed treasurer of the royal household, and knight of the Garter. He wrote a "Treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops," printed in 1608. p. 1596.

KNOWLES, James Sheridan, nole, a modern English play writer, whose first effort at dramatic composition was made at the early age of 12 years. Two years afterwards he wrote an opera entitled the "Chevalier de Crillon," and a ballad called the "Welsh Harper." These were quickly followed by a tragedy and a drama. After becoming acquainted with Hazlitt, who gave him much good advice relative to his studies, and whom Knowles terms his "mental father," the young playwright removed to Dublin, where he soon afterwards appeared on the stage, but without success. In 1800 he was engaged as an actor and vocalist in the Waterford Theatre, and, Edmund Kean having joined the company, Knowles wrote a play called "Leo the Gipsy," in which Kean enacted the principal part. He published, about the same time, a volume of poetical "Fugitive Pieces." He next became a teacher of elocution at Belfast, and there produced a play called "Brian Boroihme," which was very successful. "Caius Gracchus" was also played at the same theatre, and with the greatest success. His tragedy of "Virginius" was first produced at Glasgow, and, on being performed at Covent Garden Theatre, in 1820, its author became an established writer for the stage. During the succeeding twenty years he continued to write tragedies, dramas, and comedies with great industry, and enjoyed the very highest reputation as a dramatist. The best of these plays were the "Hunchback," the "Wife, a tale of Mantua," the "Love Chase," "Love," "William Tell," and the "Rose of Aragon." In 1817 he produced a novel called "Fortescue," and later, "George Lovel," but these were very inferior to his dramatic works. In 1819 the government granted him a pension of £200 a year. Mr. Knowles subsequently became a Baptist minister, and wrote several sermons and a couple of controversial works, called the "Rock of Rome, or the Arch-heresy," and the "Idol demolished by its own Priest," n. at Cork, 1784; p. 1862.

KNOX, John, noz, a bookseller in London, who wrote a "Systematic View of Scotland," and planned a herring-fishery and settlement on its N.E. coast. p. 1790.

KNOX, John, the celebrated Scotch reformer, received his education at the university of St. Andrew's, and entered into priest's orders before he had attained his 25th year; but an examination of the writings of St. Augustine and Jerome is said to have occasioned his renunciation of popery. Being accused of heresy before Cardinal Beaton, he addressed to that prelate a confession of faith, which was condemned. The doctrines of the Reformed religion rapidly spread throughout Scotland. Cardinal Beaton, a determined supporter of the Romish church, was murdered. Knox shortly afterwards began to preach the new faith openly from the pulpit. The French fleet, with a considerable body of troops, appeared, in 1547, before St. Andrew's, and made prisoners of Knox and the other reformers who had defended the place. Knox was afterwards condemned to the galleys at Rouen, and remained there nineteen months. After his liberation, he went to England, where he was well received and made chaplain to Edward VI., who offered him a bishopric, which he declined, being averse to episcopacy and the common prayer. In the reign of Mary he went to Frankfort, where he preached the new doctrines to the English exiles. Being accused to the emperor as a seditious person, he retired to Geneva, where he was greatly esteemed by Calvin, to whose doctrines he was zealously attached. He there wrote his "Blast of a Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women." In 1559 he returned to his native country, and commenced his ministerial office at Edinburgh by denouncing the acts of the queen and the clergy. His sermons produced a general commotion, and the Roman Catholic cathedrals and parish churches were not only deprived of their ornaments, but rednead almost to ruins. b. probably at Gifford, East Lothian, 1605; d. at Edinburgh, 1572.

Knox, Rev Vicesimus, an English writer, pursued a brilliant career at St. John's College, Oxford, after which he became master of Tunbridge school, in Kent. He was an admired preacher in his day, and an excellent pastor. He published—"Moral and Literary Essays," in 1777; "Liberal Education; or, a Practical Treatise on the Methods of acquiring Useful and Polite Learning," in 1781; and "Elegant Extracts," in prose and verse, the latter enjoying the greatest popularity. He was likewise the author of several volumes of sermons and theological essays, and was an elegant and correct writer. b. in London, 1752; d. at Tunbridge, 1821.

Knoxton, Henry, ko'-lon, an English ecclesiastic and historian, who wrote a "Chronicle of the English History, from 950 to 1305;" also a "History of the Deposition of Richard II." He was a canon regular at Leicester.

Kobell, Franz von, ko'-bel, a German mineralogist and poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Munich, was appointed, at the age of 23, assistant professor of mineralogy in that learned establishment. In 1831 he completed his work on the "Characteristics of Minerals," and from that period produced a succession of valuable treatises on the same science. The principal of these, with the dates of publication, are—"Elements of Mineralogy," 1838; "Mineralogy," 1847; "Sketch of the Mineral Kingdom," 1850; "Mineralogical Nomenclature," 1853. For his eminent scientific services, he was appointed member of the Academy of Sciences of Bavaria, and chief conservator of the Munich mineralogical collection. His poetical efforts consist of a volume of lyrics in pure German, and several others in the Bavarian idiom, and in the patois of the Palatinate. These latter are marked by great liveliness, freshness, and grace, and are greatly admired for their piquancy both of thought and language. b. at Munich, 1803.

Kocz, Christopher William, kok, a native of Alsace, and professor of public jurisprudence at Strasburg, who chiefly occupied himself with genealogy, canon law, and history. He was interrupted in his studies for a time by the French revolution, for, having been elected a member of the Legislative Assembly, he opposed the Jacobins, which caused him to be imprisoned; on the fall of Robespierre, however, he was liberated, and resumed his old pursuits. He was the author of various works, among which may be mentioned his "View of the Revolutions of Europe." b. 1737; d. 1813.

Kooc, Joseph Anton, a celebrated German landscape painter, the son of poor parents, living in the valley of the Lech, in the south of Germany, was sent by bishop Umgelder, vicar-general of Augsburg, to the Carls-Academy at Stuttgart, where he spent seven years, and became an excellent painter of landscapes. He then went to Rome, where he settled and married, and enjoyed a great reputation for nearly half a century, being long regarded as the Nestor of German artists in that city. Although specially distinguished in landscape, Koch also painted other subjects, among which may be mentioned illustrations of Dante, "Hofer's Liberation of the Tyrol," "The Flight of Laban," &c. b. 1768; d. 1839.

Kock, Charles Paul de, kok, a French comic novelist, the son of a Dutch banker, was originally educated for commerce, and placed in a French banker's establishment. While thus engaged, he commenced writing, "he knew not why." He produced a great number of vaudevilles, operas, and melodramas, and afterwards wrote a novel, which being successful, the author went on composing similar works, displaying great fertility of invention, and was the author of a considerable amount of humorous fiction, which, unfortunately, is defaced by loose morality. b. at Passy, 1794.

Koenig, Daniel, ke(r)'neeg, a Swiss, who translated "Arbathnot's Tables of Coins" into Latin, printed at Utrecht, in 1758. He died of the ill-usage he received from the populace of Franeker, who mistook him for a French spy.

Koenig, Samuel, brother of the preceding, was professor of philosophy and law at Franeker, and librarian to the Prince of Orange. He was a great mathematician, and had a dispute with Maupertuis. b. 1757.

Koerren-Block, Joanna, ker'-ten, an ingenious Dutch lady, who had a taste for drawing in water-colours and for embroidery. She also modelled in wax, and made artificial ornaments and flowers; but her principal excellence was in cutting figures out of paper with scissors, and her portraits and landscapes executed in this way became so celebrated, that foreigners visited Amsterdam to see them; among the rest, Peter the Great of Russia. She made a magnificent work for the consort of the emperor Leopold I., consisting of trees, arms, eagles, and crowns, for which she received about 4000 guilders. She also executed the portrait of that emperor. b. at Amsterdam, 1650; d. 1715.

Kort, John George, kole, a German traveller and writer, who received a legal education at Göttingen, Heidelberg, and Munich. In 1822 he became tutor in the family of Baron Mademteuffel, and afterwards in that of Count Medem. He subsequently visited Courland, Livonia, St. Petersburg, Moscow, and the interior of Russia. Finally, taking up his residence at Dresden, he made tours from that city over nearly the whole of Europe. Among his most important works of travel, many of which have been translated into English, may be enumerated, "Sketches and Pictures of St. Petersburg," "Travels in Russia and Poland," and "Tours in England, in Scotland, and in Ireland." He has also written a "History of the Discovery of America." b. at Bremen, 1808.

Kolbe, or Kolben, Peter, kolbe, a traveller, studied at Halle, in 1700; soon after which he was sent by the king of Prussia to the Cape of Good Hope to make astronomical observations. He remained there ten years, and was afflicted with blindness, but recovered his sight on his return to Europe. He wrote a "Description of the Cape of Good Hope," and was the first who gave a full and circumstantial account of that colony. B. at Dorflas, in the principality of Bayreuth, 1674; D. 1726.

KOLLAR, Jan, kol-lar, a Bohemian poet and preacher, who originated the idea of Pan Slavism. He studied at Pesth and Jena, and subsequently became pastor of an Evangelical congregation at the former place. Between the years 1821 and 1835, he published several collections of poems, written in Bohemian, the object of which was to unite in one common bond of union the Slavonic nations. Sir John Bowring translated some of his sonnets; and in one of Kollar's works he wrote,—"This is a very remarkable book, and how its true and fiery spirit should have burst this Austrian censorship is altogether grand-vizier of Turkey during the minority of Amurath IV. He remained in power till his death. He was a sagacious governor, and filled the treasury, which had been emptied by the prodigality of the previous reigns. He was, however, cruel and relentless to those who gave him offence. D. 1661.

KOPROLI, Achmet, son of the preceding, succeeded his father as grand-vizier. He made war in Hungary, in 1662, and lost, in 1664, the battle of St. Gotthard, against Montecuculi, but concluded an advantageous peace at Temeswar. In 1669 he took Candia. D. 1675.

KOPROLI, Mustapha, son of the preceding, was grand-vizier under Soliman III. He made war in Hungary; he took Widin and Belgrade; he was killed at the battle of Salankemen, 1691.

KOPROLI, Nuhman, son of the preceding, was nominated by Achmet III. grand-vizier in 1710, but remained in power only two months. He was the victim of a strange hallucination, believing that he had a fly constantly on his nose. A French physician cured him, by feigning to perform an operation upon the feature, and afterwards showing him a dead fly, with which he had previously provided himself.

KORNER, Karl Theodor, kor-ner, an eminent German poet. In early youth, his health being delicate, he was not sent to a public school, but educated by private teachers. At the age of 17 he was sent to the School of Mines at Freiburg; subsequently completing his studies at Leipzig and Berlin. His health giving way, he was sent to Vienna, where, on his recovery, he engaged in poetical composition. He there wrote two plays for the Vienna stage—"The Bride" and the "Green Domino," which, meeting with some success, he produced two tragedies, one of which had for its subject the story of the English "Fair Rosamond." In 1813 he joined the celebrated volunteer corps of Major Lützow, organized to resist the French, and was severely wounded at the battle of Kitzon. In a subsequent engagement he was shot, on the road between Gadebusch and Schwerin, and buried under an oak-tree, on the trunk of which his name was engraved by his comrades. He is chiefly famous for his collection of warlike songs, called the "Lyre and Sword," mostly composed in the intervals of battles, or by the bivouac fire. His song, "Männer und Buben" (Men and Cowards), and his "Schwertlied" (Sword-Song), were, and are still, extremely popular with his countrymen. Lord F. Gower has given a fine translation of the latter song; and selections from his poems, dramas, and tales have been produced by Mr. G. F. Richardson. B. at Dresden, 1791; D. 1813.

KOSCIUSKO, Thaddeus, kos-ko-us-ko, the great Polish patriot, studied for the military profession, first at Warsaw, and afterwards at Paris; he then accompanied Lafayette to America, and fought against England on the side of the American colonists. On the conclusion of the war he returned to Poland, and was created major-general. In 1794 he was put at the head of the Polish army, when his countrymen attempted to gain their independence. In the same year he defeated the Russians at Racławice; but was himself beaten by the combined Russians and Prussians, in an engagement near Warsaw, shortly afterwards. KÖNIGSMARCK, Philip Christopher, Count, ke(r)-neech-mar-ke, a celebrated Swedish adventurer, was descended from an ancient noble family of Brandenburg, a branch of which had passed into Sweden, where it had produced many distinguished soldiers. Philip went to Hanover, where the elector Ernest Augustus appointed him colonel of a regiment of dragoons. The electoral prince, George Louis, afterwards George I. king of Great Britain, had married his cousin Sophia Dorothea, a beautiful, witty, and accomplished princess. This princess did not love her husband, whose cold, brutal nature repelled her. She bestowed her affections upon the handsome Swede. The pair were about to fly together to France, when Königsmarck was assassinated. Many incorrect versions of the tragedy were for a long time current in the works of various writers; but Mr. Thackeray, in his first lecture on the Four Georges, thus truthfully describes the event:—"Her husband was away at Berlin; her carriages and horses were prepared, and ready for the elopement. Meanwhile, the spies of Countess Platen had brought the news to their mistress. She went to Ernest Augustus, and procured from the elector an order for the arrest of the Swede. On the way by which he was to come, four guards were commissioned to take him. He strove to cut his way through the four men, and wounded more than one of them. They fell upon him, cut him down. . . . he was dispatched presently, his body burnt the next day, and all traces of the man disappeared." The princess was afterwards consigned to the castle of Ahlen, where she was confined for 32 years, "and her silent husband no more uttered her name." Königsmarck was slain in 1691.

KÖNIGSMARCK, Marie Aurora, Countess of, was sister of the above, and celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Despoiled of a succession to which she had a claim, she went to Dresden to enlist the services of Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony. That prince became inspired with a lively passion for her, to which she responded, and became the mother of the celebrated Marshal Saxe. On being abandoned soon afterwards, she retired into privacy, and exclusively occupied herself with the education of her son. B. about 1673; D. 1725.

Suwarrow, he marched forth to meet them at the head of 21,000 men. The Russians numbered about 60,000 men. The Poles were defeated, after a desperate battle; Kosciuszko being wounded, and taken prisoner, exclaiming "Finis Polonia." Warsaw was taken by storm shortly afterwards, and the Poles were completely subdued. The patriot was conducted to St. Petersburg, but was subsequently released by the emperor Paul, upon which he went to America. In 1798 he went to France, and was repeatedly solicited by Napoleon to join his standard; but he would not consent to leave his retirement. On the establishment of the new kingdom of Poland, in 1815, he wrote to the emperor Alexander, thanking him for his generosity. In 1816, he settled in Switzerland, and applied himself to the pursuits of agriculture. B. in Lithuania, 1766; D. in Switzerland, 1817.

KOSSUTH, Louis, Kos'-suth (kos-shoot), the late provisional governor of Hungary, was son of a small land proprietor in Northern Hungary, and was educated at the Protestant college of Sarospatak. In 1819 he began to study the law at the local court of Eperies, and the royal court of Pesth. Three years afterwards, having completed his legal education, he went to Monok, where he obtained a good practice. He left that place for Pesth in 1831, and was sent the following year, as representative of a magnate, to the Hungarian diet or parliament, in whose deliberations he was allowed to participate by speech, but without voting. The debates of the diet were soon afterwards circulated by Kossuth in manuscript, and were eagerly sought after; so popular, indeed, did they become, that he set up a lithographic printing-press, to multiply copies of the speeches to meet the demand for them. This proceeding soon became distasteful to the Austrian government, and Kossuth was compelled to abandon his lithographic printing; but he still continued to circulate manuscript reports. In 1836 a number of young men were imprisoned for alleged political conspiracy: Kossuth warmly defended them, and charged the prosecution with illegal procedure and injustice. For this he was himself arrested, brought to trial, and thrown into prison at Buda, remaining therein three years, from 1837 until 1840. His release was obtained in the latter year, through the Hungarian diet's refusal to grant the supplies until he was set free by the Austrian government. With the commencement of the year 1841 Kossuth brought out the first number of the "Pesti Hírlap" (Pesth Journal), which at starting was issued four times a week, and, soon after, daily. The success of the new journal was very great, the circulation at one period reaching the number of 10,000. About this time Kossuth married. Throughout the ensuing six years the "Pesth Journal" was a bold and unceasing opponent of the Austrian design of substituting for the constitutional government of Hungary, one based on the imperialist principles. In the diet, the liberal opposition, headed by Count Louis Batthyany, was likewise very decided. In 1847 Kossuth became the representative of the city of Pesth in the diet, and in March, 1848, he proposed that a deputation should be sent to the king of Hungary (the emperor of Austria), asking that a new ministry, composed of Hungarians, together with certain constitutional reforms, should be granted.

Kossuth

Kossuth was a member of this deputation, which reached Vienna soon after the minister, Prince Metternich, had quitted it, and while the city was in a most excited state. The deputation was received by the emperor, who acceded to their request, and decreed that a new and liberal ministry should be formed, with Count Louis Batthyany as president, and Kossuth as minister of finance. Many more reforms followed this decree, in the benefits of which the Servians and Croats participated with the Hungarians. The Servians and Croats were, at the outset, greatly pleased with the new concessions, but were soon afterwards led to believe, by Austrian agents, that Hungary sought to enslave them, and to destroy their religion and nationality. Accordingly, in June, 1848, they rose against the Hungarians, being secretly provided by Austria with arms and stores, and commanded by disguised officers of the Austrian army. Several desperate encounters took place on the frontiers, and many villages were laid waste. Kossuth, by his great eloquence and energy, roused his countrymen into fierce activity; ten battalions of Honveds, or defenders of home, were organized, and these, with some regiments of hussars and of the line, formed the nucleus of what was subsequently the great Hungarian army. Three months afterwards, Jellachich, ban of Croatia, invaded Hungary at the head of 30,000 Servians and Croats. (See JELACHICH.) He was met by the Hungarians, under Guyon and other leaders, and defeated. About the same time, Field Marshal Count Lemberg was sent from Vienna as commander-in-chief of the Hungarian army. He went to Pesth to assume his post; but the infuriated populace murdered him on the Buda-Pesth bridge. The rupture between Hungary and Austria was now complete, the parliament of the former addressing the nation in a "Remonstrance," which roused the entire population. In October, the Hungarian army crossed the frontier, and advanced to within a short distance of Vienna, but was then defeated. The Hungarian parliament now retired from Pesth to Debreczin, where they proclaimed the deposition of the house of Hapsburg, and the independence of Hungary. This measure, proposed by Kossuth, is said to have led to that great division among the Hungarians, which ultimately proved fatal to their cause. It certainly furnished to Görgei a pretext for surrendering unconditionally to the Russians. Kossuth was nominated by the parliament provisional governor of Hungary. Meantime, the Austrians, under Prince Windischgrätz, invaded Hungary. The Austrians were defeated in several engagements; but, in May, 1849, a Russian army entered Hungary, and closely pursued Görgei to Arad. In the south, the Hungarians were defeated by the Austrian army, under General Haynau, in August, 1849. On receiving news of this disaster, Kossuth resigned his civil and military power as dictator, to Görgei, who, on the 14th of the same month, surrendered himself and his whole army to the Russians. The Hungarian struggle was thus terminated. Kossuth fled into Turkey, and was detained as prisoner at Schumla, being subsequently sent to Kutayia, in Asia Minor. He remained in prison about two years, during which he, with the aid of Shakspeare and of Johnson's Dictionary, mastered the English language. In August, 1851, the ambassadors of the English and American governments obtained his release, despite the threats of Austria. He embarked at Smyrna in an American vessel, and arrived in England in October. He was received in London and the provincial towns with the utmost enthusiasm; his eloquent speeches, delivered in stirring English, exciting the greatest admiration. He sailed for the United States in November of the same year, but returned to England in 1852. During the Crimean war, he spoke at Sheffield, Nottingham, and other places; and continued to watch over the interests of his country. During the war between Austria and Italy, in 1866, he attempted to excite the Hungarians to revolt, but ultimately urged them to accept the concessions then offered by Austria. In 1867 he was elected deputy for Waitzen. b. at Monok, 1802.
